"We look at past records of the country in the treatment of people in their custody," he said.

DOJ_NMG_0038045

"In respect to Egypt, let me say that we welcome the progress that is occuring here in Egypt," he said refering to constitutional amendments recently passed.

Italy has accused CIA operatives of involvement in what it says was a clandestine operation to kidnap Egyptian national Abu Omar in 2003, handing him over to Egyptian authorities for interrogation.

The cleric -- who was under investigation in Italy as part of an inquiry into international terrorism -- was the imam of a Milan mosque which had been under close surveillance since the September 11, 2001 attacks in the United States.

He was snatched from the street in February 2003 and flown from a US military base in northern Italy to Egypt, where his supporters say he was tortured.

"We do have a legal obligation not to render someone back to a country where we know they might be mistreated or tortured,' Gonzales reiterated.

Gonzales, who is the first US attorney general to visit Egypt, said that his department will send a permanent envoy to Cairo to "further cement the relationship" between the two countries.

Earlier in the day, Gonzales discussed with Mubarak the situation in the Gaza strip, calling Mubarak's mediation efforts between the Israelis and the Palestinians "important in resolving this matter in a peaceful manner," in reference to the abduction Sunday of an Israeli soldier by Palestinian militants.

The Israeli army on Wednesday launched a large-scale offensive in the Gaza strip to rescue the soldier.

During his three-day visit, Gonzales met with justice minister Mahmud Abou Leil and interior minister Habib al-Adli.

Justice Kennedy Makes The Calls On Roberts Supreme Court (LAT)

By David G. Savage, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, July 2, 2006

WASHINGTON — John G. Roberts Jr. may be the new chief justice, but the Supreme Court is not truly the Roberts court, at least not yet.

In the most divisive cases before the court in the term that just ended, it was Justice Anthony M. Kennedy who determined the outcome every time. In unpredictable fashion, he sided some of the time with the court's conservative bloc and some of the time with its liberals.

His influence was dramatically displayed Thursday, when the court announced that it had struck down President Bush's specially created military tribunals for suspected terrorists.

As Justices Antonin Scalia and Clarence Thomas read their dissenting opinions in court that day, Roberts and Samuel A. Alito Jr., Bush's other new appointee, could do no more than listen in agreement.

It was 86-year-old John Paul Stevens, the court's last World War II veteran, who read the 5-3 majority opinion. He solemnly declared that the president was "bound to comply with the rule of law" and that he could not ignore congressional mandates and long-standing U.S military rules.

He paused to note that Kennedy, seated next to him, had joined most of his opinion, creating a majority. Liberals hailed the result, and conservatives lamented it.

While the issue before the court was the balance of power in government, the drama showed how little the balance of power within the high court itself had changed. Even when Roberts and Alito side with fellow conservatives Scalia and Thomas, they need a fifth vote to prevail.

For the last decade, Justices Kennedy and Sandra Day O'Connor, both Ronald Reagan appointees, had supplied the votes that decided the court's major cases. They usually joined with the conservatives on issues of crime, the death penalty, civil rights and states' rights, but with the liberals on abortion, gay rights and school prayer.

Now, with O'Connor in retirement, Kennedy stands alone at the center.

He voted with the conservatives more often than not, but joined the liberals in several major rulings. In one closely watched environmental case, Kennedy wrote a separate, solo opinion that was decisive.

On the issue of military tribunals, Kennedy made it clear that he shared the liberals' concern about unchecked presidential power.

DOJ_NMG_0038046

The Constitution created "a system where the single power of the executive is checked," he wrote. Even in a national emergency, he said, "the Constitution is best preserved by a reliance on standards tested over time and insulated from the pressure of the moment."

This does not mean that suspected terrorists cannot be tried in military tribunals, Kennedy said — but that Congress should first debate the issue and pass a law.

Kennedy is hardly in the camp of the liberals. Just the day before, he spoke for a five-member majority that upheld the mid-decade redistricting plan engineered by former House Majority Leader Tom DeLay for Texas' seats in the U.S. House of Representatives.

The four liberals, led by Stevens, say "partisan gerrymandering" is unconstitutional. The conservatives, led by Scalia, counter that politics inevitably plays a role in the drawing of electoral districts and that there is no fair way to decide how much politics is too much.

Kennedy came down in between. He says that he finds partisan gerrymandering troubling, but that the Texas plan was not so extreme as to be unconstitutional.

Before 2003, he pointed out, the Democrats had drawn electoral districts that gave them a slim majority of seats in Congress at a time when nearly 60% of Texans were voting Republican. Measured against that map, DeLay's plan "can be seen as fairer," Kennedy said.

Developers and property-rights activists hoped a more conservative court, bolstered by Roberts and Alito, would sharply limit the Army Corps of Engineers' control over hundreds of millions of acres of wetlands. Environmentalists feared the same.

Scalia wrote an opinion to do just that, and he was joined by Roberts, Thomas and Alito. He said federal environmental protection extended only to wetlands that were part of a continuously flowing stream. This would exclude many wetlands in the middle part of the nation and nearly all of those in West, where streams are dry for much of the year.

But in this case, Kennedy refused to go along. Instead, he wrote in a separate opinion that wetlands could be protected as long as environmentalists could show that filling them or draining them would affect downstream waters.

Earlier this year, Kennedy and O'Connor thwarted the Bush administration's move to void the nation's only "right to die" law. Oregon's voters had twice approved a measure that allowed dying people to obtain a dose of lethal medication from their doctors.

Bush's first attorney general, John Ashcroft, reinterpreted the federal drug control law and said it empowered him to strip Oregon's doctors of their right to prescribe medication.

In January, Kennedy, speaking for the court, overturned Ashcroft's order. The administration's position, he said, would "delegate to a single executive officer the power to effect a radical shift of authority from the states to the federal government to define general standards of medical practice in every locality."

Had Kennedy agreed with Roberts, Scalia and Thomas to support Ashcroft's view, the court would have split 4-4 and could have held the case until the next month, when Alito took O'Connor's seat. Then a 5-4 majority could have ruled in the administration's favor.

Kennedy, who turns 70 this month, joined the court after a tumultuous confirmation battle. In 1987, Reagan's first nominee, Robert H. Bork, was defeated in the Senate. His second, Douglas H. Ginsburg, withdrew after reports that he had smoked marijuana regularly as a law professor.

Kennedy, a Sacramento native with a reputation as a straight arrow, was nominated next and won unanimous confirmation in the Senate.

At first, he looked to be a reliable conservative, voting regularly with then-Chief Justice William H. Rehnquist. But in 1992, he split with the conservatives and voted with O'Connor to uphold the right to abortion and to maintain the strict ban on school-sponsored prayers.

Since then, many on the right have portrayed him as a traitor. Their ire grew in recent years when Kennedy voted to strike down the death penalty for defendants who are mentally retarded or younger than 18 at the time of the crime.

He also wrote the court's two major rulings in favor of gay rights. In one, he said gay and lesbian couples deserved respect and dignity, not condemnation by law. Scalia denounced his opinion as the first step toward same-sex marriage.

DOJ_NMG_0038047

Despite the fiery exchanges over social issues, Kennedy has some conservative views that could loom large in the years ahead. For example, he has voted regularly against affirmative action, arguing that the government should not rely on race in making decisions. In the fall, the court will consider a challenge to voluntary school integration programs, and Kennedy could create a majority for the conservative bloc.

Last year, he voted to uphold the display of the Ten Commandments on public property. O'Connor joined a 5-4 majority to strike down such displays. Now, with Alito having replaced her, the court, with Kennedy, appears to have a majority to uphold religious displays.

The abortion issue also appears to turn on Kennedy's vote. Though he agreed in 1992 to maintain the legal right of women to choose abortion, he also said states had considerable authority to regulate it.

Six years ago, he disagreed with O'Connor when the court struck down a Nebraska law that banned intact dilation and extraction, which opponents call "partial-birth abortion." Kennedy called the practice "abhorrent" and similar to infanticide.

Congress then passed a federal ban on this form of abortion. It was struck down by federal courts relying on the Nebraska ruling.

This fall, the Supreme Court will take up an appeal. Kennedy, as usual, will probably hold the deciding vote.

*

(INFOBOX BELOW)

Major decisions this session

Key Supreme Court decisions in the just-concluded 2005-2006 session, and how the justices voted:

War on terrorism

President Bush overstepped his authority when he set up special military courts to try Al Qaeda suspects without the approval of Congress, the court said in Hamdan vs. Rumsfeld. These tribunals at Guantanamo Bay lack basic standards of fairness, the 5-3 majority said.

Justice John Paul Stevens wrote the opinion and was joined by Anthony M. Kennedy, David H. Souter, Ruth Bader Ginsburg and Stephen G. Breyer. Justices Antonin Scalia, Clarence Thomas and Samuel A. Alito Jr. dissented. Chief Justice John G. Roberts Jr. did not participate because he had ruled on the case when it was before the U.S. appeals court.

End of life

Doctors in Oregon may prescribe lethal medication for people who are terminally ill and near death, the court said in Gonzales vs. Oregon. The 6-3 ruling upheld the nation's only "right to die" law and rejected a Bush administration order that would have stripped doctors of their license to prescribe drugs.

Kennedy wrote the opinion, joined by Stevens, Souter, Ginsburg, O'Connor and Breyer. Scalia, Thomas and Roberts dissented.

Wetlands

Federal environmental regulators may protect most wetlands from development if they can show that these swampy areas have some impact on the nation's rivers and lakes. The split ruling in Rapanos vs. U.S. rejected a move by property rights advocates to sharply cut back on environmental protection.

Kennedy wrote the key concurring opinion, and Stevens, Souter, Ginsburg and Breyer sided with the government. Scalia, Roberts, Thomas and Alito would have limited the protection for wetlands.

Redistricting

State lawmakers have broad power to redraw the lines of electoral districts to benefit the party in power, the court said. The five-member majority rejected a charge of "partisan gerrymandering" lodged against the Texas Republicans and former House Majority Leader Tom DeLay for a mid-decade change that gave the GOP six additional seats in Congress.

Kennedy wrote the opinion in League of United Latin American Citizens vs. Perry, and Roberts, Scalia, Thomas and Alito agreed with him.

Campaign funding

DOJ_NMG_0038048

The government may not cap how much candidates spend for their campaigns, and contribution limits are illegal if they are too low, the court said in striking down a novel Vermont law. The 6-3 ruling was a defeat for liberal reformers who wanted to lessen the impact of money in politics.

Breyer wrote the opinion in Randall vs. Sorrell, and Roberts, Alito, Scalia, Kennedy and Thomas agreed with him.

Whistle-blowers

Public employees do not have a free-speech right to complain about serious wrongdoing in the workplace, the court said in Garcetti vs. Ceballos. The 1st Amendment protects employees when they speak out in public as citizens, but not for internal matters, the court said in its 5-4 ruling.

Kennedy wrote for the majority, which included Roberts, Scalia, Thomas and Alito. Stevens, Souter, Ginsburg and Breyer dissented.

Graphics reporting by David Savage

Kennedy Reigns Supreme On Court (WP)

By Charles Lane

The Washington Post, July 2, 2006

With O'Connor's Departure, Sole Swing Voter Wields His Moderating Force

It was the O'Connor court. Now it may be the Kennedy court.

The Supreme Court's just-concluded 2005-2006 term was a historic one, in which two new justices, Chief Justice John G. Roberts Jr. and Samuel A. Alito Jr., changed the court's style and ideological balance.

But by the end of the term, it was clear that the main impact of the turnover was to enhance the influence of a justice who has been at the court since 1988, 69-year-old Anthony M. Kennedy.

With the departure of centrist Justice Sandra Day O'Connor, the court is now frequently split between two four-justice liberal and conservative blocs, with Kennedy as the sole remaining swing voter.

An eclectic and sometimes inscrutable moderate conservative, Kennedy repeatedly cast the decisive vote on the most polarizing issues the court faced, from President Bush's military commissions, to the Clean Water Act, to the death penalty. He is poised to do so again next term when the court takes up the issues of abortion and school integration.

"Justice Kennedy seems to be asserting himself more and seems to be relishing the role," said Richard Lazarus, a law professor at Georgetown University who heads the school's Supreme Court Institute. "All the justices enjoy being more significant rather than less significant, and he has certainly asserted his role as a moderating force on both sides."

In the 17 cases during the 2005-2006 term that were decided by five-vote majorities, Kennedy was on the winning side 12 times, more than any other justice, according to figures compiled by the Supreme Court Institute.

In six of those cases, Kennedy voted with the conservative bloc, made up of Roberts, Alito, Antonin Scalia and Clarence Thomas. As a result, the court upheld most of Texas's Republican-drafted redistricting plan, restored the death penalty in Kansas, and ruled that police do not have to throw out evidence they gather in illegal no-knock searches.

But four times, Kennedy, a 1988 appointee of President Ronald Reagan, defected to the liberal justices, John Paul Stevens, David H. Souter, Ruth Bader Ginsburg and Stephen G. Breyer.

As a result, the court not only struck down Bush's military commissions, but also ruled that the police need permission from both occupants to search a home without a warrant, gave a Tennessee death row inmate a chance to win a new trial, and said that Texas violated the Voting Rights Act by diluting the voting power of Latino Democrats in one district. (Twice Kennedy was part of mixed left-right coalitions.)

Roberts voted in 10 five-justice majorities, the second-most on the court, but he joined the four liberals only once, in a minor procedural case.

The "swing voter" role is not entirely new to Kennedy, who has been in that position before, along with O'Connor.

Indeed, Kennedy is disliked by many conservatives because he has voted with liberals to uphold gay rights and abortion rights, and to strike down the juvenile death penalty.

DOJ_NMG_0038049

But since O'Connor retired from the court Jan. 31, and Alito, who replaced her, has lived up to his conservative billing, Kennedy has been all alone as the swing voter -- with the added clout, and added pressure, that implies.

O'Connor used to tell audiences that, at the court, "we decide what cases to hear, and then we decide 'em." Though she often ruled only narrowly, she did not agonize.

Kennedy, by contrast, has been known to brood or to switch his vote in the middle of a case -- though he is more inclined than O'Connor was to rule broadly once he comes to a conclusion. He is a passionate free-speech advocate, and has a consistent record of opposing affirmative action.

While O'Connor saw herself as a fact-oriented problem-solver, Lazarus says, Kennedy "views himself as a major intellectual force."

More than some other justices, "Kennedy sees real values in conflict in the court's cases, and it's a question how you negotiate it," said Neil Siegel, who served as a Supreme Court law clerk in the 2003-2004 term and now teaches at Duke University's law school. "Sometimes he does it well and skillfully, and sometimes he just can't make up his mind and the legal system gets stuck in a kind of vertigo."

In the military commission case, Kennedy ruled unequivocally, joining almost all of Stevens's broad opinion. His few reservations came in a concurring opinion that also contained Kennedy's admonition that "concentration of power puts personal liberty in peril of arbitrary action by officials."

But at other times this term, Kennedy cut difficult issues very fine, drawing criticism from his colleagues.

In a key case on the scope of the Clean Water Act, Kennedy refused to join either the conservatives, who voted as a bloc to scale back federal power to regulate wetlands, or the liberals, who wanted to leave it intact.

Kennedy instead wrote a long opinion of his own. He agreed with the conservatives that a lower court had mistakenly allowed the federal government to block development on two Michigan properties, but disagreed with them about why. He said the lower court should reconsider the issue under a new legal test -- one that most analysts thought would end up producing the same result the liberals wanted anyway.

Kennedy's opinion would not change wetlands protection in the long run, Stevens wrote in a dissenting opinion joined by the three other liberals, but "will have the effect of creating additional work for all concerned parties."

Scalia, joined by the three conservatives, called Kennedy's proposal "perfectly opaque."

"He is a man in the middle, and the man in the middle is fully capable of causing muddle," said Douglas A. Kmiec, a Pepperdine University law professor.

The pressure on Kennedy could mount next term, when the court will rule on the constitutionality of a federal law banning the procedure opponents call "partial birth" abortion, and will decide whether local governments may consider students' race when assigning them to public schools.

Though Kennedy is on record in favor of Roe v. Wade , the 1973 decision that recognized a right to abortion, he dissented angrily from a 5 to 4 ruling in 2000 that struck down a state law banning partial-birth abortion.

That would seem to commit him to upholding the federal ban, legal analysts said, except that the 2000 case is binding precedent and Kennedy may "be acutely aware of a mere personnel change on the court causing a radical shift," Siegel said.

Kennedy has always voted against affirmative action, most recently in 2003 when he voted against race-conscious admissions policies at the University of Michigan's law school and undergraduate program.

But the cases the court has agreed to hear next term involve compulsory public education for students as young as kindergarten age. They also present the problem of how public schools can avoid resegregation, at a time when residential segregation persists and court-ordered school desegregation is largely a thing of the past.

Under the circumstances, legal analysts do not all agree that Kennedy necessarily relishes his situation.

"I'm not certain it's an enviable position to be in," Siegel said. "It's quite a burden to bear."

Roberts Is At Court's Helm, But He Isn't Yet In Control (NYT)

By Linda Greenhouse

The New York Times, July 2, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0038050

WASHINGTON, July 1 — As the dust settled on a consequential Supreme Court term, the first in 11 years with a change in membership and the first in two decades with a new chief justice, one question that lingered was whether it was now the Roberts court, in fact as well as in name.

The answer: not yet.

Chief Justice John G. Roberts Jr. was clearly in charge, presiding over the court with grace, wit and meticulous preparation. But he was not in control.

In the court's most significant nonunanimous cases, Chief Justice Roberts was in dissent almost as often as he was in the majority. His goal of inspiring the court to speak softly and unanimously seemed a distant aspiration as important cases failed to produce majority opinions and members of the court, including occasionally the chief justice himself, gave voice to their frustration and pique with colleagues who did not see things their way.

The term's closing weeks were particularly ragged. The court issued no decision in a major patent case that had drawn intense interest from the business community, announcing two months after the argument, over the dissents of three justices, that the case had been "improvidently granted" — they should not have agreed to decide it — in the first place.

So if it wasn't yet the Roberts court, what exactly was it?

Perhaps it was the Kennedy court, based on the frequency with which Justice Anthony M. Kennedy cast the deciding vote in important cases.

Or perhaps it was more accurately seen as the Stevens court, reflecting the ability of John Paul Stevens, the senior associate justice in tenure as well as in age, to deliver a majority in the case for which the term will go down in history, the decision on military commissions that rejected the Bush administration's view of open-ended presidential authority.

Chief Justice Roberts did not participate in that case because he had ruled on it a year earlier as an appeals court judge. Based on his vote to uphold the administration's position then, he almost certainly would have joined Justices Antonin Scalia, Clarence Thomas and Samuel A. Alito Jr., the newest member of the court, in dissent.

If none of these labels — Roberts court, Kennedy court, Stevens court — seem to fit precisely, it is probably because what the Supreme Court really was in its 2005-6 term was a court in transition.

For the justices, it was a time of testing, of battles joined and battles, for the moment, postponed.

The term's early period of unanimity, during which cases on such contentious subjects as abortion and federalism were dispatched quickly, with narrowly phrased opinions, reflected agreement not on the underlying legal principles but rather on the desirability of moving on without getting bogged down in a fruitless search for common ground. This was especially so in the term's early months, when Justice Sandra Day O'Connor was still sitting but was counting the days until a new justice could take her place.

Once Justice O'Connor retired in late January, after Justice Alito's confirmation, and as the court moved into the heart of the term, some of the court's early inhibitions seemed to fall away. Yet when its most conservative members reached out aggressively to test the boundaries of consensus in the term's major environmental case, Justice Kennedy unexpectedly pushed back and left them well short of their goal.

In that case, Chief Justice Roberts along with Justices Alito, Scalia and Thomas tried to cut back on federal regulators' expansive view of their authority under the Clean Water Act to define wetlands.

Justice Kennedy also deserted the conservatives in a redistricting case from Texas when he found a violation of the Voting Rights Act in the dismantling of a Congressional district that had previously had a Mexican-American majority. The action of the Republican-led Texas Legislature had deprived the Latinos of the ability to elect the candidate of their choice, Justice Kennedy said, leaving Chief Justice Roberts to complain in dissent, "It is a sordid business, this divvying us up by race."

Nonetheless, there was little doubt that in its transition, the court was becoming more conservative. A statistical analysis by Jason Harrow on the Scotusblog Web site showed that Justice Alito voted with the conservative justices 15 percent more often than Justice O'Connor had.

A separate analysis, by the Supreme Court Institute at Georgetown University Law Center, showed that Justice Alito and Chief Justice Roberts had the highest agreement rate of any two justices in the court's nonunanimous cases, 88 percent, slightly higher than the agreement rate between Justice O'Connor and Justice David H. Souter in the first half of the term, 87.5 percent.

DOJ_NMG_0038051

Chief Justice Roberts agreed with Justice Scalia in 77.5 percent of the nonunanimous cases and with Justice Stevens, arguably the court's most liberal member, only 35 percent of the time. The least agreement between any pair of justices was between Justices Alito and Stevens, 23.1 percent.

The court decided 69 cases with signed opinions in the term that began on Oct. 3 and ended on June 29. Nearly half were decided without dissent, a greater number than usual, although not dramatically so. Sixteen cases were decided by five-justice majorities, either 5 to 4 or 5 to 3, a proportion very close to the 10-year average.

One measure of the court's shift to the right is in dissenting votes. In the previous term, the justice who dissented least often was Stephen G. Breyer, who dissented in 10 of the term's 74 decisions. But this term, he had the second-highest number of dissents, 16; Justice Stevens had the most, 19. Justice Thomas and Justices Ruth Bader Ginsburg and Souter were also frequent dissenters. Of those who served the full term, Chief Justice Roberts had the fewest dissents, seven. Justice Kennedy had the second fewest, with nine.

Chief Justice Roberts's dissents, while few, came in some important cases. In addition to dissenting from the Voting Rights Act portion of the Texas redistricting decision, he also dissented from a decision reopening a 20-year-old death penalty case on the basis of new evidence; a federalism case, in which the majority found the states not immune from private bankruptcy suits; and a ruling that invalidated the personal assertion of authority by John Ashcroft, the former attorney general, to penalize doctors in Oregon who follow that state's Death With Dignity Act and prescribe lethal doses of medication for terminally ill patients who request it.

The court's next term, which begins Oct. 2, looms as a major test of the justices' fortitude and ability to work together, with cases challenging precedents on abortion and affirmative action already on the docket.

With the court having indicated in Hamdan v. Rumsfeld, the military commission case, that lawsuits now pending in the lower courts on behalf of dozens of detainees at Guantánamo Bay, Cuba, are still alive, the justices are likely to have further opportunities to address the profound issues of presidential power and judicial authority that these cases raise. This time, the chief justice will not need to stay silent, and the country that is just getting to know him will hear his voice.

Following are summaries of the term's major rulings.

Presidential Power

The court repudiated the Bush administration's plan to use military commissions to try Guantánamo detainees, ruling 5 to 3 that the commissions were unauthorized by statute and violated a provision of the Geneva Conventions.

The majority opinion in Hamdan v. Rumsfeld, No. 05-184, by Justice Stevens, set minimum procedural protections that any future commissions, even those authorized by Congress, would have to provide. Justices Kennedy, Souter, Ginsburg and Breyer joined the opinion. Justices Scalia, Thomas and Alito dissented. Chief Justice Roberts, who had voted as an appeals court judge to uphold the commissions, did not participate.

Elections

A splintered decision rejected a challenge to the Republican-driven mid-decade redistricting of Texas's Congressional map, finding that it was not an impermissible partisan gerrymander. Justice Kennedy wrote the opinion in League of United Latin American Citizens v. Perry, No. 05-204. Agreeing with the judgment on the gerrymander challenge were Chief Justice Roberts and Justices Alito, Scalia and Thomas. Justices Stevens and Breyer dissented. Justices Souter and Ginsburg expressed no view on the issue, making the vote 5 to 2 to 2.

In the same case, the court ruled that the dismantling of a district in southwestern Texas with a Latino majority, an action the State Legislature had taken to shore up the faltering prospects of the Republican incumbent, violated the Voting Rights Act. On this question, Justice Kennedy spoke for a 5-to-4 majority that included Justices Stevens, Souter, Ginsburg and Breyer.

The court voted 6 to 3 to strike down Vermont's campaign finance law, which both limited the amount that candidates could spend on their own campaigns and placed the country's lowest ceilings on contributions to candidates from individuals and political parties.

The fragmented majority did not offer a unified approach to contribution limits, leaving the court's path in this area uncertain. Justice Breyer wrote the controlling opinion in the case, Randall v. Sorrell, No. 04-1528, joined by Chief Justice Roberts and Justice Alito. Justices Kennedy, Thomas and Scalia joined the judgment.

DOJ_NMG_0038052

Criminal Law

In Georgia v. Randolph, No. 04-1067, the court held that when the police lack a search warrant, they cannot enter a home if one occupant objects, even if another occupant gives permission. The vote was 5 to 3, with Justice Alito not participating. In his majority opinion, Justice Souter said the decision comported with "widely shared social expectations" about privacy in the home. Chief Justice Roberts filed his first dissenting opinion in this case. Justices Scalia and Thomas also voted in dissent.

The court ruled that evidence the police find when they search a home to execute a search warrant can be admitted in court despite an officer's failure to observe the constitutional requirement to "knock and announce" before entering. Justice Scalia, writing for the 5-to-4 majority, said the ordinary rule against admitting unconstitutionally obtained evidence should not apply in this circumstance — nor, he implied, in many other circumstances currently governed by the "exclusionary rule."

This case, Hudson v. Michigan, No. 04-1360, was argued for a second time after Justice Alito joined the court; his vote with the majority determined the outcome. The others in the majority were Chief Justice Roberts and Justices Thomas and Kennedy.

The court was unanimous in ruling that inmates facing execution by lethal injection can invoke a federal civil rights law to challenge the state's choice of drugs and the manner in which they are administered. The decision, Hill v. McDonough, No. 05-8794, opened the door to lawsuits that would be prohibited by tight restrictions on petitions for habeas corpus. Justice Kennedy wrote the opinion.

The court ruled 5 to 3 that new evidence in a Tennessee murder case, including DNA evidence, sufficiently undermined the prosecution's theory of the case to require a new federal court hearing for the man who was convicted and sentenced to death for the crime 21 years ago.

The case, House v. Bell, No. 04-8990, was the first in which the court factored the results of modern DNA testing into consideration of whether a prisoner might qualify for a chance at habeas corpus that would otherwise be prohibited by procedural obstacles. Justice Kennedy wrote for the majority. Chief Justice Roberts dissented, along with Justices Scalia and Thomas. Justice Alito did not participate.

The court ruled 6 to 3 that foreign criminal defendants who have not been notified of their right under an international treaty to contact one of their country's diplomats are not entitled to special accommodation from courts in the United States. The decision, Sanchez-Llamas v. Oregon, No. 04-10566, rejected claims brought under the Vienna Convention on Consular Relations by foreign citizens convicted in Oregon and Virginia. Chief Justice Roberts wrote for the majority. Justices Breyer, Stevens and Souter dissented.

In a unanimous opinion, the court ordered a new trial for an inmate on South Carolina's death row on the ground that an evidentiary rule used in that state's courts had prevented the inmate from putting on a complete defense. Justice Alito, writing his first opinion for the court, said the rule was irrational and arbitrary. The case was Holmes v. South Carolina, No. 04-1327.

The court was deeply split on a basic question of death penalty law: the validity of the death penalty statute in Kansas under which a death sentence is automatic if the jury finds that the mitigating evidence and aggravating evidence are of equal weight. Voting 5 to 4 in an opinion by Justice Thomas, the court upheld the law, which the State Supreme Court had declared unconstitutional. Justice Alito's vote, following a reargument after he joined the court, made the difference. Justices Souter, Stevens, Ginsburg and Breyer dissented in the case, Kansas v. Marsh, No. 04-1170.

The court considered defendants' rights to cross-examine the state's witnesses, a right protected by the Confrontation Clause of the Sixth Amendment, in a pair of cases that were decided in a single opinion by Justice Scalia.

In the first part of the opinion in Davis v. Washington, No. 05-5224, the court was unanimous in ruling that a crime victim's emergency telephone call to 911 can be introduced as evidence at trial, even if the victim is not present for cross-examination, because a call to 911 does not produce the kind of "testimonial statement" to which the Confrontation Clause is addressed.

The court then went on to hold, by a vote of 8 to 1, with Justice Thomas dissenting, that a crime victim's statement to police officers who arrive at a scene should be considered "testimonial" if the police are investigating the crime rather than providing emergency assistance. Such a statement should therefore be banned from the trial if the person who gave it is not available for cross-examination, Justice Scalia said.

In another Sixth Amendment case, on the right to the assistance of counsel, the court ruled 5 to 4 that defendants who are wrongly deprived of the right to hire a lawyer of their choice are entitled to have a conviction overturned without the need to show that the first-choice lawyer would have achieved a better result. Justice Scalia wrote the opinion in the case, United States v. Gonzalez-Lopez, No. 05-352, joined by Justices Stevens, Souter, Ginsburg and Breyer.

DOJ_NMG_0038053

Government Authority

The court ruled 6 to 3 that John Ashcroft, the former attorney general, acted without legal authority when he declared that doctors in Oregon who followed the procedures of that state's Death With Dignity Act to help patients commit suicide would lose their federal prescription rights and thus forfeit, as a practical matter, their ability to practice medicine.

No statute authorized the attorney general to take such action unilaterally contrary to "the background principles of our federal system," Justice Kennedy said in the majority opinion. The decision, Gonzales v. Oregon, No. 04-623, was a rebuff of the Bush administration, which had embraced Mr. Ashcroft's personal fight against assisted suicide and carried on the case after he left the government.

Chief Justice Roberts joined a dissenting opinion written by Justice Scalia. Justice Thomas also dissented. Justice Alito was not yet on the court when the case was decided, with Justice O'Connor in the majority, on January 17.

A pair of decisions on the question of state immunity from suit, also issued in January, before Justice Alito joined the court, gave strong indications that the Rehnquist court's federalism battles were far from over.

The court was unanimous in permitting a disabled Georgia prison inmate's lawsuit against the state to go forward under the Americans With Disabilities Act. But the unanimity was achieved only because the court limited the decision, Goodman v. Georgia, No. 04-1203, to little more than the statement of a truism: that Congress has the power to make the states liable to lawsuit when they violate the Constitution.

In this case, the inmate claimed that his mistreatment had been so egregious as to violate not only the disabilities law, but also the Constitution. Justice Scalia's opinion said that to this extent, the lawsuit could proceed.

In the second decision, the court split 5 to 4 in ruling that states are not immune from private lawsuits brought under federal bankruptcy law. Justice O'Connor joined the majority opinion by Justice Stevens in this case, Central Virginia Community College v. Katz, No. 04-885. The dissenters were Chief Justice Roberts and Justices Scalia, Kennedy and Thomas, who wrote the dissenting opinion supporting state immunity.

The court ruled that as a matter of constitutional due process, the government must take reasonable steps to make sure that homeowners have been notified before it sells a house for nonpayment of taxes. Chief Justice Roberts wrote for the 5-to-3 majority in this case, Jones v. Flowers, No. 04-1477. Justices Thomas, Scalia and Kennedy dissented, and Justice Alito did not participate.

The justices ruled 7 to 1 that the Postal Service may be sued by people who trip over packages that letter carriers have carelessly left in their path. The majority opinion by Justice Kennedy in this case, Dolan v. United States Postal Service, No. 04-848, was based on an interpretation of the Federal Tort Claims Act, not on the Constitution. Justice Thomas dissented, and Justice Alito did not participate.

Environment

A fractured decision in the term's major environmental case, defining federal jurisdiction over wetlands in the Clean Water Act, did not produce a majority opinion but did retain the ability of the government to continue enforcing the 1972 statute vigorously.

The court split 4 to 1 to 4 in the case, Rapanos v. United States, No. 04-1034, with Justice Kennedy in the middle. One group of four — Justices Scalia, Thomas and Alito, and Chief Justice Roberts — denounced federal regulators' open-ended approach to wetlands as "beyond parody" and would have redefined the term to land adjacent to open water and actually wet most of the time.

The other foursome, Justices Stevens, Souter, Ginsburg and Breyer, would have deferred to the longstanding judgment of the Army Corps of Engineers that a "wetland" can often appear dry and can be miles from a body of water, as long as it sometimes performs a filtering or runoff-control function. Justice Kennedy voted with the first group to send the case back to a lower court, but he proposed a standard much closer to that of the Stevens group.

DOJ_NMG_0038054

In a second case under the Clean Water Act, the court ruled unanimously that operators of hydroelectric dams must meet a state's water quality requirements to qualify for a federal license. Justice Souter wrote the opinion in this case, S. D. Warren Company v. Maine Board of Environmental Protection, No. 04-1527.

Religion

In a significant application of the Religious Freedom Restoration Act, the court ruled 8 to 0 that a small religious sect based in Brazil has the right to import a hallucinogenic tea that the federal government had wanted to seize as a banned narcotic.

The tea, known as hoasca, is central to the sect's rituals, Chief Justice Roberts noted in his opinion for the court. He said the government had not met the religious freedom act's demanding standard for applying a generally applicable law — federal narcotics law, in this instance — in a way that impinges on religious observance. Justice Alito did not participate in the case, Gonzales v. O Centro Espírita Beneficente União do Vegetal, No. 04-1084.

Education

Voting 8 to 0, the court upheld a federal law that requires universities to forfeit all federal financing if any part of the university does not provide military recruiters with the same access to students as it provides other potential employers.

The law, known as the Solomon Amendment, was challenged by a coalition of law schools that objected to the military's exclusion of openly gay men and women. The law schools argued that their First Amendment rights to free speech and association had been violated by the requirement that they open their doors to military recruiters.

Writing for the court in this case, Rumsfeld v. Forum for Academic and Institutional Rights, No. 04-1152, Chief Justice Roberts said the speech in question was that of the government, not of the law schools, which he noted remained free to criticize the military and to express their views on its policies. Justice Alito did not participate.

The court ruled 6 to 2 that parents who disagree with a public school system's special-education plan for their children have the legal burden of proving that the plan will fail to provide the "appropriate" education that a federal law guarantees to children with disabilities. Justice O'Connor wrote the decision in the case, Schaffer v. Weast, No. 04-698. Chief Justice Roberts did not participate, and Justice Alito was not yet on the court.

Separately, the court ruled 6 to 3 that parents who prevail at a special-education hearing are not entitled to reimbursement for the cost of hiring expert witnesses. Justice Alito wrote this opinion, Arlington Central School District v. Murphy, No. 05-18. Justices Souter, Breyer and Stevens dissented.

Employees' Rights

The court gave employees substantially enhanced protection against retaliation for complaining about discrimination on the job. Justice Breyer wrote the opinion in the case, Burlington Northern & Santa Fe Railway Company v. White, No. 05-259, which interpreted the anti-retaliation provision of the Civil Rights Act of 1964.

The court defined retaliation broadly as any "materially adverse" employment action that "might have dissuaded a reasonable worker" from making the complaint. Eight justices joined the majority opinion, and Justice Alito filed a separate concurring opinion.

Addressing the free-speech rights of government workers, the court ruled 5 to 4 that the Constitution does not protect public employees against retaliation for what they say in the course of performing their assigned duties.

Justice Kennedy's majority opinion in this case, Garcetti v. Ceballos, No. 04-473, drew a distinction between public employees' official speech, which he said supervisors were entitled to control, and their speech as citizens contributing to "civic discourse," for which they retained constitutional protection. The dissenters were Justices Stevens, Souter, Breyer and Ginsburg.

Abortion

The justices papered over, at least for this term, their fundamental differences on abortion, ruling narrowly and unanimously in a case from New Hampshire on access to abortion for teenagers facing medical emergencies. In an opinion by Justice O'Connor, her last before leaving the bench, the court reaffirmed that a medical-emergency exception was constitutionally required in a law that placed obstacles, like a parental-notice requirement and a waiting period, in the path of teenagers seeking abortions.

The more difficult question in the case, Ayotte v. Planned Parenthood of Northern New England, No. 04-1144, was that of what to do about New Hampshire's failure to include such an exception in its parental notice law. The justices sent the case back to the federal appeals court in Boston, which had banned enforcement of the law in its entirety, even for teenagers not facing a medical emergency.

DOJ_NMG_0038055

That "most blunt remedy" would be justified, Justice O'Connor said, only if it was clear that New Hampshire's legislature, which enacted the law in 2003, would have preferred no law at all to one with the necessary health exception. Otherwise, she said, the appeals court should come up with a more limited remedy for the constitutional problem.

Patents

Indicating new interest in intellectual property law, the justices considered several patent cases but failed to offer much guidance in this burgeoning legal area.

The court handed a limited victory to eBay in its patent dispute with MercExchange, which successfully sued eBay for patent infringement on the method behind the online auction company's "Buy It Now" feature. The United States Court of Appeals for the Federal Circuit, which has sole jurisdiction over patent appeals, then granted an injunction against eBay's use of the technology, under the view that an injunction should automatically follow a finding of infringement.

In a unanimous opinion by Justice Thomas, the justices instructed the appeals court to make a case-by-case determination rather than apply an automatic injunction rule. But the opinion, eBay v. MercExchange, No. 05-130, left it unclear what presumptions and factors should go into that determination, and it was evident that the justices themselves had not agreed on a standard.

A Supreme Court Of One (WP)

By Dahlia Lithwick

The Washington Post, July 2, 2006

The new John G. Roberts Supreme Court is only one term old, and already we're all wrong about it.

Liberals had feared, and conservatives had feted, the end of judicial review as we know it, at least until last week's blockbuster ruling in Hamdan v. Rumsfeld proved that bit of conventional wisdom wrong practically before it had become conventional. Predictions of a new era of hands-off judicial minimalism may have been premature.

Yes, we are seeing the expected shift to the political right with the replacement of moderate Justice Sandra Day O'Connor by conservative Justice Samuel A. Alito Jr. But, more significant, the role of swing justice has itself swung from O'Connor to Justice Anthony M. Kennedy. On all the most divisive issues, today's court is now a Supreme Court of One.

Yes, Kennedy, 69 and on the court for 18 years, has inherited the power to decide crucial cases, and this term he showed us what that might mean. In Hamdan, he joined with the court's left wing to invalidate the military tribunals President Bush had concocted for the detainees at Guantanamo Bay, Cuba. And the majority opinion he joined, written by Justice John Paul Stevens, was neither minimalist nor mild: "In undertaking to try Hamdan and subject him to criminal punishment, the Executive is bound to comply with the Rule of Law that prevails in this jurisdiction."

But more crucial, Kennedy has appropriated O'Connor's trick of writing an opinion or a concurrence that goes on to become the law of the land. O'Connor was famous (and not always in a good way) for signing onto an opinion, but on narrower grounds than the four other justices in the majority. The trick is that the justice who decides the case most narrowly speaks for the whole court. And that's how O'Connor imprinted her views on an awful lot of jurisprudence.

But unlike O'Connor, who invariably pooh-poohed her pivotal role on the court by saying she simply had one vote like every other justice, Kennedy is said to relish it. In his controversial book "Closed Chambers," Edward Lazarus, a former clerk for the late Justice Harry A. Blackmun, claimed that Kennedy deliberately stakes out positions that would make him a "necessary but distinctive fifth vote for a majority."

The fact that Kennedy is not moored to any one ideology or interpretive theory has led him to some spectacular defections from the court's conservatives -- to the lasting fury of the right. It was Kennedy, after all, who allied with O'Connor and Justice David H. Souter to preserve the core holding of Roe v. Wade in 1992, and it was Kennedy who wrote the court's broadest defense for decriminalizing gay sodomy. Kennedy also voted with the court's liberals to strike down the death penalty for juveniles and the mentally disabled, and he wrote a crucial opinion prohibiting sectarian prayer at a public-school graduation.

DOJ_NMG_0038056

Kennedy is rumored to be easily influenced by his colleagues, the media and his affection for all things foreign, making his critics even more nervous. It sometimes makes his fans even more so. Adam Cohen of the New York Times recently wrote of Kennedy that, at the very least, "there is something refreshing about a justice who genuinely seems to have an open mind."

For years, the law clerks' "tug of war for Kennedy's mind" that Lazarus described has been the stuff of insider speculation. Now that Kennedy is the court's lone swing vote, that spectacle has become increasingly public.

From Focus on the Family founder James C. Dobson, who famously called Kennedy "the most dangerous man in America," to advocates at the court, who more and more frequently respond to the justice during oral arguments as though they were addressing themselves to the burning bush, trying to influence Kennedy has become something of an Olympic event. The hottest game in Supreme Court brief-writing is to quote Kennedy gratuitously and often. In other words, flattering Kennedy has become something of an art.

The other justices are playing the quote-Kennedy game, too, presumably in hopes of wooing him to their side. Read, for example, the opinion and dissent in Rapanos et al. v. United States , the term's main environmental case. Each side made sure to send a love note to Kennedy.

The justices may also be cozying up to Kennedy in other ways: He won himself some sweet writing assignments this term. Some court-watchers have suggested that the bizarre trio of Kennedy, Roberts and Stevens, who jointly issued a strange concurring opinion in the Jose Padilla case last April, was yet another effort by the court's right- and left-wing leaders to show Kennedy a little more love. Roberts is a savvy insider who knows that, over the years, the abuse heaped on the court's moderates from the right has pushed them into the arms of the court's liberals. So Kennedy is now being love-bombed.

And what is the crucial swing voter doing with his newfound superpowers? While it's still too early to predict, the invaluable annual end-of-term tally done by SCOTUSblog shows that Kennedy voted with the majority 84 percent of the time. In the 11 cases decided 5 to 4 this term, Kennedy was in the majority 75 percent of the time. He wrote the second-highest number of opinions, the most concurrences and only two dissents. But again, that's also only half the story. The other half is how Kennedy used that vote to shape the law.

It was Kennedy who provided the fifth vote in Hudson v. Michigan , an amazing criminal law case, in which he voted with the court's four reliably conservative jurists -- Alito, Roberts, Antonin Scalia and Clarence Thomas -- to hold that the remedy for police violations of the centuries-old "knock and announce" rule, required whenever the cops serve a warrant, was, in effect, nothing. But while Scalia's majority opinion showed a readiness to end the practice of throwing out evidence obtained illegally, Kennedy's moderating fifth vote put on the brakes, by insisting that the general rule of excluding evidence gained illegally was not in jeopardy. Future challenges to the exclusionary rule may hereafter be posed to the Kennedy Court of One.

Kennedy also provided the key fifth vote in Rapanos . The case tested the authority of the Army Corps of Engineers to enforce the Clean Water Act, and the four conservative justices would have dramatically curtailed the powers of the Corps. It was Kennedy -- again writing separately -- who refused to go as far as Scalia urged. And it was Kennedy whose opinion in Rapanos will thus become the standard for the Corps as it fashions future policy. Looking forward to next year's big greenhouse gases case, which explores whether the Environmental Protection Agency has an obligation to regulate carbon dioxide, a lawyer for the Sierra Club has already suggested that " Rapanos means . . . we will write our brief for Anthony Kennedy and maybe a little bit for Roberts."

Kennedy's was the moderating fifth voice again in the cacophony of the Texas redistricting case, where he sided with the court's conservatives to defeat the claim that then-Rep. Tom DeLay's mid-decade redistricting was unconstitutional. Nevertheless, he joined with the liberals to find that a new congressional district violated the rights of Hispanic voters. Once again, a Court of One.

And Hamdan , probably the most consequential separation-of-powers case in recent memory, also pivoted on Kennedy's vote. He sided with the liberals, while refusing to go as far as they would have led him.

What does all this nipping and tucking, shucking and jiving mean for Kennedy and the court? He clearly plans to fill the shoes recently vacated by O'Connor; shoes she, in turn, inherited from Justice Lewis Powell. They each played the role of moderating a polarized court; building bridges, navigating toward the center -- a center where most of the nation was most comfortable. Each took abuse for that when they sat on the court. Each was largely celebrated for it when they retired. Kennedy, too, appears poised to hold that center together. Indeed more often than not, he seems to be leaving his options open, laying the groundwork for revisiting these issue more fully in the future, as he becomes more comfortable in this role.

DOJ_NMG_0038057

Much of the soaring rhetoric for which Kennedy was famed in previous years -- opinions that brimmed with "the ineffable glory of unflinching human dignity" and such -- seems to have been toned down of late. But then, perhaps Kennedy doesn't need to write about the ineffable glory of anything anymore. He can just sit back and bask in it instead.

dahlia.lithwick@hotmail.com

Dahlia Lithwick covers legal affairs for Slate, the online magazine at www.slate.com

Supreme Court Freshmen (LAT)

The Los Angeles Times, July 2, 2006

THURSDAY WAS THE END OF the first term of the Supreme Court presided over by Chief Justice John G. Roberts Jr., but it was just the beginning of the debate about how the law of the land has been changed by the Roberts court. Our answer: So far, not very much.

As it does in every term, the court staked out new ground in some areas, including patent and business law, but continuity was more evident than change. The justices reaffirmed, or at least did not disturb, controversial precedents on abortion rights and the regulation of election spending.

Continuity was evident even in last week's dramatic decision invalidating the military commissions set up by the Bush administration to try suspected terrorists at Guantanamo Bay, Cuba. The 5-3 ruling echoed decisions two years ago holding that the president had overreached in the war on terror.

Less than a year ago, some liberal activists were warning that the confirmation of Roberts to succeed the late Chief Justice William H. Rehnquist would jerk the court unacceptably to the right. That critique was recycled a little more respectably when President Bush named Judge Samuel A. Alito Jr. to replace perennial swing vote Sandra Day O'Connor.

Both Bush appointees have lived up to their advance billing as conservatives. Moreover, in two cases that had to be reargued because the justices split 4 to 4, the substitution of Alito for O'Connor may have altered the outcome in a conservative direction.

Yet the seismic shift dreaded by liberals and dreamed about by conservatives hasn't occurred. Partly, that is because this was a transition year. Alito didn't join the court until halfway through the term, and O'Connor's colleagues sent her off into retirement as the author of that judicial rarity, a unanimous abortion opinion. (The nine justices agreed that the absence of a health exception in a New Hampshire parental-consent law didn't render the entire statute unconstitutional.)

But even when Roberts and Alito would have shifted the law dramatically, as they did in supporting a much narrower definition of wetlands subject to federal regulation, their colleagues balked. In that case, as in last week's decision on the commissions, Justice Anthony M. Kennedy, a moderate Ronald Reagan appointee, distanced himself from the conservative bloc. In other cases he voted with the conservatives, vindicating the observation that, just as the Rehnquist court was really the O'Connor court, the Roberts court is actually the Kennedy court.

Kennedy's influence is one explanation of why a Roberts-Alito counterrevolution failed to materialize. Another is the fact that neither of the new justices lived up (or down) to the popular characterization of them as clones of liberal boogeymen Antonin Scalia and Clarence Thomas.

For example, the new justices joined Kennedy last week in a Texas reapportionment case in leaving the door open to future constitutional challenges to "partisan gerrymandering" — although, like Kennedy, they concluded that the Republican-friendly congressional map midwifed by former Rep. Tom DeLay didn't violate the Constitution. Scalia, joined by Thomas, said such challenges could never be the judiciary's business.

Alito went some way toward refuting his nickname of "Scalito" by rejecting Scalia's pet theory: that in interpreting acts of Congress, the courts should not take account of legislative history.

Even allowing for these differences, it would be foolish to deny that, especially with the Alito appointment, Bush has succeeded in moving the court somewhat to the right. But Supreme Court nominations — consequences of presidential elections — often lead to realignment. President Clinton's appointment of Ruth Bader Ginsburg to replace Byron White moved the court somewhat to the left. Such adjustments are no reason for senators to balk at highly qualified nominees such as Roberts, Alito or Ginsburg.

DOJ_NMG_0038058

The Court's Electoral Thicket (WP)

By George F. Will

The Washington Post, July 2, 2006

Last July 1 Sandra Day O'Connor announced her decision to vacate the seat from which she frequently operated as the swing vote on a Supreme Court divided 5 to 4 on important cases. Anthony Kennedy's past pronouncements suggested he would relish that role. Last Wednesday he played it in cases concerning Texas redistricting.

The cases involved several questions, the most interesting -- because it has come to the court before and we now know it will again and because it revealed a recurring and worrisome kind of judging -- was this: Was the redistricting by the Republican-controlled legislature such a partisan gerrymander as to be somehow unconstitutional?

The court's dusty answer to this question is symptomatic of the difference-splitting that characterized the last years of the Rehnquist Court. In a plurality opinion, Kennedy said there may be a "manageable, reliable measure of fairness" in redistricting, but no set of facts has sufficed for the court to discover it.

Antonin Scalia believes it is delusional to think that such a standard can be anything other than judges' cumulative hunches -- not a neutral principle found in the Constitution. Joined by Clarence Thomas, Scalia said Wednesday that no one "has put forth a judicially discernible standard" for deciding when a gerrymander is too partisan. The Kennedy position allows people to continue trying to concoct a constitutional violation (of the guarantee of equal protection of the laws), even though the court provides no guidance to lower-court judges. Scalia and Thomas believe redistricting is a "political thicket" (Justice Felix Frankfurter's phrase) courts should not enter.

By leaving open the possibility that there is a constitutional answer to the question of what constitutes a "too political" gerrymander -- the position seems to be: We don't know what the standard is, but we don't know that it doesn't exist -- the court has again practiced "split-the-difference jurisprudence." That phrase is from Judge J. Harvie Wilkinson of the U.S. Court of Appeals for the 4th Circuit, writing in the Stanford Law Review.

Wilkinson identifies difference-splitting in some late Rehnquist Court decisions that resulted in "a series of finely spun opinions that increasingly constitutionalized" some volatile political debates. One decision, in 2004, concerned political gerrymandering in Pennsylvania. Four justices said all claims of unconstitutionally partisan gerrymandering are nonjusticiable because there are no truly judicial criteria for adjudicating them. Four other justices suggested various legal theories for adjudicating. Kennedy split the difference: He voted to reject the claim of unconstitutional gerrymandering, but refused to "foreclose all possibility of judicial relief" if some "limited and precise" constitutional violation were "found."

Where can it be "found"? Inevitably, not in the Constitution's text, history and structure but in judges' intuitions about "fairness." Thus does constitutional doctrine become little more than the judiciary's temperament or the temper of the times. But elections, not courts, are supposed to take the nation's temperature.

In some "finely spun" Rehnquist Court decisions, a monument featuring the Ten Commandments on the Texas Capitol grounds was not unconstitutional, but Ten Commandments displays, with other historical documents, in the hallways of two Kentucky courthouses were unconstitutional. The University of Michigan's policy of giving favored minorities 20 extra points on a 150-point admissions index to achieve undergraduate "diversity" was unconstitutional, but its law school's use of race as a " 'plus' factor" to achieve "a 'critical mass' of underrepresented minorities" was constitutional -- assuming, as O'Connor thought it realistic and pertinent to do, that in 25 years race-conscious admissions policies will not be "necessary."

Wilkinson acknowledges that "splitting differences has real benefits": "The outcomes of cases are often sensible, the court itself is often statesmanlike, and the spacious language of the Constitution is often seductive. Splitting differences allows the court to appear simultaneously cautious and progressive."

And yet: "Americans deserve not a liberal court, not a conservative court, not even a wise or Solomonic court, but a court that respects the limits of its power and the place of others within the constitutional structure."

DOJ_NMG_0038059

Wilkinson warns that "methodology matters supremely in the law, if it is not to become the kissing cousin of politics." Granted, "split-the-difference" jurisprudence can be institutional prudence, preserving the court's standing with a public more interested in judicial results than judicial reasoning. But when political reasoning supplants judicial reasoning, courts preserve their popularity by sacrificing their proper function.

"There is," Wilkinson says, "a thin line between the unabashedly pragmatic exercise of splitting differences and the practice of politics itself," so "splitting the difference ought not to be confused with judicial restraint." Eventually, the public will notice, and recoil against, courts supplanting democratic institutions as arbitrators of our differences.

georgewill@washpost.com

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

Scrushy Will Appeal Corruption Conviction (WSJ)

By Valerie Bauerlein

The Wall Street Journal, July 1, 2006

HealthSouth Corp. founder Richard M. Scrushy vowed to fight his conviction on political-corruption charges with "everything we've got" and he said it was a mistake to limit his defense during the two-month trial to less than two days.

In an interview, Mr. Scrushy said his lawyers probably should have called 10 to 15 witnesses over about a two-week period to help undercut the federal government's allegations that he bribed former Alabama Gov. Don Siegelman to get a spot on a state panel that regulates hospitals. "We didn't put them up" because the prosecution's case seemed unconvincing, Mr. Scrushy said. "We didn't feel we needed to."

Mr. Scrushy said he will appeal his conviction Thursday by a jury in Montgomery, Ala., on five or six different legal grounds. Before the trial, his lawyers contended that the jury pool included too few African-Americans and that Mr. Scrushy should be tried separately from three other defendants in the case. Mr. Scrushy said Friday that those issues could be part of his appeal.

The 53-year-old Mr. Scrushy plans to take a one-week vacation and then return to his home outside Birmingham, Ala., to work on his appeal. He had hoped to travel to Africa this fall with a religious ministry he recently launched, but the guilty verdict has forced those plans to be put on hold.

Ralphs To Pay $70 Million For Illegal Hiring Scheme (LAT)

By Martin Zimmerman And Ronald D. White, Times Staff Writers

The Los Angeles Times, July 1, 2006

Under the plea deal, the grocery chain would admit it deceptively used hundreds of its locked-out employees during a labor dispute.

The Ralphs grocery chain said Friday that it had agreed to pay $70 million in fines and restitution to settle criminal charges that it illegally rehired locked-out workers during the supermarket labor dispute in Southern California more than two years ago.

Under a proposed agreement filed Friday in U.S. District Court in Los Angeles, Ralphs would plead guilty to five felony charges included in the 53-count grand jury indictment returned against the company in December.

Ralphs was charged with violating federal laws by secretly rehiring about 1,000 locked-out workers during the 4 1/2 -month strike and lockout from October 2003 to February 2004. The case had been scheduled to go to trial Aug. 15 before U.S. District Judge Percy Anderson, who must approve the plea agreement.

In the agreement, Ralphs admitted that it used fake names and Social Security numbers to pull off the deception. Authorities said the scheme was designed to help keep stores running during the labor dispute, the longest and largest in U.S. history involving the supermarket industry.

The labor strife affected 852 stores and nearly 60,000 grocery workers at supermarkets across Southern and Central California. The dispute cost the grocery companies more than $1.5 billion in sales before it ended on Feb. 29, 2004, when workers ratified a new contract whose terms were widely seen as a defeat for the union.

DOJ_NMG_0038060

"This labor dispute affected nearly everyone in Southern California," U.S. Atty. Debra Wong Yang said in a statement. "I hope that the resolution of this case will provide some relief to the thousands of workers who were injured by the criminal conduct that unfairly prolonged" the dispute.

Ralphs said it would plead guilty to violating federal laws regarding identity fraud, pension reporting and Social Security and Internal Revenue Service record-keeping, as well as one count of conspiracy.

The grocery chain said it would pay a $20-million fine to the federal government and create a $50-million restitution fund. Most of the money would be paid to the 19,000 Ralphs grocery clerks and meat cutters who were locked out during the dispute.

Officials of the United Food and Commercial Workers union, which represented the grocery employees, estimated that some workers could receive as much as $3,000 from the settlement.

The amount each union member receives from the fund would depend on factors such as the worker's pay rate, the amount of regular strike pay received and how much money, if any, the worker made at other jobs during the labor dispute.

The fund also would be used to reimburse the union for benefits paid to Ralphs employees during the standoff and to reimburse the grocery workers' health and retirement funds.

The company also would be placed on three years' probation and would establish court-supervised training programs.

Ralphs and its parent, Cincinnati-based Kroger Co., also agreed to cooperate with the government's continuing investigation into the illegal hiring.

The agreement doesn't prevent the government from prosecuting current or former employees of Ralphs or related companies that were involved in the illegal conduct. So far, no individuals have been charged in the case.

The U.S. attorney's office said Ralphs admitted that two of its executives who helped oversee the employee health and retirement funds concealed the illegal hiring from other fund trustees. The unnamed executives were serving as top negotiators in contract talks with the union at the time, the government said.

If convicted on all counts in the indictment, Ralphs and Kroger could have faced fines of more than $100 million, plus restitution for workers and the union.

The amount of money the grocery chain agreed to pay was less important than the signal a plea agreement sent to the business community, said Nelson Lichtenstein, a history professor and director of the Center for the Study of Work, Labor and Democracy at UC Santa Barbara.

"The fact that Ralphs had to plead guilty and admitted to the tactics they used during the long dispute is clearly a victory for the union," Lichtenstein said. "But it's also a shot across the bow to businesses who think the days of the Wild West have returned in labor relations."

At a news conference in the parking lot of a Ralphs store in Studio City, Rick Icaza, president of UFCW Local 770 in Los Angeles, said the company "made a big mistake. They should never have done what they did. If not for this illegal activity, this dispute would not have gone on for so long."

Workers said money from the settlement wouldn't come close to repairing the financial damage they suffered during the strike and lockout. But they said they felt vindicated by Ralphs' guilty plea.

"We know they were guilty, and they didn't get away with it. We feel validated," said Jackie Gitmed, 46, a cashier from Burbank who said she started working at Ralphs 30 years ago.

Gitmed said she accumulated $15,000 in debt during the labor battle and was still paying back relatives who had helped her.

Of the workers who crossed the picket line and were rehired under the cover of false identities, she said, "I'm not bitter, but we were supposed to all be in this together."

None of the workers who were illegally hired have been charged. "The investigation is focusing on the people most culpable for the criminal conduct," said Thom Mrozek, spokesman for the U.S. attorney's office.

Kroger had admitted earlier that managers at some Ralphs stores had falsified records to rehire workers, but said the practice was limited to only a few hundred workers and wasn't condoned by upper management.

DOJ_NMG_0038061

"Most of our managers followed the law and adhered to company policies," Ralphs President Dave Hirz said in a statement Friday. "Nonetheless, the illegal hiring of some locked-out employees that occurred at Ralphs during the strike was wrong and we regret that it took place."

Kroger initially placed the number of illegally hired workers at about 200 but has since concluded that the number might have approached 300, company spokeswoman Lynn Marmer said.

Kroger said it already had set aside enough money to cover the costs of the settlement.

The labor dispute began when union workers went on strike Oct. 11, 2003, against Safeway Inc. supermarkets Vons and Pavilions rather than accept cuts in their health benefits and pay. Ralphs and Albertsons Inc., adhering to a secret pact among the chains, locked out their workers the next day.

In addition to the criminal charges, the agreement announced Friday would also settle a complaint the union had filed against Ralphs with the National Labor Relations Board.

The labor board's Los Angeles office had dismissed the complaint, but the union was appealing.

Ralphs and the other chains still face a state antitrust lawsuit over an agreement to support one another financially during the dispute.

And the companies have struggled to regain the customers they had lost to rivals.

"The hard line that the grocery chains took turned out to be a good deal more costly than they thought," UC Santa Barbara's Lichtenstein said.

KLA Finds Options-Dating Problem (WSJ)

By Charles Forelle

The Wall Street Journal, July 1, 2006

Internal Probe May Lead To an Accounting Charge, Restatement of Earnings

KLA-Tencor Corp. said Friday that an internal investigation found that some stock options to executives and employees were wrongly dated, and said that the problems could lead to an accounting charge and possibly a restatement.

The semiconductor-equipment maker provided little detail about the probe's findings in a press release, but the possibility of an accounting charge strongly implies that the misdating benefited executives and raises the question of whether grants were deliberately backdated or otherwise manipulated to confer that benefit.

The firm said it anticipates needing to take a charge to correct its accounting, but it said that the investigation, conducted by a board committee, has not determined if the charge will be significant enough to warrant restatement of prior figures.

KLA-Tencor, San Jose, Calif., is the subject of separate probes into its option grants by federal regulators and prosecutors. Over the years, KLA has demonstrated a highly unusual pattern of option grants to top executives dated ahead of big run-ups in share price, often at low points.

Backdating an option grant without disclosing the maneuver or accounting for it runs afoul of securities and accounting regulations. Particularly when done without the permission of the company's board, backdating could expose individuals to criminal fraud charges.

Options entitle the recipient to profit when shares rise above the "strike price," normally set to equal the market value on the grant date. In such a case, an option is said to be granted "at the money" and only has value if the fortunes of shareholders improve.

Wrongly dated option grants cause accounting trouble because, under accounting rules in place until very recently, "at the money" grants qualified for preferential treatment and weren't recorded as an expense.

Conversely, "discount options" -- those whose strike price is below market value when granted -- had to be recorded as an expense under those rules. In effect, a backdated option is really a discount option for which the company has taken the preferential accounting treatment that only at-the-money options deserved.

Some 50 companies are facing federal investigations into their option-granting practices. The probes are focusing on backdating. Just Thursday, Apple Computer Inc. said it had found "irregularities" in option grants from 1997 to 2001, including one grant to Chief Executive Steve Jobs.

DOJ_NMG_0038062

Many of KLA-Tencor's unusually dated grants went to Kenneth Levy, who is the founder of one of its predecessor companies, a former chief executive, and the current chairman.

Among the most remarkable of KLA's grants to Mr. Levy were his two in 2001. The first was dated in April, at the bottom of a steep dip in share price and the lowest closing price of the first half. The second was dated in October, at the lowest closing price of the year. Several other top executives received grants with the same fortunate dates, securities filings show.

Mr. Levy and other executives also received grants dated at the lowest prices of 1998 and 2000. All of his grants between 1994 and 2001 preceded quick run-ups in share price. A May article in The Wall Street Journal that examined Mr. Levy's grant pattern found that the chance of the grants being dated as they were purely by chance was tiny -- around one in 20 million.

Mr. Levy could not be reached for comment. A KLA spokeswoman declined to elaborate significantly on the company's press release. She declined to provide the names of the independent directors conducting the board's probe, saying that such information was confidential.

Write to Charles Forelle at charles.forelle@wsj.com3

MZM Manager Accused Of Violating FEC Rules (WP)

By R. Jeffrey Smith

The Washington Post, July 1, 2006

The director of a defense contractor's office in Martinsville, Va., was accused yesterday of illegally funneling campaign donations to Rep. Virgil H. Goode Jr. (R-Va.), an act that the contractor has said was meant to obtain Goode's help in arranging defense funding for his company.

A federal court filing by the U.S. attorney for the District of Columbia, Kenneth L. Wainstein, said that Richard A. Berglund , a facility manager for MZM Inc., had violated the Federal Election Campaign Act by "aiding and abetting" a scheme by MZM's owner to donate the funds in the name of others.

According to the filing, Berglund and his wife wrote $4,000 in checks to "Representative A" in March 2005 after MZM's owner, Mitchell J. Wade, handed Berglund an equivalent amount of cash. It says that Berglund gave another $4,000 he received from Wade to two MZM colleagues, who in turn donated it to the congressman.

Federal Election Commission records -- which describe Berglund as a retired lieutenant colonel -- show that he and his wife gave that amount to Goode that month. He made no other donations to lawmakers that year.

Goode's office said in a statement that he is Representative A, but the lawmaker was unaware that the Berglund donations were illegal "straw" contributions. Wade, who sold MZM last summer, pleaded guilty in February to making a total of $38,000 in illegal "straw" contributions to the lawmaker in 2003 and 2005 through his employees and their spouses.

Wade targeted Goode, according to Wade's plea agreement, because Wade wanted to open an office in Goode's district and believed that Goode "had the ability to request appropriations funding for this facility and would be an advocate for funding for MZM." The plea stated that Wade did not inform Goode or his staff that the donations were illegal.

Wade handed the checks directly to "Representative A" at a March 2005 fundraising event, according to the court document filed yesterday. That was around the time that Wade requested Goode's help in earmarking funds for the facility, according to Wade's plea agreement.

In June 2005, Goode's staff "confirmed to Wade that an appropriations bill would contain $9 million for the facility and a related program. Wade thanked Representative A and his staff for their assistance," according to the plea agreement.

The document naming Berglund is typically used to state facts alleging wrongdoing by someone cooperating in an investigation. Berglund's listed phone is disconnected, and his attorney could not be reached for comment yesterday.

CRIMINAL LAW:

Judge Acquits 2 Ex-Detectives In Mob Killings (NYT)

By Alan Feuer

The New York Times, July 1, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0038063

A federal judge tossed out the racketeering convictions of two retired New York City detectives yesterday — including eight murders for the mob — because the statute of limitations had run out, despite citing overwhelming evidence that the men had committed "heinous and violent crimes."

The ruling by Judge Jack B. Weinstein entirely reversed the conviction of the two detectives, Louis J. Eppolito and Stephen Caracappa, who were found guilty in April of some of the most stunning corruption charges in the city's history.

Although a jury found that Mr. Eppolito and Mr. Caracappa had participated, as paid assassins, in killings for the mob, the judge acquitted the two men on the murder counts of the racketeering conspiracy, though not on evidentiary grounds. But the judge left open the possibility that the prosecution could seek to retry the defendants on a drug charge, and Mr. Eppolito, alone, on a money-laundering count.

The ruling, in a 102-page order that touched upon Thomas More and the sanctity of the Constitution, was the latest and most severe turn in the 15-month case.

It shocked the United States attorney's office in Brooklyn, which said it would appeal. And it bitterly disappointed the families of the victims in the case, some of whom had given heart-rending testimony at the two men's sentencing last month, where they were given life terms.

The decision sent a surge of joy through the offices of the defendants' new lawyers, one of whom, Joseph Bondy, called it "the most substantial legal victory" in recent history.

It also threatened to disrupt the careers — and the book deals — of some investigators in the case. And it led to the bizarre prospect that the two detectives — whom Judge Weinstein outright accused in his order of being stone-cold killers — could walk free from federal detention in Brooklyn as early as next week.

The judge waxed eloquent in acknowledging that his decision might seem strange to some.

"It will undoubtedly appear peculiar to many people that heinous criminals such as the defendants, having been found guilty on overwhelming evidence of the most despicable crimes of violence, should go unwhipped of justice," he wrote.

"Yet our Constitution, statutes and morality require that we be ruled by the law, not vindictiveness or the advantages of the moment."

The judge also wrote that even though there was little doubt that Mr. Eppolito and Mr. Caracappa had "kidnapped, murdered, and assisted kidnappers and murderers," he had no choice but to let them go because the five-year statute of limitations in conspiracy cases had run out.

His ruling was hardly the first mention of the statute of limitations. Virtually from the outset of the case, Judge Weinstein said he was queasy about the decision to accuse the men of an overarching conspiracy that included the eight gangland murders, all in Brooklyn in the 1980's and 1990's, and a much more recent — and less serious — charge of selling an ounce of methamphetamine in Las Vegas last year.

In October, the defense team seized upon the judge's qualms and moved to quash the case before the trial, saying, in essence, that the government had strapped the drug charge onto the murder charges "to freshen up" the case and to avoid the statute of limitations.

Judge Weinstein denied the motion, deciding instead to go to trial and see if the government could prove that an "ongoing criminal enterprise" indeed stretched from the streets of Brooklyn to the casinos and subdivisions of Las Vegas.

Judge Weinstein's ruling spiked that argument, and no matter how pained he seemed to be in vacating the convictions, he took the government to task. "The government's case against these defendants," he wrote, "stretches federal racketeering and conspiracy law to the breaking point."

There was a certain incongruity lurking in the fact that the statute of limitations was practically the first issue raised in pretrial hearings by the defendants' former lawyers, Bruce Cutler and Edward Hayes, who just this week were forced to appear in court to defend themselves against charges of incompetence that had been filed against them by the two detectives. Judge Weinstein threw those charges out.

Still, it was in keeping with the topsy-turvy nature of the case that the very argument that the fired legal team had offered in their former clients' defense was the one that eventually prevailed.

DOJ_NMG_0038064

The judge's ruling provided a much more sweeping victory than the defendants would have gotten with a finding that their lawyers were incompetent.

In that case, they would have been retried. Now there can be no new trial on the racketeering charges, although a higher court could reinstate the convictions.

Reached at his office, Mr. Hayes was at first speechless — a rarity for a man who once sang "Danny Boy" in open court.

He said the prosecution had made a grave tactical error by not allowing the case to be tried in state court, which has no statute of limitations on murder, instead of using the federal racketeering charges, which have the five-year limitation.

"But this is a Justice Department that more than any in my lifetime has shown a mad-dog desire to control everything and to ignore the law," he said. "And they paid the price in this case."

Mr. Cutler said it would have been difficult for a jury to acquit on what some might see as a technicality, but he praised Judge Weinstein for his independence.

"I take comfort in the fact that there are judges who do what they think is right," he said.

Robert Nardoza, a spokesman for the United States attorney's office in Brooklyn, released a terse statement yesterday supporting the jury's verdict.

"The jury in this case unanimously found Eppolito and Caracappa guilty of racketeering and murder based on overwhelming evidence," the statement read.

"And based on the law that was given to them by the court, each of the 12 jurors specifically found that the defendants' heinous crimes were committed within the statute of limitations. We intend to pursue an appeal."

Judge Rubs Out Mob Cops Verdict (NYDN)

By John Marzulli, Daily News Staff Writer

New York Daily News, July 3, 2006

Despite having murdered, maimed and sold out informants to blood-thirsty mobsters, the Mafia cops' racketeering conviction was stunningly overturned yesterday - all because they apparently steered clear of the mob for the last five years.

The ruling left prosecutors and victims' relatives speechless, and even seemed to surprise allies of ex-NYPD Detectives Louis Eppolito. and Stephen Caracappa.

Brooklyn Federal Judge Jack Weinstein acknowledged there was no doubt the disgraced duo were hit men for the mob - guilty of being the most corrupt cops in NYPD history.

Yet he still threw out the convictions, which carried life sentences, on a technicality.

"The evidence at trial overwhelmingly established the defendants' participation in a large number of heinous and violent crimes," Weinstein, 84, wrote.

"Nevertheless . . . the five-year statute of limitations mandates granting the defendants a judgment of acquittal on the key charge against them: racketeering conspiracy," a decision that the judge admitted would appear "peculiar to many people."

Federal prosecutors vowed to appeal the ruling; Weinstein indicated that if he is reversed, the Mafia cops will begin their life sentences immediately.

For now, they will remain behind bars at the Metropolitan Detention Center in Brooklyn until Weinstein hears a likely bail application, sometime after he returns from vacation July 21.

Eppolito's new lawyer, Joseph Bondy, broke the staggering news to his client at the jail last night.

Bondy said a weeping Eppolito embraced him and said, "I feel as though my prayers were answered and that God is my true judge. I was afraid that I was going to spend the rest of my life in jail."

Eppolito told Bondy he would tell Caracappa what happened when he got back to the cell they share. Caracappa's lawyer isn't scheduled to see him until today.

A federal jury in April convicted Eppolito, 57, and Caracappa, 64, of participating in eight gangland murders.

The racketeering indictment charged that Eppolito and Caracappa. went on the payroll of the Luchese crime family in the 1980s in Brooklyn. It specified that the duo committed or helped commit the slayings between 1986 and 1990.

DOJ_NMG_0038065

Despite a lull in their criminal activity in the late 1990s, their criminal enterprise resumed last year in Las Vegas, where they had settled after their retirement, the indictment charged.

The ex-cops' new legal team sought to overturn the verdict on two fronts: poor legal representation and the five-year statute of limitations.

Prosecutors seemed unprepared for Weinstein's ruling - and perhaps with good reason.

Earlier this month, Weinstein left no doubt at a sentencing hearing that he was convinced of both defendants' guilt. Then, last week, after Eppolito testified at a hearing for a new trial, the judge called him an immoral liar.

But Weinstein warned prosecutors on multiple occasions that he had serious misgivings about their theory connecting the Mafia cops' criminal activities in Brooklyn to their money laundering and drug crimes in Las Vegas.

Prosecutors noted yesterday that the jurors "specifically found that the defendants' heinous crimes were committed within the statute of limitations," according to a statement from Robert Nardoza, a spokesman for Brooklyn U.S. Attorney Roslynn Mauskopf.

But Weinstein concluded that the conspiracy ended when both detectives retired from the force.

The decision was vindication of sorts for the original defense attorneys, Bruce Cutler and Edward Hayes, who were blamed by their clients for the conviction.

"I'm happy that we have a courageous Judge Weinstein to do the right thing," Cutler said last night.

And in their exclusive gated community in Las Vegas, neighbors and friends crowded Caracappa's home to watch news reports of the legal victory on CNN.

"I know my husband will be unhappy that he's exonerated on a technicality," said Caracappa's wife, Monica. "But I will take my husband home any way I can."

Across the street, Fran Eppolito said she was "overjoyed" by the decision, though mindful the case is far from over. "I am very hopeful now, the most hopeful I've been in a long time. I just hope this works out in Lou's favor."

Eppolito and Caracappa had been suspected of being mob hit men since former Luchese underboss Anthony (Gaspipe) Casso ratted them out in 1994, revealing they had been leaking secret information to him for years.

Casso self-destructed as a witness, and it took authorities 10 years to flip jailed Luchese associate and Mafia cops go-between Burton Kaplan. The feds, rather than the Brooklyn district attorney, prosecuted the case because the rules of evidence would permit uncorroborated testimony by Kaplan. and other cooperating witnesses.

Brooklyn prosecutors now will await the U.S. Court of Appeals' decision before deciding whether to pursue state murder charges against the Mafia cops, said spokesman Jerry Schmetterer.

If Weinstein had dismissed the racketeering conspiracy charge before the verdict, the government would not be able to appeal, sources said.

Ex-cops' Convictions Tossed (NSDY)

By Anthony M. Destefano, Newsday Staff Writer

Long Island Newsday, July 3, 2006

Judge rules that statute of limitations requires reversal of guilty verdicts for racketeering

They did the crimes but might not do the time.

In a stunning development Friday, a federal judge threw out key racketeering conspiracy convictions against "Mafia Cops" Louis Eppolito and Stephen Caracappa - convictions that included involvement in eight gangland killings from 1986 to 1991 - because of a conflict with the federal five-year statute of limitations.

U.S. District Court Judge Jack B. Weinstein, in a 77-page ruling, said the trial "overwhelmingly established" the guilt of Eppolito, 57, and Caracappa, 64, in the slayings and other crimes, but wrote that the legal issue compelled him to acquit them.

"As a result of spillover prejudice resulting from the trial of that charge [racketeering conspiracy] with other crimes charged in the indictment, defendants are entitled to a new trial on the remaining charges," Weinstein said.

Weinstein ordered a new trial for both men on charges of drug dealing and, in Eppolito's case, money laundering. The retrial would involve charges that Eppolito and Caracappa were involved in a small methamphetamine transaction in Nevada, where they both lived after retiring from the Police Department.

"We intend to pursue an appeal," said Robert Nardoza, a spokesman for U.S. Attorney Roslynn Mauskopf.

Should the Second U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals reverse Weinstein's decision, the provisional sentences of life imprisonment that he had given Eppolito and Caracappa would be reinstated.

Bail applications for the jailed defendants, who were convicted April 6, are expected to be filed shortly.

Lawyers reacted with astonishment as news of the ruling ricocheted around the city's legal community.

"We won the case! We won the case!" an ecstatic Edward Hayes, who represented Caracappa at trial, said when told by a Newsday reporter of the decision.

Hayes and Bruce Cutler, who represented Eppolito at trial, split with their clients after the convictions. Eppolito and Caracappa said the lawyers' representation of them was poor, an assessment with which Weinstein disagreed. The defendants hired new lawyers, who brought the motions that resulted in Friday's acquittals.

"I guess Rae [Koshetz] and I didn't do such a bad job after all," Hayes said of work that he and his co-counsel did in researching the statute-of-limitations issue for the trial.

"Judge Weinstein has a reputation as a brilliant and independent jurist, and this opinion confirms that," said Dan Nobel, Caracappa's new lawyer.

Eppolito's new lawyer, Joseph Bondy, could not be reached.

Legal experts and officials said the statute-of-limitations issue always was a troublesome part of the case.

Eppolito and Caracappa were indicted on March 9, 2005. The most recent killing in the case took place in May 1991. Generally, under federal criminal law, crimes alleged in a racketeering conspiracy have to have occurred within five years of the indictment.

Before the trial, Weinstein frequently expressed reservations about whether crimes so far in the past could be prosecuted within the five-year statute of limitations.

To address the conflict, federal prosecutors charged Eppolito and Caracappa with involvement in a Nevada drug sale in late 2004 and early 2005. Prosecutors maintained that the Nevada crime was part of the original racketeering enterprise conspiracy, thus extending the alleged conspiracy beyond the crucial cutoff date of March 9, 2000.

Weinstein denied a defense pretrial motion to dismiss the indictment, saying the nature of the alleged crimes required a full trial. When the jury convicted Eppolito and Caracappa in April, the panel specifically found that the conspiracy continued beyond March 9, 2000.

In his decision Friday, Weinstein stressed that prosecutors had proved the defendants were involved in eight slayings, two kidnappings and other wrongdoing. But as a matter of law, he said that after Eppolito's and Caracappa's retirement from the Police Department, by early 1990, "the conspiracy that began in New York in the 1980s had come to a definitive close."

By the time the defendants moved to Las Vegas, Weinstein said, any concealment done there was not part of the conspiracy.

JUDGE: KILLER MOB COP DUO GUILTY AS SIN - & I HAVE TO LET THEM WALK (NYPOST)

By Zach Haberman

The New York Post, July 3, 2006

A judge says he has no choice but to let the mob cops get away with murder.

In a bombshell decision, Brooklyn federal court Judge Jack Weinstein yesterday tossed out on a legal technicality the racketeering conspiracy conviction against ex-NYPD Detectives Louis Eppolito and Stephen Caracappa for acting as mob moles and hit men while wearing their gold shields.

The judge said that evidence presented at trial pointed heavily toward the disgraced duo kidnapping and murdering for Luchese crime family underboss Anthony "Gaspipe" Casso between 1986 and 1990. But the five-year statute of limitations has expired on those charges, he said.

"The evidence presented at trial overwhelmingly established the defendants' participation in a large number of heinous and violent crimes, including eight murders," Weinstein said in the 77-page decision.

"They kidnapped, murdered and assisted kidnappers and murderers, all while sworn to protect the public against such crimes," the judge said, apparently agreeing with the jury's findings.

"Nevertheless, an extended trial, evidentiary hearings, briefings and argument establishes that the five-year statute of limitations mandates granting the defendants a judgment of acquittal on the key charge against them - racketeering conspiracy."

Prosecutors vowed to appeal - and sources said the Brooklyn DA's office is mulling whether to charge them with murder in state court.

Highly decorated detectives Eppolito, 57, and Caracappa, 64, were convicted in April of helping Casso commit eight gangland slayings - including the kidnapping of diamond dealer Israel Greenwald in 1986.

The two also were found guilty of handing Gambino family associate James Hydell over to Casso, who tortured and killed him for an attempted hit on the Mafia big's life.

When the mob cops were sentenced to life in prison on June 5, Weinstein said: "This is probably the most heinous series of crimes ever tried in this courthouse."

The surprise ruling yesterday brought Eppolito's daughter, Andrea, to tears when she heard the news from Eppolito's new lawyer, Joseph Bondy.

"I'm ecstatic and elated," she told The Post. "We've always maintained his innocence. We've always believed in him."

"This is the first step in getting my father back in my life," Andrea, 29, said in a telephone interview from Las Vegas.

"This is such a victory for my father."

Bruce Cutler and Ed Hayes, who represented the pair at trial, argued that the statute of limitations negated the crimes - whether they committed them or not.

Weinstein apparently agreed with them, saying , "The conspiracy that began in New York in the 1980s had come to a definite close" when the pair moved to Las Vegas in the mid-1990s. While there, Eppolito allegedly laundered drug money from mob associate Burton Kaplan.

"The defendants no longer had access to confidential law enforcement information and were no longer in contact with their old associates in the Luchese crime family" in Vegas, Weinstein wrote.

"Their enterprise had effectively been put out of business by their own retirements and their compatriots' arrest," he said, referring to Casso and Kaplan, who testified at trial that he was the go-between for the cops and Casso.

Caracappa's new lawyer, Daniel Nobel, said his client had not yet been told the good news, but said it should not be considered a shock.

"Judge Weinstein repeatedly cautioned [the prosecutors] that they risk exactly this result," said Nobel, noting that the judge warned them numerous times throughout the trial that he was irked by the statute-of-limitations issue.

When Weinstein released them on bail the first time, he called the connection between the murder charges and the Las Vegas money-laundering and drug charges "very thin."

Yesterday, the judge said the jury's verdict on the money-laundering and drug-dealing charges resulted from a "spillover prejudice" of the murder charges and ordered a retrial for those counts. He did not provide a definitive date for the new trial.

The retrial would only address the charges stemming from their years in Las Vegas. But sources said Brooklyn DA Charles Hynes is mulling the possibility of trying the mob cops for murder in state court, where no statute of limitations exists on murder.

Eppolito's lawyer said his client still doesn't know about the decision.

"I would imagine he would think it's April Fool's Day or that I'm joking with him," said Bondy, adding that he plans to make a motion to get Eppolito sprung on bail.

Weinstein had released the pair on $5 million bail last July, when they were facing murder charges, so both lawyers believe they have a good shot of getting them out of Brooklyn's Metropolitan Detention Center. They have been stuck in the same cell on 23-hours-a-day lockdown.

The feds are sticking to their guns.

DOJ_NMG_0038068

"The jury in this case unanimously found Eppolito and Caracappa guilty of racketeering and murder based on overwhelming evidence," said Brooklyn U.S. Attorney's Office spokesman Robert Nardoza. "Based on the law that was given to them by the court, each of the 12 jurors specifically found that the defendants' heinous crimes were committed within the statute of limitations."

"We intend to pursue an appeal," Nardoza said.

"It's a very good day," said Hayes. "It does reaffirm our trial strategy, of course."

Louis Eppolito Jr. said he's thrilled by his father's legal victory, but was quick to note: "There's going to be a lot of angry families out there."

'Mafia' Cops' Convictions Upset (PHDN)

By Larry Mcshane

Philadelphia Daily News, July 3, 2006

NEW YORK - In a stunning blow to federal prosecutors, a Brooklyn judge yesterday tossed out the racketeering convictions of two former police detectives who were found guilty two months ago of participating in eight murders while on the payroll of a brutal mob underboss.

Louis Eppolito and Steven Caracappa, who have been described as the most corrupt officers in New York police history, were also granted new trials on lesser charges by U.S. District Judge Jack Weinstein. Less than a month ago, Weinstein had told the "Mafia Cops" that they were responsible for "the most heinous series of crimes ever tried in this courthouse."

But the judge, in yesterday's 77-page ruling, said he was compelled to set aside the verdict - in spite of what he called their obvious guilt - because the racketeering statute of limitations for the worst of the pair's crimes had passed.

"The evidence at trial overwhelmingly established the defendants' participation in a large number of heinous and violent crimes," he wrote. "Nevertheless... the five-year statute of limitations mandates granting the defendants a judgment of acquittal on the key charge against them - racketeering conspiracy."

Federal prosecutors immediately promised to appeal the decision.

The detectives either committed or facilitated the murders while working with the NYPD between 1986-90, prosecutors said. But once the pair retired to Las Vegas in the '90s, "the conspiracy that began in New York in the 1980s had come to a definite close," the judge ruled. "The defendants were no longer in contact with their old associates in the Luchese crime family."

Weinstein granted the pair a new trial on drug charges and Eppolito a new trial on money-laundering charges, saying their convictions on those charges had been tainted because they were linked to the most serious counts.

He added, however, that if an appeals court reverses his ruling, Eppolito and Caracappa should be denied a new trial and required to serve life in prison.

Defense attorneys had argued that the statute of limitations had expired on the most serious allegations against the pair, who allegedly spent four years on the payroll of both the New York Police Department and Luchese crime family underboss Anthony "Gaspipe" Casso. Testimony showed the two earned $65,000 for one of the slayings.

Prosecutors had countered that the murders were part of an ongoing conspiracy that lasted through a 2005 drug deal with FBI informant Steven Corso.

"I am very happy," said Edward Hayes, Caracappa's trial lawyer. "It's exactly what we argued during the trial. I am very happy for my client, and I do feel it is a vindication of our trial strategy."

In one of the trial's many strange twists, Hayes was called to court earlier this week to testify after Caracappa sought a new trial based on poor representation at the trial.

Weinstein threw out the racketeering charges just 25 days after he told the pair they would receive life in prison on their convictions. There's now a chance that the pair, jailed immediately after their April 6 convictions, could be out on bail next week.

Judge Tosses `Mafia Cops' Convictions (LAT)

By Ellen Barry, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, July 3, 2006

He rules the statute of limitations has expired, and orders a new trial on lesser charges.

NEW YORK — In a stinging rebuke to federal prosecutors, U.S. District Judge Jack Weinstein on Friday threw out the convictions of the so-called Mafia Cops, saying that the government's case stretched the law "to the breaking point" by charging them with racketeering after the five-year statute of limitations had expired.

Weinstein did not mince words, however, in addressing the defendants — retired New York police detectives Louis Eppolito and Stephen Caracappa. He said the trial "overwhelmingly established" that the two men had "kidnapped, murdered and assisted kidnappers and murderers, all the while sworn to protect the public against such crimes."

"It will undoubtedly appear peculiar to many people that heinous criminals like the defendants ... should go unwhipped of justice. Yet our Constitution, statutes and morality require that we be ruled by the law, not by the vindictiveness or the advantages of the moment," Weinstein wrote in his 77-page memorandum. He ordered that the two receive a new trial on lesser charges of money laundering and dealing drugs.

Robert Nardoza, a spokesman for U.S. Atty. Roslynn Mauskopf, said prosecutors planned to appeal Weinstein's decision.

The ruling marks a sudden reversal of fortune for Eppolito and Caracappa.

On April 6, a jury found them guilty of 70 counts of racketeering in one of the most sensational cases of police corruption in New York's history. In a monthlong trial, witnesses testified that the two friends had formed a partnership with Anthony "Gaspipe" Casso, an underboss with the Lucchese family. In exchange for a shared $4,000 monthly retainer, they would pass along police information about mob figures and occasionally act as hit men themselves.

"They didn't deliver us from evil, they themselves were evil personified," Mauskopf said the day their convictions were announced. "They used that shield, they used that power to murder, to kidnap — all for the mob, all for their own greed."

After the verdict, Eppolito and Caracappa fired their high-powered attorneys and last week asked for a mistrial on the grounds that their defense was not competent.

Eddie Hayes, who represented Caracappa at trial, said Weinstein's decision vindicates his defense strategy, which he said leaned heavily on the statute of limitations issue — knowing it would not be compelling to the jury.

"I thought the government overreaching here was clear from the beginning, and I always said that," said Bruce Cutler, who represented Eppolito. "If you ask me if I expected it, I didn't expect it." Still, Cutler said, he was "gratified."

The statute of limitations question first arose last summer, when the former detectives were indicted. Weinstein called it a "weak link in [the government's] allegations."

Prosecutors had strong evidence linking Eppolito and Caracappa to eight murders between 1986 and 1990, including one in which they turned on police lights, pulled a man's car over and shot him in the head. Those crimes clearly fell outside the five-year statute of limitations for racketeering, and Weinstein urged prosecutors to charge them under federal murder-for-hire laws.

Prosecutors reframed their indictment several times but, for reasons they have not explained, opted to stick with racketeering. They argued that Eppolito and Caracappa had continued their conspiracy in Las Vegas with a cluster of lesser crimes committed between 1994 and 2005.

In Friday's decision, Weinstein said the government had failed to prove there was a continuing conspiracy.

"A retired contractor who opens a delicatessen in his retirement may encourage his old employees and clients to buy their lunches at his new store, and time on job sites may have taught him what brand of pastrami those customers will prefer; that does not mean he remains in the construction business," the judge wrote.

Weinstein added that although he had concerns about the statute of limitations before the trial began, he chose to allow the trial to proceed "in order to preserve the government's right to appeal" if he should reverse the jury's verdict.

Weinstein, 85, has made headlines with some regularity during his 40 years on the bench. In 1997, he ordered Vincent "The Chin" Gigante — who had worn a bathrobe and slippers as street clothes for years — to appear "properly attired, shaved and barbered." Gigante complied.

More often, he has drawn notice for using his power in the name of reform, as in a 1965 case of 23 draft-dodgers who fled to Canada. Weinstein decided the fugitives deserved representation and appointed counsel for them, said Stephen Gillars, a professor at the NYU School of Law.

"The word 'maverick' fits nicely in the best of senses," Gillars said. Weinstein's decisions have been overturned by the U.S. 2nd Circuit Court of Appeals for "going too far out on a limb," he said.

DOJ_NMG_0038070

The decision in the Mafia cops case, though, focuses on a narrow legal issue. In explaining his decision, Weinstein quoted the play "A Man for All Seasons," in which Sir Thomas More argues that even the devil deserves the full benefit of law: "This country's planted thick with laws from coast to coast — men's laws, not God's — and if you cut them down, do you really think you could stand upright in the winds that would blow then?"

NEW HEARTBREAK FOR VICTIMS' KIN (NYPOST)

By Zach Haberman And Jennifer Fermino

The New York Post, July 3, 2006

Less then three months ago, Betty Hydell was rejoicing that the dirty cops who helped kill her son got what they deserved - a guilty verdict.

But yesterday, when an FBI agent called her Staten Island home and told her their conviction had been overturned, she wondered if the evil pair would have the last laugh.

"We thought it was over," she said.

"I couldn't believe it. I couldn't see why the judge would do this. He called it a 'hideous' crime."

Louis Eppolito and Stephen Caracappa kidnapped James Hydell in 1986 and delivered him to a mobster. His body was never found.

His sister, Elizabeth Hydell, said, "This is insane. They're getting away with these murders."

Authorities told the families they would appeal.

The relatives' reaction - a mixture of sadness, anger and confusion - mirrored the other families who lost loved ones at the bloodstained hands of the Mafia cops who took orders from the wrong side of the law.

"I think this whole thing makes a mockery of our judicial system," said Danielle Lino, whose father, Ed Lino, a Gambino soldier, was shot in the head by Caracappa.

It is unclear how the ruling by U.S. District Judge Jack Weinstein will affect the six pending civil suits against Eppolito and Caracappa.

zach.haberman@nypost.com

Shock, But Some Praise, After Legal Ruling (NYT)

By Robert D. McFadden

The New York Times, July 1, 2006

The wife and daughter of one murder victim called it a shock. Lawyers for the men who had been convicted called it sound legal reasoning, a vindication of their trial strategy, and said that freedom on bail — not life in prison — might be next. Prosecutors, carefully avoiding hints of disappointment, promised to appeal.

After months of twists and turns in a federal case that ended in guilty verdicts for two former city police detectives, including convictions in eight murders for the mob a generation ago, Judge Jack B. Weinstein's decision yesterday to toss out the convictions on a statute-of-limitations ruling stunned practically everyone involved, although the defendants' lawyers were calmly making "I-told-you-so" statements.

While reaction was swift and predictable — an abyss between victims' families and their lawyers on one side, and defendants and their representatives on the other — there was general agreement that Judge Weinstein had made a hard decision on principle, according to law, and some called it courageous.

The judge acknowledged that the evidence at trial had overwhelmingly established that Louis J. Eppolito and Stephen Caracappa had committed killings for the mob, kidnappings and other "heinous and violent crimes." He noted, though, that a five-year federal statute of limitations had lapsed, compelling him to set aside the jury's verdict in his courtroom on April 6.

"It was really a very courageous decision," said Joseph A. Bondy, Mr. Eppolito's latest lawyer. "We're relieved, obviously. Mr. Eppolito and his family are relieved beyond words." Mr. Bondy — who succeeded Bruce Cutler, the trial lawyer, after Mr. Eppolito accused him of incompetent representation (a charge not upheld in a post-trial hearing) — said he would seek bail for his client next week.

DOJ_NMG_0038071

Mr. Cutler, sounding a bit bruised by his former client's accusation, calling it a "distasteful calumny," said he had mixed feelings about the new turn. But instead of talking about Mr. Eppolito, he focused on his trial defense, which cited the statute of limitations as a flaw in the prosecution's case. He said he was gratified that the judge — a jurist of "courage and independence" — had agreed.

As for losing the trial, Mr. Cutler said the gravity of the accusations — cold-blooded murders for hire, kidnapping and other crimes — had made it "hard for the jury to say not guilty" on a fine point of law.

Edward Hayes, who represented Mr. Caracappa during the trial, also praised Judge Weinstein and called his ruling "the second major rejection for the Justice Department in two days," apparently referring to the United States Supreme Court's repudiation on Thursday of the Bush administration's plan to place Guantánamo Bay detainees on trial before military commissions.

Mr. Hayes, who was also accused of incompetent defense by his client in a failed bid for a new trial, said he had not talked to Mr. Caracappa about the latest ruling. Asked if he would ever represent Mr. Caracappa again, he said: "No. I defended him once. I showed him what kind of man I was, and he showed what kind of man he is. I'm not bitter. It's a business."

Judge Weinstein's ruling was a stunning blow to prosecutors, who had presented evidence on violent crimes as part of a larger racketeering conspiracy. The judge held that the conspiracy begun in New York in the 1980's had ended when the defendants retired to Las Vegas and were no longer in contact with the Luchese crime family, which had hired them.

Prosecutors with the United States attorney's office in Brooklyn had argued that the murders were part of a continuing conspiracy that lasted through a 2005 drug deal with a federal informant and that the statute of limitations thus did not apply. Speaking for the office, Robert Nardoza issued a short statement.

"The jury in this case unanimously found Eppolito and Caracappa guilty of racketeering and murder based on overwhelming evidence," it said. "And based on the law that was given to them by the court, each of the 12 jurors specifically found that the defendants' heinous crimes were committed within the statute of limitations. We intend to pursue an appeal."

The ruling was wrenching news to the slain men's families, some of whose members had made impassioned statements at the trial. Michal Weinstein, 30, the daughter of Israel Greenwald, a diamond dealer killed in 1986 and whose remains were discovered under the floor of a Brooklyn garage in 2005, said her mother had called her with news of the decision.

"We want to see that whoever is responsible — well, we know who's responsible — for our father's murder is punished, in accordance with the law," Ms. Weinstein said in a phone interview. "It's taken the breath out of everybody. It's just shocking. I'm still in shock, honestly."

Her mother, Leah Greenwald, 52, said that while shocked by the ruling, she respected it. "We, my daughters and I, do not feel betrayed, but we are shocked and we still believe that ultimately the law will work," she said, her voice calm but with a hint of a quaver. She became more emotional as she spoke of 19 years of not knowing her husband's fate.

At one point in the early 1990's, she said, the family rented an apartment a block away from the Nostrand Avenue garage, near Avenue I, where her husband's remains were found. "I lived there for two years, I parked my car right across the street," she said bitterly. "We were looking for him, and now that we know, it is simply unbelievable that he was so close."

The Greenwalds' lawyer, Benjamin Brafman, called Judge Weinstein "wise and careful" and noted that, while disappointed in his decision, "I respect his ruling." The family, he said, would "continue to pursue justice for the murder of their father/husband in a civil forum and in any future criminal proceedings at either the state or federal level."

Gerald L. Shargel, a lawyer who has defended mobsters, including John J. Gotti, the late don of the Gambino crime family, said the prosecution "had to have known that it was a reach" to use the racketeering conspiracy charge "because the statute of limitations really was pushing the envelope." Mr. Shargel had no role in the trial of the turncoat detectives.

If the prosecution's appeal is denied, new trials on lesser drug and money-laundering charges could follow. Mr. Shargel said that New York State had no statute of limitations on murder, and that the case might have been — or still could be — prosecuted by state authorities. "Jurisdiction had everything to do with this case," he said.

Victims' Families Shocked At Reversal (NSDY)

By Carl Macgowan, Newsday Staff Writer

Long Island Newsday, July 3, 2006

Leah Greenwald said she was shocked Friday when she heard that the disgraced cops accused of killing her husband may go free.

"This is horrible," said Greenwald, of Fresh Meadows. "It's very upsetting because according to the evidence, they definitely are guilty."

Former detectives Louis Eppolito and Stephen Caracappa had been convicted of taking part in eight murders for the Lucchese crime family. Brooklyn federal judge Jack Weinstein threw out the racketeering convictions Friday.

A murder tied to the cops was that of Israel Greenwald, a Brooklyn gem merchant, who was believed to have been killed in 1986.

The Greenwald family is suing Eppolito, Caracappa and the city for $500 million. The former detectives and the city have been sued by the families of at least five other victims.

"Judge Weinstein is a wise and careful judge, and although disappointed by his decision, I respect his ruling," Greenwald's Manhattan attorney, Benjamin Brafman, said in a statement. "On behalf of the Greenwald family, we will continue to pursue justice for the murder of their father/husband in a civil forum and in any future criminal proceedings at either a state or federal level."

Michaelangelo Matera, attorney for the family of Edward Lino, who the detectives were accused of killing in 1992, said he didn't expect Weinstein's decision.

"We were extremely shocked by the judge's decision," Matera said. "We are looking forward to the appellate process and feel hopeful that the guilty verdicts will be reinstated."

Victims' Kin Call Ruling 'So Absurd' (NYDN)

By Greg B. Smith, Daily News Staff Writer

New York Daily News, July 3, 2006

Anger and disbelief.

That's how families of the murder victims reacted after a judge tossed the Mafia cops' convictions despite concluding they had committed some of the most heinous crimes he'd ever seen.

"I never heard of anything so stupid," said Betty Hydell, whose son Jimmy was kidnapped and turned over to a mob hit man in 1986. "I thought this was all over."

"We were surprised to hear this. I'm sure the family is going to be upset," said Mark Longo, an attorney representing the family of Nicholas Guido, a telephone installer who was killed by mistake on Christmas Day 1986.

In April, a jury convicted Louis Eppolito and Stephen Caracappa on all counts in a wide-ranging criminal conspiracy that prosecutors say dated to their days as a decorated NYPD detectives.

They were found guilty of participating in eight murders, one kidnapping and an attempted murder - as well leaking the names of informers to the mob, and warning Luchese crime family gangsters when they were about to be busted.

Brooklyn Federal Judge Jack Weinstein threw out the racketeering conviction because he found prosecutors failed to show the cops participated in a continuing conspiracy into 2000 - the statute of limitations cutoff.

But the legal distinctions in Weinstein's ruling carried little weight with the victims' kin.

Hydell's daughter, Linda, was the last person to talk to her brother the day he was kidnapped and killed in September 1986.

She called yesterday's ruling "so absurd it's not even funny."

"It's gotta end somewhere. They were convicted on 72 counts. What are people going to say?" she said. "There's no closure on this for my family. It just keeps getting worse and worse and worse."

There was similar reaction from the family of Israel Greenwald, a jeweler who was murdered because a mob associate feared he would become an FBI informer.

Greenwald's wife, Leah, said she respected the judge's decision but said she was upset because next week the two cops are expected to ask the judge to be released on bail.

DOJ_NMG_0038073

"Of course we are upset because we do not want them to be free after knowing that they are guilty," she said. "In our minds they are guilty, and we want them to be in jail."

Glorious New Day For Family Of Ex-cop (NYDN)

By Michelle Caruso, Daily News Staff Writer

New York Daily News, July 3, 2006

When Louis Eppolito's wife and daughters got word that his convictions were overturned, "it was like the world stopped," his eldest daughter told the Daily News yesterday.

"We were stunned. We had not been given much reason to hope," Andrea Eppolito said of the judge's ruling.

Then there were free-flowing tears of joy during an emotional three-way conference call among Andrea, 29, her mother, Fran, and sister Deanna, 28.

"We were all crying, my mother, my sister and me. It was like everything was in slow motion. We are so elated. This is such a blessing," Andrea said.

"My mother just kept saying, 'He's gonna come home. He's coming home! He's coming home!' over and over. The world is good, more than good," she added.

Andrea knows her father still has a big fight on his hands. He will first have to apply for release on bail while awaiting retrial on federal money-laundering and drug charges, and there's no guarantee he'll get it.

"We're going to try and hope for bail. When my father was out on bail before, he obeyed all the terms and conditions, so that should count in his favor," she said.

And if he comes home, "We will shut the doors and sit together as a family for some quiet personal time to reflect, as a family. Then afterwards, there will be a party," she said.

Eppolito said she is optimistic about the retrial ahead, even though it will mean more stress, legal fees and time. But she says she thinks the ex-cop's new lawyer, Joseph Bondy, will give the case 100%.

"I believe in my father. I believe in Joe Bondy and I believe in the law. We are so grateful to have a second chance."

"We will fight as a family, the way we always have. We'll fight until it's done," she said.

Eppolito says she is not daunted by the judge's contention that, even though he was legally bound to toss the convictions, he still thinks her father and his co-defendant, Stephen Caracappa, are guilty of murders and disgracing their police shields.

"If that is the judge's personal opinion, I am grateful that he upheld the law and his integrity," she said.

"I realize my father will never again be considered an innocent man. Some people will always believe the story told by the government's witnesses," she said.

"But he is innocent, and I want him to be vindicated. I want him sitting on the couch with his wife and kids and his dog, enjoying his old age. He spent two decades on the police force. He's earned it," she said.

Hacker Attacks Hitting Pentagon (BSUN)

By Siobhan Gorman, Sun Reporter

The Baltimore Sun, July 2, 2006

But NSA's methods for safeguarding data are growing obsolete

WASHINGTON -- The number of reported attempts to penetrate Pentagon computer networks rose sharply in the past decade, from fewer than 800 in 1996 to more than 160,000 last year - thousands of them successful. At the same time, the nation's ability to safeguard sensitive data in those and other government computer systems is becoming obsolete as efforts to make improvements have faltered and stalled.

A National Security Agency program to protect secrets at the Defense Department and intelligence and other agencies is seven years behind schedule, triggering concerns that the data will be increasingly vulnerable to theft, according to intelligence officials and unclassified internal NSA documents obtained by The Sun.

When fully implemented, the program would build a new encryption system to strengthen protections on computer networks and would more effectively control the access of millions of people to government computer systems and buildings.

DOJ_NMG_0038074

Launched in 1999, the program was to have been completed last year, but it fell behind in part because of differences between the NSA and the Pentagon. The NSA is trying to revamp the program, although the deadline has slid to 2012, with the most substantive security improvements planned for 2018.

An internal NSA report in April 2005 described the problem as "critical," noting that 30 percent of the agency's security equipment does not provide "adequate" protection; another 46 percent is approaching that status.

"Much of the existing cryptographic equipment is based on ... technologies that are 20-30+ years old," said the report from the agency's information security directorate. At the same time, it noted, technology for breaking into computer systems has improved, which "gives our adversaries enhanced capabilities."

Pentagon computers, in particular, are under constant attack. Recently, Chinese hackers were able to penetrate and steal data from a classified computer system serving the Joint Chiefs of Staff, according to two sources familiar with the incident. A security team spent weeks eliminating the breach and installing additional safeguards.

The Pentagon declined interview requests for two information security officials, but a spokesman said in a written statement that the NSA is continually assisting the Pentagon to "maintain best security practices" and raise the level of information security.

NSA spokesman Don Weber said in a statement that because information security is a core mission of the agency, "any speculation that we, along with our partners would leave national security systems vulnerable, is unfounded."

Among 18 current and former officials and security experts interviewed for this article, several would speak only on condition of anonymity because many details of the program are sensitive and reveal vulnerabilities in the nation's defenses.

Encryption, which is an electronic lock, is among the most important of security tools, scrambling sensitive information so that it can ride securely in communications over the Internet or phone lines, and requiring a key to decipher.

Powerful encryption is necessary for protecting information that is beamed from soldiers on the battlefield or that guards data in computers at the NSA's Fort Meade headquarters. Without updated encryption, sensitive information could be stolen by China or other countries that have regularly tried to break into U.S. government systems to steal military and intelligence secrets. There are emerging concerns about Iran's desire to do so, as well.

"This stuff is enormously important," said John P. Stenbit, the Pentagon's chief information officer until 2004. "If the keys get into the wrong hands, all kinds of bad things happen. You don't want to just let a hacker grab the key as it's going through the Internet."

The NSA report warned that "serious risks" in the Pentagon's security system jeopardize its ability to execute its missions effectively. A December 2005 NSA planning document described the program as crucial for ensuring adequate protection for all national security programs.

"It's a pretty critical thing to do right ... because the government relies on confidential communications so heavily," said Martin Roesch, founder of Sourcefire, a computer security company in Columbia, Md. "It's kind of a fundamental capability."

A growing threat As the program, known as Key Management Infrastructure, has faltered, the potential for penetrating government computers has grown. Intelligence officials have said that as many as 100 countries pose legitimate threats to U.S. government computers and those of companies doing government work.

In the past decade, reported attempts to hack into Pentagon computers have grown 200-fold, according to the Pentagon.

"Numerous states, terrorist and hackers groups, criminal syndicates, and individuals continue to pose a threat to our computer systems," Maj. Gen. Michael D. Maples, director of the Defense Intelligence Agency, warned Congress this year. "Over the last few years, hackers have exploited thousands of [Department of Defense] systems."

In addition to the NSA's aging security technology, some of the tools required for encrypting data lack security protections and are vulnerable, so an infiltrator could uncover and possibly replicate the tools to access government data, according to the NSA's December 2005 planning document.

Intelligence specialists say potential attacks could include foreign governments snooping for U.S. intelligence and military secrets and using identity information to create false IDs, which could enable them to gain access to military or intelligence facilities, computers and even weapons systems, they said.

DOJ_NMG_0038075

"What's at stake here is the security of the nation, because we are under monster attack from China, Russia, Israel, France and so on," a former government official said.

News reports last year revealed a major Chinese campaign called Titan Rain that targeted unclassified Pentagon computer networks and others at the Energy and Homeland Security departments. In a Miami case, the Justice Department charged two men this year with channeling military technology secrets to China that were obtained through hacking. It brought similar charges against three others last fall in a case in Los Angeles.

"The threat is much larger than we ever thought it was," said David Szady, a former top counterintelligence official at the FBI and the CIA. The Chinese "have been able to develop their military and their systems on the backbone of United States technology."

Another country emerging as a concern is Iran. "They certainly are able to, and would have an interest in doing it," said one former senior intelligence official.

Cracking the government's aging encryption system would require a high level of training of the type most likely occurring in countries such as China or Russia.

But as commercial code-breaking technology improves, intelligence experts said, it is possible that a technically astute terrorist or even an unusually focused teenage hacker could infiltrate government computers.

If hackers can break through weak encryption systems on government and contractors' computers, they can hunt through different networks for bits and pieces of information to thread together and assemble a fairly good idea of U. S. defense capabilities - with the intent of either copying them or devising a system to defeat them, said one former NSA employee.

The new system would address a number of the security challenges that exist with the explosion of wireless, networked communication devices, according to internal NSA documents. The most sensitive data is generally held in internal systems that are not exposed to the Internet. But the Pentagon and other government agencies are increasingly using Internet-based communications.

And as the demand grows for "smart" identification cards with computer chips that verify the card holder's identity, so does the need for sophisticated ways to manage who is being assigned cards, so that the cards do not end up in the wrong hands, said Stephen Kent, a chief scientist at BBN Technologies who has chaired government panels on information security.

False starts Sprawled across several government agencies, but centered at the NSA, the Key Management Infrastructure program is actually a compilation of about 25 programs; its costs, which are classified, are difficult to gauge. One estimate pegs spending so far at $2 billion or more, said a former government official familiar with the program. Other estimates are in the hundreds of millions.

A critical problem with the project, according to several current and former intelligence officials, is one that has afflicted other large programs at the agency: poor management.

Like other major NSA efforts - such as the failed Trailblazer program to rapidly sift out threat information, and the troubled Groundbreaker program aimed at upgrading the agency's computer networks - an ever-changing game plan has caused many of the project's problems, current and former senior intelligence officials said.

One former senior intelligence official said that the NSA had unrealistic expectations from the start and repeatedly opted for delays to try to perfect the program. That left the government with aging security protections in the quest for security nirvana, the official said.

"NSA often will say, 'Well, this is not totally secure, so you can't use it,' when the only alternative is nothing," the former official said. "My worry is this push for perfect security is the enemy of good security.

NSA officials have also had a difficult time forging consensus among the agencies involved with the project, especially the Pentagon, according to former officials familiar with the conflict.

"Anybody who doesn't like the way you're doing it can essentially withdraw," the former senior intelligence official said. "It's a program that is actually planned for failure."

After several false starts, the first phase of the program was canceled in 2003, and its replacement has been in the planning stages since then.

DOJ_NMG_0038076

The NSA is re-evaluating the program, intelligence officials said. That reassessment - owed at least in part to pressure from Maj. Gen. Dale W. Meyerrose, the chief technology officer under spy chief John D. Negroponte and the Pentagon - is expected to produce a new blueprint, Meyerrose said in an interview. It also coincided with incoming NSA Director Lt. Gen. Keith B. Alexander's agency-wide review.

Under the current plan, the initial phase will be completed in 2012. Even then, it would at best provide only a level of security equivalent to the existing system, current and former government officials said. The agency would, however, be able to upgrade the revised system, which is not possible now, they said.

Meyerrose acknowledged that the project has taken "a little longer than we thought." He chalked it up to a lack of leadership in the intelligence community to get behind the program, which he said would change under the new spymaster. The program's planners, he said, underestimated how difficult it would be to "synchronize" all the moving parts of the program.

After the first false start, the NSA asked the consulting firm Booz Allen Hamilton, which was involved in aspects of the project, to take on a broader role to get the program's many segments working together. But the NSA is unhappy with the firm's performance, which it deemed slow and rigid, one former government official said. A spokesman for Booz Allen declined to comment, citing confidentiality agreements.

Booz Allen's contract is slated to end in October, and the NSA plans to do the work on its own, probably with assistance from a new contractor, the former official said.

Although Richard C. Schaeffer, in charge of the NSA's information security division, characterized the current timetable for the program as "aggressive" in a statement to The Sun, some officials are concerned that the schedule is sliding again, according to a former government official familiar with the program. The NSA was supposed to award a contract for the revamped program last December, but that shifted to June and then to October.

"It's pretty scandalous. It certainly has been a start, restart, start, restart," said one former intelligence official. "It seems stunning to me."

Meanwhile, given the pace of technology, every year that the project slips, it becomes less relevant, said a former government official familiar with the project.

"You're going to introduce something that is completely obsolete," he said.

While 2012 is the target date for wrapping up the current phase of the program, Meyerrose said, some portions will be implemented in the interim.

But some intelligence officials said they are concerned that components of the program could be delayed until 2018, when the next phase of more substantive security changes is to be completed, and the April 2005 NSA report highlights this possibility.

The program's delay also is likely to hold up some major Pentagon efforts that rely on secure information, such as the Global Information Grid, a network under development that aims to manage all national security information around the world, former intelligence officials said. Both the NSA report and planning documents emphasize the dependency of this network and other defense programs on the key management program.

"If you can't communicate securely, the enemy has the potential to know what you're doing," one former official said. "Information security is Job One."

siobhan.gorman@baltsun.com

Sex Offender Law Limited (KCS)

By Joe Lambe, Laura Bauer

The Kansas City Star, July 1, 2006

The Missouri Supreme Court ruled Friday that thousands of sex offenders no longer have to register, because the law requiring it does not apply retroactively.

As a result, although the court unanimously upheld the state's sex offender registry law, only those convicted after the law took effect Jan. 1. 1995, now will have to register.

The law previously required people to register if they were convicted after July 1, 1979. This involved more than 11,000 offenders to register, but Friday's ruling lopped off about 16 of 27 years of registration.

The ruling written by Judge Laura Denvir Stith also said nothing prevented publishing the information about those who have registered. Offenders before 1995, however, can now move to new addresses that will not have to be listed.

"The fact that the Missouri Supreme Court upheld the state's sex offender registration law was an important victory," attorney general spokesman John Fougere said. "We will work with the General Assembly to ensure that the maximum amount of information possible about all sex offenders will continue to be made available to Missouri's citizens."

Jackson County Prosecutor Mike Sanders said the ruling would affect about half of the 1,400 offenders registered in the county.

Capt. Randy Gibson of the Greene County Sheriff's Department in southwest Missouri worries about public safety. His county has roughly 650 on its registry, and up to half would be affected.

"I think the public has a right to be concerned," Gibson said. "I don't look upon this as a victory for victims or the safety and security of the public."

The ruling came in a lawsuit filed by Kansas City lawyer Arthur A. Benson II on behalf of 11 offenders in Jackson County.

Benson praised the ruling, even with the continued publishing possibility.

"The information is going to get stale very fast, and nobody will be interested in it," Benson said.

The court found that the law violated the state constitution by applying a civil law retroactively. But the court ruled against plaintiffs on many other constitutional issues.

Benson said the ruling reflected "a general sense of fair play in the Missouri Constitution."

Many of his 11 Jane or John Doe clients pleaded guilty to minor crimes long before 1995 in exchange for nothing on their records, he said, but then were slammed years later with registration.

His clients also contended the law was overly broad. Missouri, unlike most states, required registration for things like nonsexual child abuse and parental kidnapping. Some of the Does had to register for life for such crimes or for teen romances when one party was underage.

The Supreme Court said the broadness issue was moot because of changes passed this year by the General Assembly. Nonsexual abuse no longer requires registration, and some low-level offenders as of Aug. 28 can petition to get off the lists after two or 10 years.

Only one of the 11 plaintiffs was convicted after the 1995 law went into effect, and that one was registered for nonsexual child abuse, Benson said. All of them should no longer have to register.

The registry law in Kansas is not retroactive, and offenders have to register only if their sex crimes occurred after April 14, 1994.

Advocates have said the growing lists have become too hard to administer but question whether ignoring many past offenders is the way to narrow them.

Marc Klaas, who has pushed for sex offender reforms since a convicted rapist kidnapped and killed his daughter Polly in 1993, said Friday's ruling in Missouri was a mistake.

Lists nationwide have become too unwieldy for sheriff's departments to enforce, he said, but the best way to deal with that is not cutoff dates but to exclude low-level crimes and those with little risk of re-offending.

"If you're not retroactive," Klaas said, "you're creating a false sense of security. … Is the guy who commits the same crime the day before the law goes into effect any less dangerous than the guy who commits it the day after? Of course not."

Gibson and Missouri Highway Patrol officials said they would wait until the state attorney general's office interpreted the ruling to know how to proceed.

"We'll clean the list the way the Supreme Court wants us to, but we don't want to inadvertantly take someone off that should still be there," said Capt. Chris Ricks, a patrol spokesman.

He said his department would contact the governor's office and attorney general as early as next week.

•A Friday ruling by the Missouri Supreme Court upheld the state's sex offender law.

•But it ruled the law could not be applied retroactively, meaning thousands of sex offenders no longer have to register if they were convicted before the law took effect in 1995.

DOJ_NMG_0038078

CIVIL LAW:

High-Drama, Low-Frequency Protest (NYT)

By Henry Fountain

The New York Times, July 2, 2006

The Senate nearly approved a constitutional amendment last week that would allow Congress to outlaw flag-burning, falling one vote short of the two-thirds majority needed to send it to the states for approval.

Opponents, mostly Democrats, warned that if it passed the amendment, the Senate would be tinkering with the Bill of Rights to ban a form of protest that is rare.

Just how uncommon is it?

"My impression is that probably in all of American history there's been something like a few hundred flag burnings," said Robert Justin Goldstein, a retired political science professor at Oakland University in Michigan and an expert on the issue. There has probably been a similar number of other types of desecration, including ripping and defacing the flag, Mr. Goldstein said.

"Flag desecration really became famous in this country during the Vietnam War period," he said. "But the general sense is that the news media has not been paying a whole lot of attention to the subject in recent years."

While many incidents are serious protests, others appear to be the work of people with too much time or alcohol on their hands. In a Senate speech, Senator Orrin G. Hatch, the Utah Republican who was the chief sponsor of the amendment, listed 17 cases since 2003. The latest include one early last month in West Haven, Conn., in which an apparently drunken man ripped up two small flags, threatened a bystander while using a racial slur and then chugged a beer in front of police officers before his arrest on breach-of-peace and other charges.

CIVIL RIGHTS:

Feds File Lawsuit Against Sarasota (BRAH)

The Bradenton Herald, July 1, 2006

Sarasota County officials broke federal law when they denied permission for housing for disabled people, according to a lawsuit filed Friday by the U.S. Justice Department.

The complaint, filed in U.S. District Court in Tampa, alleges the county refused to allow Renaissance Manor Inc. to operate six homes for individuals with mental illness and a history of substance abuse. The homes are similar to other houses in the county occupied by residents who share living space and common facilities, according to a Justice Department news release.

According to the government's complaint, the homes are allowed under Sarasota County's zoning code, but the county determined that the homes broke the code because of the residents' disabilities. The complaint also alleges that the county retaliated against Renaissance Manor by refusing to release grant funds it had been previously awarded.

"The residents of these homes should not be refused an equal opportunity for housing in their community," said Wan J. Kim, assistant attorney general for the Civil Rights Division.

Sarasota County officials said late Friday they had not seen the complaint, but they defended the county's housing practices.

"We have always supported housing for disabled persons. as well as programs for people recovering from addiction," said Deputy County Administrator Susan Scott, in a statement. "Our attorneys will be responding to the issues raised."

The suit seeks monetary damages to compensate the victims, civil penalties, and a court order barring future discrimination.

The federal Fair Housing Act prohibits discrimination in housing on the basis of race, color, religion, sex, familial status, national origin and disability.

DOJ_NMG_0038079

Early Voting Critics Eye Appeals Court (WT)

By Jon Ward, The Washington Times

The Washington Times, July 1, 2006

ANNAPOLIS -- A group opposing early voting in this fall's election will now take its lawsuit to Maryland's Court of Appeals, after a county judge yesterday denied its request to keep alive a petition drive that would stop early voting and let voters decide whether they want it in the future.

"I'm disappointed that they ruled so narrowly, but we expected that this would go to the Court of Appeals," said Tom Roskelly, chairman of Marylanders for Fair Elections, a group backed by Gov. Robert L. Ehrlich Jr.'s re-election campaign.

"It's one more bump in this legal road we have to navigate," Mr. Roskelly said.

Mr. Ehrlich, a Republican, officially registered yesterday as a candidate, along with running mate Kristen Cox. He called the two bills that established early voting "power grabs by the leadership of the Maryland General Assembly."

Mr. Ehrlich has also said that early voting will make voter-fraud easier to commit.

Mr. Roskelly's group is pressing forward with the petition drive and yesterday submitted to Secretary of State Mary D. Kane about 200,000 signatures, roughly twice the number needed.

The two petitions against the bills require about 51,000 signatures each to halt early voting this fall and place it on the ballot for voters to decide whether it is implemented in the future.

The group had already submitted 40,000 signatures May 31, but State Board of Elections Administrator Linda H. Lamone said the signatures were insufficient.

Miss Lamone said the group had fallen 138 signatures short on May 31 on its petition against the initial early-voting bill, which was passed in 2005, vetoed by Mr. Ehrlich, then passed by a veto override in the Democrat-controlled legislature this year.

Mr. Roskelly accused Miss Lamone of trying to stifle the petition drive by declaring the signatures insufficient, and he has cast doubt on the honesty of her count.

"They can make all the baseless, groundless charges they want," said David Paulson of the Maryland Democratic Party. "It doesn't hide the fact that they failed."

The group also said it was denied a request to observe the signature verification and requested a recount.

In the group's lawsuit, members argued that the validity of the signatures should not have been determined until yesterday's deadline had passed and all signatures had been submitted.

Anne Arundel County Circuit Judge Paul Hackner yesterday dismissed the suit.

Judge Hackner said he thought the group's argument was "nonsensical," according to the Associated Press.

The petition drive against the second bill, which passed this year and set up early voting locations in what Republicans said were overwhelmingly Democratic precincts, is going forward.

The State Board of Elections will now verify those signatures and hold on to the signatures on the petition against the first bill until the Court of Appeals rules on the lawsuit.

Cruel And Unusual (SLPD)

By Jeremy Kohler

St. Louis Post-Dispatch, July 1, 2006

For those opposed to the death penalty, a humane execution might be a contradiction of terms.

For those who don't care if a condemned man suffers in his last moments, it might be a pointless concern.

The nation has walked a fine line between those views for more than a century in seeking ways the founding fathers intended to permit to snuff capital criminals.

States used hangmen's nooses, gases, electricity and, finally, injections. But new challenges have raised questions about the legality of lethal injections, and about the future of capital punishment in the 38 states where it's legal.

In May, the U.S. Supreme Court ruled that inmates could challenge lethal injections as being unconstitutional. Now a wave of suits has halted the death penalty in some states, including Missouri.

DOJ_NMG_0038080

At the crux of the issue, critics say some inmates have been insufficiently numbed and may have suffered excruciating pain that was not evident to witnesses.

In Missouri, those claims were helped by the disclosure last week that the state's executions for the past decade have been largely in the hands of a dyslexic surgeon who confessed he sometimes makes mistakes with figures.

U.S. District Judge Fernando Gaitan Jr. halted Missouri executions, saying he had grave concerns that the inmates were being subjected to "unacceptable risk" of unconstitutional suffering.

Gaitan amended his earlier ruling in the case of inmate Michael Taylor, of Kansas City. He gave corrections officials until July 15 to come up with a new protocol.

Also last week, a federal judge in Little Rock, Ark., postponed an execution, saying if the inmate became conscious during the execution he would suffer pain "that will never be rectified."

The two rulings had Missouri's corrections director, Larry Crawford, wondering whether the state could ever perform another execution in compliance with Gaitan's order.

In Illinois, a moratorium on executions remains in place. Former Gov. George Ryan halted all executions in 2000 after 13 people condemned to death were found to have been wrongfully convicted. Illinois uses lethal injections for its executions.

Moreover, days before leaving office in January 2003, Ryan granted clemency to all of the 167 death row inmates in Illinois because of the flawed process that led to these sentences.

Most of the states that have capital punishment rely on lethal injection, using a series of three injections that has lately come under intense scrutiny.

First a general anesthetic is administered to knock out the inmate. Then comes a drug that paralyzes. Finally the inmate is injected with a drug that triggers a heart attack.

The final drug would be excruciatingly painful if the inmate was not given enough anesthetic, but the inmate could be unable to show that he or she was in pain, because of the other drugs' effects, according to testimony in Taylor's case.

Other options

Experts note that states could use injections that are less likely to cause pain.

Dr. Mark Heath, an anesthesiologist from Columbia University in New York, testified in Taylor's case - and in several other similar cases nationwide - that it would be more humane to execute humans the same way animals are euthanized: with an overdose of a barbiturate.

The condemned inmate would simply go to sleep and not wake up.

Heath testified that Missouri was the only state using lethal injection that did not have written protocols that could prevent "ad hoc changes or vagaries or misunderstandings or absent-mindedness or other problems that can occur when a complex endeavor is undertaken by a group of people."

Crawford pointed out that simply giving an overdose of barbiturate could prolong executions and make deaths linger over an hour.

That might cause less pain, he said, but might not pass any more constitutional muster. Crawford said he believed Missouri's system of three injections was better.

A painless death "would be a wonderful goal but we come into this world in pain and we all suffer some discomfort, and in this case it's as painless as we can make it," he said.

"Not gruesome"

States have tried to make executions quick, painless and "not gruesome," said Deborah Denno, a Fordham University law professor and expert in executions.

"But those goals don't mesh very well," she said.

Chief among Gaitan's concerns was that Missouri's lethal-injection program was largely controlled by a dyslexic doctor, called John Doe I in court records.

Missouri had no apparent protocol for executing prisoners other than Doe's whim, he wrote in a 16-page decision. Among Gaitan's requirements was that a certified anesthesiologist prepare the lethal-injection drugs. John Doe I is not an anesthesiologist.

DOJ_NMG_0038081

The American Medical Association has urged its members to steer clear of involvement in executions. Crawford said he did not know if state officials would be able to find an anesthesiologist, although he said he was trying.

Crawford declined to provide Doe's real name, saying he was concerned that identifying the doctor would pose a threat to Doe's safety.

Crawford said he never had any reason to question Doe. "This is being portrayed as being a performance issue," he said. "There is no indication there has been any performance deficiency."

Other states have executed prisoners without a doctor, he noted. He said he did not know about Doe's dyslexia until the surgeon's recent testimony.

Crawford said he was aware at all times that Doe was risking his reputation and his medical career by working on executions and that he felt "very, very fortunate to have a medical professional willing to assist in what he believes is an ethical level of involvement."

He said it was possible that the state would not be able to find an anesthesiologist who would be willing to participate in an execution.

"That would effectively stop executions," he said.

Denno said she thought it was more likely that states would find ways to change their procedures to skirt constitutional questions.

Corrections officials "know people who would be willing to conduct these executions," she said. "It might be a little difficult but they'll get one."

The question, she said, is "What are the quality of these people?"

Scandal At The Coast Guard Academy (NYT)

The New York Times, July 2, 2006

The Coast Guard Academy in New London, Conn., which first accepted women in 1976, has a higher proportion of women in its student body — about 30 percent — than do any of the nation's other military service academies. The Coast Guard is also the only military service to open every available job to women.

But recently the Coast Guard Academy has drawn attention for a very different reason. For the first time in its 130-year history, the academy court-martialed a cadet, convicting him on sodomy, indecent assault and extortion charges after four female cadets accused him of assaulting them. The stories that emerged from the trial are enough to make any reasonable person question how such allegations are handled at the academy.

Last week two Connecticut members of Congress took up the issue. Christopher Shays, a Republican, led hearings on how officials are responding to reports of sexual assaults in the service academies. Rosa DeLauro, a Democrat, inserted a request in a Homeland Security spending bill for the Government Accountability Office to monitor the Coast Guard Academy's progress in responding to sexual harassment claims.

That scrutiny is necessary, as shown by an announcement earlier this year by the academy that it would start involving women in sexual harassment investigations to improve handling of such cases. It is frankly surprising, and somewhat appalling, that such a basic step was not taken years ago.

The academy's defenders say that the case is the rare exception and that the Coast Guard, with its strong record of welcoming women into the service, is unfairly getting a black eye. But the women who are performing so many functions in the service deserve assurance that their concerns will be taken seriously. The American people expect no less.

ANTITRUST:

Microsoft Races To Meet Deadline Before Europe Imposes A Fine (NYT)

By Kevin J. O'Brien

The New York Times, July 1, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0038082

BRUSSELS, June 30 — For nearly three months, Microsoft says, 300 of its engineers have been working nearly nonstop to come up with the documentation for its server software that the European Commission has sought since an antitrust ruling in 2004.

After two years of dragging its heels — at least in the view of the commission's antitrust staff — Microsoft is now presenting itself as productive and cooperative. The commission's threat of another fine on the company is driving the last-minute frenzy.

But the commission's vote on the fine, which if assessed in full would total about 420 million euros ($527 million), may come just before Microsoft crosses the finish line.

A European Union advisory committee is scheduled to discuss the commission's draft decision to impose the fine on Monday, but no action is expected.

Neelie Kroes, the European competition commissioner, has threatened a maximum fine of 2 million euros a day, starting from Dec. 15, 2005, the commission's original deadline for submission of the data.

Jonathan Todd, a spokesman for Ms. Kroes, said the commission intended to decide on the fines before the end of July. But he would not say whether this burst of activity would forestall any penalties.

Even if Microsoft met its deadline and delivered the documentation, the commission could impose the fines anyway for not having delivered the protocols in the form the commission wanted by Dec. 15.

Ms. Kroes accused Microsoft on Dec. 15 of having provided "incomplete and inaccurate" material. The independent trustee in the case called the material "totally unfit" for use by rival software makers, and a consulting firm for the commission agreed.

After what Brad Smith, Microsoft's general counsel and lead lawyer on the European case, called a "breakthrough" hearing in Brussels in March, Microsoft says it finally knew what the commission wanted and it has been rushing to provide it. But Mr. Smith said he knew the commission might impose the daily fines anyway.

Microsoft plans to hand over the last batch of computer codes sought by the commission on July 18. Mr. Smith said the deadline for delivering the communications protocols had been set with the commission's monitoring trustee, Neil Barrett, a British computer expert.

"We pulled together people from across the company and took them off jobs to work on this project," Mr. Smith said by telephone from Redmond, Wash., this week. "It is really something that has strained our resources to the limit.

"Some people are literally spending 24 hours a day at the office," Mr. Smith added.

The European Commission ruled in March 2004 that Microsoft had used its Windows operating system to dominate the market in software for servers, the computers that form the backbone of most office computer systems and the Internet.

But Microsoft appealed the decision and the commission's record fine of 497.2 million euros. The European Court of First Instance is not expected to rule on the appeal until next year. But in December 2004, the same court ruled that Microsoft had to disclose the protocols before the appeal was decided.

For the last 18 months, the commission and Microsoft have been at odds over the protocols. To break the impasse, the commission appointed Mr. Barrett, a London author and occasional Microsoft critic, as trustee in the dispute last October.

Even then, Microsoft and the commission battled, until a closed hearing of Microsoft and commission staff lawyers on March 29-30 in Brussels, when the company changed tack, according to those involved. Thomas Pfenning, a German engineer who had worked on Microsoft protocols in Redmond, where Microsoft is based, since 1995, approached Mr. Barrett after the hearing. Mr. Barrett agreed to meet again with Microsoft in London.

A week later, on April 6, three Microsoft engineers — Henry Sanders, a general manager for Windows networking; Bill Laing, general manager of the server division; and Iain McDonald, director of program management for Windows server products — flew to London and met with Mr. Barrett, two of his assistants and three representatives of the European Commission for two days.

Both sides agreed on a format for the protocols and the timetable for delivering them, Mr. Sanders said. On his way to Heathrow Airport, Mr. McDonald gazed at the London Underground map and suggested naming stages of the project after stops on London's Circle Line.

Microsoft has delivered the first five batches of protocols, code-named Tower, Liverpool, Moorgate, King's Cross and Baker.

On Friday, it delivered Edgware Road. On July 18, the journey is to end at Paddington station.

The protocols cover server software and elements of Microsoft's new desktop operating system, Vista, which will not be sold until 2007.

Michaels Takes $6 Billion Buyout (WSJ)

By Mike Spector, Dennis Berman

The Wall Street Journal, July 1, 2006

Bain, Blackstone to Acquire Arts-and-Crafts Retailer; Options Probes Continue

Michaels Stores Inc. Friday said it accepted a more than $6 billion takeover bid from a private-equity group comprising Bain Capital and Blackstone Group, completing a nearly three-month process of fielding offers for the arts-and-crafts retailer.

The winning takeover group paid $44 a share for the Irving, Texas, retailer. Michaels shares rose 8.5%, or $3.24, to $41.24 at 4 p.m. Friday in New York Stock Exchange composite trading. Michaels has 137 million shares outstanding.

Michaels, the largest arts-and-crafts retailer in the U.S. and Canada by sales, has been attractive to private-equity groups because of its heavy cash flow, which could help to pay down debt incurred in the deal. The retailer generated operating cash flow of $364 million in its fiscal year ended Jan. 28.

"This transaction delivers outstanding value for all Michaels Stores' shareholders and represents a powerful endorsement of our company's strategy, performance and business prospects," said Charles J. Wyly Jr., Michaels chairman. The company "is well-positioned for future growth," he added.

Michaels put itself up for auction in March at the same time that its chief executive, R. Michael Rouleau, retired.

The sale comes amid a Securities and Exchange Commission investigation of Michaels. The SEC is looking into possible irregularities in stock-options grants at the company, which may have boosted the pay of some executives. The company in June said the SEC had asked it to preserve documents related to stock-options grants since 1990. Michaels has set up its own internal committee to investigate its potential tax liability in the case.

In addition, a federal grand jury in New York subpoenaed documents from the company related to its stocks-options practices. The Internal Revenue Service and the Manhattan District Attorney are scrutinizing the company. Michaels also faces two lawsuits related to the matter.

J.P. Morgan Chase & Co. advised Michaels on the takeover. Michaels, which reported $3.68 billion in revenue last year, owns more than 1,000 stores in the U.S. It also owns Aaron Brothers stores.

The Michaels buyout is the latest example of private equity's appetite for retailers with strong cash flows. In 2004, Target Corp. sold its Mervyn's division to a private-equity group including Sun Capital Partners Inc. and Cerberus Capital Management for $1.65 billion. Last year, Warburg Pincus and Texas Pacific Group teamed up to purchase luxury retailer Neiman Marcus Group Inc. for $5.1 billion.

Others could follow. Pier 1 Imports Inc., retailer of imported furniture and home decor, hired J.P. Morgan Chase in May to help it study strategic alternatives.

"We are delighted to partner with the Michaels management team to help build on its already strong position in an attractive industry and capitalize on the significant growth opportunities that lie ahead," said Matt Levin, a managing director at Bain Capital. "Our deep experience in the retail sector reinforces our conviction that Michaels has the best store locations, a broad and attractive assortment of products for crafters of all ages, and a sustainable competitive advantage thanks to smart investments in systems and infrastructure. We look forward to helping Michaels achieve its full long-term potential."

ENVIRONMENT/INDIAN AFFAIRS:

Indian Vote Affected If Act Expires (AP)

AP, July 1, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0038084

SIOUX FALLS, S.D. (AP) -- Landmark provisions in the federal Voting Rights Act of 1965 soon could expire, taking away powerful deterrents to discrimination against Indian voters in South Dakota and threatening to halt an upward trend in voter turnout on reservations.

In the past 30 years, the provisions have forced South Dakota to submit 3,048 voting law changes in Todd and Shannon counties for approval by the Department of Justice and have required Lakota speaking interpreters at polling places in 11 counties.

Provisions of the Voting Rights Act are the underpinning of a renaissance in Indian voting, resulting in a 122 percent increase in turnout in Shannon County on the Pine Ridge Reservation, and a 139 percent increase in Todd County on the Rosebud Reservation, between 2000 and 2004.

They have helped Indian candidates get elected to local, county and state offices, said a representative of the American Civil Liberties Union and a founder of the LaCreek Civil Rights Committee.

But they've had little practical effect on South Dakota elections, Secretary of State Chris Nelson said.

Whatever their impact, they hang in the balance as Congress attempts to reauthorize the Voting Rights Act this summer. The effort is being held hostage by a handful of House members from Georgia and other Southern states who want those states exempted from Justice Department scrutiny of election procedures. Republican House leaders will not let the reauthorization bill come to the floor until that issue is resolved.

The Voting Rights Act requires the Justice Department to approve or "preclear" election law changes in jurisdictions that have a past history of voter discrimination. The ACLU used that provision of the act in three key federal lawsuits affecting South Dakota. It successfully sued to force Buffalo County to redraw county commission lines so the majority of Native Americ an voters were not packed into a single district.

Preclearance cases

In the Alfred Boneshirt and Elaine Quick Bear Quiver v. (then Secretary of State) Joyce Hazeltine lawsuits in 2002, the ACLU was able to extend preclearance to Todd and Shannon counties.

The verdicts in those suits triggered Nelson to submit to the Justice Department the thousands of changes in election rules in Shannon and Todd counties, going back to 1972, with a rationale explaining why those changes were not discriminatory. The Justice Department has upheld every one, Nelson said.

"It's clear those counties needed to be doing the preclearance work. It's unfortunate we had to go through the legal process to get to that. If the ACLU had come to us and asked, we could have done it without litigation," Nelson said.

But Jennifer Ring, executive director of the ACLU of the Dakotas, said "we consider preclearance a critical check in the Voting Rights Act because of something you can't see - jurisdictions complying with the law."

Because of the successful litigation, election officials have refrained from making changes that would have harmed Native American voters, she said, because they knew those changes would not be precleared.

Ring cited as an example the South Dakota Legislature discussing eliminating legislative District 28B in Harding, Butte, Meade, Perkins and Corson counties, and 28A in Ziebach, Dewey and Corson counties, and going to an at-large system.

Those districts, comprising the Standing Rock and Cheyenne River reservations and nearby counties, have a high probability of electing Native American legislators. Eliminating them would reduce the chances of Native Americans being elected, Ring said.

"Frankly, because they knew it would not preclear, they ended up not doing it," she said. "If we lose preclearance, that would be a significant step backward."

Lakota interpreters

Having the Justice Department scrutinize election changes "at least levels the playing field," Craig Dillon said. He's a founder of the LaCreek Civil Rights Committee that has registered thousands of Native American voters in Shannon, Todd and Bennett counties since 2002.

"We need to continue with preclearance and with interpreters. Basically leave the Voting Rights Act intact, the way it is. If it ain't broke, don't fix it," Dillon said.

DOJ_NMG_0038085

Because of the Voting Rights Act, the state this year took on the task of providing instructions in Lakota for using computerized voting machines in 11 counties near reservations.

"It was much more difficult than we anticipated," because there are not Lakota words that directly describe computers and computer functions, Nelson said. "But we got it done for the primary."

"The reports we've got back are, 'Yeah, you got it right.' "

Because of the Voting Rights Act, auditors in those counties also are responsible for ensuring that Lakota speakers are on hand at the polls to explain voting procedures to voters who want such instruction in that language.

While Nelson said auditors tell him the interpreters are not widely used, Dillon insisted that "in Indian Country, where I'm from, the interpreter, I think, is essential. We still have a large number of Native American people who go to the polls who speak only Lakota."

Ring said: "It's not that they don't understand any English. They do. It's that they understand better in their own language."

Gerald Betelyoun, an Oglala Sioux Tribe member and Bennett County Commissioner, said: "The Lakota people are kind of shy, the elderly especially. If they see another Native sitting there that can speak Lakota, they usually go up and ask questions about where to vote."

What would change?

Nelson does agree that interpreters play a valuable role in welcoming Indian voters into the state electoral process by honoring the Lakota culture and language. If the Voting Rights Act is not reauthorized before next year, he does not know if auditors will look to shed a complicating factor in putting on an election by doing away with interpreters.

"I would hope you would have a debate on a local basis," Nelson said, and Native American constituents would let auditors know they value interpreters.

But Nelson thinks Congress will reauthorize the Voting Rights Act this summer.

If the provisions affecting Indian Country are allowed to expire, "it not does not mean everything that has been done over the last 40 or 50 years is not there anymore," Ring said. "It means a level of protection disappears. It probably means more litigation."

Betelyoun, who was elected in 2002 and is running again this year, credited the Voting Rights Act with helping him get elected. His experience on the county commission is an illustration of the value of bringing Native American voters into the state political process.

Betelyoun said he decided to run to address huge Native American dissatisfaction with a former Bennett County sheriff. Once he became a commissioner, Betelyoun became a member of the committee that oversees law enforcement.

"It's been pretty good since I've been on there," he said. "The sheriff's deputies treat everybody equal. They do not just pick on the Natives."

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

Drug Probe Targets Aristide (MH)

By Jay Weaver And Jacqueline Charles

The Miami Herald, July 2, 2006

• This is the first of two parts.

Jean-Bertrand Aristide was a modern-day Moses to Haiti's poor masses, a former Catholic priest who rose to the presidency by promising to wash away the country's bloody and corrupt past.

But since his ouster as president in 2004, U.S. authorities have been investigating detailed accounts alleging that Aristide and several top aides sought and took millions of dollars in bribes from drug traffickers in Haiti, The Miami Herald has learned.

So far, a federal grand jury probe in Miami has led to 22 convictions of mostly Haitian drug traffickers, ex-police officers and a high-ranking politician close to Aristide. Although the exiled former president is a main target of the ongoing investigation, he has not been charged.

The allegations against the ex-president come from numerous sources, but the evidence has not risen to a level to press a case against Aristide, say U.S. law enforcement officials, who have been hampered by a lack of financial records.

Still, The Miami Herald has learned from interviews with about 20 law enforcement officials, defense lawyers and others involved in the case that Aristide has been accused of being at the center of his country's narco-trafficking and money-laundering activities from 2001 to 2004.

Authorities have gathered evidence, including testimony by cooperating defendants convicted in the case, alleging that:

• Soon after he took office in early 2001, Aristide held a meeting at his Port-au-Prince home with his presidential security chief, two government security advisors, the national police chief and a district commander to organize a scheme to shake down Colombian and Haitian drug smugglers for kickbacks for both his personal and political activities.

• Drug traffickers bribed Aristide to turn a blind eye to shipments of Colombian cocaine through Haiti, directly paying him hundreds of thousands of dollars in cash during regular visits to his home.

• Convicted drug kingpin Beaudouin "Jacques" Ketant personally delivered $500,000 a month in a suitcase to Aristide's home, he told authorities. He said the suitcase had a combination lock set to 7-7-7 at Aristide's request because that was his favorite number.

• Traffickers gave Aristide $200,000 to buy a helicopter in 2002, but the president pocketed the money and instead used government funds to rent a helicopter from Miami-based Biscayne Helicopters. Those same traffickers also bought a $75,000 ambulance in Miami that was shipped to Haiti for the president's private charitable Aristide Foundation.

• Traffickers spent hundreds of thousands of dollars on carnival festivities in February 2002 that were arranged by the Aristide government. They also paid for some of Aristide's July birthday celebrations, his Lavalas Family Party and his foundation.

• At Aristide's direction, some of the traffickers' bribes helped buy weapons smuggled into Haiti to equip national police officers as well as pro-Aristide street gangs that harassed his opponents during his second term as president, between 2001 and 2004, according to former Haitian law enforcement officials and drug traffickers who are cooperating with U.S. investigators.

ACCUSERS CALLED `LIARS'

Lawyer for Aristide calls accusations `inconceivable'

Aristide's longtime lawyer, Ira Kurzban, said he does not believe the allegations against the former president.

Speaking generally, Kurzban said that the federal prosecution is politically motivated and that the U.S. government's witnesses are "liars" seeking to reduce their prison sentences by fingering the former president in their money-laundering and cocaine enterprise.

"It is inconceivable to me that Aristide would do anything for personal gain," Kurzban said, commenting on the ex-president's character. ``He was not a person interested in money."

So far the U.S. investigation has been built on testimony from many of the 22 mostly Haitian cocaine smugglers, police officers and others convicted in Miami in the past 2 ½ years. The probe, spearheaded by the Drug Enforcement Administration (DEA) with help from the Internal Revenue Service, has focused on cocaine smuggling during Aristide's second presidential term.

The investigation continues as the Haitian government carries out its own separate inquiry into the Aristide administration and foundation records, so far concluding that the president had looted government coffers, Haitian government records show. The interim government that replaced Aristide two years ago filed suit in Miami last year to recover "tens of millions of dollars" allegedly stolen by the former president and others from Haiti's treasury and its phone company. Neither the Haitian investigation nor the civil suit alleges drug trafficking.

To this day, the 52-year-old Aristide remains intensely popular in Haiti and has expressed a desire to return home from exile in South Africa after the recent election of President René Préval, once an Aristide ally. That would upset Haiti's domestic politics and Préval's relations with the U.S. and French governments, which regard Aristide as a destabilizing factor in Haiti.

CLAIMS UNSUPPORTED

Probers report absence of incriminating records

While several witnesses have testified against the former president in the U.S. drug-trafficking probe, investigators have told The Miami Herald that they have yet to uncover bank records and other financial statements that support the claims. The absence of such documents to solidify their case against Aristide has prevented authorities from seeking a federal indictment in Miami, U.S. law enforcement officials said.

DOJ_NMG_0038087

Efforts to reach Aristide for comment on this story failed. Kurzban, who represented the Haitian government as its lawyer from 1991 to 2004, said he did not believe that the ex-president would agree to an interview.

Kurzban, who still speaks on Aristide's behalf, said that while people in Haiti were well aware of the country's drug-trafficking problem, it came as a "shock" to him when he learned that Aristide and others in his government became targets of a U.S. criminal investigation.

He said that, if anything, Aristide cooperated with the federal government in the crackdown on cocaine smuggling in 2003, including allowing Ketant to be turned over to U.S. authorities. He said that money donated to the Aristide Foundation went to the poor for relief programs such as rice subsidies.

Haiti, an impoverished country where cash and corruption go hand in hand, has long been a significant transit point for Colombian cocaine headed for U.S. streets. From there, it sometimes is smuggled directly to the United States. Another route: from Haiti to the Dominican Republic, west to Puerto Rico and then to the U.S. mainland.

During Aristide's second term as president, an estimated 10 percent of all cocaine smuggled into the United States flowed through the Caribbean corridor, especially Haiti, according to a 2006 federal report by the National Drug Intelligence Center.

Shortly after the Aristide government turned over Ketant to U.S. officials, the U.S. government broadened its drug investigation by looking into the Aristide leadership.

It was during a 2004 sentencing in federal court in Miami that Ketant accused Aristide of turning Haiti into a "narco-country" and being a "drug lord." Not under oath at the time, Ketant was sentenced to 27 years in prison and ordered to pay $30 million in fines and forfeitures.

Behind the scenes, he began to cooperate as a key witness for prosecutors, providing details on his alleged payoffs to Aristide and others in exchange for a free hand to ship cocaine through Haiti to the United States. His testimony triggered some of the indictments against the 21 others on money-laundering or cocaine-smuggling charges, U.S. law enforcement officials said.

Another major witness was Aristide's former security chief, Oriel Jean, who was convicted last year in a separate federal case of money-laundering and sentenced to three years. He fingered the same drug traffickers, police officials and politicians -- including Aristide.

And during his testimony at two Miami trials last year, he linked Aristide to at least two people implicated in Haiti's drug trade and the U.S. investigation.

In sworn testimony at those trials, Jean said he was introduced in late 2001 or early 2002 to one drug lord, Serge Edouard, by Hermione Leonard, then the director of the national police's Port-au-Prince district and a woman who was close to Aristide.

"She told me that the president is aware that she has contacts" with major drug traffickers, he testified at Edouard's trial, without elaborating. Leonard, wanted by the DEA, is believed to be hiding in the Dominican Republic.

Jean also testified at trial that he and Aristide approved a national security ID card for Edouard in 2002. He testified that the security badge allowed Edouard to travel throughout Haiti without being stopped by police. Edouard was convicted in that trial on drug charges and is serving a life sentence.

Defense attorneys for Ketant and Jean declined Miami Herald requests to interview their clients.

Ketant also has told authorities that among other drug traffickers who paid off Aristide and members of his inner circle were Ketant's brother, Hector, and Gilbert Horacious, according to sources familiar with the case. Ketant said Horacious was a longtime friend of Aristide's who introduced him and other traffickers to the Haitian president, according to sources familiar with the case.

Ketant's brother was fatally shot in Haiti in 2003, and Horacious was gunned down last year in the Dominican Republic. Shortly after Aristide fled the country on Feb. 29, 2004, hundreds of thousands of dollars in rotted $100 bills were found hidden in his home, according to U.S. news reports. U.S. federal investigators analyzed some of the bills but could not figure out where the money had come from.

ASSOCIATES ACCUSED

Several are alleged to have laundered money

While investigators have struggled to piece together a paper trail leading directly to the former president, they have identified several people in his government who allegedly helped launder drug money for him.

DOJ_NMG_0038088

The Miami Herald has learned that the Ketant brothers and other major traffickers made cash contributions to the Aristide Foundation through one of its high-ranking members.

According to traffickers and U.S. law enforcement officials, Aristide allegedly ordered Port-au-Prince district police chief Leonard to pass any seized drugs on to Edouard and other Haitian traffickers for resale. The smugglers, in turn, donated some of the tainted proceeds to the Lavalas party or the foundation, they said.

Aristide also instructed Haitian Sen. Fourel Célestin, who represented the Jacmel area southwest of the capital, to solicit donations from drug traffickers for Lavalas, according to convicted drug smugglers, ex-police officers and U.S. law enforcement officials.

Convicted last year after a plea deal with Miami prosecutors, Célestin admitted taking a $200,000 bribe to help secure the release of two detained Colombian traffickers. Célestin is now cooperating with prosecutors.

Under federal law, prosecutors would not have to prove that Aristide was personally involved in moving loads of cocaine to the United States -- only that he allowed traffickers to use his country and received kickbacks in return. If Aristide comes under a U.S. indictment, the threat of extradition to the United States might keep him from pushing to return to Haiti, according to legal observers. It may also keep Préval from worrying too much about the prospect of his former mentor's return.

After February's presidential election, Préval said that Aristide, like all Haitians, could legally come home. But he added a cautionary note, saying Aristide "must decide whether he wants to return, if there are legal and other actions" pending against him.

EU Arms Market Widens Bidding (WT)

By Gareth Harding, The Washington Times

The Washington Times, July 2, 2006

BRUSSELS -- The European Union took a major step toward opening its notoriously closed armaments market yesterday with a new code of conduct aimed at boosting competition.

The union's 25 members currently spend $62 billion to $75 billion a year buying new defense goods, but there is little cross-border competition or tendering for contracts because the arms industry is exempt from normal EU rules.

Until now, defense ministries have jealously guarded their right to hand lucrative contracts to national industries without having to justify their decisions or open the tender to normal procurement practices. But dwindling defense budgets and the pressures of the single market, which allows for the free flow of goods across national borders, have prodded governments to tentatively open their markets.

Under the code of conduct, which will apply in all EU states except for Spain, Denmark and Hungary, defense ministries are obliged to post new tenders on an Internet notice board and all European arms companies are free to compete for the contracts. Although the code is not legally binding, EU officials hope peer pressure will force defense ministries to comply.

"This regime will create new opportunities for companies across Europe, strengthen our defense, technological and industrial base and offer better value for money to the armed forces and to taxpayers," said Nick Whitney, head of the European Defense Agency.

In an interview with The Washington Times, Mr. Whitney said European governments were spending too much on soldiers' wages and pensions -- personnel costs consume half of the union's $225-billion-a-year defense budget compared with one-quarter in the United States -- and too little on high-tech hardware.

"We have more men and women in uniform than in America, yet if you compare the collective European deployable military capability, then it really bears no comparison," he said.

The Briton, who manages the newly created agency, also said European governments should spend more on defense research and technology, noting that on average only 1.25 percent of their defense budgets goes for developing cutting-edge weapons, compared with more than 6 percent in the United States.

"If we carry on like that, we will not be able to sustain a competitive defense industry in Europe," Mr. Whitney said.

EU defense ministers gave the green light to set up a common defense research fund in March but remain split over how to finance it.

DOJ_NMG_0038089

Mr. Whitney said the United States had nothing to fear from a more robust and competitive European defense industry, but urged Washington to follow Brussels' example in opening up its defense equipment market.

Decrying what he called "fairly strong protectionist currents" in the United States, the EU official said it was "a lot more difficult for European companies to access the American defense market than vice versa."

IMMIGRATION:

Guv Ties Cannon's Win To Immigration (DESMN)

By Lisa Riley Roche

Deseret News, July 2, 2006

Rep. Chris Cannon's victory in the Republican primary shows that Utahns agree with his more comprehensive approach to immigration reform, Gov. Jon Huntsman Jr. said Thursday.

The immigration issue dominated the race between Cannon and his challenger in the primary, John Jacob. Jacob accused Cannon of supporting amnesty for illegal immigrants, because the five-term congressman backs President Bush's proposed guest-worker program.

The primary race was widely seen as a referendum on immigration reform, which has stalled in Congress because lawmakers can't agree on what to do about the estimated 12 million undocumented workers currently in the United States.

Cannon beat Jacob, a real-estate developer, with 56 percent of the vote. The race attracted national attention, with a political-action committee opposed to illegal immigration spending $40,000 on radio ads supporting Jacob.

Huntsman said during the taping of his monthly news conference that airs on KUED Channel 7 that the primary results reflect what most Utahns — and most Americans — support in terms of immigration reform: increased border security and a way of dealing with the "human component," those workers who are already here.

The governor said Cannon addressed those issues. But there was never "a fully articulated view from the Jacob campaign other than (to) deal with the border," Huntsman said.

"I do believe that if we can take anything from the results of the election, it would be that comprehensive reform is what Americans and Utahns are looking for," the governor said, adding he hoped the election would serve as a call to Congress to take quick action.

Huntsman and Arizona Gov. Janet Napolitano, a Democrat, put together a resolution on immigration reform that was adopted earlier this year by the Western Governors' Association. The resolution included calls for both increased security and a guest-worker program.

The Utah governor's involvement in the issue stemmed from his visit a year ago to Mexico City, where he met with Mexican President Vicente Fox. Huntsman was there to pitch an alliance between Utah and Mexico, but Fox wanted to talk about immigration.

So the governor, who also used the trip to extend a formal invitation to Fox to come to Utah, agreed to raise the issue with his Western counterparts. In May, Fox spent about a day in the state, speaking out against building a wall along the U.S.-Mexico border.

Huntsman traveled to the border earlier this month to visit Utah National Guard troops working on the wall. They were among the first deployed under President Bush's latest effort to curb illegal immigration, Operation Jump Start.

Both Cannon and Jacob agreed on the need to strengthen the border. But they differed greatly on what should be done with illegal immigrants who have already crossed into this country.

Jacob said illegal immigrants should be sent back to their home countries, while Cannon backs a guest-worker program that would allow them to stay in the United States for employment.

E-mail: lisa@desnews.com

In Armed Forces, And Now Citizens (LAT)

By Tony Perry, Times Staff Writer

DOJ_NMG_0038090

The Los Angeles Times, July 2, 2006

SAN DIEGO — In what the keynote speaker called a marriage of two great American traditions — "service to country and the game of baseball" — 53 active-duty U.S. military personnel were sworn in as new citizens Saturday night before the Padres-Giants game.

The crowd at Petco Park cheered as if the home team had just rallied for a victory.

It was an emotional moment for some of the new citizens.

"When I go back to Iraq and if something bad happens to me, they'll send my body home with an American flag," said Navy Petty Officer 2nd Class Xiomara Suttles, 33, who was born in El Salvador. "Now I know that that flag will be from my country."

Most of the Marines and sailors have served either in Iraq or the Persian Gulf, with more deployments to come.

"It's like I'm finally a true part of the country I'm serving," said Petty Officer 2nd Class Hector Estrella, 26, who was born in Mexico. He has done three six-month overseas deployments in seven years.

"I feel I owe this to my Marines," said Cpl. Selia Seiffert, 30, of Germany. "This way, if we're fighting in Iraq, they'll know I am just as much an American as they are and they can trust me."

Since Sept. 11, a number of measures sponsored by the Bush administration have led to an expedited process for active-duty military personnel to become U.S. citizens.

Before the changes, military personnel often were stymied by the military and civilian bureaucracy and the constant shifting of duty stations.

Since the changes, more than 20,000 military personnel have become citizens, 75 of them posthumously. Officials estimate that more than 40,000 military personnel remain eligible for citizenship.

To enlist, noncitizens must be legal residents (green-card holders). Noncitizens are not eligible to become commissioned or warrant officers, and are restricted from certain high-security jobs.

Federal Magistrate Barbara Major administered the oath of citizenship to the 53, who represented 20 countries.

Debra Rogers, San Diego district director of U.S. Citizenship and Immigration Services, called them "true-blue American heroes who have put their lives on the line to protect our way of life."

Sandy Alderson, Padres chief executive officer and a former Marine infantry officer, in his keynote remarks, quoted the song "America" by Neil Diamond:

"Everywhere around the world
They're coming to America
Every time that flag's unfurled
They're coming to America."

With citizenship comes opportunities as well as obligations, and the new citizens pondered both. Many waved small American flags as the fans, settling in for the second part of an Independence Day weekend doubleheader, waved and whistled.

Cpl. Victor Ortiz, 21, of Mexico, who served in Ramadi, Iraq, during some of the heaviest fighting, said that being a citizen will "open doors for me." He wants to join law enforcement when his tour is complete.

Sgt. Nate Greenough, 25, of England, who served two tours in Iraq, will leave the service soon to become a sheriff's deputy in Orange County. Citizenship is a requirement before he can pin on the badge.

Besides, Greenough said, he's felt American for a long time and already has acquired the requisite love of hot dogs and baseball. "I've been there, done that, and now I get the T-shirt," he said, laughing.

For some, explanations of what the future will bring as a U.S. citizen came with difficulty.

"It's uplifting, that's all I can say, it's uplifting," said Petty Officer Willie Nuas, 29, who was born in the Philippines.

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

Cheneys Take Tour Of Hangar (FLTODAY)

By Jim Waymer, Florida Today

Florida Today, July 2, 2006

Vice President Dick Cheney had seen a shuttle launch once before, but hoped Saturday that his three granddaughters would get their chance.

Storm clouds thwarted their hopes, however, for a roaring light show at liftoff. The booms would have to come at their next destination, NASCAR's Pepsi 400 in Daytona Beach.

"I was especially looking forward to having my grandchildren here," Cheney told reporters from atop the Operation Support Building, shortly after the launch controllers ordered a scrub.

"But we just got a tour of the Atlantis," he said. "At least we got to see that."

Earlier, Cheney had walked through the Orbiter Processing Facility at Kennedy Space Center, where he, his wife, Lynne, and their three granddaughters, Kate, 12, Elizabeth, 8, and Grace, 6, scoped the underbelly of shuttle Atlantis.

"There's actually 25,000 of these," Scott Thurston, a Kennedy Space Center manager, told them as they gazed up at the tiles underneath the shuttle.

Thurston then led Cheney and his family to the nose of the shuttle, where they peered up into the front wheel well of the extended landing gear.

Moments after the Discovery launch was called off, Cheney said he was "very impressed" by the tour of Kennedy Space Center and said of the space program: "It's a great program. It's important that we keep it going."

Other politicians on hand for the launch Saturday echoed similar support for the shuttle program, tempered with concerns about the consequences of another mishap.

"This is a critical launch," U.S. Rep. Dave Weldon, R-Indialantic, said. "We need this mission to go successfully for the future of our manned space flight program. . . . The support for NASA is very strong."

But that support could erode for the shuttle program, he said, should the space agency have another significant accident prompting further safety concerns.

Sen. Bill Nelson, D-Orlando, emphasized the importance of a smooth shuttle mission to ensure enough flights to finish the International Space Station by 2010 and to maintain and repair the Hubble Space Telescope.

"There's a lot riding on this launch because of the necessity of doing at least 16 flights to complete the space station," Nelson said. A 17th flight would include needed repairs to Hubble.

Shuttle Launch Postponed; NASA To Try Again Today (WP)

By Guy Gugliotta

The Washington Post, July 2, 2006

CAPE CANAVERAL, Fla., July 1 -- Under a murky sky studded with lightning-bearing thunderheads, flight controllers on Saturday scrubbed the launch of space shuttle Discovery 11 minutes before liftoff and scheduled a second try for Sunday.

"It is not a good day to launch," Shuttle Launch Director Mike Leinbach told mission control after polling his team during a scheduled "hold" 16 minutes from liftoff. "We're not going to make it today." Five minutes later, Leinbach called Commander Steven Lindsey aboard Discovery and told the crew that the launch had been scrubbed.

The team will try again at 3:26 p.m. Sunday, but Leinbach warned that conditions are likely to be about the same as they were Saturday, or perhaps even a little worse, with low clouds rolling in to the Kennedy Space Center off the Atlantic Ocean to the east, and high thunderheads, known as "anvils," drifting in from the west.

NASA guidelines prohibit liftoff if anvils lurk within 20 miles of the Kennedy launch facility, where the shuttle has to land if there is an aborted launch, and within a 10-mile radius of Launch Pad 39B, where Discovery sits waiting for blastoff.

Tech. Sgt. Matt Timmermann of the Air Force weather squadron said the weather was "observed" in violation of the 20-mile restriction when the scrub was ordered, and had a "growing probability" of violating the 10-mile rule.

The weather provided a disappointing anticlimax to a near-flawless three-day countdown, marred only by the failure of a heater used to keep fuel for one of the shuttle's thruster jets from freezing. The shuttle uses the thrusters to steer the orbiter in space.

DOJ_NMG_0038092

Mission control decided early Saturday afternoon that the glitch did not hamper shuttle operations, and decided to put the thruster on standby and use other thrusters during the mission. NASA officials said the broken heater could not be swapped out in time for Saturday's launch attempt.

Lindsey and a crew of six are flying to the international space station for a 12-day mission to resupply the station, repair station equipment and test shuttle machinery. The mission could be extended for an extra day to test repair techniques for the shuttle's heat-shielding.

Wearing bright-orange launch suits, the crew members were strapped into their seats in Discovery beginning about 12:30 p.m. At that time, weather conditions for launch were toggling between "green" for "go" and "red" for "no-go," with frequent changes.

The trend, however, was downhill. A dazzling central Florida dawn had prompted the Air Force weather squadron to raise the probability of launch from 40 percent, where it had hovered most of the week, to 60 percent.

But by 11 a.m., chances had returned to 40 percent, and around 2 p.m. conditions turned "red" as angry-looking clouds rolled in from east and west, covering more than half the sky. The shuttle, simply by passing through an anvil cloud, can trigger a lightning storm.

Clouds Force Delay Of Shuttle Launching For At Least A Day (NYT)

By John Schwartz And Warren E. Leary

The New York Times, July 2, 2006

CAPE CANAVERAL, Fla., July 1 — NASA scrubbed the launching of the shuttle Discovery minutes before its scheduled liftoff Saturday as threatening clouds encroached on the 20-mile boundary around the Kennedy Space Center.

The postponement came on the first day of a 19-day launching window, just before the start of a 10-minute span in which the launching pad enters the same orbital plane as the International Space Station.

Liftoff is now scheduled for a 10-minute window starting at 3:26 p.m. on Sunday, but current weather forecasts put the likelihood of adverse conditions at 60 percent.

Conditions for Monday, according to forecasters working with the National Aeronautics and Space Administration, are likely to be even worse.

The 12-day flight to the space station is to be the second mission for the Discovery since the loss of the shuttle Columbia and its crew of seven when it broke apart while re-entering the atmosphere on Feb. 1, 2003.

Delays have always been part of the space program because of the complexity of spaceflight technology and the vagaries of weather.

Hopes at NASA for good weather were high throughout the morning, which dawned bright and relatively clear. Dozens of government officials, including Vice President Dick Cheney, came to the space center for the launching.

All morning, the issue causing more concern than the weather was a heater for one of the shuttle's six small thrusters that was not operating properly. But mission officials decided to work around that problem and launch anyway, since shuttle pilots are trained to work without all six thrusters.

Storms are another matter, however, and NASA does not launch when anvil-shaped clouds are near because of the potential for lightning.

A single anvil cloud began to dissipate before 3 p.m., but others began massing behind it. At 3:15, half an hour before the scheduled liftoff at 3:49, Bruce Buckingham, a NASA spokesman, announced, "We are still no go for weather."

The clouds near the launching site began to dissipate, but clouds massed over the landing strip — another condition that prohibits liftoff because good visibility there is needed in case the flight is aborted soon after liftoff and the shuttle has to be brought back to the Kennedy landing site. Two minutes before the countdown was to resume, Michael Leinbach, the launching director, decided to delay resuming it to see if the weather would clear before the day's window closed. Though the seven astronauts had been strapped into their seats in the shuttle, with the hatch shut at 2 p.m., the mission managers gave the order to cancel liftoff at 3:42.

DOJ_NMG_0038093

Mr. Leinbach apologized to the commander, Col. Steven W. Lindsey of the Air Force. "Sorry to break your string," he said, "but we're not going to launch today." Mr. Leinbach added, "We're going to try again tomorrow."

Colonel Lindsey agreed. "We'll launch when we're ready," he said. "Hopefully, tomorrow will look better."

In a brief interview on NASA television, Mr. Leinbach said, "We played it till the end," but ran out of time.

"We can't control the weather, and we have very strict rules," he said. "It was very disappointing for the entire launch team ."

But he added, "We're not going to launch the vehicle unless it's safe."

The weather for Sunday, he said, is also at "60 percent no-go," with a high probability of clouds.

Normally, NASA waits a day after two unsuccessful launching attempts to give the astronauts, ground crew and mission controllers the rest that allows them to remain sharp; two more consecutive days of launch attempts would follow. If the shuttle cannot be launched before July 19, the next window opens in August.

Mr. Cheney, who was at Cape Canaveral with his wife and three granddaughters, said he was disappointed, according to [a wire service].

"I was really looking forward to today, especially looking forward to having my grandkids here," he said. "But it was not to be today. Maybe it will work tomorrow."

Weather Nixes Shuttle Launch - Again (AP-Y2)

By Marcia Dunn

AP2, July 2, 2006

Stormy weather prevented NASA from launching Discovery for the second day in a row Sunday, extending a yearlong grounding of the space shuttle prompted by persistent trouble with fuel-tank foam.

Launch officials said they would try again Tuesday, on the Fourth of July, after giving the work force some rest and a chance to replenish the shuttle's on-board fuel. The weather was expected to improve by Tuesday, although rain was still in the forecast.

Launch director Mike Leinbach said it will be tight getting Discovery ready for a Tuesday afternoon launch — only the second liftoff of a shuttle since the 2003 Columbia disaster — and that any thunderstorms on Monday could put his team behind.

He halted the countdown just an hour after the seven astronauts boarded the fueled spaceship.

"Looking out the window it doesn't look good today," shuttle commander Steven Lindsey radioed from the cockpit. He noted that July Fourth would be "a good day to launch." It would be the first time NASA has ever launched a crew on the holiday.

The afternoon sky was considerably darker than on Saturday and left NASA with little choice but to call off the flight to the international space station. Thunderstorms were moving in quickly from the west, and lightning was detected within a few miles of the launch pad. The astronauts rode back to crew quarters in the rain.

The back-to-back delays cost NASA an estimated $2 million in overtime pay and fuel costs.

"After a year of preparation and after a very careful countdown, you don't want to get into a rush and do something that is not smart from a weather standpoint," said deputy shuttle program manager John Shannon, chairman of NASA's mission management team. "Nobody is going to remember that we scrubbed a day or two days a year from now. But if we go launch and get struck by lightning or have some other problem, that will be very memorable."

Shannon said he told his team, "What a great gift NASA could give to the nation to return the shuttle to operation on Independence Day."

"If the weather is good, that's exactly what we'll do," he said.

Among the invited guests who returned for the second launch attempt were family members of the perished Columbia astronauts. Vice President Dick Cheney was back in Washington after a brief visit to the space center Saturday.

Last month, NASA Administrator Michael Griffin approved launching the shuttle despite the concerns of two top agency managers who wanted additional repairs to the foam insulation on the external fuel tank. Columbia was brought down by a chunk of flyaway foam, and a piece broke off Discovery's redesigned tank last July, barely missing the shuttle.

"I've kind of steeped myself in this problem over the last month, and I am quite confident that we've got a very good chance of flying and flying safely," Griffin said Sunday in an interview on CNN's "Late Edition with Wolf Blitzer."

DOJ_NMG_0038094

Griffin has repeatedly pointed out that if Discovery were damaged during launch, the astronauts always could take refuge on the space station until a rescue vehicle is sent up.

Sen. Bill Nelson (news, bio, voting record), D-Fla., who flew on a space shuttle in 1986 right before the Challenger disaster, defended Griffin's decision on Sunday and said it was an acceptable risk.

NASA's top safety officer and chief engineer recommended at a flight readiness review meeting two weeks ago that the shuttle remain grounded until design changes are made to the foam that insulates 34 brackets on the fuel tank. Without this foam, dangerous ice could form on the metal brackets once the tank is filled with super-cold fuel.

As it is, more than 35 pounds of foam were removed elsewhere in what NASA described as the biggest aerodynamic change ever made to the shuttle's launch system. Shuttle managers said they wanted to fly with only one major change at a time.

Once in orbit, Discovery's crew will test shuttle-inspection techniques, deliver supplies to the space station and drop off German astronaut Thomas Reiter for a six-month stay.

NASA hopes to add an extra day to Discovery's 12-day flight to test spacewalking methods for repairing possible damage to the ship's thermal skin. By replenishing the shuttle's on-board fuel now, the astronauts will have a better chance of getting that additional day in orbit.

___

On the Net:

NASA: http://spaceflight.nasa.gov

Cheney's Heart Condition Is Called Stable (NYT)

By Sheryl Gay Stolberg

The New York Times, July 2, 2006

WASHINGTON, July 1 — Vice President Dick Cheney, who has a long history of heart disease and underwent surgery last year to repair aneurysms in arteries behind his knees, was pronounced in stable cardiac health after a routine annual physical examination on Saturday.

Tests at George Washington University Hospital found that Mr. Cheney's cardiac pacemaker was working properly and had not been activated due to arrhythmia, or irregular heartbeat, said Mr. Cheney's spokeswoman, Lea Anne McBride.

Stent-grafts implanted in the popliteal arteries behind Mr. Cheney's knees last September are "wide open," Ms. McBride said, allowing oxygen-rich blood flow to his legs.

When Mr. Cheney went into the hospital for the knee operation, his spokesman said at the time that doctors had planned to implant a stent-graft behind his right knee only, and to repair the aneurysm behind the other knee later.

But in the operating room, his doctors decided to repair both aneurysms on the same day. It is rare that the procedure is performed on both knees at the same time, medical experts said.

Mr. Cheney, 65, has had four heart attacks, the first when he was 37 and the fourth on Nov. 22, 2000, in the thick of the dispute between former Vice President Al Gore and President Bush over the outcome of the 2000 presidential election. Mr. Cheney has also had quadruple heart bypass surgery and two angioplasties, procedures to clear blockages in the arteries.

The physical on Saturday consisted of several tests, including an electrocardiogram, follow-up imaging of the repaired aneurysms and a check of Mr. Cheney's implantable cardioverter defibrillator, also known as a pacemaker, that he has had since 2001. A stress test on a treadmill is scheduled for the fall, Ms. McBride said.

"The vice president's cardiac status remains stable, his I.C.D. is functioning properly and has not treated any arrhythmia," Ms. McBride said in a statement, adding, "The vice president feels great."

After the checkup, Mr. Cheney and his wife, Lynne Cheney, and three of their grandchildren flew to Florida. They stopped first in Cape Canaveral, with hopes of seeing the launching of the space shuttle Discovery. But the mission was postponed.

The Cheneys then headed to Daytona to see a NASCAR race.

Physical: Cheney's Heart Condition Stable (AP-Y2)

By Deb Riechmann, Associated Press Writer

AP2, July 2, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0038095

Vice President Dick Cheney's high-tech pacemaker is working properly and has not been activated by any irregular heartbeats, according to his annual physical on Saturday that showed his overall heart condition was stable.

The 65-year-old Cheney, who has a long history of heart ailments, had an electrocardiogram and imaging to check on repaired aneurysms on the back of his knees, his spokeswoman said.

Doctors also checked the condition of an implantable cardioverter defibrillator, which was placed in his chest in June 2001.

Cheney has had four attacks; the first in 1978, when he was 37, and the fourth on Nov. 22, 2000, after the election that made George W. Bush president.

"The vice president's cardiac status remains stable, his ICD is functioning properly and has not treated any arrhythmia," or irregular heartbeat, according to a statement from his spokeswoman, Lea Anne McBride.

Cheney is scheduled to have a stress test on a treadmill in the fall as part of a comprehensive cardiac evaluation.

Dr. Bernadette Aulivola, a vascular surgeon at Loyola University Health System in suburban Chicago, said it was a good sign that Cheney's defibrillator had not been activated since it was last checked.

"If he had had an irregular heartbeat, the ICD would have kicked in," Aulivola said.

The physical did not slow Cheney's pace.

The vice president's schedule for the rest of Saturday: flying to Florida to watch the shuttle Discovery blast off from the Kennedy Space Center and then heading for the Pepsi 400 at the Daytona International Speedway.

In addition to the four heart attacks, the vice president has had quadruple bypass surgery and two artery-clearing angioplasties.

In September, he underwent six hours of surgery on his legs to repair a kind of aneurysm, a ballooning weak spot in an artery that can burst if left untreated. Cheney had flexible stent grafts put in his knee arteries. The stents, when fully opened, keep the rushing blood from touching the weakened artery walls.

"The stent grafts used to treat the popliteal artery aneurysms are wide open," McBride said.

That they are open means the blood flow to the grafts is normal and haven't clogged, Aulivola said. Patients who have had this kind of surgery typically are given intermittent checkups, often once a year, Aulivola said.

She said the upcoming stress test, which will determine if the blood flow to Cheney's heart is adequate, is unrelated to the vice president's aneurysms.

Cheney was carrying a newspaper and was accompanied by his security detail when he enter the George Washington University Medical Center at about 7 a.m. He left less than three hours later, walking to his motorcade and waving at cameras but saying nothing.

Bush Faces 60th Birthday With Wisecracks (AP-Y2)

By Jennifer Loven, Associated Press Writer

AP2, July 2, 2006

The most powerful man in the world turns 60 on Thursday and he just can't seem to stop talking about it. Barely a week has gone by this year that President Bush has not brought up his advancing age at least once.

"How you doing, sir?" a reporter asked Bush at a news conference a few hours after a middle-of-the-night return from a grueling sprint to Baghdad. "I'm doing all right, thank you," the president replied. "A little jet lagged, as I'm sure you can imagine. Nearly 60."

In his State of the Union address, the president referred to his upcoming birthday as "a personal crisis." It was a laugh line — used to segue to a call for overhauling programs, such as Social Security and Medicare, soon strained by Bush's baby boomer generation.

In fact, Bush is nearly always cracking wise when the topic of his age comes up. The humor, however, contains unmistakably wistful notes, revealing a president who is least somewhat pensive both about aging and his relevance after he leaves the White House in 31 months.

Bush's "I'm getting old" preoccupation puts him in good company.

Cher, Bill Clinton, Dolly Parton, Donald Trump, Sylvester Stallone, Diane Keaton, Suzanne Somers, Reggie Jackson and Jimmy Buffet also are turning 60 in 2006. They are part of the first wave of the 78-million strong baby boomers to enter their senior years.

Karl Pillemer, a professor of human development at Cornell University, said the president's musings are reflective of the group.

Boomers brought advances in the civil rights and women's rights movements. But the generation also introduced America to what Pillemer called "the new narcissism." And now, members of this group are presented with a slew of sometimes bewildering roles: seeing their children enter adulthood; contemplating grandparenthood; watching their parents age and die; retiring from work; and dealing with physical and intellectual limitations.

"For many boomers, turning 60 is a fairly significant shock," Pillemer said. "The generation that believed it would be young forever, clearly will not. ... The boomers are having a hard time with the existential reality of life not being one open-ended opportunity after another."

Dr. J. Edward Hill, the immediate past president of the American Medical Association and a family physician from Tupelo, Miss., has seen many patients display Bush's chatty angst. But he said the president's joshing around is one of the healthiest approaches.

"When you worry about something, you talk about it," he said. "The stints of humor are critically important."

In speech after speech, Bush has referred to himself as the "old president — getting older by the minute, by the way"; as one of "the gray-haired folks"; as "getting older"; and as just flat-out "old."

He often reflects on how he considered 60 practically ancient as a younger man, but has been inspired by changing circumstances to adjust his perspective. "It's all in your mind," he said recently in Omaha, Neb. "It's not that old, it really isn't."

"When are you turning 60?" he quizzed Pete Navarro, a somewhat wrinkled Florida man participating with the president on a panel in May on Medicare's new prescription drug benefit. Bush deflated a bit when Navarro reported that his 60th birthday was not until next January. "Oh, January. You're a lot younger than I am," the president said.

Most often, the famously competitive and fitness-crazed president brings up the physical ravages of time. He jokes about losing his hearing (a frequent source of ribbing by his staff as well), about how knee problems turned him to riding his bike after years of jogging, or about how he is too old for the basketball court.

Bush even broods aloud about his life expectancy, estimated to be an additional 19 years for the average American male his age. "I don't know about you all, I plan on just kind of stretching it out a little bit," he told GOP donors in Indiana in March.

Like most presidents, Bush has grayer hair, more lines and a few extra pounds than when he took office. Yet he still has the health statistics and energy of a much younger man.

Those close to him say Bush is entirely comfortable with the milestone, in part because of the discipline that allowed him to turn 20 years ago from a life of excessive partying and career meandering and never look back.

He also revels in remaining in shape, even markedly improving his fitness, thanks to intense, six-days-a week workouts. The president may have traded running shoes for a mountain bike, but he pushes himself hard, so much so that he has made news several times when hairpin rides sent him tumbling to the ground.

"I'm sure it makes it easier, especially when you're whipping people half your age — some of them trained to kill people, like Secret Service agents," White House counselor Dan Bartlett said.

The president's most recent physical, conducted last July, found he had a resting heart rate in the range of a well-trained athlete and nothing worse than mild hearing loss, skin lesions from sun damage, occasional acid reflux and joint stiffness. His physicians placed him in a "superior" fitness category for men his age.

Age milestones are common for commanders in chief.

Ten other presidents have turned 60 in office. Dwight Eisenhower had his 70th birthday in the White House, as did Ronald Reagan. Seven others turned 50, including Clinton.

The president's 60th celebration looks barely different from other recent birthdays, just a bit bigger.

DOJ_NMG_0038097

About 150 close friends and family are dining with Bush and his wife, Laura, who turns 60 herself in November, on July 4 in the White House residential quarters. Afterward, they will gather on the Truman Balcony for Washington's dramatic fireworks show — and no doubt keep Bush from his usual 9 p.m. bedtime in the process.

Minding Medicare's Drug Gap (LAT)

By Ricardo Alonso-zaldivar And Rong-gong Lin li, Times Staff Writers

The Los Angeles Times, July 2, 2006

The program leaves a $2,850 hole in coverage. Now half a year into the plan, 3.4 million seniors may have to decide how to pay or avoid the costs.

WASHINGTON — When Congress created the Medicare prescription drug program, it adopted an unusual idea to hold down costs: the so-called doughnut hole.

The program pays most of a participant's drug bills until expenses reach $2,250 in a year. Then it stops paying until costs exceed $5,100. That leaves a hole of $2,850 that seniors with serious prescription needs are expected to manage on their own.

Now, six months into the drug program — the first new major healthcare benefit for the elderly in decades — 3.4 million seniors are approaching the doughnut hole.

Most of them are middle-class seniors with multiple chronic illnesses. (The poor are exempt from the gap.) Some have already experienced an abrupt surge in prescription costs.

Melvin Kinnison, 65, of Huntington Beach was shocked to discover that the out-of-pocket cost to refill his prescription for antiseizure medication was jumping to $178 from $10. He left the pharmacy empty-handed.

"It hit me like a slap in the face," said Kinnison, a former Los Angeles County sheriff's deputy.

Kinnison is trying to figure out how to handle a monthly tab for heart, diabetes and acid reflux medications that has climbed to $1,000 from $80. "I thought Medicare is supposed to be helpful," he said. "It sure isn't."

Sensing a political opportunity, some Democrats are campaigning on a promise to shrink or close the doughnut hole. As November's congressional elections draw nearer, more seniors will confront the gap.

But the significance of the issue extends beyond the immediate problem. At stake is a basic approach of the Bush administration and many conservatives and business leaders for dealing with the cost crisis in healthcare. They say consumers must be made to take more responsibility for their medical affairs. Costs are growing so fast, they say, the government and private employers cannot shoulder the burden alone.

They say seniors can avoid problems like Kinnison's if they purchase a plan that covers the doughnut hole. The Medicare drug benefit is delivered through private insurance plans, which individuals choose. The plans that cover the doughnut hole — most plans don't — charge higher premiums. Of the estimated 23 million seniors enrolled in the Medicare benefit, about 2.4 million paid extra for some level of gap coverage.

Medicare Administrator Mark B. McClellan also points out: "Even among the people in plans with a doughnut hole, there are steps consumers can take" to make sure they never reach the hole, such as using lower-cost generic drugs and monitoring costs.

"What millions of these beneficiaries had before was no coverage at all for their prescription expenses," McClellan said.

He urged concerned seniors to call (800) MEDICARE to find out about generics. Medicare officials also advise seniors to carefully read their drug plans' monthly statements, which contain information on how close they are to the gap.

In the long run, some experts suggest, some seniors may wish to switch from traditional Medicare to managed care plans, which are more likely to provide coverage in the doughnut hole. Seniors can also anticipate the gap and save ahead for it.

Those strategies may help many seniors, but not everyone, critics of the doughnut hole say.

The higher premiums for blanket coverage may be beyond the reach of some. Generics are not available for all drugs. And a senior's health needs can change, making it difficult or impossible to plan ahead.

Moreover, such careful management is itself an obstacle for some seniors, whose medical and other problems complicate the situation.

DOJ_NMG_0038098

Some doctors worry that vulnerable patients may fall victim to the gap, unable to pay the suddenly higher costs of their medicines.

"There is a huge amount of evidence from research and clinical experience that seniors skip medicines when the price is too high," said Dr. Joshua Sharfstein, Baltimore's public health commissioner.

"If we find that people are skipping their medications, that is a subject of concern."

Some seniors say their solution to the gap will be to import medications from Canada, which is illegal. But if they saved money, they'd take longer to reach the other side of the gap, when "catastrophic" drug coverage kicks in at the $5,100 mark.

Industry experts say a hole in the middle of an insurance benefit is highly unusual. Most medical insurance plans have a yearly deductible. And some prescription drug plans limit how much they will pay each year.

Under the Medicare drug benefit designed by Congress, beneficiaries pay the first $250 in drug costs for the year. The plan then pays 75% of the next $2,000. After that comes the $2,850 doughnut hole, for which seniors are solely responsible. Then, when a beneficiary's drug bills for the year exceed $5,100 ($250 plus $2,000 plus $2,850), Medicare pays 95%.

"I think this is unique," said Dan Mendelson, president of Avalere Health, a healthcare research and consulting firm.

The company's research shows that 15% of stand-alone drug plans for seniors with traditional Medicare offer coverage in the gap. Among managed care plans, 24% offer coverage in the gap.

Economist Jack Rodgers of PricewaterhouseCoopers likened the Medicare benefit to two plans rolled into one: The first offers limited coverage of medication, with a cap at $2,250; the second provides a more generous benefit for higher bills. In between is the doughnut hole.

"A lot depends on whether you look at the doughnut or you look at the hole," said Rodgers, adding that he believed the availability of enhanced plans, albeit for higher premiums, would soften the impact of the gap.

Recent estimates by PricewaterhouseCoopers indicate that 3.4 million beneficiaries will have to pay full freight in the gap.

An additional 2.4 million have signed up for enhanced plans that provide doughnut hole coverage, mostly for generic drugs.

And 10 million are low-income beneficiaries, whose coverage in the gap is subsidized by the government.

The remaining seniors will not spend enough to reach the gap.

Those who have no coverage in the doughnut hole will have to ride what some experts call a benefits roller coaster.

"For the first five, six, seven months of the year, everything is hunky-dory," said Ronald Ozminkowski, a senior researcher with the information firm Thomson Medstat. "Then come July and August, they're on their own and they will have to start paying everything out of their own pockets. That will last most of the rest of the year, until the federal government says, 'OK, enough is enough.' "

And the cycle starts again the following year.

By analyzing national data on prescription spending, analysts are trying to calculate when patients with different kinds of ailments will hit the gap.

"Patients with illnesses like rheumatoid arthritis and multiple sclerosis, who use very expensive drugs, will accelerate through the gap in two to three months," said Mendelson, of Avalere Health. "Those with more common disorders such as high cholesterol and diabetes will take longer to hit the doughnut hole, generally in the fall."

Democrats say the coverage gap can be closed if Congress grants Medicare authority to directly negotiate lower prices with drug manufacturers. Eliminating the gap with tax dollars would be expensive, perhaps costing more than $10 billion a year now, and bigger sums in the future.

But Leonard Cleveland, 68, a retired machinist who lives in El Monte, said a $2,850 gap was too much for people with fixed incomes. "If they just shortened the gap, people could make it through, [with a] credit card or whatever," Cleveland said.

His wife, Helen, who is partially blind and on medication for depression, back pain, allergies and migraines, has fallen into the gap.

"I didn't think it would total up that fast," said Cleveland, who cares for his wife and a 42-year-old daughter who is disabled.

Dr. John Hsu, a research physician with Kaiser Permanente in Oakland, said drugs shown to be highly effective for common problems such as high blood pressure and diabetes should be provided to beneficiaries at no cost, even in the coverage gap.

DOJ_NMG_0038099

"A lot of forms of cost-sharing are like blunt instruments," Hsu said. "With any medication that we have good, reliable data on, we need to think hard about encouraging its use and not putting any barriers in front of patients."

And, because failure to take prescribed medicines could mean that untreated illnesses become more serious, it might even save Medicare money.

*

*

(INFOBOX BELOW)

"Doughnut hole"

Some seniors enrolled in Medicare's drug benefit plan fall into a gap after their costs reach $2,250, which leaves them responsible for paying the next $2,850.

Who is covered

Low income (no gap): 44%

Costs are less than $2,250 (no gap): 31%

Face coverage gap: 15%

Paid for extra coverage: 11%

--

Numbers do not add up to 100% due to rounding.

--

Source: PricewaterhouseCoopers analysis for Healthcare Leadership Council

Saving The Majority (MUL)

By Robert Novak Column

Robert Novak, July 2, 2006

WASHINGTON, D.C. – Facing the real prospect of losing control of the Senate in this year's elections, Majority Leader Bill Frist called together 10 other Republican senators for a Tuesday night strategy session on "saving the majority."

Frist, who is not seeking re-election in 2006, took copious notes about the ideas put forth. But no consensus was reached on how to deal with possible loss of GOP Senate seats in Pennsylvania, Ohio, Missouri, Montana and Rhode Island, with mediocre compensating prospects for defeat of Democratic incumbents.

The need for Republicans to cure their addiction to costly earmarks was raised at the meeting, but hardly any of the senators present showed interest in the subject.

SAVING THE VETO

House Majority Leader John Boehner is credited with cooling off opposition by Appropriations Committee Chairman Jerry Lewis sufficiently to save the administration-backed line-item veto in the House June 22.

Lewis had been giving a run-around to Republican Rep. Paul Ryan, sponsor of the bill providing Presidential authority to veto parts of a spending bill (subject to approval by both houses of Congress). Boehner reminded Lewis that President Bush and the congressional Republican leadership supported the Ryan bill. Consequently, the majority leader urged the chairman not to mobilize the 36 Republican Appropriations Committee members against the line-item veto.

As a result, Lewis e-mailed his committee members that he would vote against Ryan's bill but was not calling on his fellow appropriators to follow him. That ended the danger that monolithic opposition by the Appropriations Committee would turn enough other Republicans to kill the measure. The bill passed, 247 to 172, with Republican appropriators supporting it, 27 to nine.

FUNDING MCCAIN

The Rasika restaurant in downtown Washington was jammed at 6 p.m. last Wednesday for a fund-raising reception benefiting Sen. John McCain's political action committee.

Republicans were willing to pay $5,000 each to hear McCain speak. They wanted to be on record as present to help the prospective front-runner for the 2008 Republican Presidential nomination.

DOJ_NMG_0038100

Included among those attending were some of Washington's top GOP lobbyists: Charlie Black, Wayne Berman, Scott Reid and Rick Hohlt. Also present was Sen. John Warner, whose fellow Virginia senator -- George Allen -- is McCain's potential opponent for the Presidential nomination.

FUNDING 'LITTLE ITALY'

Rep. Jeff Flake, continuing his persistent but unsuccessful crusade against congressional markups, last Wednesday ran into implied accusations of anti-Italian bias when he opposed another $150,000 federal subsidy for the Arthur Avenue Retail Market in the Bronx's "Little Italy."

Noting that this unauthorized appropriation brings to $700,000 the taxpayers' money spent on the market servicing Italian food merchants, Flake declared, "There is a lot of federal prosciutto ... for a private Italian grocery market." He added, "I would argue that this is one cannoli the taxpayer doesn't want to take a bite out of."

Those words apparently offended Democratic Rep. Jose Serrano, whose Bronx district includes the Arthur Avenue Market. "The gentleman from Arizona's use of certain ethnic words like 'cannoli' and 'prosciutto' indicate that he takes this more lightly than he should," Serrano told the House.

Serrano's subsidy was one of nine earmarks, totaling nearly $3 million, that Flake tried to eliminate last Wednesday. All his efforts were rejected.

GOP'S MICHIGAN CHOICE

Although Oakland County Sheriff Mike Bouchard faces opposition in the Michigan Republican primary Aug. 8, he took part in a strategy session in Washington last Wednesday attended by incumbent GOP senators.

Bouchard is heavily favored to be nominated over the Rev. Keith Butler, a former Detroit city councilman. Bouchard was invited to the midday meeting at the last minute by Sen. Elizabeth Dole, the Senate Republican campaign chairman.

The Republican challenge in Michigan against first-term Democratic Sen. Debbie Stabenow has attracted little national attention so far. However, national Republican strategists consider Stabenow one of the few vulnerable Democratic Senate incumbents in 2006.

Farm Program Pays $1.3 Billion To People Who Don't Farm (WP)

By Dan Morgan, Gilbert M. Gaul And Sarah Cohen

The Washington Post, July 2, 2006

EL CAMPO, Tex. -- Even though Donald R. Matthews put his sprawling new residence in the heart of rice country, he is no farmer. He is a 67-year-old asphalt contractor who wanted to build a dream house for his wife of 40 years.

Yet under a federal agriculture program approved by Congress, his 18-acre suburban lot receives about $1,300 in annual "direct payments," because years ago the land was used to grow rice.

Matthews is not alone. Nationwide, the federal government has paid at least $1.3 billion in subsidies for rice and other crops since 2000 to individuals who do no farming at all, according to an analysis of government records by The Washington Post.

Some of them collect hundreds of thousands of dollars without planting a seed. Mary Anna Hudson, 87, from the River Oaks neighborhood in Houston, has received $191,000 over the past decade. For Houston surgeon Jimmy Frank Howell, the total was $490,709.

"I don't agree with the government's policy," said Matthews, who wanted to give the money back but was told it would just go to other landowners. "They give all of this money to landowners who don't even farm, while real farmers can't afford to get started. It's wrong."

The checks to Matthews and other landowners were intended 10 years ago as a first step toward eventually eliminating costly, decades-old farm subsidies. Instead, the payments have grown into an even larger subsidy that benefits millionaire landowners, foreign speculators and absentee landlords, as well as farmers.

Most of the money goes to real farmers who grow crops on their land, but they are under no obligation to grow the crop being subsidized. They can switch to a different crop or raise cattle or even grow a stand of timber -- and still get the government payments. The cash comes with so few restrictions that subdivision developers who buy farmland advertise that homeowners can collect farm subsidies on their new back yards.

DOJ_NMG_0038101

The payments now account for nearly half of the nation's expanding agricultural subsidy system, a complex web that has little basis in fairness or efficiency. What began in the 1930s as a limited safety net for working farmers has swollen into a far-flung infrastructure of entitlements that has cost $172 billion over the past decade. In 2005 alone, when pretax farm profits were at a near-record $72 billion, the federal government handed out more than $25 billion in aid, almost 50 percent more than the amount it pays to families receiving welfare.

The Post's nine-month investigation found farm subsidy programs that have become so all-encompassing and generous that they have taken much of the risk out of farming for the increasingly wealthy individuals who dominate it.

The farm payments have also altered the landscape and culture of the Farm Belt, pushing up land prices and favoring large, wealthy operators.

The system pays farmers a subsidy to protect against low prices even when they sell their crops at higher prices. It makes "emergency disaster payments" for crops that fail even as it provides subsidized insurance to protect against those failures.

And it pays people such as Matthews for merely owning land that was once farmed.

"We're simply administering it the way Congress established," said John A. Johnson, a top official at the U.S. Agriculture Department.

Today, even key farm-state figures believe the direct-payment program needs a major overhaul.

"This was an unintended consequence of the farm bill," said former representative Charles W. Stenholm, the west Texas Democrat who was once the ranking member on the House Agriculture Committee. "Instead of maintaining a rice industry in Texas, we basically contributed to its demise."Freedom to Farm

The program that pays Matthews was the central feature of a landmark 1996 farm law that was meant to be a break with the farm handouts of the past. Subsidies began when the Roosevelt administration stepped forward to support millions of Depression-era farmers suffering from low prices. By the early 1990s, U.S. agriculture was a productive marvel, yet was still mired in government controls and awash in complex subsidies.

When the Republicans took control of Congress in 1995, they brought a new free-market philosophy toward farm policy. In a break with 60 years of farm protections, they promoted the idea that farmers should be allowed to grow crops without restrictions, standing or falling on their own. The result was the 1996 bill, which the Republicans called Freedom to Farm.

The idea was to finally remove government limits on planting and phase out subsidies. But GOP leaders had to make a trade-off to get the votes: They offered farmers annual fixed cash payments as a way of weaning them off subsidies.

That sweetener was needed to win over wheat-state Democrats -- led by Senate Minority Leader Tom Daschle (S.D.) -- and GOP House members from rice and cotton districts. Wheat growers alone stood to receive $1.4 billion in the first year. The payments for rice growers were increased by $52 million at the last minute in an effort to win support from Sen. David Pryor (D-Ark.).

The new payments were calculated on a farm's "base acres," or production dating to 1981. For example, if a farmer had planted 400 acres of rice, he was entitled to a check of about $100 an acre, or $40,000, every year. The amount per acre varied depending on past production.

The payments were unrestricted -- farmers got them whether or not they grew any crops, or whether prices were high or low.

Owners could do almost anything they wanted with their land, as long as they did not develop it. They could leave it fallow or rent it for pasture. They could set up a hunting retreat. Or, as happened in some Louisiana parishes, landowners could collect payments while planting stands of commercial timber.

Supporters said these annual payments gave farmers the flexibility to switch from one crop to another as market conditions changed, or even to sit it out in a year of low prices. In addition, the payments fit with international trade rules that frown on traditional price supports.

DOJ_NMG_0038102

The annual payments were dubbed "transitional" and were supposed to decline over seven years. Many lawmakers assumed they would eventually end. But two years later, farm prices fell sharply, and the Republican-led Congress gave in to the farm lobby.

Sen. Thad Cochran (R-Miss.) used his power as chairman of the Appropriations subcommittee on agriculture to push through $3 billion in "emergency" assistance to grain, cotton and dairy farmers. That was only the beginning of a retreat by Republicans fearing retribution at the polls in key "red" states with broad farm constituencies.

"The original intent was to make a step in the direction of eliminating farm programs," said then-House Majority Leader Richard K. Armey (R-Tex.), who led an unsuccessful fight in the 1990s to trim the subsidies. "By 1998, there was no zeal left."

Instead of cutting, Congress ended up expanding the program, now known as direct and countercyclical payments. A program intended to cost $36 billion over seven years instead topped $54 billion.

"The farm policy we're pursuing now has no rhyme or reason, and we're just sending big checks to big farmers," said Gary Mitchell, now a family farmer in Kansas who was once a top aide to then-Rep. Pat Roberts (R-Kan.), the 1996 bill's House sponsor. "They're living off their welfare checks."

Efforts to overhaul the farm subsidy network have been repeatedly thwarted by powerful farm-state lawmakers in Congress allied with agricultural interests.

"The strength of the farm lobby in this town is really unbelievable," Armey said. "I don't think there's a smaller group of constituents that has a bigger influence."'Cowboy Starter Kits'

Farmers and landowners benefited from the 1996 law whether their land once grew wheat, corn, cotton or any of the other subsidized crops. But nowhere is the impact more evident than in the sunbaked Texas rice country that spreads southwest from Houston to the Colorado River and east to the Gulf of Mexico.

In 1981, the Texas rice belt extended over about 600,000 acres. By last year, USDA records show, the amount of planted rice had shrunk to 202,000 acres, partly because landowners were able to get farm payments even if no rice was grown on their land.

In fact, so many landowners and farmers are collecting money on their former ricelands -- $37 million last year alone -- that the acres no longer used for rice outnumber the planted ones.

"So many wealthy people are getting so much money off this, it's going to be hard to cut," said Michael Wollam, a rice farmer from Brazoria County.

At a housing development rising from old rice fields on the outskirts of El Campo, 70 miles southwest of Houston, local real estate broker John K. Petty purchased a 75-acre tract from investors in July 2002. He held on to it for a few months, then carved it up and resold it for housing.

"At one time, the area was all farmed in rice," Petty said. Now, the dusty tract is perfect for what he calls "cowboy starter kits," residential tracts owned by nonfarmers but still large enough to keep a horse in the back yard.

Petty informed potential buyers that because their land had once been an active rice field, they could collect an annual payment from the USDA on the portion that was not developed. They did not have to grow rice or anything else.

"If you have 10 acres and build a house on one, you can continue to get farm payments on those other nine acres without farming," the USDA's Johnson said.

Petty used it as a selling point.

"Does it increase the marketability?" Petty asked. "Sure it does."

Duane Korenek bought 17 acres at the site and is building a house. Korenek said it was "common knowledge around here" that the new owners could collect farm payments. He has received about $2,550, USDA records show.

A few hundred yards up a gravel and dirt road, oilman Rene Hamman purchased 20 acres in May 2003. His two-story house and garage sit on part of the land and are appraised at $338,140, records show. His payments have been about $4,500, according to USDA records. "The money is free," Hamman, 48, said, adding that he thought the money should go to real farmers. "You don't have to do anything but keep the ground."

When Donald Matthews bought his 18-acre tract from Petty in 2002, he never expected to receive farm subsidies on his property, appraised at $381,000.

DOJ_NMG_0038103

"I was informed by Mr. Petty that there was a 'rice base' and I was entitled. I said, 'What do you mean I'm entitled? I'm not going to farm rice.' "

But nine of Matthews's acres are classified as agricultural land, for which he has received more than $5,000, records show.

Matthews said he originally was not going to take the money. But he said Petty told him that it would just go to other landowners. "I thought, heck, why should I do that? I wasn't going to give it to somebody else to put in their pocket." Instead, he uses the money to fund scholarships at the county fair and two local high schools, he said.

"Still, I get money I don't think I'm entitled to," he said.

In some Texas counties, the federal payments open the door to another benefit: property tax reductions.

"When a property owner receives a federal payment, the land is considered agricultural use and is assessed at that lower rate," explained Tylene Gamble, the chief appraiser for Wharton County, where El Campo is located. The discount can be dramatic. For example, she said, a parcel might be assessed at $55 an acre for agricultural use but $3,000 for regular use. " It's big," Gamble said.

Gamble is trying to enforce local rules that require landowners to actually farm to qualify for the lower tax rate. But she is hampered by the federal government's definition of farming, "which does not require you to actually farm. There is a conflict there between the federal definition and our definition," she said.

Gary Underwood, director of agricultural appraisals for sprawling Harris County, which includes Houston, said owners are building $500,000 houses on old rice fields and qualifying for tax breaks.

He singled out one tract where the owner built a 4,000-square-foot single-story house on five acres in Katy, a booming suburb. The house sits on one acre. The other four acres get a tax break and a farm payment. "I can't touch him," Underwood said.The Big Landowners

The large landowners who control vast sections of the once-sprawling rice fields outside Houston have been some of the biggest beneficiaries of the 1996 law, USDA records show.

Diana Morton Hudson is a corporate securities lawyer whose 87-year-old mother, Mary Anna Hudson, owns an interest in two tracts of land in nearby Matagorda County. USDA records show that Mary Anna Hudson has received $191,000 since 1997 on land she doesn't farm. "We just pay someone to mow it, and it just sits there," Diana Hudson said.

Later, she added: "I'm a corporate securities lawyer. I couldn't even locate these two parcels in Matagorda."

Houston heart surgeon Jimmy Frank Howell has received $490,709 since 1996 in payments tied to old rice tracts on a vast ranch near Raywood in Liberty County where he now raises cattle, USDA records show. The last rice produced on the 10,000-acre property was "probably over 10 years ago," according to Susan Cotton, Howell's business manager. "We're not rice producers anymore."

For Guy F. Stovall III, an El Campo banker who helps oversee thousands of acres of family lands in Wharton, Matagorda and Jackson counties, the 1996 farm law was a chance to get out of rice farming and convert properties inherited from his grandparents to other uses.

But 10 years later, taxpayers are still paying for the transition. Records show the land owned by Stovall and two trusts set up by his grandparents have generated $1.8 million in rice subsidies since 1996.

Stovall stopped growing rice and began renting the land for grazing cattle. The family continues to grow some crops, such as sorghum and soybeans.

Stovall said that is exactly the kind of transition Congress intended with Freedom to Farm. He estimates that 50 to 60 percent of his government payments go to soil, water and other improvements, such as filling in irrigation ditches and putting up fences.

"There are bullfrogs where there were none, and we're starting to see quail," he said. "There are less chemicals flowing into our bays, and it reminds me of the environment when I was a kid."'Hell of a Deal'

Among the most fervent critics of the annual payments are hundreds of Texas farmers who rent land on which they grow rice. Under the rules, tenants receive the money if they operate the farms. But landlords can simply increase rents to capture those payments.

DOJ_NMG_0038104

Other landlords have evicted the tenants from land they had farmed for years. Then the landowners can collect the checks themselves, even if they do not farm.

Congress "made slaves out of every farmer who was a tenant," said Stephen J. Zapalac, a former Matagorda County rice farmer who now runs a farm credit office in Bay City.

In 1998, Zapalac was leasing 2,500 acres, most of it for rice farming. One landlord canceled a lease for 1,400 acres in 1998, he said, and a second cancellation followed for the rest in 2004.

"As soon as they figured they could take the payments, they said, 'I don't need you anymore,' " he said. "They were renting me land for $40 an acre, but they could get $125 an acre from the government."

Some of the rice land he lost has been turned into pasture for cattle, while the landlord continues to receive the rice money.

"You can sell the calves and still stick the rice payment in your pocket," Zapalac said. "It's a hell of a deal."

For years, Rex Bailey III, a rugged 6-foot-5 rice farmer, sharecropped near Angleton, Tex., an arrangement in which he and his landlord divided the costs and shared in profits and government payments.

"It was all based on what was produced," he said. "We shared the risk."

That changed in 2002, when the owners of one tract changed their arrangement with Bailey, 55, from sharecropping to a fixed annual rent, pegged to capture the $90 an acre that the government was paying him on 214 acres.

"A lot of landlords increased their rental rates to equal or exceed the direct payments," Bailey said. "They know what the payment is, so that's what the rent is. Even though the payment is in my name, I turn around and give it to" the owner.

In 2004, the property was sold to Shin Shan Chu, an elderly investor who lives in Vancouver, Canada. Once a year, Bailey, who still grows rice on part of the 4,000 acres, cuts a $25,000 check and sends it to Chu, whom he has never met.

Reached by telephone, Chu said he hoped to eventually "develop some residential buildings there. It's very nice land, very flat, very close to the city."

Chu, who also owns and leases 17,000 acres of farmland in west Texas, grew up in mainland China and Taiwan, worked in electronics and moved to Vancouver 36 years ago. He described himself as nearly 80.

"It's just an investment," he said of his farm holdings. "I'm waiting for the money."

Researchers Alice Crites and Don Pohlman contributed to this report.

Hiring Federal Lobbyists, Towns Learn Money Talks (NYT)

By Jodi Rudoren And Aron Pilhofer

The New York Times, July 2, 2006

TREASURE ISLAND, Fla. — Rebuffed on several requests for state and federal financing to help rebuild its crumbling bridge, this small resort town was all but resigned to raising the money by doubling the 50-cent bridge toll, increasing property taxes and issuing bonds.

But in a last-ditch gambit, city officials hired a federal lobbyist who had known the local congressman for four decades. Within weeks, the congressman, Representative C. W. Bill Young, called the mayor to say he had slipped a special $50 million appropriation, known as an earmark, into an omnibus bill.

The city had originally sought $15 million. But Mr. Young — a Republican who was then the all-powerful chairman of the Appropriations Committee and, as his lobbyist friend knew, believes public roads should be free — raised it to eliminate the toll.

Since that windfall three years ago, Treasure Island has continued to pay $5,000 a month to the lobbying firm, Alcalde & Fay, and has continued to reap earmarks: $500,000 to fix a sewer plant, $625,000 to repair wooden walkways over the dunes, $450,000 for pedestrian crosswalks.

"They're worth every penny they get," said Mayor Mary Maloof, who led a parade of antique cars to open the new bridge on June 10. "When we started talking about it, there were plenty of eyebrows raised that we would be doing such a thing. But it's turned out to be a valuable tool for helping us cover costs."

Cities and towns — and school districts and transit authorities and utility agencies — across the country are increasingly reaching for that same toolbox, putting lobbyists on retainer to leverage their local tax dollars into federal tax dollars.

DOJ_NMG_0038105

Since 1998, the number of public entities hiring private firms to represent them in Washington has nearly doubled to 1,421 from 763, as places like Treasure Island, population 7,514, have jumped onboard with behemoths like Miami that have long had lobbyists.

Most of these new clients had never sought earmarks — some had never even heard of them — before someone knocked on their door, essentially offering big pots for a pittance. Others had read in the newspaper about neighbors with lobbyists building bridges or beach walks and felt pressure to keep up with the municipal Joneses.

"We're all in competition for the same dollars, and you want all the advantages you can have," said John Litton, city manager in Lake Mary, Fla., about 20 miles north of Orlando.

The collective bill over eight years has topped $640 million.

Enlisted almost exclusively to land earmarks, lobbyists for local governments have boomed alongside a broader explosion in such appropriations, to 12,852 items worth $64 billion last year from 4,219 pet projects totaling $27.7 billion in 1998. The prolific earmarking does not change the overall budget's bottom line, but how the pie is cut: dollars are doled out, often in secret, at the whim of a lone legislator — often under the influence of a lobbyist — rather than through a competitive process.

It is against the law to use federal money to hire lobbyists. Yet local officials' near-unanimous justification is that the lobbyists pay for themselves many times over through the infusion of federal funds.

Ronald D. Utt, a senior fellow at the Heritage Foundation and a frequent critic of earmarks, said he was most troubled at seeing firms solicit public clients with virtual guarantees that they could deliver "dollars for pennies" (or billions for millions).

"The mystery to me is the way they are able to promise returns," Mr. Utt said, pointing to the revolving door between Congressional appropriators' payrolls and lobby shops, as well as to lobbyists' generous campaign contributions. "It goes beyond mere influence peddling to just outright, classic third-world corruption."

The most vivid case of earmark-related corruption came with the conviction this year of Jack Abramoff for trading huge fees from Indian tribes for influence with lawmakers. Public entities have also played a prominent role in the current federal investigation of the links between Representative Jerry Lewis, the current Appropriations Committee chairman, and the lobbying firm Copeland Lowery Jacquez Denton & White, leading to subpoenas of several of the firm's government clients in Mr. Lewis's Southern California district.

Lobbyists say there is nothing improper in their political activity. In fact, they use it as a selling point. In a 2002 proposal to the City of Pembroke Pines, an Alcalde lobbyist pointed to monthly fund-raisers the firm held at its offices in Arlington, Va., and said attending events "very frequently" for Republicans and Democrats alike "does allow us to better our local government clients."

Although local officials are rarely active in the campaign-contribution race that accompanies the earmarks derby, the firm's employees have given upward of $200,000 to more than 100 politicians since 1997, nearly half in Florida and in other states where it has clusters of public clients.

"Because we enjoy a considerable clientele from the private sector," the Alcalde proposal read, "we are able to significantly participate in the political and fund-raising process that might at times better enable us to access public policy makers on behalf of all the firm's clients."

Beyond any question of quid pro quo, however, some critics say the new ubiquity of private lobbyists paid with public money perverts basic democratic tenets. Of the 250 top-grossing firms in Washington, 48 have state, local and tribal governments as their leading source of revenue, far more than any other sector, according to the Center for Public Integrity, which monitors lobbying.

Tim Phillips, president of Americans for Prosperity, one of several Washington watchdog groups critical of earmarks, said it was local politicians' mandate to make their needs known — and the job of members of Congress to look out for them.

"If you're a mayor or a city councilman and you have to hire a lobbyist, what a gross admission of failure on your part," Mr. Phillips said. "I would think they have a fiduciary responsibility to not put taxpayer dollars into lobbyists when they're elected to be, really, the lobbyist for the people."

The mayors and city council members, though, point to the special appropriations as proof of their fiscal prudence.

DOJ_NMG_0038106

Alcalde & Fay is one of three firms — along with Patton Boggs and the Ferguson Group — that collected $25 million from public clients in the past eight years, much more than any other lobbyists. A close look at Alcalde & Fay's 44 public clients in Florida alone shows that, since 2001, $9.8 million in lobbying fees translated into $173 million in earmarks, or a return of $18.41 on every dollar spent.

In Treasure Island, each dollar to Alcalde & Fay yielded $285.83 in federal money.

A Game Changed

To understand how the game has changed, consider the visit of West Virginia University leaders to Senator Robert C. Byrd's office one day in 1989.

They went to see Mr. Byrd — a Democrat long known as the "prince of pork" for pumping money into hometown projects, and then the chairman of the Appropriations Committee — about a research center. When the senator learned the delegation included several lobbyists, he directed them to wait in the lobby.

Mr. Byrd asked for an $18 million earmark, then withdrew the request after an article in The Washington Post revealed that the lobbying firm, Cassidy & Associates, was the origin of the university's idea for where to seek the money.

"I'm on the Appropriations Committee — if I can't do it, nobody can," The Post quoted Mr. Byrd as saying. "Why do you waste your money on a lobbyist when I'm being paid to be your senator?"

These days, such comments seem quaint.

Some lawmakers still insist that lobbyists are unnecessary for local governments, but far from being kicked out of meetings on Capitol Hill, the lobbyists typically arrange them.

When Ms. Maloof, the Treasure Island mayor, makes her annual pilgrimage to Washington to press her case, her lobbyist, L. A. Bafalis — a former Republican Congressman from Florida — picks her up at the airport and escorts her through the day's meetings, paying for lunch in the Capitol's members-only dining room.

A typical monthly retainer is $5,000, with raises over time — and success. For that, according to interviews with more than a dozen Alcalde & Fay clients, the firm sends weekly e-mail messages detailing available federal grants and arranges once-a-year visits to Washington. In between, some clients speak to their lobbyists weekly, while others go a month or more without a phone call.

The Municipalities Practice Group at Alcalde, which accounts for about half the firm's client roster and a third of its $12 million annual revenue, was born with the firm, in 1973. Hector Alcalde had been chief of staff to a congressman from Tampa for a dozen years, and his first client was the Tampa Port Authority, which still pays the firm about $80,000 a year, according to Senate reports.

The City of Tampa eventually signed on, too. And the surrounding county, Hillsborough. Then the neighboring county, Pinellas. The City of Clearwater, 23 miles west of Tampa, became a client in the 1990's, and it was Alcalde & Fay's success in getting Clearwater $22 million in 2000 to replace its own bridge that got Treasure Island's attention.

And so on.

In the 2002 pitch to Pembroke Pines, Alcalde & Fay boasted of having 35 public clients on its roster, including many of the town's neighbors. Now it has 85.

"All of them say, 'We're paying taxes, this is a way for us to get back our fair share of what we're paying into,' " said Andy Wahlquist, a partner who handles several of the firm's public clients in Florida.

Noting the proliferation of earmarks, Kevin Fay, the firm's president, said, "They're compelled to try to get some of that money if the programs are out there."

A snapshot analysis shows that hiring a lobbyist seems to help.

Looking at the 10 Florida cities with populations closest to Treasure Island's, none have lobbyists registered with the Senate; the only earmark among them was $25,000 last year for a veterans' memorial at Alachua City Hall.

North Miami Beach and Homestead, Alcalde & Fay clients with about 40,000 residents each, got a combined $13 million in earmarks in the past five years, while six cities of similar size got none. (Dunedin, population 35,691, lacked a lobbyist but got three earmarks totaling $2.7 million while its congressman, Mr. Young, ran the Appropriations Committee.)

DOJ_NMG_0038107

Local leaders say they lack both the knowledge of bureaucratic procedures and the political contacts to navigate the complex world of federal appropriations. Besides, they are thousands of miles from Washington, picking up garbage and running recreation programs and putting police officers on beats.

Cyndie Goudeau, the Clearwater city clerk, said she could comfortably approach her own congressman, Mr. Young, "but if I walk into a representative or a senator's office that's not from this area, they don't know me from a man on the moon."

"But they know Danielle, they know Hector Alcalde, they know that firm," Ms. Goudeau said, referring to Danielle McBeth, the Alcalde partner who handles Clearwater's account. "If we didn't have one, we wouldn't be getting the funding we're getting."

In the past five years, Clearwater has collected 37 earmarks totaling some $30 million, or $26.25 for each dollar paid to Alcalde & Fay. Besides the sleek, curvaceous bridge leading from downtown to the city's island beaches, the city collected $4 million to transform the streetscape along the water, $1.5 million for a homeless shelter, $1 million for police technology and more.

"In a perfect world, you wouldn't need them," Ms. Goudeau said as she showed off the bridge one recent morning. "But the world's not perfect."

Flying to Washington in February, Joe A. Martinez, chairman of the Miami-Dade County Commission, studied biographies of members of the transportation committee he hoped to persuade to finance a new commuter rail line. He noticed one, Representative Corinne Brown, from Florida, but she is a Democrat — he is not — and from Jacksonville, the other end of the state.

So he called Mr. Alcalde. It turns out that Ms. Brown's daughter, Shantrel Brown Fields, is an associate at the firm.

"I had a meeting with her the next day," Mr. Martinez said of Representative Brown. "I got results."

Last year, Miami-Dade spent more than any other government entity on lobbying, $1.36 million. Totaling fees for the past eight years, it ranks sixth, with $6.7 million; topping the charts are the Metropolitan Water District of Southern California and the Gila River Indian Community, which each spent more than $10 million.

Spreading the Wealth

In general, the largest states had the most public entities with lobbyists — and the biggest fees — but there are notable exceptions: Louisiana ranks fifth, for example, with its government agencies spending nearly $24 million from 1998 to 2005, and Puerto Rico ranks ninth, with $19 million, about the same as Michigan, Illinois and Pennsylvania, which have two or three times Puerto Rico's 3.8 million people.

Mr. Martinez said that after taking over as Miami-Dade chairman last year, he decided to slash the lobbying budget in half, fire 8 of the 11 firms on contract and send his own employee to open a Washington office. But that employee does not have the contacts, Mr. Martinez said: "He doesn't have access to all these people."

Large governments like Miami-Dade — along with ports, airports and public utilities — have long had people in Washington looking out for their interests. What has changed in the past few years is the number of smaller entities looking to get in on the action.

The number of cities with lobbyists, for example, has grown to 511 from 234 in 1998, and the number of counties has also doubled, to 186 from 85. Fifty-nine public school districts had lobbyists last year, up from 19 in 1998, while the number of police and fire departments with their own paid representatives jumped to 16, from just 2.

In Florida, Lake Mary, population 13,922, signed up for $5,000 a month in 2002, joining the two nearby county governments, the local airport, the wastewater authority and the nearby towns of Sanford (population 49,252) and Oviedo (population 30,800) on Alcalde & Fay's client list. But after three years, $220,000 and half a dozen requests for money, all Lake Mary got was a $100,000 clock tower that plays Christmas and wedding music. So the City Council terminated the contract last year, then promptly hired another lobbyist, based in Orlando.

"We felt that if we were going to invest that kind of money, we wanted to attempt to try to get more return on our investment," Mr. Litton said. "Sometimes in the bigger firms you kind of envision yourself as just a number."

Of Alcalde's 44 Florida government clients, half a dozen got no earmarks in the past five years; five more got less than a dollar back in earmarks for every dollar spent on lobbying. The City of Tampa and Orange County also recently fired Alcalde & Fay upon changes in their elected leadership.

DOJ_NMG_0038108

"If there's a long list of clients that have something in common with Orange County, i.e., being a local government in central Florida or the state of Florida, then it would occur to me that there's the potential, at least, to dilute your effectiveness," said the county's new mayor, Richard T. Crotty. "There's only so much money to go around, and if you cut the pie 40 ways instead of two ways, that's not as good a deal."

If Alcalde & Fay has cornered the Florida market, Bradley Arant Rose & White dominates Alabama, its home state. Robertson, Monagle & Eastaugh, an Anchorage firm, represents nearly half the public entities in Alaska with lobbyists. Then there are firms like Marlowe & Company, in Washington, which sells itself as an expert in getting money to prevent beach erosion.

Rather than creating a conflict of interest, partners of Alcalde & Fay said that having a geographic cluster of clients allowed them to concentrate on a certain Congressional delegation. They said they were careful to present each client's priorities and, as Mr. Wahlquist put it, never "go to the Hill with more than one client in mind."

A Need for Professionals

The four-lane, 1.4-mile bridge connecting this spit of land with St. Petersburg was built in 1939, when Treasure Island was unincorporated and had just a handful of homes. By 2003, it rated 3.3 out of 100 on a standard bridge rating. "At zero, you're in the water," said Don Hambidge, the public works director.

Chuck Coward, the former city manager, said the city planned to issue $25 million in bonds backed by toll revenue, and to seek $15 million from the federal government and $10 million from the state. But, he said: "Treasure Island's a very small city. It's not savvy in federal politics."

"We thought we had a worthy project, we thought there were a lot of attributes to it, but we were not skilled in presenting those," Mr. Coward said, recalling several years of requests without results. "After talking with Clearwater, we thought very certainly some professional assistance would be appropriate."

Mr. Bafalis, the lobbyist assigned to Treasure Island, had served in the State Legislature and in Congress with Mr. Young before a failed bid for the governor's nomination in 1982. He mentioned Mr. Young's aversion to tolls when he first met with Mr. Coward on Sept. 23, the day before Mr. Coward met with Mr. Young about the bridge.

Like Mr. Bafalis, Mr. Young declined to be interviewed for this article. But his chief of staff, Harry Glenn, said the removal of the toll had been key to obtaining the earmark, not hiring the congressman's old friend.

"When asked the question whether a city or county needs to hire a lobbyist, he has always told them they don't need to hire a lobbyist to work with their own congressman," Mr. Glenn said. "That's his job. Those are the people he was elected to represent. He doesn't need to work through somebody else to schedule a meeting with a mayor or a city council member."

At the bridge ceremony, where residents nibbled "no toll house cookies," it was Mr. Young who got thanked, not Mr. Bafalis. A 1927 fire engine was the first vehicle to roll across, followed by a forest green Ford Tudor Deluxe as old as the original bridge and two dozen more classics, like a 1959 turquoise Impala and a 1967 cherry Camaro convertible, both complete with fuzzy dice.

Though only one lane flowed in each direction — the two other lanes should be done by next summer — residents were relieved to have their evacuation route reopened in time for hurricane season, and to be able to cut as much as 40 minutes from their commute into town.

The City Council, meanwhile, may yet consider raising property taxes this summer. Without the toll, they would otherwise have no money for maintenance of the new bridge. Unless Alcalde & Fay helps find another earmark.

Federal Standards Put Schools In Quandary (MH)

By Matthew I. Pinzur

The Miami Herald, July 2, 2006

More than 500 high-poverty Florida schools could be forced under the federal No Child Left Behind law to privatize, become charters, replace most of their staffs or make other major changes -- even though some have repeatedly received A or B grades from the state.

A handful of low-performing schools have already faced that choice under Florida's own education accountability laws. But it could become far more widespread next year unless those schools make unprecedented gains on the state's high-stakes standardized test.

DOJ_NMG_0038109

"This calls for a drastic change of culture, an entirely new environment," said Rod Paige, the former U.S. secretary of education who oversaw the creation of No Child Left Behind in 2001.

But Florida's education commissioner suggested in an interview Friday that he may defy the federal law -- and risk losing millions in funding -- if he cannot convince Congress or federal education officials to take a more moderate stance.

"My first duty is to the state of Florida's accountability system; I will act accordingly," Education Commissioner John Winn told The Miami Herald. ``I'd be hard pressed to demand an A school make wholesale restructuring."

No Child Left Behind created a ladder of penalties for schools that fail to meet federal standards. The strongest sanction forces a school to plan for dramatic restructuring if it falls short for five consecutive years. If it fails a sixth time, that plan must be immediately implemented.

In Florida, 535 public schools have missed the goal -- known as Adequate Yearly Progress -- for four years. And because AYP standards become more difficult every year, the percentage of schools making it dropped this year from 36 to 28 percent.

It will likely drop further as the targets soar toward 100 percent proficiency. Within a few years, Paige said, huge numbers of urban schools will confront restructuring.

"It would seem the day of reckoning is coming," said Jack Jennings, president of the Center on Education Policy, an independent public-school advocacy group in Washington.

The federal government's jurisdiction over schools is limited. The No Child penalties apply only to the high-poverty schools that receive federal money under Title I. But that list includes hundreds of South Florida schools. Seventy-nine schools in Miami-Dade County and 32 in Broward have already missed AYP for four consecutive years.

HIALEAH SCHOOL EYED

Among those is Palm Springs Elementary, a Hialeah school of more than 900 students that has received A grades from the state since 2003.

"A staff that's been successful and helped maintain an A school -- why would you restructure it?" asked Roxana Herrera, who recently became Palm Springs' principal.

The apparent disconnect between Florida's school grades and federal AYP is rooted in the two systems' completely different way of interpreting student performance on the Florida Comprehensive Assessment Test.

The school grades are determined almost entirely on two factors: what percentage of students scored a 3 or higher that year on the FCAT's five-level scale and what percentage improved their score since the prior year.

No Child Left Behind measures what percentage of students in various demographic groups are scoring at least a 3 on the exam, which is considered proficient. The target percentage increases every year until 2014, when 100 percent of students must be proficient.

If any one of the nine demographic groups misses the target, the entire school fails to make AYP. At Palm Springs, for example, the school failed to make AYP in 2004 because only 28 percent of special-education students had proficient reading scores -- the goal that year was 31 percent.

"You've got A or B schools that out of 39 criteria has missed one," Winn said. ``To restructure that school based on that, I'm going to be hard pressed to get on the bandwagon regarding that."

There are a handful of loopholes in the rule, but the basic message never changes: Within the next decade, all public-school students in the country must be proficient at reading and math.

"There's a lot of states that aren't yet focused on it, and that's because the numbers have [not] been overwhelming, but they're building," Assistant U.S. Secretary of Education Tom Luce said, speaking June 2 at an education reporters' conference in New Orleans.

HOPING FOR A CHANGE

Indeed, Winn has pinned his hopes on changes to the law. No Child Left Behind needs congressional reauthorization in 2007, and Winn said he hopes the rules will be changed to account for differing levels of achievement instead of the yes-or-no system that now exists.

But the law will not be changed in time for next year's exams. Without a quick change, he said, the 2007 results will be ``a train wreck."

DOJ_NMG_0038110

To avoid it, Winn wants federal officials to approve a "growth model," which would allow schools to make AYP even if they fall short of the goals, as long as their students are on pace to catch up. Such a model was rejected this year, but Florida was encouraged to tweak its plan and reapply.

Without it, Winn said, many schools will fall further and further from the federal goals.

"It's like me playing golf -- I throw up my hands and say I'm never going to make it," Winn said. ``We've never raised [Florida's system] to the level of hopelessness, but I think we're on the tipping point of that for No Child Left Behind."

Gov. Jeb Bush has long insisted there is no contradiction between the two systems, but this spring he said Florida's system was more effective.

"That's no disrespect to anybody in Washington, D.C," Bush said June 14. ``I believe our system [school grades] is the most comprehensive system of measuring how schools are doing based on student learning."

Local districts, meanwhile, are left with little guidance about what to do if federal law tells them to restructure dozens or hundreds of schools.

"This has always been a problem, the idea of putting public school systems in a vise between their own state requirements and No Child Left Behind," Miami-Dade Superintendent Rudy Crew said. ``If the state and federal government will get on the same page, it will avoid districts being at risk of being in this conflicting environment altogether."

A few states began measuring AYP earlier than Florida and have already breached restructuring. California recently dealt with 271 schools, and Michigan had 133.

But according to Jennings' group, the vast majority elected for the vaguest of the law's requirements: ``Undertaking any other major restructuring of the school's governance that produces fundamental reform."

In Michigan, for example, those plans included reorganizing the school's governance and changing the curriculum -- strategies often used in Florida for schools that repeatedly earn F grades.

While those plans seem less drastic than the law's other options, the Center on Education Policy's study of Michigan suggests they work: Eighty-five percent of the state's restructured schools made AYP the following year.

TOUGH TALK

"What happens with politicians is that they talk tough when they sign laws and pass laws, but that doesn't necessarily mean that's how the law is going to be implemented," Jennings said.

But as AYP becomes more difficult to achieve, internal reforms may not be enough. Moreover, the law says little about what happens to schools that continue to miss AYP after the sixth year.

Paige said policy-makers and public pressure will likely force those schools to confront the more draconian options.

"I'm not surprised they're looking first to these kinds of steps," said Paige, now chairman of Chartwell Education Group, a consulting firm. ``But eventually, I think it is going to go to the kinds of things conceptualized in the legislation."

The School Testing Dodge (NYT)

The New York Times, July 2, 2006

Many of the nations that have left the United States behind in math and science have ministries of education with clear mandates when it comes to educational quality control. The American system, by contrast, celebrates local autonomy for its schools. When Congress passed the No Child Left Behind Act, it tried to address the quality control problem through annual tests, which the states were supposed to administer in exchange for federal dollars. But things have not quite worked out as planned.

A startling new study shows that many states have a longstanding tradition of setting basement-level educational standards and misleading the public about student performance. The patterns were set long before No Child Left Behind, and it will require more than just passing a law to change them.

Policy Analysis for California Education (PACE), a research institute run jointly by Stanford and the University of California, showed that in many states students who performed brilliantly on state tests scored dismally on the federal National Assessment of Educational Progress, which is currently the strongest, most well-respected test in the country.

DOJ_NMG_0038111

The study analyzed state-level testing practices from 1992 to 2005. It found that many states were dumbing down their tests or shifting the proficiency targets in math and reading, creating a fraudulent appearance of progress and making it impossible to tell how well students were actually performing.

Not all states have tried to evade the truth. The tests in Massachusetts, for example, yield performance results that are reasonably close to the federal standard. Not so for states like Oklahoma, where the score gap between state and federal tests has averaged 48 points in reading and 60 points in math, according to the PACE report. The states that want to mislead the government — and their own residents — use a variety of dodges, including setting passing scores low, using weak tests and switching tests from year to year to prevent unflattering comparisons over time. These strategies become transparent when the same students who perform so well on state tests do poorly on the more rigorous federal exam. Most alarming of all, the PACE study finds that the gap between student reading performance on the state and federal tests has actually grown wider over time — which suggests that claims of reading progress in many states are in fact phony.

States have always resisted the idea of one national set of tests, citing local autonomy. But if the United States wants to equal its competitors abroad, it must move away from a patchwork system based on weak standards and a frankly fraudulent system of student assessment. Under one promising proposal, the government would finance creation of a rigorous, high-quality test that would be provided free to the states — as long as they agreed to use federal scoring standards. That would finally give the country an accurate and all-encompassing view of student performance.

OTHER NEWS:

Tech Faceoff: Net Neutrality, In The Eye Of The Beholder (WP)

By Kim Hart And Sara Kehaulani Goo

The Washington Post, July 2, 2006

Stark Contrasts in the Debate Over the Future of the Internet

From Capitol Hill to Silicon Valley, it's become one of the most controversial and confusing topics to hit the tech industry this year: network neutrality. The term is confusing, the ad campaigns have further clouded the issue, and it's no longer easy to tell who's for it and who's not.

Whatever becomes of the concept could affect what you pay for connectivity, the sites you'll have access to and the types of services (think video, music and Internet phone offerings) you'll be able to use.

Net neutrality is the push to prohibit a pay-for-speed Internet pricing structure that the cable and phone companies -- those that provide high-speed Internet connections -- have proposed.

To better understand it all, go back to the old "information superhighway" analogy, where the phone and cable lines that connect your computer to the Web are the on-ramps to that highway. Should the companies who built those on-ramps -- Verizon Communications Inc. and Comcast Corp. in the Washington region -- be allowed to impose a toll system that charges Web companies such as Google Inc. a higher fee to reach your computer faster than its competitors, such as Yahoo Inc.?

Is that the essence of a free-market system? Or is it one that creates inequality on a road that should have no tolls at all? The jury -- in this case, Congress -- is still out.

* * *

Q Why should I care about net neutrality?

AThe absence of a net-neutrality provision in a revision of the Telecommunications Act could result in fewer choices, according to proponents. Currently, similar Web sites take about the same amount of time to load in a Web browser. If Congress takes no action, the "load time" for some sites -- those that don't pay a premium, for example -- could be longer than others. Likewise, Internet service providers could favor partners that offer music or video downloads, Internet calling or online shopping, slowing access to competing sites. Big companies, such as Google and Microsoft Corp., will be able to pay higher fees to have their sites come up more quickly. But this could stifle innovation and start-up Internet companies, especially those that have little revenue but require a lot of bandwidth, such as online video site YouTube.

DOJ_NMG_0038112

Net-neutrality opponents, however, argue that these scenarios aren't happening now and that net neutrality attempts to solve a problem that doesn't exist. From a business perspective, opponents say, Internet providers understand that customers won't tolerate that sort of treatment of the Internet. It's in their best interests to keep all Internet traffic flowing at an equal speed.

Could the number of Web sites I can access be limited?

On this point, both sides say yes -- but for different reasons. Proponents say that without net neutrality, inexpensive free-speech vehicles such as blogs and social-networking sites could be stifled. Likewise, Internet start-up companies would have a tougher time competing for a presence on the Web against the big players. Opponents believe, however, that a government-regulated Internet would deter deep-pocketed technology companies such as Google, Microsoft and Yahoo from investing in a more robust Internet infrastructure. Video and voice features, which take up more room in the Internet pipeline, clog the networks and decrease the speed for everyone. If the tech companies don't pitch in for upgraded networks, the congestion will slow things down for everyone, opponents say.

Would net neutrality affect my ability to download music, watch videos or make phone calls over the Internet?

It could. Proponents cite a scenario in which your Internet provider launches its own music- or movie-download service and puts it on "the fast-download lane" in front of competing services such as iTunes, Yahoo Music and others. More importantly, they say, we've already seen this sort of abuse with Internet phone services. Last year, the Federal Communications Commission sided with Vonage when it complained that a small Internet service provider based in North Carolina was blocking its service to customers. The decision made clear that the FCC won't stand for phone companies blocking their competitors, but current rules don't prevent them from giving their own service priority or charging higher fees to their competitors.

Net-neutrality opponents make the same "congested Internet" argument on this point. But they enhance their position by noting that today's non-neutral market keeps the Internet competitive, forcing iTunes, YouTube and others to invest in an upgrade of the network. Regardless of how you get your Internet service, Web sites could differentiate themselves from other sites by finding new ways to offer speedy delivery. That, in turn, could lead to further innovation and more choices for consumers, they say.

Would net neutrality affect my choices for an Internet provider or how much I pay?

Both sides say no. But those who favor net neutrality worry that if phone and cable companies start charging tech companies for enhanced speeds, the costs could be passed on to the consumers -- in the form of increased prices for music downloads or service fees on online retail sites. Those against net neutrality argue that if the tech companies help pay for the future upgrades needed to deal with increased traffic, then the cable and phone companies won't have to raise rates to offset those upgrade costs. Likewise, they also could create pricing structures that give consumers a choice for the levels of Internet service they want. Heavy users could pay more, while light users could opt for a lower-priced plan.

What happens next?

The net-neutrality issue has been included in a larger telecommunications bill being considered by Congress. The House has already approved its version, but it's unclear whether the bill has enough support in the Senate to move ahead.

As of now, the bill favors telecommunications companies that want the FCC to monitor the issue of access to the Internet. Many Democrats oppose the current bill unless it includes tougher language that would make it illegal for telecom firms to impose a priority pricing structure. It's unlikely that they'll reach a compromise before September, but many lobbyists and lawmakers say the net-neutrality issue could prevent the entire telecom bill -- which includes other provisions such as new rules for cable franchises -- from moving forward until next year.

White House Suitors Deluge New Orleans (WT)

By Christina Bellantoni, The Washington Times

The Washington Times, July 2, 2006

NEW ORLEANS -- Visiting Louisiana and Mississippi has become increasingly important for politicians considering a White House bid.

Although New Hampshire and Iowa hold the first-in-the-nation presidential primary and caucuses, the Gulf Coast region ravaged by Hurricane Katrina has emerged as a crucial stop for 2008 contenders.

DOJ_NMG_0038113

Sen. George Allen, Virginia Republican, recently walked amid the rubble of what were once homes in New Orleans neighborhoods. Others interested in the presidency also have taken a tour.

"If you are going to be a serious, credible politician, you are going to have to be able to talk intelligently about what Katrina did to this region, and the first step in that is going to be to come and visit now," said Brian Brox, assistant professor of political science at Tulane University.

Mr. Allen pledged to help New Orleans because he views it as a unique American city.

"I don't think that by 2008 this is all going to be built back," he told The Washington Times on June 22 before taking a damage survey by helicopter.

Wearing his signature cowboy boots, Mr. Allen stood atop piles of debris in homes that had been destroyed by Lake Pontchartrain's floodwaters.

"It's just so heartbreaking," he said. "If this were a carpet-bombing in a war, you couldn't have more devastation."

Sen. Mary L. Landrieu has hosted dozens of other lawmakers here, but the Louisiana Democrat is reaching out especially to potential presidential candidates, telling them: "You've got to see what's not working, so hopefully, if you get to be president, you can help fix it."

Other Louisianans agree that seeing is believing.

"There's nothing more effective than showing people like this. You just can't tell from TV," said Sen. David Vitter, Louisiana Republican.

Mr. Allen said smelling the mud and listening to survivors helped him realize the magnitude of the situation and that he was particularly moved by the vast number of family-owned shops and small businesses left in ruins.

After touring the flood-ravaged lower 9th Ward and St. Bernard Parish, he wondered aloud how the neighborhoods could be rebuilt in a place that is "tempting nature."

"It is literally decimated. People cannot live in places that are dangerous," Mr. Allen said.

Mr. Allen, facing a tougher-than-expected re-election battle in the fall, has been criticized for traveling outside Virginia as he simultaneously explores a White House bid. The senator insisted that the New Orleans trip was necessary as he votes on recovery funding and serves on the Energy and Natural Resources Committee, which is tackling coastal issues after Hurricanes Katrina and Rita.

Mr. Allen was briefed on the challenges of the coastal wetlands. He said New Orleans should be able to share in the royalties from deep-sea energy exploration.

Both Mr. Allen and Sen. Evan Bayh, Indiana Democrat, evoked presidential themes at a press conference with Mrs. Landrieu and Mr. Vitter.

"We're all neighbors, and Americans need to stick together," Mr. Allen said.

Mr. Bayh called the rebuilding efforts a "test of America," adding: "We need to learn the lessons of this disaster."

The lawmakers were mentioned briefly in the papers the next day, but some television stations provided no coverage. Observers note that the photos will remain.

"Just like kissing pigs here in Iowa, it's a great photo opportunity," said Steffen Schmidt, a political science professor at Iowa State University.

Former Virginia Gov. Mark Warner, who has been mentioned as a Democratic presidential candidate, was in New Orleans last week on a fact-finding mission to see how he could help with children's health care challenges. He took with him Virginia specialists.

After Katrina hit, Mr. Warner sent his chief of staff to help New Orleans officials.

Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton, New York Democrat who also took the Gulf Coast tour with Mrs. Landrieu, has called for an independent investigation of the failed government response to the hurricane.

Political observers said that theme will work for 2008 presidential candidates from both parties. Republicans can say Democratic state and local officials failed to demonstrate proper leadership, while Democrats can criticize blunders made by the Bush administration and the Federal Emergency Management Agency, Mr. Schmidt said.

DOJ_NMG_0038114

Sen. Joseph R. Biden Jr., Delaware Democrat, visited New Orleans in March but expressed reservations beforehand that it would seem like "we're all down there grandstanding."

"The risks are real in terms of looking like they are being exploitive," said Linda Fowler, a government professor at Dartmouth College.

Other potential presidential hopefuls who have toured the damage in New Orleans include: Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist, Tennessee Republican, Republican Sens. Sam Brownback of Kansas and John McCain of Arizona, and Democratic Sens. Christopher J. Dodd of Connecticut and John Kerry of Massachusetts.

Sen. Russ Feingold, Wisconsin Democratic, plans a visit this month.

Kerry Faces Hard Road In Presidential Bid (AP-Y2)

By Mike Glover, Associated Press Writer

AP2, July 2, 2006

Seeking the presidency is harder the second time around. As the race for 2008 builds, Democratic Sen. John Kerry has left little doubt about his intentions to try again after his narrow loss to President Bush in 2004. He isn't the only also-ran considering another marathon.

Sen. John McCain (news, bio, voting record), R-Ariz., has the look of a White House hopeful. Three Democrats — 2004 vice presidential nominee John Edwards, retired Army Gen. Wesley Clark and Sen. Joe Biden of Delaware — sound a lot like presidential candidates; Al Gore, the Democrats' nominee in 2000, says he has all but ruled out running for president in 2008.

Kerry faces a challenge of major proportions, convincing Democratic activists that a candidate who just lost an election can still carry his party's White House hopes.

"I think the Democratic Party, unlike the Republican Party, has had a historic reluctance to give people a second chance," said Democratic activist Jerry Crawford, a Des Moines lawyer who was chairman of Kerry's 2004 campaign in Iowa.

It's rare when Democrats give the nomination to a candidate who just failed.

Adlai Stevenson got a second chance against President Eisenhower in 1956, but many suspect that Democrats were pessimistic about the odds of unseating a popular president. Their doubts were realized when Stevenson lost again.

Republicans, on the other hand, are more willing to give their nominees another try. Richard M. Nixon lost the presidency in 1960 and won the White House in 1968. Bob Dole sought his party's nomination in 1980 and 1988. He secured the GOP nod in 1996 but lost the general election to President Clinton.

Dole said the climb gets steeper on the next try.

"I think the advantage is the first time you are fresh and new to a lot of people and they haven't formed a judgment about you," the former Kansas senator said. "The second time around, some people might say he's had his chance, we need a new face."

Kerry's allies acknowledge the struggle but are unwilling to give up the cause.

"Historically, the Democratic Party has tended to shoot its wounded," said former New Hampshire Democratic Chairman Joe Keefe. "John Kerry has done everything within his power to rewrite that chapter."

The Massachusetts senator has raised nearly $9 million for candidates and the party and has campaigned actively across the country.

In statements the party's liberal base has welcomed, Kerry has said he was wrong to vote for the Iraq war resolution in 2002 and has called for an end to the conflict.

The Vietnam War veteran also has come out in favor of a timetable for withdrawing U.S. troops from Iraq. But he got precious little support, even among fellow Democrats, in recent Senate debate.

The amendment failed 86-13 and Kerry's push for the measure frustrated some in the party leadership.

Kerry has made three trips to Iowa. The state's caucuses launch the nominating season and Kerry's surprising victory in January 2004 propelled him to the nomination.

Attitudes have changed among state Democrats, with a recent Des Moines Register poll putting Kerry a distant third behind 2004 running mate Edwards, the former North Carolina senator, and New York Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton.

DOJ_NMG_0038115

Democratic consultant and Kerry ally Jenny Backus said Kerry must overcome "the Democratic curse" of dismissing losing candidates, no matter how well they perform.

"He has grown from the devastation of the last election," said former Sen. Max Cleland of Georgia. "A lot of people who are reacting to Kerry are reacting to the Kerry of '04."

Kerry, who raised $233 million as a presidential candidate, had about $15 million left after the November 2004 election. That was a sore point with many Democrats who questioned why he did not spend it all to unseat Bush.

Kerry gave about $3 million of that money to various Democratic committees and spent about $2 million to buy the e-mail donor list from his campaign. After covering various campaign debts, he had millions left and has been adding to his accounts since then.

As Kerry moves to involve himself in the next campaign, some point to the flaws in his last run as evidence he shouldn't be the standard bearer again.

"I think he has to make an argument that he could do better than he did in 2004," said Democratic strategist Jeff Link, who is consulting with the political action committee of Iowa Gov. Tom Vilsack, a potential Kerry rival.

"We had an unpopular president who had launched an unpopular war and Democrats were as motivated as I've ever seen them, but he couldn't close the sale. I think that's going to give a lot of Democrats pause," Link said.

John Norris, who managed Kerry's campaign in Iowa and ran his field operations in the general election, said candidates learn valuable lessons in a national campaign that could be put to use in a second bid. Sadly, he said, voters do not see it that way.

"That sentiment you talked about is really strong out there," Norris said. "You know, 'He's had his chance.' I think that's shortsighted."

Link said there is an inherent reluctance to give a candidate a second chance, regardless of how well they performed. He worked for Gore during the disputed 2000 election.

"I was a very strong supporter of Al Gore and when he sort of put his toes in the water in 2004 he didn't find the support I think he had hoped for," Link said. "And he had arguably won the 2000 election."

Veteran Democratic strategist Ron Parker said it isn't a very complicated set of dynamics.

"For most folks, Kerry's selling point was less about ideology, about experience, it was the fact that he was the most electable candidate," Parker said. "It turns out that wasn't true and that opens the door for somebody new in 2008."

Crawford, a close ally of Bill Clinton, said electability is critical to the Democrats.

"We, as a party, are going to get to January of 2008 and take a look at the national landscape. And if it looks like Hillary Clinton can win a general election, the great possibility is she will be our nominee," Crawford said. "If we get to January of 2008 and it looks like she can't win a general election, then it's open season and we'll go from there."

Between Polar Opposites Is This Equator: Text Me (WP)

By Zachary A. Goldfarb

The Washington Post, July 2, 2006

Ring, buzz, vibrate: You've got a political message on your cellphone.

Sending text messages to cellphones is catching on this year as a method for reaching supporters.

On Thursday, the political action committee of former senator John Edwards (D-N.C.) went live with a messaging service. People who sign up for the One America Committee's text-messaging database receive on their phone: "Thanks 4 joining my mobile team. Please text me your name & email. Visit us @ http://oneamericacommittee.com. I'll be in touch. John."

"Senator Edwards and Mrs. Edwards are very interested in utilizing all the latest technologies to communicate with people," said Kim Rubey, Edwards's spokeswoman. "Communicating with text messages is a great way to stay in touch with people who are incredibly busy."

The technology comes from a firm called the Rights Group, which has worked on mobile phone advocacy with organizations such as the American Civil Liberties Union.

DOJ_NMG_0038116

"It's a very good way to increase the number of people you're in ongoing contact with," said Jed Alpert, the company's chief executive. "You can enroll at different points of contact, at live events, in print media or on the Web.

"We get response rates that are 10, 20 even 30 times what response rates are to e-mail because open rates are so high with text messaging," Alpert said.

Embattled Sen. Rick Santorum (R-Pa.) recently started using text messaging.

At a women's outreach breakfast in the Harrisburg area last month with Mary Matalin, a former adviser to Vice President Cheney, attendees were invited to join Santorum's text-message database. In response, they received: "From Keeping Women's Docs in PA to Allowing Parents the Freedom to Work from Home, Rick Santorum is Leading 4 Women. Look 4 Msgs with More Information."

"We wanted to find a way to reach some of the busiest voters. Almost everyone has a cellphone at their fingertips," said Virginia Davis, Santorum's spokeswoman. She said people who sign up will get "periodic updates on what the senator is up to."

Right now, the text-messaging feature is limited to Santorum's women's outreach efforts, but it could be expanded to other groups, such as veterans or students.Kerry's Treasury Department

John F. Kerry, the Democratic presidential nominee in 2004, has a big electronic address book -- it contains 3 million e-mail addresses -- and he hasn't been shy about using it to promote Democratic causes and to position himself for a presidential run in 2008. Now, insiders say, it's also bringing in quite a bit of money for Democrats nationwide.

Kerry insiders said reports for the quarter that ended Friday show he has given or raised nearly $10 million for Democratic candidates and committees since November 2004. That's $1.5 million in the past three months. Kerry has raised a total of $13.5 million this cycle.

Just last week, Kerry sent out an e-mail to raise money for the Senate candidacies of incumbent Maria Cantwell (Wash.), Claire McCaskill (Mo.), Rep. Sherrod Brown (Ohio) and incumbent Bob Menendez (N.J.). Kerry has given or raised $2.3 million for 18 Senate candidates and $6 million for 36 committees.

Other potential 2008 presidential candidates have also been active in giving and raising money.

Kerry's 2004 running mate, former senator John Edwards, has raised $6.5 million this cycle for fellow Democrats. He does not give funds to other committees.

Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton (N.Y.) has raised and given $8 million to Democratic candidates and committees this cycle.

Former Virginia governor Mark R. Warner's Forward Together has raised $8.2 million and donated $810,000 to candidates and party committees since the political action committee was formed last year. Warner aides could not specify how much he has raised for other candidates, but he has done more than 25 events for candidates since last November.Bush, Yea or Nay?

President Bush isn't running for office this year, but candidates are doing their best to make 2006 a referendum on him.

Two new television ads have popped up in the Senate contests in Connecticut and Nebraska that feature the chief executive.

In Connecticut, businessman Ned Lamont, who is challenging Sen. Joseph I. Lieberman in an Aug. 8 Democratic primary, has launched an ad that morphs the incumbent into the president. The commercial features images of Bush paired with audio from Lieberman, creating the effect that Bush is speaking with the Connecticut Democrat's voice.

"Joe Lieberman may say he represents us, but if it talks like George Bush and acts like George Bush, it's certainly not a Connecticut Democrat," the narrator says. Lamont is hoping to capitalize on anti-Bush sentiments in the state to defeat Lieberman, one of the Democrats most closely aligned with the president.

In Nebraska, Sen. Ben Nelson (D), who is seeking reelection in Nebraska, is playing the opposite game.

In an ad that slams his GOP challenger, former Ameritrade Holding Corp. executive Pete Ricketts, the narrator says: "We know no one's more independent than Ben." Bush appears in a clip from his visit to the state in February 2005 in which he praises Nelson as "a man with whom I can work, a person who's willing to put partisanship aside to focus on what's right for America."

Since Bush uttered those words, Nelson's political team has viewed them as political gold -- essentially an endorsement of the senator's centrist politics by a president who carried the Cornhusker State with 66 percent in 2004.

DOJ_NMG_0038117

The Power Of Hillary (WP)

By James Carville And Mark J. Penn

The Washington Post, July 2, 2006

"Hillary Clinton really is one of the weakest . . . nominees with whom the Democrats could be saddled."

"Democrats are worried sick about her chances."

"Just give someone else a chance, so we in the Democratic Party can elect a Democrat."

"She cannot possibly, possibly win."

Yada, yada, yada.

We've heard all this "Hillary can't win stuff" before. In fact, the quotes above aren't from recent weeks but from six years ago, when many pundits -- and Democrats -- said there was no way that Hillary could get elected to the Senate. She won by 12 percentage points.

We don't know if Hillary is going to run for president, but as advisers who have worked on the only two successful Democratic presidential campaigns in the past couple of decades, we know that if she does run, she can win that race, too.

Why? First, because strength matters. Our problems as a party are less ideological than anatomical: Our candidates have been made to look like they have no backbone. But the latest Post-ABC News poll shows that 68 percent of Americans describe Hillary Clinton as a strong leader. That comes after years of her being in the national crossfire. People know that Hillary has strong convictions, even if they don't always agree with her. They also know that she's tough enough to handle the viciousness of a national campaign and the challenges of the presidency itself.

One thing we know about Clinton campaigns: Nobody gets Swift Boated.

The woman who gave the War Room its name knows how tough politics at the presidential level can be. Adversaries spent $60 million against her in 2000, and she endured press scrutiny that would have wilted most candidates. She gave as good as she got, and she triumphed.

For those who think that the politics of personal destruction might be rekindled against Hillary or her husband, we can only remind people how consistently that approach has backfired in the past. Bill Clinton would certainly be a huge asset if Hillary decided to run.

In fact, Hillary is the only nationally known Democrat (other than her husband) who has weathered the Republican assaults and emerged with a favorable rating above 50 percent (54 percent positive in the latest Post-ABC poll).

Yes, she has a 42 percent negative rating, as do other nationally known Democrats. All the nationally unknown Democrats would likely wind up with high negative ratings, too, once they'd been through the Republican attack machine.

The difference with Hillary is the intensity of her support.

Pundits and fundraisers and activists may be unsure of whether Hillary can get elected president, but Democratic voters, particularly Democratic women and even independent women, are thrilled with the idea.

The X factor for 2008 -- and we do mean X -- is the power of women in the electorate. Fifty-four percent of voters are female. George Bush increased his vote with only two groups between 2000 and 2004: women and Hispanics. Bush got 49 percent of white female voters in 2000 and 55 percent in 2004. Of his 3.5-percentage-point margin over John Kerry, Bush's increase with women accounted for 2.5 percentage points. The rest came from a nine-point increase among Hispanic voters: from 35 percent in 2000 to 44 percent in 2004. We believe that Hillary is uniquely capable of getting those swing voters back to the Democratic column.

Hillary's candidacy has the potential to reshape the electoral map for Democrats. Others argue they can add to John Kerry's 20 states and 252 electoral votes by adding Southern states, or Western or Midwestern, depending on their background. Hillary has the potential to mobilize people in every region of the country.

Certainly she could win the states John Kerry did. But with the pathbreaking possibility of this country's first female president, we could see an explosion of women voting -- and voting Democratic. States that were close in the past, from Arkansas to Colorado to Florida to Ohio, could well move to the Democratic column. It takes only one more state to win.

Finally, for those who believe that Hillary's electoral chances are tied to ideology, not leadership qualities, we believe that she is squarely in the mainstream of America. Some people say she is too liberal, some that she is too conservative. We think her

DOJ_NMG_0038118

35 years of advocacy for children and families and her tenacious work in the Senate to help ensure our security after Sept. 11 and to help middle-class families will serve her well. We think she represents the kind of change the country is yearning for: a smart, strong leader. She would take the country in a fundamentally different direction: closing deficits, not widening them; expanding health care coverage, not shrinking it. Fighting terrorism without isolating us from the rest of the world.

We don't know whether Hillary will run. But we do know that if she runs, she can win.

James Carville, a Democratic political consultant and commentator, was chief strategist in Bill Clinton's 1992 presidential campaign. Mark J. Penn was a key strategist in Clinton's 1996 bid for re-election and in Hillary Clinton's 2000 Senate campaign.

Slamming Bush, Biden Declares Candidacy (NHUL)

By John Distaso

Union Leader, July 2, 2006

Bedford – After more than 30 years in the United States Senate and nearly 20 years after his first try for his party's Presidential nomination, Joseph Biden has no doubts about making another run for the White House.

"I'm in," the Delaware Democrat said Friday as he began a five-day visit to the first-in-the-nation primary state.

"I know I'm supposed to hedge, but I'm in."

Biden dropped out of the 1988 nomination race amid allegations of plagiarism. He then suffered a cerebral aneurysm virtually on the eve of the New Hampshire primary.

He recalls being given a 30 percent chance of surviving.

"I'm lucky," he said. "I'm a respecter of fate. But barring something like that happening to me or my family, I am in."

Biden said he won't be surprised if, as the fourth longest-serving member of the Senate, he's labeled the "consummate insider."

But, he said, the label doesn't really apply.

Biden, 63, realizes that among the hard left activists in his party, his stance on the Iraq war — to stay and fight until the job is done — is unpopular. But he is asking for their trust that a "neo-isolationist" foreign policy is the worst possible alternative for the country at this point in history.

Regarding the Iraq war, terrorism, and overall foreign policy, Biden considers himself a "muscular Democrat."

In an interview at the Bedford Village Inn, Biden said the Bush administration's policy has made the United States more vulnerable to terrorism, not less.

The ranking Democrat on the Senate Foreign Relations Committee and former chairman of the Senate Judiciary Committee, Biden said his "bluntness" and the fact that he shuns the Washington "political rounds" and "embassy rounds" will show voters he is not typical of the Capitol Hill genre.

"But the very thing that may prevent me from being viewed as the consummate insider is the very thing that may get me in trouble — and that is a tendency to say what I think," he said.

While he is employing consultants, such as long-time friend former Democratic national chairman David Wilhelm, who managed Bill Clinton's 1992 campaign, Biden said, "I'll have my counsel be my own counsel."

While admitting to being "agnostic" on what he considers less important issues, Biden said, "There are certain core things I'm not prepared to back off on," including, he said, a belief that Sens. John Kerry and Russell Feingold's calls to withdraw troops from Iraq by a specified date in mid-2007 is a mistake.

Biden said 2008 may also be "the one year maybe in the better part of a century when it's much better to be a senator than a governor. I don't think the country is looking for on-the-job training."

He said four of the seven Presidents he has served with were former governors, and each "took at least two years to figure out what their foreign policy was. And I think the public is looking for someone who seems to have strength and the substance, the intelligence, to implement what he or she says."

Biden said his Senate experience "is the thing that's given me the confidence to believe I'm the best qualified person to be President. I'm wrong about a lot of things, but I haven't been very wrong about the foreign policy side of the equation."

DOJ_NMG_0038119

A key missing component of George W. Bush's foreign policy, Biden said, is the ability to "project to the world what your values are, and what you value."

"We need a much, much, much more robust doctrine of public diplomacy," said Biden, including programs not unlike the cold war's Radio Free Europe.

He said Donald Rumsfeld should resign as defense secretary in the wake of the Haditha killings to show the world "we take responsibility for mistakes and we're ready to change."

The United States must remain the world's most powerful force by expanding the military and moving from reliance on high-tech weapons "to having a force large enough to be able to deal with the exigencies of the world."

But even as a "muscular Democrat," he said, "the rules of engagement are very different for me.

"It's a matter of having to rebuild alliances by rebuilding faith in our country. Other countries don't doubt our physical might. They doubt our judgment. That's where we've been so badly damaged."

Biden said a U.S. Supreme Court decision last week outlawing military tribunals for detainees suspected of terrorism was valuable.

"When we depart from the rule of law, does it help us or hurt us in our overall fight and objective, to take on terror?" said Biden. "It hurts us, and the court's decision is positive and will help us in the international community."

Biden said he proposed opening discussions with Iran immediately after 9/11, when thousands marched in the streets to show empathy for the United States. "There was an opportunity because the Iranians were worried about terror turning on themselves."

He said Bush refused to negotiate.

Biden said Bush correctly handled Afghanistan, "but then the hubris began. We defeated the Taliban almost too quickly, and (the administration) immediately turned their attention away from solidifying Afghanistan, nailing the Taliban and bin Laden, and turning to this new adventure (in Iraq).

"In retrospect, it's clear to me they had no intention of doing anything other than going to war in Iraq," Biden said. "This is going to (go) down as the single most tragic foreign policy mistake of this century."

Biden said that if the United States had not gone to Iraq, Saddam Hussein, "left unfettered," would have gained access to a nuclear weapon in five to seven years.

But if "we had kept the no-fly zone going, inspections, and if the Kurds had continued building a serious state that was growing, you would have continued to put pressure on Saddam, and I think we would have eventually brought Saddam down in a process where his own military would have decided he was too much of an impediment for them."

Biden said that with Saddam at least contained, "we could have been able to keep the rest of the world with us and focused on really doing what the President promised us. By now, we would have crushed the Taliban and would have had a much better chance of having eradicated the bulk of al-Qaida and bin Laden."

Now, Iranian leaders "like things just the way they are," said Biden. "We're tied down and there is no full-blown civil war.

"The irony of all ironies is that Tehran is much more secure today because Saddam's gone and the Taliban is gone," he said. "They ought to be sending us a 'thank you' note.

"It did not have to be this bad."

Graham Defies Easy Labels (TSSC)

By James Rosen

The State (SC), July 2, 2006

WASHINGTON — When Lindsey Graham first came to Congress almost a dozen years ago, he quickly became known as a Republican attack dog who helped lead the House impeachment of President Clinton.

These days, conservative activists are less enchanted with the first-term senator from South Carolina.

Graham worked with U.S. Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton, D-N.Y., to boost military health-care benefits for Guardsmen and Reservists. He's joined with U.S. Sen. Charles Schumer of New York, another Democratic scourge for many Republicans, to clamp down on China's currency manipulation.

DOJ_NMG_0038120

A former military lawyer who is still a colonel in the Air Force Reserves, Graham sometimes sits on the service's Court of Criminal Appeals. He was an early critic of the U.S. military's excessive interrogation practices at Abu Ghraib prison in Iraq and elsewhere.

In the "Gang of 14" last year, Graham and 13 other senators from both parties prevented Republicans from trying to force rule changes in order to end Democrats' use of the filibuster to block President Bush's most controversial judicial nominees.

Much like his friend and mentor, U.S. Sen. John McCain, R-Ariz., Graham disdains party-line politics and revels in his independence.

"People are always telling me what I think and why I'm doing something," Graham said last week in an interview. "Usually, they're just full of it."

Graham, 50, has no time for special interest groups and politicians of any political persuasion who "want you to hate the people they hate" and cannot tolerate compromise.

"I readily look for opportunities to work with Democrats to solve problems important to my state and the nation," he said. "If Senator Clinton is willing to come to the middle to provide better benefits for the military, I will get a car and drive her."

HIGH PROFILE

Scarcely 41 months into his Senate term, Graham has become one of the most visible and sought-after members of Congress. A regular on the Sunday morning news shows, he is often trailed around Capitol Hill by TV camera crews and recorder-toting reporters. His office fields dozens of requests each week for interviews, speeches and other appearances.

"Lindsey Graham is a very, very smart guy, and he's also a creative guy," said Charlie Black, a prominent GOP consultant in Washington. "Lindsey thinks of himself as a problem solver. That's why he's out front and involved in a lot of things."

Graham's articulateness and high profile have led some political analysts to cast him as a possible 2008 presidential candidate — a job for which he adamantly denies having even the slightest interest.

Why all the attention?

"I take stands on complicated issues, and I get involved in fights that are sometimes emotional," he said. "Hard political fights are something that I feel like I was sent here to engage in. So, if you get involved in the hard political fights every time, dealing with the tough issues, you're going to stand out. That is part of our modern politics. And if I'm standing out in a way that people believe I could serve at the highest level of government, I think it helps my state."

IN LINE WITH BUSH

Radio talk show hosts, conservative activists in South Carolina and outside the state, and prominent evangelical Christians, including James Dobson and the Rev. Pat Robertson, lacerated Graham last year for his willingness to compromise on judicial nominees.

Under the deal he and the rest of the Gang of 14 hammered out, Democrats agreed to allow up-or-down votes on Bush's more conservative nominees while reserving the right to filibuster — a stalling tactic that requires 60 votes to be stopped — only in limited, extreme cases.

Despite the heat he took for his role in the compromise, Graham believes time has proved him right.

"From a Republican point of view, we have gotten judges confirmed on very close votes that had been filibustered for years," he said. "Alito and Roberts are sitting on the Supreme Court without a filibuster. I think it was a good deal for the Senate, a good deal for President Bush and a good deal for the country."

Even as he touts his independence, Graham says his "conservative voting record is second to none."

Graham regularly acts on his core conservative beliefs, as he did Tuesday in voting for a constitutional amendment prohibiting desecration of the flag, which came within a vote of passing the Senate.

Graham also has stood fast with Bush on Iraq, criticizing the treatment of some detainees but supporting the broader war effort.

The senator is also more open to the reality of global warming as a serious environmental threat, an increasingly important issue for many evangelical Christians but one still resisted by Bush.

DOJ_NMG_0038121

At the same time, Graham backs Bush's more moderate approach to immigration reform, which couples stronger border protections with provisions to grant illegal workers temporary visas and even a pathway to eventual citizenship. House Republicans, backed by conservatives back home, want the border strengthened before considering other reforms.

STILL A CONSERVATIVE

The American Conservative Union, which grades lawmakers on a scale of 1 to 100 each year based on key votes, gives Graham a lifetime ranking of 91. While he points to that figure as proof of his conservative credentials, 19 Republican senators — including Jim DeMint of South Carolina at 98 — have higher numbers.

Other rating groups give Graham high conservative marks, too, though some not as high. To the extent that such comparisons are valid, Graham is less conservative than more than one-third of his Senate Republican colleagues.

"I genuinely and earnestly believe in conservative solutions to the problems facing our country, but I also genuinely and earnestly believe that the big problems of my time can never be solved without some bipartisanship," Graham said.

Whit Ayres, a Republican pollster in Alexandria, Va., said Graham has a rare ability to balance ideology and practical politics.

"He has an unerring sense for what will work politically while remaining true to his principles," Ayres said. "He is a maverick who figures out unusual ways to promote conservative policies and goals."

Graham said he long ago gave up trying to please everyone.

"Some people are not going to like me because I won't stand up in front of the country and spew out a bunch of hate toward my political opponents," Graham said. "I'm just not going to build a career around that. It would hurt my state if I spent my time up here trying to cater to the meanest and nastiest people in politics."

James Rosen covers Washington for The State and other McClatchy newspapers in South Carolina.

GOP Aims To Use A War To Win An Election Battle (LAT)

By Doyle Mcmanus And Peter Wallsten, Times Staff Writers

The Los Angeles Times, July 2, 2006

Republicans are once again making the fight against terrorism a campaign cornerstone. So far, Democrats have not been as engaging.

WASHINGTON — President Bush says Democrats want to "wave the white flag of surrender" in Iraq. Vice President Dick Cheney accuses the opposition party's leaders of "defeatism" in the global war on terrorism. And House Republican leader John A. Boehner of Ohio charges Democrats who applauded last week's Supreme Court ruling on detainees with advocating "special privileges for terrorists."

Ever since the Sept. 11 attacks, Republicans have made an uncompromising stance against terrorism a cornerstone of their campaigns. It helped the GOP to take control of the Senate in 2002 and Bush to win reelection in 2004.

Now, in the face of increasing violence in Iraq and eroding public support for the war at home, Republicans are turning again to the theme of toughness — with gloves off.

The environment is not entirely hospitable. A car bomb killed scores of people in a busy Baghdad market Saturday, a day after the Army announced that American soldiers were accused of raping an Iraqi woman and then killing her and three family members. Polls find most voters say they want to see Democrats take control of Congress this fall.

But Republicans believe toughness still sells.

"Foreign policy looked like a minus for Republicans this year," GOP pollster Frank Luntz said, "but it's turning into a plus…. The public doesn't endorse the Republican policy, but they actually reject the Democratic alternative…. By comparison, the Republicans do well."

Republican strategists hailed last week's Supreme Court ruling on detainees at the Guantanamo Bay naval base in Cuba, which held that Bush had overstepped his powers by refusing some legal protections for alleged terrorists.

"The Supreme Court ruling on Guantanamo was a real blessing in disguise," said Whit Ayres, another GOP pollster. It "allows us to have a debate on whether terrorists should receive the same legal protections as American military personnel…. It's hard to see Republicans losing when that's the debate."

DOJ_NMG_0038122

Democratic leaders say, at least in public, that they are confident they can win that debate.

But the Democrats' response so far has been less unified, less pointed and less memorable than the Republicans' attacks.

"The Democratic leadership has not been very good at this," said George P. Lakoff, a linguistics professor at UC Berkeley who has advised some Democrats on ways to sharpen their message. "They're still debating whether you should say as little as possible and hope the Republicans fail, or stand up for what you believe."

Last week's Los Angeles Times/Bloomberg poll found that 54% of voters said they wanted to see Democrats capture control of Congress this fall, whereas 34% favored Republican control. Voters said they thought Democrats would do a better job than Republicans on issues including the economy, immigration and Iraq. The one exception was national security and terrorism: 39% of registered voters said Republicans would do a better job; 30% favored Democrats.

The poll also found that Bush's approval rating on his handling of the war on terrorism had improved markedly since April — a swing at least partly attributable to signs of progress in Iraq, including the death of Abu Musab Zarqawi, the leader of Al Qaeda in Iraq.

The Republicans' new offensive on national security was launched last month by the White House, which encouraged Republican leaders in Congress to press for a debate on Iraq.

As the debate approached, Bush embarked on a surprise, made-for-TV mission to Baghdad. On the same day, the president's top strategist, Karl Rove, accused Democrats of wanting to "cut and run" from Iraq.

In a June speech to New Hampshire Republicans, Rove charged that Sen. John F. Kerry (D-Mass.) and Rep. John P. Murtha (D-Pa.), who have proposed a timetable for U.S. withdrawal from Iraq, were "ready to give the green light to go to war, but when it gets tough, and when it gets difficult, they fall back on that party's old pattern of cutting and running," according to the Union Leader newspaper.

The next day, Bush signaled that Republicans would paint the Democrats as pushing a plan that would "embolden" terrorists.

"What's going to matter [in the 2006 elections] is who has got the plan that will enable us to succeed in Iraq," he said.

At a fundraising event last week for Sen. Jim Talent (R-Mo.), Bush said: "There's a group in the opposition party who are willing to retreat before the mission is done. They're willing to wave the white flag of surrender. And if they succeed, the United States will be worse off, and the world will be worse off."

And after Thursday's Supreme Court decision on Guantanamo, House Majority Leader Boehner went a step further, accusing his Democratic counterparts of giving Al Qaeda "a show of support" by praising the court ruling.

A statement released by Boehner's office was headlined, "Capitol Hill Democrats Advocate Special Privileges for Terrorists." It noted that House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi (D-San Francisco) had applauded the court's ruling that alleged terrorists were entitled to "the basic guarantees of our justice system." The statement also said that Al Qaeda was "surely pleased at the show of support from Capitol Hill Democrats."

Some Republican strategists think Boehner may have gone too far.

"That's too extreme," Luntz said. "What you don't want to do in this debate [is] go over the top."

A spokesman for Boehner, Kevin Smith, said that the majority leader stood by his statement and that it fit into the GOP's campaign plan.

"Nancy Pelosi's statement was weak and sympathetic to the rights of terrorists," Smith said.

Pelosi spokesman Brendan Daly replied: "Republicans are resorting to their tired tactics of distort, distract and divide. Instead of actually doing something to protect our nation, such as implementing the 9/11 commission recommendations or hiring more border control agents, they are doing what that always do: trying to incite fear and attack Democrats. It won't work."

Pelosi said in her statement that the Supreme Court ruling provided "a reminder of our responsibility to protect both the American people and our constitutional rights. We cannot allow the values on which our country was founded to become a casualty in the war on terrorism."

So far, issues of national security and terrorism haven't turned up much in races for the House, where Democrats are hoping to erase the Republicans' 15-seat majority.

DOJ_NMG_0038123

"House races aren't about national security," said Carl Forti, a spokesman for the National Republican Congressional Committee, which is coordinating GOP House campaigns.

"House races are about pocketbook issues."

But national security is already a theme in several close Senate races, including the contest in Missouri, where Bush campaigned last week.

Talent, the Republican incumbent, faces a tough challenge from Democratic State Auditor Claire McCaskill. Talent has been a strong supporter of Bush's policy in Iraq. McCaskill, a moderate, did not endorse either of two Democratic proposals on a withdrawal from Iraq that came before the Senate last month, leading Talent's campaign to accuse her of being "wishy-washy."

In Virginia, Republican Sen. George Allen — who is exploring the possibility of running for president — is facing furious attacks on his national security credentials from Democratic nominee James H. Webb Jr., a Vietnam veteran who served as secretary of the Navy in the Reagan administration before leaving the Republican Party.

Allen has accused Kerry and other Democrats of being "weak in the knees."

Webb said he did not endorse Kerry's position.

Democrats Look Beyond City Limits (WP)

By Chris Cillizza

The Washington Post, July 2, 2006

Candidates Turn New Attention To Rural Voters

When Claire McCaskill ran for governor in 2004, she followed a tried-and-true blueprint for Missouri Democrats: She focused heavily on turning out voters in the urban strongholds of St. Louis and Kansas City while working to cut her losses in the vast rural reaches of the state.

She lost.

This year, McCaskill, the state auditor, is back for another statewide race -- against Republican U.S. Sen. James M. Talent -- but with a new commitment to rural areas.

McCaskill formally announced her campaign for the Senate in Houston, Mo., in the state's southern reaches, and since then has made four rural tours through towns such as Hannibal, Springfield, Branson and Mexico. On those trips she travels in a 31-foot RV with her mother, Betty Anne.

"What 2004 demonstrated is that we have ignored rural Missouri at our own peril," McCaskill said.

The wooing of rural voters is essential to Democrats' hopes for taking back the Senate this November, party strategists say. Rural voters wield real electoral power in Missouri, Pennsylvania, Ohio, Montana, Tennessee, Virginia and Arizona -- all of which are being targeted this fall by Democrats.

Sen. Charles E. Schumer (N.Y.), chairman of the Democratic Senatorial Campaign Committee, said the Bush administration's economic policies have created an opening for his party to argue that rural voters have a self-interest in backing Democrats. "The way to get in is not to try to avoid being who we are, but put far greater emphasis on the issues of common ground and talk to people in a language that they speak," he said.

The raw numbers are daunting. Exit polling in the 2004 presidential race showed Bush carrying rural areas 57 percent to 42 percent over Sen. John F. Kerry (D-Mass.). Similar margins have fueled Republican victories on the state and local levels, where candidates have repeatedly used social issues such as abortion and same-sex marriage to advantage over Democrats.

Republican Rep. Robert Aderholt, who represents a largely rural district in Alabama, expressed skepticism about Democratic attempts to make inroads among his constituents.

"Most rural Americans tend to be more conservative," he said. "They see the Democratic Party nationally, and certainly no one has ever labeled [Democratic National Committee Chairman] Howard Dean or [House Minority Leader] Nancy Pelosi a conservative."

Focus groups conducted in 2005 by Democracy Corps, a consortium of Democratic consultants, reinforced that sentiment. "Democrats had lost all credibility as champions of the middle class; as a result, voters saw no real difference between the parties on the economic and quality-of-life issues that mattered most to them," wrote pollster Karl Agne.

DOJ_NMG_0038124

But developments over the past year, such as higher gas prices and increased health-care costs, have created a sense of pessimism among rural Americans, according to more recent focus groups conducted by Agne in places such as Little Rock and Golden, Colo. While Iraq remains the dominant issue for this voting bloc, it is the "growing economic pressures facing these voters that really caused fireworks," Agne said.

Hoping to capitalize on this discontent, the Democratic Senatorial Campaign Committee is reviewing the voting patterns of rural and exurban voters in the targeted states and has sought advice from Sen. Ken Salazar (D-Colo.) and Gov. Timothy M. Kaine (D-Va.).

"The successful campaigns of Ken Salazar in 2004 and Tim Kaine in 2005 prove that Democrats are capable of making inroads with these communities and can, at the very least, reduce the large deficits in exurbs that have fatally damaged other candidates in recent history," Schumer wrote in a memo to his colleagues.

How successful Democrats are in this effort will be one of the determining factors in which party controls the Senate in 2007.

This fall's contest in Virginia between Sen. George Allen (R) and James Webb (D), a secretary of the Navy in the Reagan administration, is an example.

Once viewed as a long-shot race, Virginia now counts among Democrats' top eight potential takeovers. Their optimism springs from a belief that Webb's r?sum? as a decorated Vietnam War veteran and longtime Republican will allow him to blunt the traditional GOP edge in largely rural central and southwestern Virginia.

Steve Jarding, a strategist for Webb, said the key for Democrats to be competitive in rural America is simple: Just show up. "You can't write it off," he said. "We need to quit conceding turf to Republicans."

It was not by accident then that Webb announced his candidacy in Gate City, in the far southwestern part of the state. Scott County, of which Gate City is part, voted 65 percent for President Bush in 2004 and 63 percent for Allen when he defeated the n-Sen. Charles S. Robb (D) in 2000. Webb must improve on those numbers to have any realistic chance of winning, analysts say.

While Webb's r?sum? may be appealing to rural voters, his positions on issues are out of whack with their beliefs, said Allen campaign manager Dick Wadhams. He said that while Democrats make "cosmetic" arguments on why they can appeal to rural voters, there is no substance beneath that style.

"Showing up at a NASCAR race wearing a flannel shirt does not do anything to change the reality that Democrats are by and large out of touch with rural voters on fiscal and cultural issues," Wadhams said.

James G. Gimpel, a professor of government at the University of Maryland, said that while recent Republican struggles have narrowed the partisan gap among rural voters, the perceived liberalism of national Democrats makes any wholesale shift among this group unlikely.

"If you don't prime rural voters on the issues that they care about, a lot of them will go your way because they are Democrats," Gimpel said. "If you remind them of how conservative they are and how liberal the national Democratic party is, those Democrats would say they will vote for the man, not the party."

GOP Woos Values Voters, Pushes Hot-button Issues (SLPD)

By Deirdre Shesgreen

St. Louis Post-Dispatch, July 1, 2006

Forget about immigration overhaul, lobbying and ethics reform, and even the Iraq war.

Last week, House Republican leaders unveiled an election-year "values agenda" that included a gay marriage ban, abortion restrictions and legislation preserving the words "under God" in the Pledge of Allegiance, among other items. And the Senate spent two days debating a constitutional amendment to ban flag desecration before defeating it, just a few weeks after an amendment banning gay marriage met the same fate.

These hot-button cultural issues are designed to rev up the Republican base and cut into Democratic support among rural blue-collar voters; they are so-called "wedge" issues that in the last election helped propel George W. Bush to a second term and boosted Republican majorities in Congress.

DOJ_NMG_0038125

That 2004 vote sent Democrats reeling, with many calling for a re-examination of the way they talked about faith and politics and a new push to win back "values voters" who over the last few election cycles have come to see the Democratic Party as reflexively anti-religion.

Last week's action by Republicans shows the GOP is ready for a replay of the culture wars.

"Radical courts have attempted to gut our religious freedom and redefine the value system on which America was built," House Speaker Dennis Hastert, R-Ill., said in a statement unveiling the House agenda. "We hope to restore some of those basic values" with these legislative proposals.

It's unclear whether Democrats, despite their soul-searching, will be able to reframe the debate with their own moral tilt and cut into the established GOP advantage on these issues.

Sen. Barack Obama, D-Ill., suggested in a speech last week that Democrats had fallen into a trap of their own making on religious issues and had made little progress despite evidence of the serious electoral ramifications.

"At best we may try to avoid the conversation about religious values altogether, fearful of offending anyone or claiming that ... constitutional principles tie our hands," Obama said in a speech to Call to Renewal, a liberal Christian group focused on eliminating poverty.

"At worst," Obama said, "there are some liberals who dismiss religion in the public square as inherently irrational or intolerant ... (with some) thinking that the word 'Christian' describes one's opponents, not people of faith."

That may have been a subtle jab at Howard Dean, now head of the Democratic National Committee, who last year sparked an uproar when he said of the GOP: "They all behave the same. They all look the same. It's pretty much a white, Christian party."

"Red meat" in Missouri

Del Ali, an independent pollster whose firm conducts polls for the Post-Dispatch, said there's no evidence that Democrats have gained ground on these sensitive social issues. But he said the public may not get as riled up about gay marriage or other "values" subjects this election as they did in 2004.

In this sour political climate, Ali said, voters are not going to wake up "every morning saying 'I don't care what the price of gas is ... I hope no one's burning the flag."

Still, he said, the GOP's move last week is a strategic one that could make a small but significant difference in a few House and Senate key races, particularly in an election where turnout of each party's base will be crucial.

In Missouri, for example, Sen. Jim Talent, R-Mo., needs some "red meat" issues to make sure conservative voters in the southern part of the state are motivated to get to the polls, Ali said. Talent supported both constitutional amendments barring flag desecration and gay marriage.

Talent's Democratic challenger, Claire McCaskill, has been playing up her rural roots in an effort to blunt Talent's advantage among those voters. So it was no surprise that McCaskill moved quickly last week to neutralize the flag issue, saying that she, like Talent, would have voted for the measure.

In Washington, Democrats have been trying out all sorts of new strategies to woo evangelical voters. Last month, Dean went on Pat Robertson's "700 Club" show and declared that Democrats have "an enormous amount in common with the Christian community."

Senate Democrats have called in a half-dozen or so liberal religious activists, authors and others to help them reframe key issues in values-laden language.

Democrats stress that their retooling has not been about shifting positions but about finding new ways to talk about Democratic priorities - from protecting the environment to increasing health care coverage. For example, they have tried to reframe economic issues, such as tax cuts geared toward the wealthy or budget cuts aimed at the poor, in moral terms.

"When you've got an estate tax debate that proposes a trillion dollars being taken out of social programs to go to a handful of folks who don't need and weren't even asking for it, you know that we need an injection of morality in our political debate," Obama said in his speech.

Courting evangelicals

Republicans and conservative activists shrug off the Democratic efforts, saying they can't repackage their positions on issues that matter most to conservative Christian voters.

DOJ_NMG_0038126

"When your party is pro-abortion, pro-gay rights, and pro-flag burning ... how do you say that in a nicer way?" said Connie Mackey, of the Family Research Council, a prominent Christian advocacy group. "I don't know how you can sell that."

Mackey said the GOP's recent focus on such issues will help re-invigorate evangelical voters who have otherwise become somewhat disenchanted with Republicans over immigration and other issues.

But Mackey also noted that congressional Republicans have not been able to deliver on most of those issues, causing further consternation.

Another bill on the House Republicans "values agenda" is a proposal, sponsored by Rep. Todd Akin, R-Mo., to prevent federal courts from declaring as unconstitutional the words "under God" in the Pledge of Allegiance. But that measure could not even muster a majority in a committee vote last week.

"There's room for a lot of improvement," Mackey said. She acknowledged "a dip in enthusiasm" among conservative Christians, but added, "when the time comes around, there's still a base that can be counted on."

Jim Wallis is a liberal Christian activist and author of "God's Politics: Why the Right Gets It Wrong and the Left Doesn't Get It." He said he has seen some progress among Democrats, although they've been "slower" to adapt than grass-roots activists.

"I think a lot of Democrats are learning that they can't cede the entire territory of moral values and religion to a religious and political right without them defining the entire conversation, which they did in 2004," said Wallis, among those called in by Senate Democrats for advice.

Religious conservatives had "insisted there were only two moral values questions: abortion and gay marriage," he said. But now issues from poverty in the United States to violence in Sudan are on the agenda, with Democrats talking about those issues in the context of their "moral compass."

EDITORIAL WRAP-UP

Backtracking In Darfur (WP)

The Washington Post, July 2, 2006

Sudan's dictator gets nastier.

THIS YEAR, Sudan's government declared that it would allow United Nations peacekeepers into the western region of Darfur once a peace deal had been concluded. Then a peace deal was signed in May, and the government reversed itself. President Omar Hassan al-Bashir recently swore that "there will not be any international military intervention in Darfur as long as I am in power."

"We will not accept colonial forces coming into the country," he continued, attributing U.S. pressure for intervention to "Jewish organizations." Meanwhile, Mr. Bashir has some interesting organizations on his side. Ayman al-Zawahiri, the deputy leader of al-Qaeda, recently accused the United Nations of preparing to occupy Sudan and divide it.

U.N. Secretary General Kofi Annan was due to meet Mr. Bashir this weekend. But his chances of persuading the president to change his mind seem negligible. It's not that Mr. Bashir has any principled objection to "colonialist" peacekeepers; he has already accepted a 10,000-strong U.N. deployment in Sudan's south as part of a previous peace agreement. It's simply that Mr. Bashir has calculated that he can snub the international community with impunity. As well as ruling out peacekeepers for Darfur, Mr. Bashir has recently imposed a two-day suspension on most Western aid efforts in Darfur and is blockading humanitarian access to the victims of another crisis in Sudan's east. His fighters are exporting instability to neighboring Chad. And he has missed a deadline in the Darfur peace deal for submitting a timetable for disarming the genocidal janjaweed militia.

History has demonstrated that Mr. Bashir's regime is susceptible to foreign pressure. Sustained diplomacy pushed him into a peace deal with the south and forced him to allow a small contingent of African Union peacekeepers into Darfur. But the external pressure has to be consistent to work, and recently the international community has appeared divided. Sudan's Arab neighbors have been passive in the face of the extermination of Muslim civilians in Darfur; the African Union has blown hot and cold on Sudan's behavior. China, which has a stake in Sudan's oil industry, has sometimes used its U.N. Security Council seat to resist ultimatums to Sudan's government.

DOJ_NMG_0038127

Some of the ingredients of progress in Darfur are already in place. The U.N. is busy planning for a peacekeeping deployment, and a peace deal exists, at least on paper. The priority is to reconstitute the diplomatic coalition that has successfully put pressure on Sudan's government in the past and that can clear the way for a U.N. deployment and hold the government to its commitments under the peace deal. Worrisomely, President Bush's point man on Sudan, Deputy Secretary of State Robert B. Zoellick, is leaving for Wall Street, and his ambassador to the United Nations, John R. Bolton, recently refused to accompany his Security Council colleagues on a trip to Sudan. But if Mr. Bashir's shameless outpourings are not enough to solidify diplomatic efforts to isolate his regime, it's hard to know what would be.

A Noncommittal Fed (LAT)

The Los Angeles Times, July 2, 2006

TALK ABOUT IRRATIONAL EXUBERANCE. Stock markets surged Thursday because of what the Federal Reserve didn't say.

As expected, the central bank raised its short-term interest rate a quarter-point, the 17th consecutive hike since mid-2004. The Federal Open Market Committee explained that although economic growth was slowing, other factors "have the potential to sustain inflation pressures." With customary ambiguity, the committee said its next moves would depend on how the outlook for economic growth and inflation evolved.

The Fed's statement was simply a variation of "That depends," a time-honored, noncommittal answer to practically any question about the future. Still, it was notably different from the news release that followed the committee's previous meeting on May 10. Then, the Fed explicitly warned that more interest-rate hikes might be needed.

The contrasting levels of noncommitment sparked the largest daily run-up in the Dow Jones Industrial Average since March 2003. Then, on Friday, the Commerce Department reported slower growth in consumer spending and a steadying rate of inflation, which could relieve pressure for more rate hikes.

All the recent volatility and confusion about discerning the Fed's real intentions should lead Chairman Ben S. Bernanke to forge ahead with one of his long-standing pet ideas: having the Fed publicly set a target for inflation. The Fed's governors have an informal comfort range of 1% to 2% for "core" inflation, the index that excludes volatile energy and food prices. Before joining the board, Bernanke argued that the Fed should publicly declare a target for inflation and focus on keeping inflation within that range. Doing so would set people's expectation of inflation, which would in turn reduce the pressure to raise wages and prices, according to Bernanke and other proponents of public targets. It's an approach taken by about two dozen central banks around the world.

Public inflation targets would be a natural extension of the Fed's slow, steady drive toward transparency. Alan Greenspan started the process by ending the Fed's Wizard-of-Oz habit of hiding its deliberations behind a curtain of confidentiality. Bernanke has continued the trend, in part by making notably less oblique pronouncements than Greenspan. Having a clear target would further enhance the Fed's predictability.

DOJ_NMG_0038128

DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE NEWS CLIPS

PREPARED FOR THE OFFICE OF PUBLIC AFFAIRS, US DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE

TO: THE ATTORNEY GENERAL AND SENIOR STAFF

DATE: SUNDAY, JULY 2, 2006 7:45 AM EDT

TODAY'S EDITION

Terrorism News:
Hurdle To Closing Guantanamo: Where To Put Inmates (WP) 2
Guantanamo Detainees: Why They're Still There (LAT) 3
The Court Enters The War, Loudly (NYT) 4
A Check Against Fear (NYT) 5
Let There Be Law (WP) 6
Bush Originally Trumpeted Anti-terror Plan's Details (HC) 7
A History Of Publishing, And Not Publishing, Secrets (NYT) 8
Secrecy, Security, The President And The Press (NYT) 9
Can't Win The War? Bomb The Press! (NYT) 11
Governor To Release Intelligence Reports (LAT) 13
At The Northern Border, No Talk Of Fences (WP) 14
Al-Qaeda, Still In Business (WP) 15
BBC Let Intelligence Agents Vet Staff (WT) 17

War News:
Baghdad Market Bombing Kills 66 (WP) 18
Car Bomb Kills 66 At Iraqi Bazaar (WT/AP) 19
Car Bomb Kills More Than 60 In Iraq Market (NYT) 20
Iraq PM Wins Saudi Backing For Peace Efforts (AFP-Y2) 21
Iraqi, U.S. Authorities Free 495 Prisoners (AP-Y2) 22
US Envoy Promises More Iraq Releases As 495 Detainees Freed (AFP-Y2) 22
Muslim Group Condemns Reports Of U.S. Rape (AP) 23
Bin Laden Tape Urges Insurgents To Forgo Talks (WP) 23
Suddenly, Sand Bags And Potshots At Post 1 (NYT) 24
Army Probing Soldier's Death (WT/AP) 26
2 British Soldiers Killed In Afghan Attack (NSDY/AP) 26
Bush Address Pays Tribute To Armed Forces (AP) 26
Cheney Applauds NASCAR At Florida Raceway (WT/AP) 27
Cheney Revs Up Schedule In Florida (LAT/ORL) 27

DOJ:
Gonzales Backs Handling Of Terror Suspects (AP-Y2) 28
US Attorney General Defends Special Military Tribunals (AFP-Y2) 29
Justice Kennedy Makes The Calls On Roberts Supreme Court (LAT) 30
Kennedy Reigns Supreme On Court (WP) 32
Roberts Is At Court's Helm, But He Isn't Yet In Control (NYT) 34
A Supreme Court Of One (WP) 38
Supreme Court Freshmen (LAT) 40
The Court's Electoral Thicket (WP) 41

Corporate Scandals:
Scrushy Will Appeal Corruption Conviction (WSJ) 42
Ralphs To Pay $70 Million For Illegal Hiring Scheme (LAT) 42
KLA Finds Options-Dating Problem (WSJ) 43
MZM Manager Accused Of Violating FEC Rules (WP) 44

Criminal Law:
Judge Acquits 2 Ex-Detectives In Mob Killings (NYT) 45
Judge Rubs Out Mob Cops Verdict (NYDN) 46
Ex-cops' Convictions Tossed (NSDY) 47
JUDGE: KILLER MOB COP DUO GUILTY AS SIN - & I HAVE TO LET THEM WALK (NYPOST) 48
'Mafia' Cops' Convictions Upset (PHDN) 49
Judge Tosses `Mafia Cops' Convictions (LAT) 50
NEW HEARTBREAK FOR VICTIMS' KIN (NYPOST) 51
Shock, But Some Praise, After Legal Ruling (NYT) 52
Victims' Families Shocked At Reversal (NSDY) 53
Victims' Kin Call Ruling 'So Absurd' (NYDN) 53
Glorious New Day For Family Of Ex-cop (NYDN) 54
Hacker Attacks Hitting Pentagon (BSUN) 54
Sex Offender Law Limited (KCS) 57

Civil Law:
High-Drama, Low-Frequency Protest (NYT) 58

Civil Rights:
Feds File Lawsuit Against Sarasota (BRAH) 58
Early Voting Critics Eye Appeals Court (WT) 59
Cruel And Unusual (SLPD) 60
Scandal At The Coast Guard Academy (NYT) 61

Antitrust:
Microsoft Races To Meet Deadline Before Europe Imposes A Fine (NYT) 61
Michaels Takes $6 Billion Buyout (WSJ) 62

Environment/Indian Affairs:
Indian Vote Affected If Act Expires (AP) 63

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:
Drug Probe Targets Aristide (MH) 65
EU Arms Market Widens Bidding (WT) 67

Immigration:
Guv Ties Cannon's Win To Immigration (DESMN) 68
In Armed Forces, And Now Citizens (LAT)..... 69

Congress-Administration:
Cheneys Take Tour Of Hangar (FLTODAY) 69
Shuttle Launch Postponed; NASA To Try Again Today (WP) 70
Clouds Force Delay Of Shuttle Launching For At Least A Day (NYT) 71
Weather Nixes Shuttle Launch - Again (AP-Y2)..... 71
Cheney's Heart Condition Is Called Stable (NYT) 72
Physical: Cheney's Heart Condition Stable (AP-Y2) 73
Bush Faces 60th Birthday With Wisecracks (AP-Y2)..... 74
Minding Medicare's Drug Gap (LAT) 75
Saving The Majority (MUL) 77
Farm Program Pays $1.3 Billion To People Who Don't Farm (WP)..... 78
Hiring Federal Lobbyists, Towns Learn Money Talks (NYT)..... 81
Federal Standards Put Schools In Quandary (MH)..... 85
The School Testing Dodge (NYT)..... 87

Other News:
Tech Faceoff: Net Neutrality, In The Eye Of The Beholder (WP) 87
White House Suitors Deluge New Orleans (WT)..... 89
Kerry Faces Hard Road In Presidential Bid (AP-Y2)..... 90
Between Polar Opposites Is This Equator: Text Me (WP) 91
The Power Of Hillary (WP)..... 92
Slamming Bush, Biden Declares Candidacy (NHUL)..... 93
Graham Defies Easy Labels (TSSC)..... 95
GOP Aims To Use A War To Win An Election Battle (LAT)..... 96
Democrats Look Beyond City Limits (WP)..... 98
GOP Woos Values Voters, Pushes Hot-button Issues (SLPD)... 99

Editorial Wrap-Up
Backtracking In Darfur (WP) 100
A Noncommittal Fed (LAT) 101

TERRORISM NEWS:

Hurdle To Closing Guantanamo: Where To Put Inmates (WP)

By Josh White

The Washington Post, July 2, 2006

The Supreme Court decision striking down military commissions for detainees at Guantanamo Bay, Cuba, has renewed calls for the government to close the facility that has held terrorism suspects for four years. The problem facing U.S. officials is how to shut down Guantanamo and what to do with the 450 men who are still there -- in particular, about 100 they consider too dangerous to ever release.

U.S. officials acknowledge that closing Guantanamo Bay is likely, though there is no timetable and no specific plan for how to do it. While the State Department works to repatriate nearly two-thirds of the prison's population via complex negotiations with other nations, the Bush administration will have to decide what to do with the core group who officials claim would kill Americans if they were freed.

Senior administration officials, requesting anonymity because they were not authorized to discuss the matter, said there are only two options for the men the United States deems too dangerous to release: transfer them to federal or military prisons in the United States -- such as the supermax facilities or Fort Leavenworth -- or arrange for another country to assume responsibility for their detention.

So far, no third country has said it would be willing to take the men, and the Bush administration has been reluctant to consider allowing them to be transferred onto U.S. soil. Senior officials said in interviews it is possible that any suspects who are convicted of crimes could land in U.S. prisons.

The United States has taken that step previously with international criminals, such as Panamanian Gen. Manuel Noriega, who was convicted in 1992 on drug trafficking and racketeering charges and is incarcerated in a federal prison near Miami. Admitted al-Qaeda operative Zacarias Moussaoui is serving a life sentence in a Colorado supermax prison along with Ramzi Yousef, convicted in the 1993 bombing of the World Trade Center in New York.

White House spokesman Tony Snow told reporters aboard Air Force One on Friday that closing the facility will not be easy, adding that the administration does not want some of the people there to cross the U.S. border.

"You close it when you finish handling all the cases of people who are at Guantanamo," Snow said. "And, as we've said many times, you don't simply shut it down. There are some people who you do not want on American soil, who you want to go ahead and conclude the process of bringing them to justice, and repatriating those to whom it is appropriate to repatriate."

President Bush and senior administration officials have said they want Guantanamo Bay to close, in large part because the detention center has become an enormously negative symbol.

DOJ_NMG_0038130

John B. Bellinger III, legal adviser to Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice, said last week that there are about 300 detainees from Afghanistan, Saudi Arabia and Yemen who are likely to be returned to the custody of their home countries when agreements can be worked out.

Retired Army Gen. Barry R. McCaffrey wrote in a recent academic paper for the U.S. Military Academy that the United States should "rapidly weed out as many detainees as possible and return them to their host nation with an evidence package as complete as we can produce," urging countries to try their nationals for war crimes and terrorist actions. If detainees are released in their own countries and appear back on the battlefield fighting the United States -- as the administration has contended will happen -- "it may be cheaper and cleaner to kill them in combat than sit on them for the next 15 years," McCaffrey wrote.

McCaffrey also advocates putting the 25 most dangerous terrorism suspects on trial in U.S. courts or by courts-martial, followed by civil indefinite detention in a U.S. territory.

Human rights groups do not necessarily disagree with putting detainees who are convicted by a sound legal system in jail, and they believe the Supreme Court decision could provide an avenue toward that legal framework.

"There are probably people at Guantanamo who should be held, and they should be brought to the United States," said Elisa Massimino, Washington director of Human Rights First. "If there's anybody in there that they have evidence of a crime against, they can try them."

Rep. Adam Schiff (D-Calif.) introduced legislation last year calling for a solid legal framework at Guantanamo Bay that would require U.S. officials to either charge, release or repatriate detainees within two years, except in extraordinary circumstances.

"The problem with closing down Guantanamo is you're still going to need a place to hold the worst of the worst . . . and closing down Guantanamo means opening up something else somewhere else," Schiff said Friday, saying that he favors a location inside the United States, either in an existing facility or a new special prison. "I'm more concerned about making sure that they're tried in a way where they can be detained if necessary than what we call the facility or where we put it."

Guantanamo Detainees: Why They're Still There (LAT)

By Carol J. Williams, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, July 2, 2006

There are 450 men from more than three dozen countries detained as "enemy combatants" in a seaside network of seven — soon to be eight — camps and prisons at the U.S. Naval Base in Guantanamo Bay, Cuba. Following are some frequently asked questions.

Question: Why does the United States have a base in Cuba?

Answer: The oldest U.S. base overseas and the only one in a communist country, the naval station is positioned at a strategic point between the Atlantic Ocean and the Panama Canal. It has been expanded and modified since the U.S. government leased 45 square miles of land and water from the newly liberated island nation in December 1903. A 1934 treaty set the annual rent at $2,000 in gold, or $4,085 today, and deemed the lease permanent unless both parties agreed to any changes. Communist revolutionary President Fidel Castro has wanted to break the lease since he took power in 1959 and has refused to cash any of the checks.

Q: What crimes are the prisoners at Guantanamo accused of?

A: Only 10 of the men have been charged with war crimes, for their alleged roles in aiding Taliban and Al Qaeda operatives responsible for the Sept. 11, 2001, terror attacks, and assaults on U.S. forces who invaded Afghanistan a month later. The other 440 were captured by Afghan, Pakistani, U.S. and other authorities and accused of engaging in combat or plotting to do harm to Americans and their allies.

Q: Why does the government continue to hold men who haven't been charged with a crime?

A: The Bush administration claims the right, under the laws of war, to indefinitely detain "enemy combatants" while the nation is at war — in this case, the global war on terrorism. Detention prevents prisoners from returning to the battlefield and endangering U.S. forces or U.S. national security, the administration argues. Under the Geneva Convention, captured enemy forces may be held as prisoners of war but must be provided specific rights and protections. For instance, POWs are housed in quarters equivalent to those for U.S. forces, are allowed to keep their personal effects, can work and receive compensation, and are not subject to interrogation. The Guantanamo detainees are not accorded these rights.

Q: Why was Guantanamo chosen as the site for the United States' captured enemies in the war on terrorism?

A: Initially, officials at the White House and the Pentagon believed they were under no obligation to accord U.S. constitutional rights and protections to noncitizen detainees held outside U.S. soil. However, two years ago, the Supreme Court ruled on a prisoner's challenge, Rasul et al. vs. Bush, that anyone in U.S. custody anywhere has the right to challenge his captivity in federal court. That ruling was just on the right to challenge detention, but opened the door to Hamdan vs. Rumsfeld.

DOJ_NMG_0038131

Q: Why was the Supreme Court looking at the military tribunals?

A: After the Rasul ruling, attorneys for Yemeni Salim Ahmed Hamdan appealed to U.S. district court with a challenge to the legality of the military commissions set up to try those accused of war crimes. Hamdan's challenge resulted in Thursday's Supreme Court ruling that President Bush exceeded his war powers when he created the tribunal.

Q: How are the Guantanamo detainees affected by the Supreme Court ruling?

A: Only the 10 charged detainees are directly affected by the decision, and the consequences won't be immediate even for them. The president may seek congressional authorization for another kind of offshore military court, or the administration may try those charged with war crimes in U.S. federal courts.

Q: What about the other 440 men — will they also receive trials?

A: Military prosecutors have said for months that charges were pending for at least two dozen more prisoners, and the number prosecuted could reach 75. But with international pressure mounting against the Guantanamo operations and the government likely to have a tougher time securing convictions in U.S. courts, the State Department is negotiating with detainees' home countries in an effort to transfer custody and responsibility for the men.

Q: If the Bush administration is trying to downsize Guantanamo, why is it building new detention facilities?

A: The $30 million in funding for the medium-security, 100-cell Camp 6 due to open in August was budgeted more than two years ago. Military officers running the detention operations also note that the first three camps constructed at Guantanamo in early 2002 — the metal mesh cells arrayed in open-air rows in Camps 1, 2 and 3 — are rusting and nearing the end of their five-year intended life span. Camp 4, a barracks-like communal-living facility for as many as 200 detainees with the best behavior records, is mostly empty now because of repairs underway after a May 18 uprising.

Q: How can a prisoner get released from Guantanamo?

A: Of the 759 men known to have been brought to the detention network since January 2002, about 300 have left the island after being judged by panels of military officers as "no longer an enemy combatant" or when their home governments agreed to take responsibility for them. Three committed suicide. About 100 still at the prison have been judged eligible for transfer or release by annual Administrative Review Board hearings. Another round of the assessments is underway to reconsider the need to hold the 330 or so deemed last year to require continued detention because they posed a threat to U.S. security if released or because they could provide intelligence under interrogation.

The Court Enters The War, Loudly (NYT)

By Adam Liptak

The New York Times, July 2, 2006

JOHN C. YOO, a principal architect of the Bush administration's legal response to the terrorist threat, sounded perplexed and a little bitter on Thursday afternoon. A few hours earlier, the Supreme Court had methodically dismantled the legal framework that he and a few other administration lawyers had built after the Sept. 11, 2001, attacks.

"What the court is doing is attempting to suppress creative thinking," said Professor Yoo, who now teaches law at the University of California, Berkeley. "The court has just declared that it's going to be very intrusive in the war on terror. They're saying, 'We're going to treat this more like the way we supervise the criminal justice system.' "

While in the Justice Department's Office of Legal Counsel from 2001 to 2003, Mr. Yoo helped write a series of memorandums setting out a bold and novel legal strategy to find, hold, question and punish the nation's enemies. The memorandums said the Geneva Conventions do not apply to people the administration designates as enemy combatants. They contemplated the use of highly coercive interrogation techniques. They justified secret surveillance.

The court's decision in Hamdan v. Rumsfeld, Professor Yoo said, may signal the collapse of the entire enterprise. "It could affect detention conditions, interrogation methods, the use of force," he said. "It could affect every aspect of the war on terror."

He was not overstating his case. True, the decision itself — holding that the government could not try detainees held at Guantánamo Bay, Cuba, for war crimes in a particular way — was narrow, given that it directly affected only 10 men and did not address the administration's broader contention that it can hold those men and hundreds of others without charges forever. And Congress may yet put some or all of the president's programs on firmer legal footing.

But the effect of the decision, constitutional lawyers across the political spectrum agreed, could devastate the administration's main legal justifications for its campaign against the terrorist threat.

"The mood music of this opinion so lacks the traditional deference to the president," said John O. McGinnis, who served in the Justice Department from 1987 to 1991 and now teaches law at Northwestern, "that it would seem to have implications for his other programs."

DOJ_NMG_0038132

The administration had built its case in part on a vote by Congress, taken a week after Sept. 11, that authorized the president to "use all necessary and appropriate force" against those who participated in and supported the attacks. The administration has relied on that authorization as legal support for several of its programs.

In 2004, the Supreme Court endorsed a part of this argument, but Justice John Paul Stevens, writing for the majority in Hamdan, was having none of it. There is, he said "nothing in the text or legislative history" of the authorization "even hinting that Congress intended to expand or alter" existing laws concerning military trials.

The opinion, Professor Yoo said, seemed to require Congress to specify a laundry list of powers before the president can act.

"I worked on the authorization," he added. "We wrote it as broadly as possible. In past wars, the court used to let the president and Congress figure out how to wage the war. That's very different from what's happening today. The court said, 'If you want to do anything, you have to be very specific and precise about it.' "

The logic of the ruling and its requirement that Congress directly authorize presidential actions even in wartime has broad implications. For one thing, said Laurence H. Tribe, a law professor at Harvard, it seems to destroy the administration's argument that Congress blessed the National Security Agency's domestic surveillance program when it voted for the authorization.

"That argument is blown out of the water and is obliterated," Professor Tribe said.

Justice Stevens also took aim at the administration's chief constitutional argument, the one that critics call "Article II on steroids."

Because Article II of the Constitution, among other things, anoints the president as commander in chief, Professor Yoo and other administration lawyers have argued the president can ignore or override laws that seem to limit his authority to conduct war. In the current struggle against terrorism, they argue, the entire world is the battlefield.

Perhaps not any more. Steven G. Calabresi, a law professor at Northwestern and a founder of the Federalist Society, the conservative legal group, said this second argument is also in trouble.

"The court is certainly not embracing the broader Article II power," he said.

Indeed, a footnote in the majority opinion, one sure to be read closely, seems tailored to address these other controversies by rejecting the argument that the president is free to ignore Congressional limitations on his power.

"Conceivably the court had in mind controversies like the N.S.A. terrorist surveillance program" in crafting the footnote, said Curtis A. Bradley, a former Bush administration lawyer who now teaches law at Duke.

There are supporters of the N.S.A. program who say that the Hamdan decision does not affect it. They note that a 2002 appeals court decision said that Congress "could not encroach on the president's constitutional power" to conduct warrantless surveillance to obtain foreign intelligence.

The wholesale rejection of the administration's positions in Hamdan may have its roots in part in judicial hostility toward the memorandums Professor Yoo helped prepare several years ago. The justices in the majority, said Professor McGinnis, "have been so skeptical of a variety of legal interpretations coming out of the executive branch, like the so-called torture memos, that they are not giving the president any deference."

But some justices seemed to leave a door open, suggesting that the decision is not so much a judicial attack on executive power as it is an insistence that Congress, rather than a small group of administration lawyers, must play a leading role in formulating the response to terror.

"Where, as here, no emergency prevents consultation with Congress," Justice Stephen G. Breyer wrote in a brief concurrence that three other justices joined, "judicial insistence upon that consultation does not weaken our nation's ability to deal with danger. To the contrary, that insistence strengthens the nation's ability to determine — through democratic means — how best to do so."

But Professor Yoo was not inclined to accept the decision as a triumph of the democratic process. Instead, he saw it as a judicial usurpation of the president's power to protect the nation. "The court is saying we're going to be a player now," he observed ruefully.

A Check Against Fear (NYT)

By Jonathan Mahler

The New York Times, July 1, 2006

(Note: This article will appear in the July 9 issue of The Times Magazine.)

The afternoon before the Supreme Court handed down its instantly historic ruling in Hamdan v. Rumsfeld, Lt. Cmdr. Charles Swift, the Navy defense lawyer appointed to represent the man who has admitted to being Osama bin Laden's driver, Salim Hamdan, told me he was reading a minority opinion written 60 years earlier, in the wake of World War II, by one of the court's lesser-known justices, Wiley B. Rutledge. The case involved Tomoyuki Yamashita, a Japanese general who'd been convicted of war crimes and sentenced to death by a U.S. military tribunal, a verdict upheld by the court, 6-2, despite some glaring procedural deficiencies: among other things, the admission of hearsay evidence including propaganda films and unnamed witnesses. When Swift and I spoke, Supreme Court watchers had already deduced that Justice John Paul Stevens would be writing for the majority in Hamdan. Back in 1947, the 27-year-old Stevens was Rutledge's clerk, so Swift was consulting Rutledge's dissent in Yamashita for clues.

DOJ_NMG_0038133

Swift read me stirring words from Rutledge's opinion: "The immutable rights of the individual, including those secured by the due process clause of the Fifth Amendment, belong not alone to the members of those nations that excel on the battlefield or that subscribe to the democratic ideology. They belong to every person in the world, victor or vanquished, whatever may be his race, color or beliefs. They rise above any status of belligerency or outlawry." Swift paused and then added, "I think tomorrow's going to be a good day."

And of course it was. With the assent of four of his colleagues, Stevens ruled that the military tribunals created by presidential order in November 2001 to try enemies captured in the war on terror violated the Geneva Conventions and the Uniform Code of Military Justice and were therefore illegal. Stevens, it would seem, had absorbed his mentor's distaste for unbridled power. "He was finally able to vindicate those values that Rutledge championed," says Allison Danner, who clerked for Justice Stevens in the late 1990's.

So much of the conversation concerning the war on terror has focused on fear - for some, the fear of losing our freedoms, for all, the fear of another attack. It's easy to overlook the counternarrative of hope, whether it's Iraqi citizens braving violence to vote in free democratic elections, the declining confidence in bin Laden in a number of Muslim countries (according to a recent Pew Research Center poll) or our Supreme Court reminding us of the resilience of the principles upon which this country was built. "There are not many countries where a noncitizen with a fourth-grade education can sue the president," says Neal Katyal, the Georgetown Law professor who argued Hamdan's case before the Supreme Court. "That is our great gift to the world. We're strong enough to say our system can handle it."

Throughout our history, war has led to the abrogation of rights, from the Alien and Sedition Acts through the detention and internment of Japanese-Americans in World War II to the F.B.I.'s undercover infiltration of antiwar groups during Vietnam. More often than not, when asked to rule on the legality of these extraordinary measures, the Supreme Court has given the commander in chief a wide berth. This is understandable: "Judges, like other citizens, do not wish to hinder a nation's 'war effort,' " Justice William Rehnquist once wrote. And yet, when the court sets aside civil liberties and defers to the president, it acts out of fear; when the court checks the president and reaffirms those liberties, it acts out of strength - and, equally, hope.

President Bush has said that the war on terror presents unprecedented challenges and therefore demands a novel approach, the so-called new paradigm. It is true that we are fighting a new kind of enemy, one who is transnational, can wreak havoc on an epic scale and, in the case of suicide bombers, cannot be deterred by the threat of conviction in a court of law. But if the danger posed by this enemy is of a different character than we have encountered in the past, so, too, is the danger posed by our response to him. This is, after all, a war with no foreseeable end and a limitless battlefield. Left unchecked, the president could extend the reach of his wartime powers anywhere, ad infinitum. Do we need to narrow the scope of certain liberties to defeat radical Islam? The majority opinion in Hamdan does not preclude this possibility, but it does prevent the president from acting unilaterally, while inviting - compelling, really - Congress to assume its own share of constitutional responsibility for the war on terror. Will Congress prove a more vigilant steward of our civil liberties? We cannot say. In the future, the balance of hope and fear will depend on many things, most notably whether we are attacked again. But we are at least assured of an admittedly overdue debate about the conduct of the war. Before Hamdan, that debate, such as it was, consisted of the executive branch telling us - or not telling us - how it was prosecuting the war and of the denunciations issued by the executive branch's critics. We were told that after 9/11, everything had changed - or that nothing had changed. Now that our fear will be tempered by hope, the real conversation can begin.

Let There Be Law (WP)

The Washington Post, July 2, 2006

The Supreme Court has offered a chance to put the war on terror on solid legal ground. Will Congress rise to the occasion?

THE SUPREME Court's rejection of the Bush administration's plan for terrorist trials has rightly been seen as a rebuff of the president's unilateral legal approach to fighting al-Qaeda. But in a subtler way, it is also a profound rebuke to Congress. The nation's legislature has mostly sat on the sidelines for the duration of the war on terror, letting the administration make its own rules -- and ride roughshod over the law as well as fundamental American values. The court's action forces the administration to invite Congress into the process of designing trials for enemy combatants. This presents a major opportunity to bring the legal framework of this conflict -- and the country's political system -- back into balance.

DOJ_NMG_0038134

This chance is far broader than the relatively narrow question of how accused terrorists should face justice. There is an opportunity to provide legislative authorization -- along with limits, safeguards and accountability -- for all of the powers and practices the U.S. government may need in a long-term confrontation with violent Islamist extremism. Congress should audit the administration's treatment of prisoners, whether in Guantanamo Bay, Cuba, or in secret locations abroad. It should scrutinize its interrogation methods, including those that skirt prohibitions against torture. It should review the government's domestic surveillance and debate the proper balance between ensuring Americans' privacy and gathering intelligence effectively.

The immediate danger is that Congress will become reckless and hasty and abdicate the responsibility the court has given it. With midterm elections looming, the administration may push for quick legislative fixes. It may ask for a simple statutory authorization for the military commissions it wants to use for terrorist trials. It may also seek to counter the court's ruling that Common Article 3 of the Geneva Conventions, which requires humane treatment for all detainees, includes al-Qaeda members. Having granted the administration a blank check for so long, Congress should not offer a rubber stamp.

Instead, and as a start, Congress needs to examine comprehensively what changes, if any, the administration truly needs in the ordinary rules of military justice to bring al-Qaeda suspects to trial. Many military lawyers believe terrorist trials could proceed smoothly using the normal system of courts-martial, which the military utilizes to try its own personnel. The administration has several concerns, chiefly the need to protect classified intelligence information and its desire to use evidence collected in the rough and tumble of war that might not be admissible in a conventional court-martial. Its own rules offered maximal flexibility at considerable risk to fairness. Congress must satisfy itself both that any deviations are truly needed and that they are no broader than absolutely necessary.

Legislators also have an important role to play concerning the court's holding on Geneva's Common Article 3, which could have a major impact on treatment standards for prisoners. The import of the decision is to make it a potential crime under U.S. law to treat prisoners inhumanely, yet the Geneva article is vague in its language. As a consequence, it is essential that Americans fighting the war get clear guidance as to what conduct is prohibited. Given the administration's ugly history of construing vague language requiring humane treatment as allowing inhumane treatment, it cannot be permitted a free hand in that interpretation.

At a minimum, Congress should force the administration to publish the guidance it gives to personnel in the field concerning the article's meaning. More broadly, it should consider legislation putting meat on the treaty's rather bare bones. It should consider every exceptional practice the administration has tried to justify: from "waterboarding" and other practices of torture and near-torture to "renditions" of suspects to foreign governments to the holding of prisoners incommunicado. One obvious place to start would be to stipulate that the CIA's network of secret prisons is not consistent with Geneva's requirements: Its detainees must be transferred to U.S. facilities, registered with the International Red Cross and guaranteed humane treatment.

Other issues not directly addressed by the court warrant close examination, too. As we have argued before, Congress should put on firmer legal ground the basis on which captives in this war are detained in the first place. It needs to gets a handle on the National Security Agency's program of domestic surveillance -- authorizing whatever part of it is necessary, subject to meaningful judicial and legislative oversight.

This is a moment in which this country can correct the mistake of five years ago, when the executive branch sought to fight a novel war based on a combination of outdated laws and new rules it made up on its own. The Supreme Court has created the chance to bring real law to the war on terror -- if Congress is willing to do its job.

This is the sixth editorial in an occasional series about the Bush administration's detention and treatment of foreign prisoners. We will revisit the topic from time to time during coming months. The full series is available athttp://www.washingtonpost.com/opinions.

Bush Originally Trumpeted Anti-terror Plan's Details (HC)

By Julie Mason

Houston Chronicle, July 2, 2006

WASHINGTON - President Bush's sustained outrage last week about newspaper reports on a program tracking terrorists' financial records may have seemed odd considering how urgently the administration once publicized the program's broad concepts.

Thirteen days after Sept. 11, Bush signed an executive order expanding the Treasury Department's authority to track the bank activities of those with suspected ties to terrorism. The White House sent reporters a detailed fact sheet on the new powers.

For good measure, Bush summoned the news media to the Rose Garden to trumpet the program alongside the secretaries of state and treasury.

"We're putting banks and financial institutions around the world on notice, we will work with their governments, ask them to freeze or block terrorists' ability to access funds in foreign accounts," Bush said. "If they fail to help us by sharing information or freezing accounts, the Department of the Treasury now has the authority to freeze their bank's assets and transactions in the United States."

The information was still on the White House Web site as of Saturday.

One of the first organizations shut down with the new powers was in Texas. With great fanfare, the Justice Department's Terrorist Financing Task Force busted the Holy Land Foundation for Relief and Development, an organization operating from a Richardson storefront.

Last week, the New York Times and others reported some of the details of how the Bush administration has been monitoring financial transactions since Sept. 11.

The program uses far-reaching government subpoenas to obtain financial records from a cooperative in Belgium called Society for Worldwide Interbank Financial Communication, according to the articles. (The Times story was quickly matched by the Los Angeles Times and the Wall Street Journal).

Bush reacted swiftly, calling the reports disgraceful and a compromising of national security. Vice President Dick Cheney followed suit.

"The New York Times has now made it more difficult for us to prevent attacks in the future," Cheney told supporters at a fundraiser in Nebraska.

The difference between disclosures in the Rose Garden and in the newspaper is that the Times and others are reporting operational details, according to the White House.

At a fundraiser in Missouri, Bush intensified his rhetoric, earning a sustained, standing ovation when he said, "There can be no excuse for anyone entrusted with vital intelligence to leak it and no excuse for any newspaper to print it."

Last week the Times added an article saying that some officials thought disclosures about the intelligence program actually could stem terrorism financing by forcing suspects to use a more informal, less reliable way to move bank funds.

U.S. Sen. Jim Bunning, a Kentucky Republican, accused the Times of treason for reporting on the program, while other Republicans on Capitol Hill called for an investigation and urged the Justice Department to pursue charges in the matter.

The House passed a resolution Thursday supporting the financial tracking program and condemning news organizations that report on secret surveillance programs. The action came three months after Congress reauthorized the Patriot Act.

Short takes·At a campaign fundraiser in St. Louis last week, a supporter in the crowd shouted to Bush, "Four more years."

Responded the president: "No more wife."

·On Thursday, Bush turns 60. Also turning 60 this year are Donald Trump, former President Clinton and Cher.

A History Of Publishing, And Not Publishing, Secrets (NYT)

By Scott Shane

The New York Times, July 2, 2006

WASHINGTON

WHEN government officials ask journalists to withhold information on national security grounds, they face a natural skepticism.

Many reporters believe that the government routinely exaggerates the need for secrecy. They suspect that security officials try to snuff reporting that is merely embarrassing or at most politically troublesome. And most journalists are deeply reluctant to pass up a scoop.

Yet for decades, American newspapers and broadcasters have regularly censored themselves on security grounds, plucking compromising details from a story, delaying its publication or killing it entirely. The New York Times has withheld articles that might have jeopardized counterterrorism programs or efforts to protect vulnerable stockpiles of nuclear material. Reporters have removed details about invasion plans, military equipment, allies' assistance and much else.

None of those precautions, intended to protect American lives and intelligence sources, is visible to the public. But on vivid display are articles published over the government's vociferous objections, some of which have deeply angered the Bush administration and its allies.

The latest tempest was set off on June 22 by the disclosure in The New York Times, closely followed by The Los Angeles Times and The Wall Street Journal, of a secret program that scrutinizes global money transfers by a Brussels banking consortium.

The article followed other exposés of counterterrorist tactics, including The Washington Post's on the Central Intelligence Agency's overseas detention centers and The New York Times's on the National Security Agency's warrantless eavesdropping.

DOJ_NMG_0038136

Critics of the Bush administration say that extraordinary secrecy has generated the rash of disclosures. "People in the government who believe something wrong or illegal is going on feel they have no recourse but to go to the press," said Jeffrey H. Smith, a former C.I.A. general counsel.

But some current and former intelligence officers express exasperation at what they see as journalists' arrogance in publishing in the face of government pleas for caution.

"I'd say views are hardening," said Bobby R. Inman, former director of the National Security Agency and deputy director of the C.I.A., who is generally viewed as friendly to the press. "If we're going to avoid an official secrets act" — a British-style law far more draconian than anything in this country — "we're going to have to have more discipline from the media."

John S. Carroll, former editor of The Los Angeles Times, recounted an exchange last year with the C.I.A. that illustrated the opposite instincts of the two sides.

Over C.I.A. objections, the newspaper published an article about the agency's cultivation of sources in the Iranian community of Los Angeles. "If we felt it would seriously compromise national security, we would not have run it," said Mr. Carroll, adding that he never heard of problems resulting from the decision to publish.

But a former C.I.A. official said intelligence officers had been "furious" about the article, fearing it would make it harder to recruit Iranian-Americans and put expatriates under potentially dangerous scrutiny if they traveled to Iran.

In what Mr. Carroll calls the "eternal argument" over the publication of secrets, history offers evidence for both sides.

KATHARINE GRAHAM, the publisher of The Washington Post who died in 2001, backed her editors through tense battles during the Watergate era. But in a 1986 speech, she warned that the media sometimes made "tragic" mistakes.

Her example was the disclosure, after the bombing of the American embassy in Beirut in 1983, that American intelligence was reading coded radio traffic between terrorist plotters in Syria and their overseers in Iran. The communications stopped, and five months later they struck again, destroying the Marine barracks in Beirut and killing 241 Americans.

"This kind of result, albeit unintentional, points up the necessity for full cooperation wherever possible between the media and the authorities," Ms. Graham said.

But such cooperation can prove problematic, as her newspaper's former editor, Benjamin C. Bradlee, has recounted.

In 1986, after holding for weeks at government request a scoop about an N.S.A. tap on a Soviet undersea communications cable, The Post learned that the Russians knew all about it already from an N.S.A. turncoat named Ronald Pelton. NBC beat The Post on its own report.

"Officials often — more often than not, in my experience — use the claim of national security as a smoke screen to cover up their own embarrassment," Mr. Bradlee wrote in his 1995 memoir, "A Good Life."

In 1985, The Times reported that aMarine colonel in the White House was overseeing the secret war against the Nicaraguan contras. The newspaper withheld the name of the colonel because the White House said printing it might endanger his life, recalled a former Times reporter, Joel Brinkley.

The Post named Oliver North the next day. "There was absolutely no reason not to print his name," he said.

In 1961, The Times's learned of the planned Bay of Pigs invasion but removed references to the C.I.A. and other details from its article at the government's request.

But after the attempted attack on Cuba proved a catastrophe, President John F. Kennedy told a Times editor that he wished the paper had ignored the government's plea — because a more pointed article might have led the C.I.A. to abort the operation.

Some countries try to regulate such exchanges. In Britain, skirmishing over secrets is mediated by the Defense Press and Broadcasting Advisory Committee, with both press and government members. The group has no power to stop publication but advises journalists on what damage a report might cause.

No such system exists in the United States, but some years ago, a group of about 20 journalists and officials met quarterly for dinner to discuss how a free press should cover secret agencies.

Some officials refused repeated invitations, said Mr. Smith, one of the organizers.

But he said the meetings were useful while they lasted. "The idea was that each side didn't really understand the other very well," Mr. Smith said. "I'd say that's certainly still the case."

Secrecy, Security, The President And The Press (NYT)

By Byron Calame

The New York Times, July 2, 2006

THE Bush administration's unusually harsh attacks on The New York Times for exposing a secret banking-data surveillance program have turned a glaring spotlight on the paper's decision to publish the article.

DOJ_NMG_0038137

President Bush, Vice President Cheney and Republican legislators have singled out The Times in recent days for disclosing the counterterrorism program, even though The Los Angeles Times and The Wall Street Journal published articles the same day. Senator Jim Bunning of Kentucky called on the attorney general to investigate The New York Times for treason.

The flood of reader e-mails reacting to the June 23 article has left hundreds of messages in various newsroom in-boxes at The Times. Roughly 1,000 e-mails have come to me, about 85 percent of them critical of the decision to publish the story and a large fraction venomous. It was time to take a close look at the handling of the article in search of answers.

My close look convinced me that Bill Keller, the executive editor, was correct in deciding that Times readers deserved to read about the banking-data surveillance program. And the growing indications that this and other financial monitoring operations were hardly a secret to the terrorist world minimizes the possibility that the article made America less safe.

The banking-data surveillance program, set up in 2001, is run out of the Central Intelligence Agency and overseen by the Treasury Department. It provided access to records of transactions routed through a Belgian consortium by banks and financial institutions around the world. More than 11 million transactions involving about $6 trillion are routed daily through the Society for Worldwide Interbank Financial Telecommunication, or Swift.

So what were the most solid reasons to publish the story?

There was a significant question as to how secret the program was after five years. "Hundreds, if not thousands, of people know about this," Mr. Keller said he was told by an official who talked to him on condition of anonymity. The 25 bankers from numerous nations on the Swift board of directors, and their predecessors going back to 2001, knew about the arrangement. So did some consortium executives and staff members — a group that probably expanded during this period. Starting in 2003, Swift representatives had to be stationed alongside any government intelligence official searching the data.

Further support for the conclusion that the Swift program hasn't remained totally hidden from terrorists, or anyone else, emerged last week. A former State Department official who has served on a United Nations counterterrorism group pointed to a 2002 United Nations report noting that the United States was monitoring international financial transactions. Swift and similar organizations were mentioned in the publicly available report, although there were no details. "The United States has begun to apply new monitoring techniques to spot and verify suspicious transactions," the report noted.

The Times's June 23 article "awoke the general public" to the Swift program and "in that sense, it was truly new news," Victor Comras, the former State Department official, wrote on The Counterterrorism Blog last week. "But," he added, "the information was fairly well known by terrorism financing experts back in 2002."

The administration has sometimes invited press attention to its effort to track terrorist financing. In September 2003, Treasury Secretary John W. Snow and a team of his aides took reporters from The Times and other papers on a six-day tour on a military aircraft "to show off the department's efforts," Mr. Keller and Dean Baquet, the editor of The Los Angeles Times, noted in a joint Op-Ed commentary that appeared yesterday. The aides "discussed many sensitive details of their monitoring efforts, hoping they would appear in print and demonstrate the administration's relentlessness against the terrorist threat," according to the two editors.

Another reason Times editors were right to proceed with the 3,550-word Swift story was the skimpy Congressional oversight of the program. Secrecy is vital for intelligence and national security programs, but so is oversight by the courts or elected legislators. The Swift program, however, doesn't seem to have any specific Congressional approval or formal authorization. The Treasury Department has not provided a list of who in Congress was informed, or when, The Times has reported.

Eric Lichtblau, one of the two reporters who wrote the Swift story, told me the administration briefed a limited number of Congressional leaders — apparently from both parties, but not the full intelligence or banking committees — toward the beginning of the program. It wasn't until the Treasury Department learned that The Times was working on the story, Mr. Lichtblau said, that the administration apparently briefed all members of the intelligence committees. Whether there are official standards established for the Swift program or not, the weak Congressional oversight over the past five years deserved public scrutiny.

Temporary emergency measures cloaked in government secrecy can too easily become permanent shortcuts. That's why oversight is important. It is also a reason to publish the article. The reservations expressed by some of the 20 current and former government officials and industry executives who were disturbed enough to talk to The Times were based on this concern: "What they viewed as an urgent, temporary measure had become permanent nearly five years later without specific Congressional approval or formal authorization," in the words of the article.

The most fundamental reason for publishing the article, of course, was the obligation of a free press to monitor government and other powerful institutions in our society. "Our default position — our job — is to publish information if we are convinced it is fair and accurate," Mr. Keller wrote in a letter to readers posted online last weekend, "and our biggest failures have generally been when we failed to dig deep enough or to report fully enough." He added:

DOJ_NMG_0038138

"The question we start with as journalists is not 'why publish?' but 'why would we withhold information of significance?' We have sometimes done so, holding stories or editing out details that could serve those hostile to the U.S. But we need a compelling reason to do so."

What about the administration's reasons for demanding that The Times not publish?

Mr. Keller said the "central argument" senior officials gave against publishing the Swift article was that international bankers would stop cooperating. In his weekend letter, he cited two reasons that argument didn't stop him from publishing the story: First, the consortium provides data to comply with administrative subpoenas issued by the Treasury Department — a legal obligation. "Second, if, as the administration says, the program is legal, highly effective, and well protected against invasion of privacy, the bankers should have little trouble defending it." So far, Swift hasn't publicly indicated any intention to stop cooperating.

For me, the most substantial argument against running the story was the acknowledgment that the Swift program was letter-of-the-law legal, had helped catch some terrorists and had a clean record on privacy abuse. But full-bore oversight would have had to be part of that picture to make a convincing case that the program deserved to continue in secrecy, with its access to Swift's mother lode of financial data.

Often obscured in the past week's hot rhetoric over The Times's decision to publish the Swift article were the occasions when the paper's editors have chosen to hold or modify a story when warned by government officials that lives or national security might be endangered. "Few people are aware when we decide to hold an article," noted Mr. Keller and Mr. Baquet in their joint commentary. Apart from The Times's decision to hold the December story about the National Security Agency's warrantless eavesdropping for more than a year, it turns out the paper has decided not to publish stories that "might have jeopardized efforts to protect vulnerable stockpiles of nuclear material," according to the joint commentary. The Times has also held stories about "highly sensitive counterterrorism initiatives that are still in operation," the Op-Ed piece noted.

"There is no magic formula, no neat metric for either the public's interest or the dangers of publishing sensitive information," the two editors concluded. "We make our best judgment."

The best judgment of these two editors served their readers well in the case of the Swift story. In the face of intense administration pressure in a country that's unusually polarized politically, they correctly decided to make sure their readers were informed about the banking-data surveillance.

Can't Win The War? Bomb The Press! (NYT)

By Frank Rich

The New York Times, July 2, 2006

OLD GLORY lost today," Bill Frist declaimed last week when his second attempt to rewrite the Constitution in a single month went the way of his happy prognosis for Terri Schiavo. Of course it isn't Old Glory that lost when the flag-burning amendment flamed out. The flag always survives the politicians who wrap themselves in it. What really provoked Mr. Frist's crocodile tears was the foiling of yet another ruse to distract Americans from the wreckage in Iraq. He and his party, eager to change the subject in an election year, just can't let go of their scapegoat strategy. It's illegal Hispanic immigrants, gay couples seeking marital rights, cut-and-run Democrats and rampaging flag burners who have betrayed America's values, not those who bungled a war.

No sooner were the flag burners hustled offstage than a new traitor was unveiled for the Fourth: the press. Public enemy No. 1 is The New York Times, which was accused of a "disgraceful" compromise of national security (by President Bush) and treason (by Representative Peter King of New York and the Coulter amen chorus). The Times's offense was to publish a front-page article about a comprehensive American effort to track terrorists with the aid of a Belgian consortium, Swift, which serves as a clearinghouse for some 7,800 financial institutions in 200 countries.

It was a solid piece of journalism. But if you want to learn the truly dirty secrets of how our government prosecutes this war, the story of how it vilified The Times is more damning than anything in the article that caused the uproar.

The history of that scapegoating begins on the Friday morning, June 23, that The Times, The Los Angeles Times and The Wall Street Journal all published accounts of the Swift program first posted on the Web the night before. In his press briefing that morning, Tony Snow fielded many questions about the program's legality. But revealingly, for all his opportunities, he never attacked the news media.

Far from Swift-boating the Swift reportage, he offered tentative praise. "It's interesting," he said, "because I think there's a fair amount of balance in the story in that you do have concrete benefits and you do have the kind of abstract harms that were mentioned in there." He noted that there had been "no allegation of illegality" in the Times article.

This was accurate. The story was balanced, just as Mr. Snow said. And it was no cause for a national-security alarm for the simple reason that since 9/11, our government has repeatedly advertised that it is following the terrorists' money trail, a tactic enhanced by the broad new powers over financial institutions that Mr. Bush sought and received. In November 2002, he and the Treasury secretary at the time, Paul O'Neill, even held a televised event promoting their Foreign Terrorist Asset Tracking Center, established expressly, in the president's words, to "investigate the financial infrastructure of the international terrorist networks." As for Swift, Dan Froomkin of washingtonpost.com points out that it can't resist bragging on its own Web site that it "has a history of cooperating in good faith with authorities," including treasury departments and law enforcement agencies, in trying "to combat abuse of the financial system for illegal activities."

DOJ_NMG_0038139

Only a terrorist who couldn't shoot straight would assume that Swift was not part of the American effort to stalk terrorist transactions; that's tantamount to assuming that cops would track down license plate numbers without enlisting the Department of Motor Vehicles. But, unfortunately for us, terrorists are not so stupid: it's been reported as far back as 2003 (in The Washington Post) and as recently as this month (in Ron Suskind's must-read best seller, "The One Percent Doctrine") that our enemies long ago took Mr. Bush at his word and abandoned banks for couriers, money brokers, front companies and suitcases stuffed with cash and gold. Tom Brokaw summarized the consensus of terrorism experts last week when he told Chris Matthews of MSNBC: "I don't know anyone who believes that the terrorist network said, 'Oh my God, they're tracing our financial transactions? What a surprise.' Of course, they knew that they were doing that."

The real news conveyed by The Times and its competitors was not the huge program to track terrorist finances, but that per usual from the administration that gave us Gitmo, the program was conducted with little oversight from the other two branches of government. Even so, the reporting on the pros and cons of that approach was, as Mr. Snow said, balanced.

Or so he said Friday morning, June 23. By Monday, the president had entered the fray and Mr. Snow was accusing The Times of putting the "public's right to know" over "somebody's right to live." What had happened over the weekend to prompt this escalation of hysteria? The same stuff that always happens when the White House scapegoats the press (or anyone else): bad and embarrassing news that the White House wants to drown out.

One such looming embarrassment was that breathless arrest in Miami of what federal authorities billed as a "homegrown terrorist cell." This amazing feat of derring-do had all the melodramatic trappings of a carefully staged administration P.R. extravaganza. On June 22, the F.B.I. director, Robert Mueller, just happened to be on "Larry King Live" speaking about his concerns about "homegrown terrorists" when, by a remarkable coincidence, Larry King announced a "report just in" from a Miami station on a federal terrorism investigation. The next day — the same day the Swift story was published — brought the full-dress dog-and-pony show by the intrepid attorney general, Alberto Gonzales.

But rain soon started to fall on this parade. The seven men accused of plotting to take down the Sears Tower in Chicago and collaborate with Al Qaeda on a "full ground war" turned out to have neither weapons nor explosives nor links to Al Qaeda; both the F.B.I. and the Chicago police said there was no operational threat. By Saturday the administration's overhyped victory against terrorists was already deflating into a national punch line, a nostalgic remembrance of John Ashcroft orange terror alerts past.

Sunday brought another unwanted revelation (from Michael R. Gordon of The Times): Gen. George Casey Jr., the commander in Iraq, was drafting a plan for sharp troop reductions there, some of them to precede this year's election. Inconveniently enough, the Casey approach was a virtual double for the phased withdrawals advocated by Senate Democrats days earlier and incessantly slurred as "cut-and-run" defeatism by Republicans.

By the time of the Bush-Snow eruption on Monday, the Democrats were holding hearings on the Hill about prewar intelligence. It was better that Americans hear tirades about traitors in the press than be tempted to listen to the testimony of Lawrence Wilkerson, Colin Powell's former chief of staff, who described Mr. Powell's February 2003 United Nations presentation on Iraq's W.M.D. as "the perpetuation of a hoax."

It's not only the White House that has a vested political interest in concocting a smoke screen by demonizing the fourth estate as a fifth column. The Democrats were holding their hearing because Pat Roberts, the chairman of the Senate intelligence committee, has for two years been stalling his panel's promised investigation into how the administration used intelligence before the war. Hoping that we'd forget about that continuing cover-up, Mr. Roberts last week made a big show of calling for an investigation into the Swift story's supposed damage to national security.

Representative King, so eager to label others treasonous, has humiliating headlines of his own to counteract: he's the chairman of the House Homeland Security Committee who has so little clout and bureaucratic aptitude that he couldn't stop the government led by his own party from stripping New York City, in his home state, of 40 percent of its counterterrorism funding. If there's another terrorist attack, he may be the last person in New York who should accuse others, as he did The Times on the House floor on Thursday, of having blood "on their hands."

Such ravings make it hard not to think of the official assault on The Times and The Washington Post over the Pentagon Papers. In 1972, on the first anniversary of the publication of that classified Pentagon history of the Vietnam War, The Times's managing editor then, A. M. Rosenthal, reminisced in print about the hyperbolic predictions that had been made by the Nixon White House and its supporters: "Codes would be broken. Military security endangered. Foreign governments would be afraid to deal with us. There would be nothing secret left." None of that happened. What did happen was that Americans learned "how secrecy had become a way of life" for a government whose clandestine policy decisions had fomented a disaster.

DOJ_NMG_0038140

The assault on a free press during our own wartime should be recognized for what it is: another desperate ploy by officials trying to hide their own lethal mistakes in the shadows. It's the antithesis of everything we celebrate with the blazing lights of Independence Day.

Governor To Release Intelligence Reports (LAT)

By Peter Nicholas, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, July 2, 2006

Schwarzenegger acts to ease concerns about inappropriate compilation of information on antiwar and political rallies.

SACRAMENTO — Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger's office said Saturday he was ordering the release of dozens of intelligence reports prepared for the state Office of Homeland Security — a step that comes as lawmakers from both parties are denouncing a practice in which state intelligence agents compiled information about political and antiwar protests and rallies.

Schwarzenegger administration officials say there were only two cases in which state homeland security agents collected material on political protests in recent months. Releasing the full trove of intelligence reports will prove that point, assuring the public that the practice was not more widespread, according to those officials.

State lawmakers from both parties said it was inexcusable that two such intelligence reports from March and April carried details about the location and purpose of political rallies throughout California.

The two reports, obtained by The Times, were described in a news article published Saturday.

"The governor believes that any inappropriate information gathering like this is totally unacceptable," Adam Mendelsohn, Schwarzenegger's communications director, said in an interview.

The governor's homeland security director, Matthew Bettenhausen, said Saturday that the material was mistakenly included in the reports by a private contractor working for his office.

Schwarzenegger will allow the media to review the approximately 60 intelligence reports that have been prepared for the homeland security director since March, but no copies will be allowed, Mendelsohn said.

Before the reports can be reviewed in coming days, officials will remove all "law-enforcement-sensitive information" — anything covering "ongoing investigations" and related "safety threats," said Chris Bertelli, spokesman for the homeland security office.

Rep. George Miller (D-Martinez) said in an interview that there should be a "very, very high threshold" for removing anything and that the reports should not be sanitized. The congressman attended an antiwar rally in Walnut Creek in March that was listed in one of the intelligence reports, in a section called "Upcoming California Protests."

State legislators said they were pleased that the governor was releasing the material.

Yet some said they were troubled by what they viewed as a continuing pattern of aggressive intelligence gathering by his administration.

Last year, the state Senate held hearings into news accounts that a California National Guard intelligence unit had tracked a Mother's Day antiwar rally.

State Sen. Joe Dunn (D-Santa Ana), who led the hearings on the National Guard, said the homeland security episode is fresh proof of the need for greater oversight.

Dunn said he wants to create a special legislative intelligence committee that would monitor California's fast-growing homeland security apparatus. Lawmakers serving on the committee would receive a special security clearance. He said he has broached the idea with the Senate leadership.

"I am very pleased that they're willing to share all the reports," Dunn said. "However, I was assured after the one spying incident in May 2005 by the California National Guard that the practice was not more widespread at the state level.

"We now discover that those assurances were patently false. I hope the current assurances are a little more truthful than the ones of a year ago."

The homeland security office quickly arranged a news conference Saturday morning to offer some reassurances of its own.

Bettenhausen, a Schwarzenegger appointee, said there was no surveillance of any of the political demonstrations listed in the intelligence reports.

One of the rallies was staged by animal rights activists protesting the slaughter of Canadian seals. Another was a women's peace protest aimed at showing support for a Salinas woman facing charges of trespassing at Vandenberg Air Force Base. Several other protests concerned the war in Iraq.

The two reports from March and April that mentioned the political demonstrations were shared with the California Highway Patrol and the attorney general's office, but not with any other law enforcement entity, Bettenhausen said.

DOJ_NMG_0038141

These two agencies are part of a state partnership set up to combat terrorism and gather intelligence.

Bettenhausen described how the material made its way into the reports.

A state contractor retained by homeland security issued a report March 7. That document included summaries of 10 rallies set for later in the month. Listed were the date of the event, the purpose, the location, the expected number of people, the source of the information, and "officer safety issues."

When they saw that, homeland security officials told the contractor not to include such information again, Bettenhausen said.

Yet similar material was part of a report dated April 10. Again, homeland security officials saw it and told the contractor to leave out such information in the future, Bettenhausen said.

Since then, none of the reports prepared for Bettenhausen have included information on political protests, homeland security officials said.

Bettenhausen said his office "does not tolerate the gathering of inappropriate information and we never will. We will not stand for it."

The contractor used by the state homeland security agency is SRA International Inc., which is being paid up to $16 million to provide counterterrorism analysis.

At The Northern Border, No Talk Of Fences (WP)

By John Pomfret

The Washington Post, July 2, 2006

U.S. and Canada Collaborate to Enforce Law

BLAINE, Wash. -- Royal Canadian Mounted Police agents watched from a clifftop as a helicopter swooped down in a Canadian field, picked up more than 300 pounds of marijuana from a waiting truck and skimmed across the border into the United States.

Federal agents in Washington state's Okanogan County, in constant radio contact with the Mounties, were waiting when the helicopter dropped its illicit load in a wildlife area. The U.S. agents arrested two men who had scooped up the dope, and the Canadians were waiting when the chopper landed back in British Columbia, arresting the pilot and another man.

The closely coordinated investigation, announced by authorities last week, was about more than busting a drug-smuggling ring, however. U.S. and Canadian law enforcement officials said it highlighted the increasingly close and institutionalized cooperation between the two nations' police agencies. Such joint operations, called "parallel investigations" because of sensitivity about sovereignty issues, also reflect the fundamentally different strategies used to secure the United States' two very different borders since the Sept. 11, 2001, terrorist attacks.

Along the border in Texas, local police departments have claimed to see Mexican army troops protecting drug smugglers, a claim the Mexicans deny. Corruption has been common among some Mexican police. The United States has constructed walls and fences and stationed National Guard troops along the border to keep out illegal immigrants.

Along the Canadian border, there are no plans for fences, and efforts focus on smuggling and terrorism. U.S. and Canadian authorities are patrolling together on the Great Lakes and have plans to operate a joint radio network. In a real-life repeat of the 1990s TV show "Due South" that featured a well-mannered Mountie and a hard-bitten Chicago cop, American agents and their Canadian counterparts have begun to investigate cases on each other's soil.

Americans and Canadians also share law enforcement intelligence. U.S. agents aided the Canadians in their investigation into an alleged terrorist plot stymied on June 3 with the arrest of 17 men and teenagers in Ontario, law enforcement officials said.

Five years ago, only Canadians worked at the Mounted Police headquarters in Ottawa, said Joe Oliver, a Canadian police superintendent. Now, Americans representing four agencies are based there, he said, adding that cooperation is "pervasive."

Just a few years ago, cross-border law enforcement cooperation was difficult and ad hoc. "You could get punished for improper disclosure to a foreign country," said Roy Hoffman, who runs the Immigration and Customs Enforcement operation in Blaine. "You used to need a friend on the other side to work a case together with you. Now it's ingrained behavior."

The Washington drug-smuggling investigation, known as Operation Frozen Timber, began two years ago when law enforcement agencies learned that smuggling rings were using helicopters and small aircraft to move high-quality marijuana known as B.C. Bud from Canada and cocaine, firearms and bulk cash from the United States, said Leigh Winchell, special agent in charge of the Immigrations and Customs Enforcement office in Seattle. In July 2005, Playboy magazine interviewed pilots who bragged of making $125,000 a week running marijuana to the United States.

Winchell said U.S. and Canadian authorities identified suspects and infiltrated the organizations. They arranged wiretaps and pooled intelligence. Over time, agents arrested more than 40 people in the United States and six in Canada. Authorities also seized 8,000 pounds of marijuana, 800 pounds of cocaine, three aircraft and $1.5 million in U.S. currency. Three alleged smugglers were killed in two helicopter crashes in Canada.

DOJ_NMG_0038142

"The ability of organizations to move contraband back and forth across the border is a national security issue, because these are people who figured out a mechanism to penetrate the U.S. and Canadian border," Winchell said. "Those small helicopters can move 250 pounds of marijuana at a time. But what does a suitcase carrying a dirty bomb weigh? Maybe 80."

Culture, the nature of the threat and geography have brought U.S. and Canadian law enforcement together. While there are many cities that sprawl across the Mexican border, they are usually divided by walls. But in most places, the U.S.-Canadian border is delineated by nothing more than a ditch or a clear-cut through a forest.

As of the end of April, only 950 Border Patrol agents were stationed along the 4,000-mile-long northern border while 10,200 patrolled the 1,920-mile-long boundary with Mexico. At scores of checkpoints across the northern border, when it's quitting time, an orange cone is the only thing stopping incursions -- although since the Sept. 11 attacks, the United States has invested billions to establish five air and marine stations, and to install sensors, cameras and other technology to firm up the northern frontier.

Border Patrol senior agent Bob Riffle, who worked on the Mexican border for a decade before transferring to Washington state, said the two borders have different cultures and had high praise for his Canadian counterparts. "I trust those guys implicitly," he said. "In Mexico, how can you have serious cooperation on a day-to-day level with guys who might have just robbed a group of illegals? It's a different world down there."

Law enforcement officials also say the nature of the threat demands that the two sides cooperate. As of the end of May, 829,109 illegal immigrants had been apprehended crossing from Mexico this year. Canada's numbers are a tiny fraction of that amount -- 4,066.

But a significant number concern American law enforcement. The only terrorist caught entering the United States, millennium bomber Ahmed Ressam, came from Canada. Criminal gangs also traffic in Asian sex workers from Canada to the United States.

Some law enforcement officials, such as John McKay, the U.S. attorney in Seattle who prosecuted Ressam, are not satisfied with the level of cooperation. "The good news is it's improved," he said. "The bad news is it's not nearly as good as it should be."

When an FBI analysis raised the possibility in 2004 that the massive ferry system that plies Puget Sound had been scouted by potential terrorists, McKay remembers sitting in a meeting when someone asked, "Hey, has anyone called the Canadians about this?" "And everybody in the room stopped what they were doing, and blood ran cold," McKay said. "We're equally vulnerable. Why isn't there an RCMP constable sitting in the Joint Terrorism Task Force in Seattle?"

Canadian officials said a Mountie participates in the task force by invitation only.

McKay has lobbied to open up an experimental law enforcement database, called Linx, to Canadian law enforcement. "We have people who think if we shared sensitive law enforcement records with Canada, we would be giving up sovereignty, but we can't be secure unless we share information with Canada," he said.

Some in Canada have been wary of the long arm of American justice. In 2002, a Canadian citizen, Maher Arar, was changing planes in New York when U.S. authorities detained him and spirited him to Syria, where he said he was imprisoned and tortured for nearly a year. Arar's charges that Canadian authorities assisted the United States in his detention caused an uproar in Canada.

On the American side, there are worries that Canada is not being vigilant enough. A recent State Department report called Canada's recently tightened immigration policy "liberal" and claimed Canada is a safe haven for militants.

One unintended consequence of the increase in cross-border cases is a crush of suspects being handed off to local prosecutors and warehoused in local jails. More than 85 percent of the cases made by federal agents in Whatcom County, in the northwest corner of Washington state, for example, are declined by the U.S. attorney and end up as state cases. As a result, Whatcom's jail, built to house 148 inmates, now has 280. People convicted of drunken driving are given tickets and are not incarcerated because the jail is packed, and people arrested for misdemeanors who do not show up for court dates "know there are no consequences," Sheriff Bill Elfo said.

Currently, 700 people in the county have been sentenced to jail but cannot serve their sentences because, he said, "there's no room at the inn."

Al-Qaeda, Still In Business (WP)

By Peter Bergen

The Washington Post, July 2, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0038143

Over the past four years, key members of the Bush administration have claimed that al-Qaeda is "on the run" (Donald Rumsfeld and Condoleezza Rice), "disrupted" (George Tenet) or "decimated" (President Bush). At the same time, however, significant terrorist attacks around the world have dramatically increased since Sept. 11, 2001, most of them conducted by militant Islamists. How does one reconcile this apparent contradiction?

A new narrative that purports to answer that question has emerged: Yes, al-Qaeda as an organization is severely impaired, but it has been replaced by a broader ideological movement made up of self-starting, homegrown terrorists who have few formal links to al-Qaeda but are motivated by a doctrine that can be called "Binladenism." Recent examples would include the militants in Madrid who bombed commuter trains in March 2004 and killed 191 people, or the seven terrorist wannabes recently arrested in Miami in connection with an alleged plot to blow up federal buildings. They had embraced al-Qaeda's doctrine of destruction, yet had no ties to the terrorist group.

However, according to five veteran U.S. counterterrorism officials I've spoken with recently, al-Qaeda the organization remains a real threat. One longtime government terrorism analyst points to the four suicide attacks in London last July 7 that killed 52 people as evidence of the organization's resilience. "At a minimum, this was an al-Qaeda-supported operation," the analyst told me. And al-Qaeda's leaders don't seem to be feeling the heat of the "war on terror." On Thursday, Osama bin Laden released his third audiotape in three months, while his deputy, Ayman al-Zawahiri, has appeared on an unprecedented number of videotapes since the second week of June -- averaging one a week.

So while the rapid spread of al-Qaeda's ideology in the past two years -- partly fueled by the Iraq war -- should be of considerable concern, it would be quite wrong to conclude that al-Qaeda the organization is down for the count. Indeed, if the bombings in London are any indication, it may be staging a comeback.

The London attacks of one year ago have generally been portrayed as the work of four young British men of Pakistani and Jamaican descent from the north of England -- distinguished only by their utter ordinariness -- who embraced radical Islamist ideology and managed to carry out the deadliest terrorist attack on British soil in history without outside help. The Sunday Times of London even opined that "the new breed of unaffiliated terrorist is potentially far more dangerous than the IRA or even al Qaeda because he is almost impossible to identify."

But the more you delve into the London bombings, the more they look like a classic al-Qaeda plot. The British government's official account of the attacks -- issued by the Home Office two months ago -- provides a revealing picture. It explains that the presumed ringleader, Mohammed Sidique Khan, visited Pakistan in 2003 and 2004, spending several months there. On one of those trips, he aimed "to cross the border and fight in Afghanistan," the report stated. (Presumably, Khan did not plan to fight alongside U.S. troops in Afghanistan, but rather to join the Taliban or al-Qaeda to kill Americans.)

The report goes on to note that Khan "had some contact with al Qaida figures" in Pakistan, and is "believed to have had some relevant training in a remote part of Pakistan, close to the Afghan border" during his two-week visit in 2003. The British government did not specify what sort of training he received, but given that the London bombs were made of highly efficient explosives that can't be readily made from recipes on the Internet, it is probable that the training was in the manufacturing of bombs. According to the report, Khan was also in "suspicious" contact with individuals in Pakistan in the four months immediately before the London attacks. Taken together, Khan's travels and contacts in Pakistan strongly suggest an al-Qaeda role in the operation.

Khan also appeared on a videotape that aired on al-Jazeera two months after the suicide attacks -- an important fact to which the British report did not give sufficient weight. "I'm going to talk to you in a language that you understand," Khan said on the tape, speaking in the broad brogue of his native Yorkshire. "Our words are dead until we give them life with our blood." He goes on to describe bin Laden and Zawahiri as "today's heroes." Appearing on the same videotape, Zawahiri trumpeted al-Qaeda's responsibility for the London bombings. As a veteran U.S. counterterrorism official told me, "Zawahiri does not take credit for things that he hasn't done."

On the videotape, Zawahiri referenced a prior al-Qaeda threat to explain the targeting of London, saying "Didn't . . . Sheik Osama bin Laden offer you a truce?" -- a reference to the al-Qaeda leader's April 2004 proposal of a peace agreement with those European countries willing to pull out of Iraq. Britain is the most prominent member of that coalition. Bin Laden offered a three-month grace period before the truce expired in July 2004. A year later, the four bombers blew themselves up in London.

But the key piece of evidence overlooked in the British government report is that both Khan and Zawahiri's statements were made on a videotape bearing the distinctive logo of al-Sahab ("the clouds"), which is al-Qaeda's television production arm. Al-Sahab's first tape, a two-hour al-Qaeda infomercial, debuted on the Internet in the summer of 2001, signaling that a major anti-American attack was in the works. Since then, al-Sahab has continued to release key statements from al-Qaeda leaders. Khan's appearance on the videotape strongly suggests that he met up with members of al-Qaeda's media team based on the Afghan-Pakistan border, probably in the tribal area of Waziristan. There is much we still don't know about Khan's activities in Pakistan, but additional information is likely to point toward further contact with members of al-Qaeda in Pakistan.

DOJ_NMG_0038144

The rapidly deteriorating security situation in Afghanistan over the past year is also, in part, the responsibility of al-Qaeda. The use of suicide attacks and makeshift bombs and the beheadings of hostages -- all techniques that al-Qaeda perfected in Iraq -- are methods that the Taliban has increasingly adopted in Afghanistan, making much of the south of the country a no-go area.

Hekmat Karzai, an Afghan terrorism researcher at the Institute of Defense and Strategic Studies in Singapore, points out that suicide bombings were rare in Afghanistan until 2005, when 21 such attacks took place. This year has already seen at least 16. In addition, Karzai reports that two of al-Qaeda's "most able" commanders -- Khalid Habib, a Moroccan, and Abd al Hadi, an Iraqi -- have been appointed to run its operations in southeastern and southwestern Afghanistan. These developments suggest that al-Qaeda is regrouping and strengthening along the Afghan-Pakistan border.

And, of course, bin Laden and Zawahiri remain at large in that border region, issuing a stream of tapes aimed at inflaming their supporters around the world. Zawahiri, for example, released a video last week urging further attacks on U.S. and other coalition forces in Afghanistan. Meanwhile, bin Laden's ongoing influence over al-Qaeda's affiliates was confirmed after the death last month of Abu Musab al-Zarqawi, al-Qaeda's leader in Iraq. Abu Hamza al-Muhajer, al-Qaeda's new leader in Iraq, quickly released a statement on a jihadist Web site pledging allegiance to bin Laden: "We are at your disposal, ready for your command." Muhajer has longstanding ties to Zawahiri; they have both been members of Egypt's ultra-violent Jihad Group for more than two decades. A U.S. intelligence official told me that the intelligence community's recognition of bin Laden and Zawahiri's continued importance to Islamist terrorists worldwide has led to a renewed push in the past two months to locate them.

Almost five years after the attacks on Washington and New York, al-Qaeda not only remains in business in its traditional stronghold on the Afghan-Pakistan border, but continues to project its ideology and terrorism abroad. So now we face a world of ideologically driven homegrown terrorists -- free radicals unattached to any formal organization -- in addition to formal networks such as al-Qaeda that have managed to survive despite the tremendous pressure brought to bear against them since 9/11. And even more grim, they now feed off and strengthen one another.

Peter Bergen is a Schwartz senior fellow at the New America Foundation and author of "The Osama bin Laden I Know: An Oral History of al Qaeda's Leader" (Free Press).

BBC Let Intelligence Agents Vet Staff (WT)

By Chris Hastings, London Sunday Telegraph

The Washington Times, July 2, 2006

LONDON -- Confidential papers obtained by the Sunday Telegraph reveal that the British Broadcasting Corp. allowed intelligence agents to investigate the backgrounds and political affiliations of thousands of its employees, including newsreaders, reporters and continuity announcers.

The files, which shed light on the BBC's hitherto secret links with the counter-espionage service known as MI5, show that at one stage it was responsible for vetting 6,300 BBC posts -- almost a third of the total work force. The procedure was phased out in the late 1980s.

The files also show that the corporation maintained a list of "subversive organizations" and that evidence of certain kinds of political activity could be a bar to appointment or promotion.

The BBC's reliance on MI5 reached a peak in the late 1970s and early 1980s, at exactly the same time as millions of viewers were tuning into the fictional adventures of George Smiley in the popular spy dramas, "Tinker, Tailor, Soldier, Spy" and "Smiley's People."

The papers show that senior BBC figures covered up the links in the face of awkward questions from trade unions and the press. The documents refer to a "defensive strategy" based on "categorical denial." One file note, dated March 1, 1985, states: "Keep head down and stonewall all questions."

The BBC has always refused to be drawn out on the extent of its collaboration with the secret services. It was only after a request by the Sunday Telegraph under the Freedom of Information Act that it has released details of the vetting operation.

The documents do not name any of the individuals subjected to vetting, but it is possible that some of the BBC's biggest names were scrutinized.

Different posts were vetted for different reasons. Senior officials, including the director-general, and their support staff were checked because they had access to confidential government information in relation to their jobs. But thousands of employees were vetted because they were involved in live broadcasts and the BBC was worried about the possibility of on-air bias or disruption.

In 1983, 5,728 BBC jobs were subjected to this second kind of scrutiny known as "counter-subversion vetting." The system applied to dozens of job categories, including television producers, directors, sound engineers, secretaries and researchers.

DOJ_NMG_0038145

The details of freelance television and radio staff were also routinely passed on to the security services and even the posts of editor and deputy editor of Radio 4's Woman's Hour were subject to background checks by MI5. In many cases, the spouses of applicants were subjected to scrutiny.

The BBC tried on several occasions to be more open about the system, but was blocked by security services. A memo, dated March 7, 1985, states: "Secrecy of the complete vetting operation is imposed upon us by the Security Service -- it is not of our making."

WAR NEWS:

Baghdad Market Bombing Kills 66 (WP)

By Ellen Knickmeyer

The Washington Post, July 2, 2006

Attack Is Largest Under New Regime

BAGHDAD, July 1 -- A truck bomb killed at least 66 people and injured more than 100 on a market street in the Shiite Muslim heart of Baghdad on Saturday, the deadliest such attack since Iraq's national-unity government took office in May.

Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki's government, which is attempting to end sectarian bloodshed through force and conciliation, had escaped the high-fatality bombings that were a fixture under the previous government. But Saturday's massive bomb, powerful enough to hurl bodies of shoppers onto the roofs of high-rise buildings surrounding the market in Baghdad's Sadr City district, drew angry denunciations from survivors, suggesting Iraqis could quickly sour on Maliki's initiatives if insurgent attacks once again begin claiming dozens of lives at a time.

The U.S. military, meanwhile, disclosed new details about allegations that soldiers raped a woman and killed her, along with her mother, father and a sibling, in March in a village south of Baghdad. A U.S. military official revealed Saturday that the target of the alleged attack was a 20-year-old Iraqi woman who lived with her family near an American military checkpoint.

One resident of the village of Mahmudiyah al-Kasr al-Awsat said Saturday that the young woman had complained of harassment by U.S. soldiers each time she passed through the American checkpoint. The resident, Omar Janabi, said in an interview that the woman's family had taken the precaution of sending her to spend nights with a neighboring family. But the soldiers attacked the family's house during the daytime, when everyone was at home, said Janabi and another man from the village who was interviewed separately.

The military announced Friday that authorities were investigating allegations of a rape and subsequent killings by soldiers of the 502nd Infantry Regiment, part of the 4th Infantry Division, near the city of Mahmudiyah. Maj. Gen. James D. Thurman, commander of the 4th Infantry, had ordered an investigation into the killings more than a week ago, the military said in a statement.

The U.S. military official, who spoke on condition of anonymity, said Saturday that an initial investigation indicated that the rape and killings had occurred March 12. Officials had said Friday that they learned of the allegations only late last month, after insurgents captured, tortured and killed two soldiers in that regiment.

The military has provided few details about the case, the latest in a series of probes that began with the U.S. disclosure in March that it was investigating alleged killings of 24 civilians by Marines in the far western town of Haditha.

On Saturday, Janabi, one of the neighbors asserting knowledge of the Mahmudiyah killings, said the victims were Kassim Hamza Rasheed Janabi, 36, a guard at a government-owned food warehouse; Fakhriya Taha Muhasen, 44, his wife; and their two daughters, 7-year-old Hadeel and 15-year-old Abeer.

Omar Janabi said that on March 11, with American and Iraqi forces in the area, U.S. troops raided Kassim Janabi's home. Although members of the same, large tribe, the two men are not directly related.

Entering the home after the raid, Omar Janabi said, he found the husband, wife and 7-year-old girl in one room. All had been shot dead, he said.

The 15-year-old girl lay in another room, with her dress pushed up around her neck, Omar Janabi said. A fire had been set in the room, burning a pillow and the girl's hair, he said.

Janabi and another neighbor, interviewed separately, said that the family lived a few hundred yards from an American checkpoint and that Kassim Janabi's two young sons had been out of the house and escaped the attack.

It was impossible to independently confirm the accounts given by the two men. Although some of the details, such as the home's location, coincided with those given by the U.S. military official, it was also impossible to immediately reconcile differences, such as whether the alleged rape victim was 15 or 20.

Omar Janabi said relatives have given permission for U.S. investigators to exhume the young woman's body.

DOJ_NMG_0038146

Janabi spoke to a Washington Post special correspondent at the home of tribal leaders in Mahmudiyah. The other neighbor had left Mahmudiyah, fearing retaliation, and talked separately to another Washington Post special correspondent but refused to be identified.

U.S. soldiers initially told residents that the four dead Iraqis were victims of Sunni Arab insurgents -- which puzzled neighbors, who knew the family was Sunni, Janabi said. The other neighbor said he was first told the family had been killed by a Shiite militia.

In Sadr City, home to more than 2 million Shiites and scene of Saturday's bombing, angry survivors made clear how quickly a resurgence of bomb attacks -- typically blamed on Sunni insurgent groups -- could undermine government efforts to overcome sectarian divisions.

"They called for unity?" demanded a man who identified himself as Abu Hassan al-Thahabi, his hands and feet blackened with soot and grease from pulling the dead and injured out of the wreckage of the bombing. "This proves to the Shiites that there is no unity."

Saturday's bombing was also the deadliest since a U.S. airstrike killed the most prominent leader of the Sunni insurgency, Abu Musab al-Zarqawi, on June 7. U.S. military officers and academics alike had predicted at least a brief surge in attacks immediately after Zarqawi's killing, saying militant Sunni groups would want to show they had survived his loss.

Even before Zarqawi's killing, however, massive bombings like Saturday's had become less and less frequent. The gradual decrease was attributed to several factors, including better defenses against bombings and the intense, often deadly pressure that Shiite-led governments have placed on the Sunni minority, leaving some insurgent groups more willing to at least try political solutions.

At the same time, however, the frequency of smaller multiple-fatality bombings reached its highest point of the war, according to the Brookings Institute. And sectarian killings -- blamed largely on Shiite militias with ties to the government -- have left an average of more than 1,000 victims at Baghdad's main morgue each month since February.

The surge in sectarian killings brought greater U.S. military pressure on Shiite religious militias, notably the Mahdi Army loyal to Shiite cleric Moqtada al-Sadr. In Sadr City, fear of questioning or detention by U.S. troops has led the Mahdi Army's gunmen to switch from their trademark black uniforms to civilian clothes and to handle their AK-47 assault rifles, pistols and rocket-propelled grenades more discreetly.

Thahabi, an official in Sadr's movement, complained that the militia's usual checkpoints would have stopped Saturday's truck bomb but that militia members had abandoned them that morning when they saw U.S. troops in the area.

Sadr officials said the bomb -- a mix of explosives and artillery shells, with ball bearings nearly the size of marbles and scrap metal added for shrapnel -- was hidden in a truck under a load of fruit. The truck, with a suicide driver at the wheel, blew up on a street crowded on both sides with shops and market stalls, leaving a crater the size of a wading pool in the pavement.

Car Bomb Kills 66 At Iraqi Bazaar (WT/AP)

By Robert H. Reid, Associated Press

The Washington Times, July 2, 2006

BAGHDAD -- A huge car bomb exploded yesterday at a bustling outdoor market in a Shi'ite district of Baghdad, killing at least 66 persons and injuring about 100 in the deadliest attack since the national unity government took office six weeks ago.

Shortly before the midmorning blast, gunmen seized a female Sunni legislator at a checkpoint in a Shi'ite area of the capital. The attacks represented a major challenge to Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki's vow to curb sectarian violence.

In an audio recording posted on the Internet, al Qaeda leader Osama bin Laden endorsed the successor to Abu Musab Zarqawi, the slain leader of his network in Iraq and warned the country's Shi'ites against collaborating with the Americans in the fight against Sunni insurgents.

The comments appeared designed to sharpen the conflict between Shi'ites and Sunnis. Bin Laden also warned other countries against intervening in Somalia, where an extreme Islamist has been named head of the most powerful political group.

The market bombing seemed timed to cause a maximum number of casualties among civilians doing their weekend shopping. It blew some victims onto the roofs of nearby two-story buildings and sent gray smoke billowing over Sadr City, stronghold of radical cleric Muqtada al-Sadr.

Emergency crews bundled the wounded into ambulances and private cars and rushed them to hospitals. Iraqi state television reported last night that 66 persons had died and about 100 were wounded, making it the deadliest bombing since an April 7 suicide attack that killed 87 persons at a Shi'ite mosque in Baghdad.

A statement posted on the Internet claimed responsibility in the name of the "Sunna Supporters Group." The statement, whose authenticity could not be verified, accused Shi'ites of killing Sunnis and raping Sunni women in detention.

DOJ_NMG_0038147

"Your mujahedeen brothers decided to teach the Shi'ites a lesson that they will not forget as long as they live," the statement said.

A few miles from the blast, gunmen seized lawmaker Tayseer al-Mashhadani and seven of her bodyguards at a checkpoint in a Shi'ite area of eastern Baghdad. Officials said she was traveling to Baghdad from her home in nearby Diyala province, a hotbed of sectarian violence, to attend a parliament session today. One of her bodyguards escaped, officials said.

Mrs. al-Mashhadani's colleagues in the Iraqi Islamic Party, the largest Sunni political organization, blamed the ministers of interior and defense for failing to restore security in the capital. A party statement said some of the kidnappers carried government-issue weapons.

The U.S. Embassy condemned the kidnapping as an attempt to stoke sectarian tension and demanded her immediate release.

The violence occurred as Mr. al-Maliki, a Shi'ite, left for a tour of Persian Gulf countries to brief leaders on his plans for national reconciliation, including amnesty for Sunni Arab insurgents and efforts to heal the Shi'ite-Sunni rift.

In his Internet statement, bin Laden endorsed Abu Hamza Muhajer, identified by the terrorist network as Zarqawi's successor, and urged him to step up "the struggle" in Iraq. The U.S. military thinks Muhajer is Abu Ayyub Masri, a wanted terrorist.

Bin Laden also warned Iraqi Shi'ites that they "cannot just take part with America and its allies" in the war against Sunni militants "and expect that their areas will be safe from a reaction and harm."

Addressing Somalia, which was largely seized in June by a militia affiliated with the country's Islamic courts, he urged its people to support the militants and said they were building an Islamic state in the Horn of Africa.

Bin Laden lashed out at the president of Somalia's secular interim government, calling Abdullahi Yusuf a "traitor" and a "renegade." He also warned other Islamic countries against sending troops there, saying, "We pledge that we will fight your soldiers on the land of Somalia, and we will fight you on your own land if you dispatch troops to Somalia."

Car Bomb Kills More Than 60 In Iraq Market (NYT)

By Edward Wong

The New York Times, July 2, 2006

BAGHDAD, Iraq, July 1 — A powerful suicide car bomb ripped through a bustling street market in a Shiite slum here on Saturday, killing at least 62 people and wounding nearly 120 in the deadliest insurgent assault since the new Shiite-led government was installed in May, police officials and witnesses said.

The blast took place as a Sunni Arab member of the new Parliament and eight of her bodyguards were abducted by militiamen while driving into Baghdad, the police said. Together, the bomb attack and kidnapping posed the most direct challenge yet to the fledgling Iraqi government, which has deployed tens of thousands of police officers and troops into the streets in recent weeks to try to secure the capital.

New details emerged Saturday about an American military investigation into soldiers from the Fourth Infantry Division who are accused of raping an Iraqi woman in her home and killing her and three family members, including a child.

Investigators are looking into whether the soldiers monitored the family for a week before carrying out the assault, a military official in Iraq said. The soldiers are also accused of dousing the woman's body with a flammable liquid and setting it on fire to cover up evidence of their crime. A villager said the soldiers then burned down the family's home.

The explosion on Saturday morning, in the sprawling Sadr City district, ignited dozens of cars around the marketplace and sent a thick column of smoke above the skyline of eastern Baghdad, framing minarets in the foreground.

Ambulances raced through streets littered with smashed apple crates and wrecked stalls to carry wailing victims to nearby hospitals. As firefighters struggled to hose down the flames, Shiite militiamen tried to coax angry mobs of onlookers to leave, fearing that another bomb would go off. A tarpaulin covered the body of a donkey in a pool of blood. Children threw rocks at American and Iraqi soldiers who drove up in Humvees. One American soldier pointed an assault rifle with a grenade launcher at the children to scare them off. Men and boys screamed slurs about the Americans and the new Iraqi government.

"Look at this chaos, look at this mess," said a militia leader who gave his name as Yahir Abu Ali, black prayer beads in one hand and a cigarette in the other. "You see these poor people? They've lost their means of living because of this."

Karim Nasser, a fruit merchant sweating in a beige robe, waved wildly at the twisted metal debris of his stall. "A truck filled with apples was trying to cross over the median when it exploded," he said. "I lost my stall; it was the only source of income for my family."

Some police reports suggested that the bomber had been driving a minivan. The bombing was the deadliest in Iraq since early April, when three bombers blew themselves up in a prominent Shiite mosque here, killing scores of worshipers. The attack was likely to provoke more sectarian bloodshed, because Sadr City is the home base of the Mahdi Army militia, whose thousands of members rose up against the Americans twice in 2004 at the urging of the cleric Moktada al-Sadr, and often clash with Sunni Arab fighters.

DOJ_NMG_0038148

Mahdi militiamen rampaged through eastern Baghdad and other areas of Iraq after the February bombing of a Shiite shrine, leaving hundreds dead.

A Sadr official, Abdul Zahira al-Suweidi, said in a telephone interview that the American occupiers were ultimately to blame for the explosion rather than militant Sunnis. "Yesterday, we asked the government for a timetable for the withdrawal of the occupation forces," he said. "As long as they stay, terrorist activities will increase."

The bombing occurred shortly after Tayseer Najah al-Mashhadani, a new member of Parliament, and eight of her guards were kidnapped while driving into Baghdad from her home north of the capital.

An official from Ms. Mashhadani's party, Hamdi Hassoun, citing a bodyguard who escaped, said militiamen operating a checkpoint in eastern Baghdad had pulled everyone from the cars at gunpoint and dragged them away. "They aimed their guns at the heads of the bodyguards and confiscated their guns and cellphones," Mr. Hassoun said.

Ms. Mashhadani belongs to the Iraqi Islamic Party, a conservative Sunni Arab group that has often criticized the Shiite-led security forces and the American presence. The party's leader, Tarik al-Hashemi, is one of Iraq's two vice presidents.

The abduction and marketplace attack occurred as the new prime minister, Nuri Kamal al-Maliki, arrived in Jidda, Saudi Arabia, the first stop on a tour of three Arab countries where he planned to promote his limited "reconciliation plan."

Since taking charge in May, Mr. Maliki's government has had to grapple with rising sectarian violence, as well as electricity and water shortages during 120-degree days.

Military investigators continued to sift through evidence linked to the rape and murder accusations surrounding soldiers from the 502nd Infantry Regiment, attached to the Fourth Infantry Division.

The investigation into the possible rape of a woman and the killings of her and her family are centered on events of March 12 near the insurgent stronghold of Mahmudiya, about 20 miles south of Baghdad. A military official in Iraq said four soldiers were implicated, not five as some reports had suggested. But he acknowledged that early details were often muddled.

All four of those under scrutiny are enlisted men. A Defense Department official said one of the soldiers had been dismissed and was back in the United States.

Initial reports show the soldiers had noticed the woman on earlier patrols, the official said. Of the four victims, one was a girl, the military official added.

An Iraqi man who lived near the family said the assault took place at night in a village called Sayidat Abdullah, part of a farming region outside of Mahmudiya.

Before the soldiers came, there was a rumor in the village that the family, particularly the father, who was a farmer, was wanted by the Americans, said the villager, Muhammad Khamis, in a telephone interview. The soldiers burned down the house before leaving, he said.

"They were a very good family, a very nice family," Mr. Khamis said. "I don't know where the Americans got this idea."

In the Muslim world, sexual assault of women, especially by foreigners, is considered one of the most heinous of crimes. Sunni Arabs infuriated by the American presence have often speculated that American troops are raping Iraqi women in prisons like Abu Ghraib.

In other violence on Saturday, at least five Iraqi Army soldiers were killed in an ambush on a checkpoint south of Kirkuk, police officials said. Three soldiers were captured in the attack. Their bodies turned up later, along with a fourth body; all showed signs of torture.

A bomb exploded near a police patrol transporting prisoners in Kirkuk, killing one prisoner. In southern Baghdad, the police found six bodies dumped in a construction site.

The American military said a soldier assigned to the 43rd Military Police Brigade died Saturday of noncombat injuries.

Iraq PM Wins Saudi Backing For Peace Efforts (AFP-Y2)

AFP, July 2, 2006

Iraqi Prime Minister Nuri al-Maliki won Saudi Arabia's backing for his efforts to halt the bloodshed in Iraq at the start of a Gulf tour to rally support for his peace plan.

"On behalf of ... King Abdullah, I assure you of ... (Saudi Arabia's) full support for you and your constitutional government," Crown Prince Sultan bin Abdul Aziz told Maliki, according to the official SPA news agency.

Prince Sultan, who chaired a formal session of talks with Maliki late Saturday, said Saudi Arabia hoped his government would usher in "stability and security" in Iraq and put an end to the hardships of the Iraqi people.

At least 66 Iraqis were killed in a devastating car bombing against a market in a Shiite district of Baghdad on Saturday, the latest sectarian violence to rock the war-weary country.

DOJ_NMG_0038149

Maliki, who arrived in the Red Sea city of Jeddah Saturday, had earlier met with King Abdullah, who stressed Saudi Arabia's "keenness on (the preservation of) Iraq's unity and territorial integrity," SPA said.

The news agency said the discussions during the session of talks with the Saudi crown prince focused on "efforts to restore security and stability in Iraq, chiefly the national reconciliation plan" unveiled by Maliki last Sunday. "We will revert to being sons of one country in the full sense of the word," Maliki said, referring to efforts to end violence between Sunnis and Shiites.

"We have come carrying the pains and hopes of Iraq, and to thank you for the kingdom's stands in support of the unity of Iraq's people and lands," he was quoted by SPA as saying.

Iraqi Minister of State for National Dialogue Akram al-Hakim earlier said that Maliki's tour, his first trip abroad since taking over as premier in May, would also take him to the United Arab Emirates and Kuwait to discuss with Arab leaders his national reconciliation plan.

Maliki announced the plan in a bid to stem the violence that has ravaged Iraq. But the blueprint has already been rejected by a number of Sunni Arab leaders and rebel groups.

The Shiite prime minister apparently wants to enlist help during his tour to influence the former elite community of Sunni Arabs in Iraq as many of its leaders have close ties with the oil-rich Gulf Arab states.

Maliki has said the amnesty offered in the plan would only cover detainees held in US and Iraqi prisons who have committed no violent crimes and stressed there would be no pardon for those who killed foreign troops, journalists or innocent Iraqis.

More than 2,500 detainees have been freed this month from US and Iraqi prisons as part of the plan.

Top Saudi officials were on hand for the talks with Maliki, who was accompanied by a high-level delegation. Among those attending were the oil ministers of Saudi Arabia and Iraq, which sit on the world's largest and second largest oil reserves, respectively.

US ambassador to Iraq Zalmay Khalilzad visited Jeddah on Tuesday and met with King Abdullah and other Saudi leaders.

Saudi Arabia, which shares a long border with Iraq, has expressed increasing concern in recent months about the bloodshed in its northern neighbor.

The kingdom is also concerned about the threat to its security that would be posed by the return home of Saudis who had crossed the border to join the anti-US insurgency in Iraq.

Iraqi, U.S. Authorities Free 495 Prisoners (AP-Y2)

AP2, July 2, 2006

Iraqi and U.S. authorities freed 495 prisoners from U.S. facilities on Saturday, completing a mass release announced by the prime minister last month as part of his national reconciliation efforts.

U.S. Ambassador Zalmay Khalilzad welcomed the move and said more prisoners could be freed.

"We are prepared in consultation with the Iraqi leaders to make future prisoner releases and to take other concrete steps to facilitate reconciliation," he said in a statement. "As the government moves forward with these steps, it can count on support from the U.S. government."

Al-Maliki had promised to release 2,500 inmates by the end of June.

The Justice Ministry said Saturday's releases fulfilled that promise but stressed officials would continue to study the cases of individual inmates and release them as merited.

The U.S. military has not provided a sectarian breakdown of those being released, but most were believed to be Sunnis, the minority that was dominant under ousted leader Saddam Hussein but lost power when he was ousted. Sunnis frequently complain of random detentions and maltreatment at the hands of the Shiite-led government and the prisoner releases are seen as a key step toward soothing that anger and dampening the Sunni-led insurgency.

Khalilzad also noted that al-Maliki was traveling to Saudi Arabia, the United Arab Emirates and Kuwait this weekend to drum up support for his reconciliation efforts.

"The new government is reaching out not only to all Iraqis but also to its neighbors," the ambassador said. "We expect these visits to be successful, as the countries that Mr. Maliki is visiting understand what happens in Iraq will affect the stability of the area and shape the future of the region."

Khalilzad urged insurgents to respond to al-Maliki's overture by laying down their arms and joining in the reconstruction of Iraq.

US Envoy Promises More Iraq Releases As 495 Detainees Freed (AFP-Y2)

AFP, July 2, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0038150

US ambassador Zalmay Khalilzad promised that more detainees would be freed from US and government-run prisons in Iraq as a seventh batch of nearly 500 was released.

A justice ministry spokesman told AFP that 495 security detainees held without charge were freed Saturday as part of Prime Minister Nuri al-Maliki's national reconciliation plan.

Khalilzad said the latest batch completed the "release of nearly 3,000 detainees from coalition custody over the past several weeks."

"As the reconciliation project proposed by Prime Minister Maliki moves forward, we are prepared in consultation with the Iraqi leaders to make future prisoner releases and to take other concrete steps to facilitate reconciliation."

Again calling on Sunni Arab insurgents to lay down their arms, Khalilzad also called on the government to bring "all militias and other illegal armed groups under control and to strengthen Iraq's security institutions."

Militias close to Shiite parties in the government have been accused of carrying out reprisal attacks against Sunni Arab civilians amid escalating communal unrest.

"We call on the leaders of Iraq's various communities to begin to take responsibility for bringing sectarian violence to an end. As the government moves forward with these steps, it can count on support from the US government," Khalilzad said.

He said disagreements over the reconciliation plan must be "expressed through dialogue rather than through violence."

The security detainees released over the past month had been held on suspicion of involvement in the insurgency but were not suspected of carrying out bombings, killings or abductions.

An amnesty for detainees not suspected of serious crimes was a key element of a 24-point national reconciliation programme which Maliki unveiled to parliament last week.

About 14,000 detainees continue to be held in US or Iraqi government-run prisons.

Muslim Group Condemns Reports Of U.S. Rape (AP)

Associated Press, July 2, 2006

BAGHDAD, Iraq (AP) -- An influential Sunni Muslim organization Sunday strongly condemned reports that U.S. troops raped an Iraqi women then killed her and her family, saying it shows "the truth of the ugly American face."

The Association of Muslim Scholars said that what U.S. troops have done by "raping this girl then mutilating her is shameful and will remain as a sign of shame to American invaders."

U.S. investigators believe that American soldiers spent nearly a week plotting an attack in which they raped the Sunni Muslim woman, then killed her and her family in a religiously mixed area about 20 miles south of Baghdad.

The Americans entered the home, separated three family members from the woman, then raped her and set fire to her body, a U.S. military official said Saturday on condition of anonymity because the investigation is ongoing.

The three others, apparently including a child, were also slain, another official said.

The association said in its statement that it "condemns this ugly crime and declares to the whole world that this mean behavior and terrible violations committed by the invaders show the truth of the ugly American face and also shows that their claims of calling for humanity and liberation are not true."

"We put the world and all humanitarian organizations as witnesses to this ugly crime and call them to face the American recklessness that went way too far," said the association, a strong critic of American presence in Iraq.

Bin Laden Tape Urges Insurgents To Forgo Talks (WP)

By Karen Deyoung

The Washington Post, July 2, 2006

Osama bin Laden, in his second recorded message in 48 hours, warned Iraqi insurgents yesterday not to participate in negotiations with the elected government in Baghdad and urged Muslims in Somalia to violently oppose any challenge to Islamists who have seized power in that country.

"There will be no bargaining with the crusaders and the apostates" in Iraq, bin Laden said in a clear reference to efforts by Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki to draw insurgent groups into negotiations and amnesty agreements with his government. "There will be no half-solutions." Maliki and his appointed predecessors since the 2003 U.S. invasion of Iraq would be punished as soon as American military forces are defeated, he said.

Bin Laden's message, like one released Thursday night, was contained in an audio recording posted on a jihadist Web site. The fifth such message this year, its mention of events occurring over the past week in Iraq and Somalia indicated an ever-faster turnaround time.

The al-Qaeda leader has not appeared in publicly released photographs or videos since 2004. A U.S. counterterrorism official, who said there was "no reason to doubt" the authenticity of yesterday's recording, speculated that security concerns had prevented bin Laden from participating in the more time-consuming and labor-intensive production of a video. Bin Laden is believed to be in the mountainous, ungoverned border area between Pakistan and Afghanistan.

DOJ_NMG_0038151

Al-Qaeda's media products have grown in sophistication since the poorly lighted, grainy videos that characterized its propaganda efforts several years ago. Deputy Ayman al-Zawahiri's eulogy to al-Qaeda's Iraq leader Abu Musab al-Zarqawi released a week ago was a slickly produced video. Zawahiri was seated in front of a full-size, framed picture of Zarqawi taken from Zarqawi's own video released before his death in a U.S. air raid in Iraq last month.

Yesterday's bin Laden message was addressed to the "nation of Islam in general, and our people and brothers the mujaheddin in Iraq and Somalia in particular." According to a translation of the 17-minute tape provided by the Washington-based SITE Institute, which monitors jihadist Internet sites, it had three parts.

Bin Laden hailed the selection of Abu Hamza al-Muhajer as Zarqawi's successor. He advised Muhajer, which the U.S. military has said is a pseudonym for Egyptian Abu Ayyub al-Masri, to continue unifying Sunni insurgent groups and to "concentrate his fighting on the Americans, as well as their allies and supporters."

The tape opened with a warning to residents of the predominantly Shiite south, saying they could not join the Iraqi armed forces fighting insurgents in Sunni cities such as Fallujah and Ramadi in central and western Iraq, "while at the same time hoping that their areas will be safe from reaction and harm."

He called on all Muslims to help the insurgency "with money and men," and labeled efforts to stabilize Iraq through talks with the government "nothing more than deceit."

U.S. counterterrorism officials interpreted a lengthy passage on Somalia as reflecting bin Laden's concern that the dispersion of the al-Qaeda network by the U.S. terrorism fight has diminished his claimed leadership of a worldwide movement. But at the very least, bin Laden demonstrated a close and current knowledge of events in the Horn of Africa.

He called Abdullahi Yusuf, who heads the largely powerless, U.S.-backed Somali transition government in Baidoa, an "agent" of foreign apostates, and he condemned Yusuf's recent call for support from neighboring Ethiopia. About 100 Ethiopian troops in military vehicles were seen yesterday crossing the border into Somalia, the Associated Press reported.

Among several international efforts to stabilize Somalia, the African Union and the Arab League said last week that they would send a team of experts to assess the situation. Yemeni President Ali Abdullah Saleh has also called for talks among regional governments. Bin Laden yesterday warned "every Muslim in Somalia" to reject such efforts, calling Saleh in particular "an obedient American agent."

The Bush administration funded secular warlords who were defeated in early June trying to get control of the Somali capital, Mogadishu, by militias allied to the Council of Islamic Courts. Warning the council not to shelter al-Qaeda fugitives it believes are in Somalia, the administration has called on the Islamists to negotiate with the Yusuf government. Last week, Jendayi E. Frazer, U.S. assistant secretary of state for African affairs, said the administration had warned Saudi Arabia and Yemen to end financial and weapons support for council forces.

Bin Laden called on Islamic forces to attack the Yusuf government "quickly and make sure he doesn't flee." Regarding intervention by "international forces," he instructed, "prepare what is needed, especially the mines for the tanks and the [rocket-propelled grenades] for the armored vehicles."

He recalled the 1994 withdrawal of U.S. military forces from Somalia after a warlord attack killed 18 Special Forces troops. "This time," he said, "victory will be far easier."

Suddenly, Sand Bags And Potshots At Post 1 (NYT)

By Dexter Filkins

The New York Times, July 2, 2006

RAMADI, Iraq, July 1 — It is a lonely night on the rooftop of the government center in this rubble-strewn town, and Lance Cpl. Joseph Hamlin is talking about his life.

"I'm 19; I'll be 20 in September," he says, his face shrouded in the darkness. "I'm from western Georgia, on the Alabama line. LaGrange. They say it's the biggest little city in Georgia. It means 'the farm' in French. Lafayette was there."

Corporal Hamlin is at Post 1, overlooking downtown Ramadi from the northwest corner of the government center. His post is a concrete-block hut covered in sand bags. It has just enough room for two people.

"This is my first time ever," he says. "I joined in May '05. Right after I graduated high school. Graduated high school on Friday, showed up for boot camp on Monday. Didn't take any time off."

He laughs. The streets below are mostly invisible in the darkness. Even at 11 p.m., the temperature here hovers at well over 100 degrees. Every few minutes or so, Corporal Hamlin picks up his night-vision scope and peers down the alley that juts out directly north from his post.

A volley of shots ring out, but they are too far away to cause worry.

DOJ_NMG_0038152

"Over yonder there," he says, pointing with a slow roll of his hand.

"Jeff Foxworthy, he bought some land in LaGrange," Corporal Hamlin says. "You know him, they call him a country comedian. 'You must be a redneck,' stuff like that. He bought some land down there to hunt on. It's good hunting."

He peers into the scope of his rifle.

"I'm a decent shot. Pretty good," he says. "Not like the snipers."

Another shot echoes in the distance. "What do I hunt? Whatever is in season: deer, squirrel, turkey, dove. I love to hunt. If could have a job where money didn't matter, I'd be a hunter."

Corporal Hamlin has laid out four weapons: an M-240 belt-fed machine gun, an M-16 rifle, an M-79 grenade launcher and a rifle called a Sam-R that he especially likes.

"It's like my .308 Remington — it's got a free-floating barrel, too," he says. "That's my favorite."

"I joined the Marines. I'm hoping to go to college. When I'm in, I'll do what I can for my country. Do something to help this country."

Cradling the Sam-R, he looks into the blackness. "Here it's more difficult," he says. "It's not like all you have to do is be quiet and still and just shoot whatever comes by. Like a duck blind. These guys will play. A turkey don't play. A turkey don't shoot back. He just turns around and runs. They shoot back."

The night wears on. Because of the lack of electricity here, most of Ramadi is dark. What light there is comes from the stars, which are arrayed in their particular way from horizon to horizon.

"I wish they had some police out here," he says. "You know, the gangs. We have gangs in places like New York City. They wouldn't stand a chance here. They would have their heads cut off. These are the real gangs here."

"People say this is the worst place in the world. But it isn't bad. They need to fight for themselves," he says of the Iraqis. "Everybody has a civil war. We had ours. We got stronger. Maybe they need to have theirs and get it over with."

Midnight nears. Corporal Hamlin turns back to his favorite subject. "Oh yeah, they got pigs down there. They like to play. You shoot one of them with a .357 right in the head and they keep running. My dad got gored by one of them once. That's some cool hunting.

"I want to kill some bear. I want to go with a bow. A long bow. Not even a compound bow," he says. "You know the difference? A compound bow has the pulleys. Long bow is just the bow. I want to go with a long bow. Kill a big-ass bear."

"My dad lived in China," Corporal Hamlin says. "He ran the Duracell plant there. I lived there. I learned martial arts. Aikido, which is Japanese. Tae kwon do, which is Korean. I'm a second-degree black belt."

"If I had a choice between this, martial arts and hunting, I'd take hunting easy. No alcohol, womens or anything like that, like some guys."

Three nights before, the government center came under attack by about 20 guerrillas. The firefight lasted two hours. The marines fired hundreds of rounds of ammunition, dropped bombs and artillery. Corporal Hamlin was asleep in his bunk, but he has seen his share of fighting.

"I shot a couple of guys," he says. "When you're young, seeing movies and everything, you're brought up to think killing is wrong. That's what people do in gangs. Weird. You just shoot. They attack you. Either you are going to shoot and go back to your family or they are going to kill you and keep on killing everyone else. I don't really know what to think of it."

"If I shoot, I get to go back to my family, my girl," he says.

He scans the streets through his rifle scope. "I'm a Christian. East Vernon Baptist Church."

Corporal Hamlin is silent for a time. "I asked other people before what it was like to kill somebody. I wasn't sure I could kill somebody. I didn't know what it would be like. Now, I don't know if I feel that much."

The talk turns to love.

"I did have a girlfriend until two days ago. We were together for five years." It happened in a telephone conversation, he says.

"She doesn't handle my being gone. She says it's hard. I think whatever I'm going through here is harder. Whatever problems she's having at the house, she doesn't have R.P.G.'s being shot at her."

The telephone conversation with his girlfriend, Corporal Hamlin says, has left him feeling a little down. The couple had planned to marry, he says. "Yes, I was wanting to. We were going to get an apartment."

He considers the possibility that she has another boyfriend back in LaGrange. "Absolutely. She probably does. She might be lying. She told me she did."

"She is a full-blooded Indian. Mohawk. I'm just a pale-skinned white boy."

"I'll get with her when I get back, talk to her," he says. "See if I can work things out. It'll be O.K."

Another young voice enters from outside Post 1. It is Corporal Hamlin's relief. He's been six hours on post. It's midnight, time for bed.

DOJ_NMG_0038153

"Good talking to you," he says.

The corporal picks up his rifle and walks downstairs.

Army Probing Soldier's Death (WT/AP)

By Tini Tran, Associated Press

The Washington Times, July 2, 2006

The U.S. military said yesterday it was investigating whether the Gaithersburg soldier who was recently killed in eastern Afghanistan died because of "friendly fire."

The Defense Department said Army Pfc. Justin R. Davis, 19, died June 25 in eastern Kunar province when he came in contact with indirect fire -- a term used for mortar shelling -- while on patrol during combat operations.

"The circumstances of the soldier's death are under investigation as a possible friendly-fire incident," according to a statement from the department.

In Afghanistan, the U.S.-led coalition released a statement saying an investigation into the incident is under way.

"We are looking into Pfc. Davis' death to determine what happened. No final determination has been made and we will not release any information relating to the investigation until it is complete," the statement said.

Pfc. Davis had been assigned to the 1st Battalion, 32nd Infantry Regiment, 3rd Brigade Combat Team, 10th Mountain Division based in Fort Drum, N.Y.

His mother, Paula Davis, told the Frederick News-Post that her son was "passionate about joining the service.

"He would always say, 'This is my dream. I am going to follow it,' " Mrs. Davis said. "He died doing what he loved."

Pfc. Davis had been in Afghanistan since March and had plans to come home for several weeks in August.

"It was a calling," his mother said. "It was a life that fit him."

Pfc. Davis' body arrived Tuesday at Dover Air Force Base in Delaware, Mrs. Davis said. He will be buried July 10 in Arlington National Cemetery with full military honors.

Coalition troops have been operating in eastern Afghanistan to battle insurgents active along the Pakistan border.

According to U.S. Army data earlier this year, 17 soldiers in the past four years have died from friendly fire, which means from non-enemy weapons. Ten died in Iraq and seven in Afghanistan. The deaths occurred in 11 separate incidents.

The most well-known case was the 2004 death of former NFL player Pat Tillman, an Army Ranger and corporal, who died during a gunbattle near the Pakistan-Afghanistan border. That case triggered a criminal investigation that is still pending.

2 British Soldiers Killed In Afghan Attack (NSDY/AP)

By Tini Tran, Associated Press Writer

Long Island Newsday, July 2, 2006

KABUL, Afghanistan -- A coalition base came under attack by suspected Taliban fighters in southern Afghanistan, leaving two British soldiers and an interpreter dead, officials said Sunday.

The incident occurred Saturday night in Sangin district in southern Helmand province, said military spokesman Capt. Drew Gibson.

Four coalition soldiers were wounded in the attack, but their nationalities were not immediately known. They were listed in stable condition at a hospital, a coalition statement said.

The deaths come amid a massive anti-Taliban campaign in southern Afghanistan involving more than 10,000 Afghan and coalition soldiers. It is the largest military offensive since the former regime's ouster in late 2001.

Last week, two other British soldiers were killed in an attack in Sangin district. On Saturday night, 11 militants were killed by Afghan forces in the district after they came under attack, said Helmand provincial police chief Ghulan Nabi Malakhail. No Afghan soldiers or police were injured.

Britain currently has some 3,300 troops involved in the military operation.

Bush Address Pays Tribute To Armed Forces (AP)

AP2, July 2, 2006

President Bush paid tribute to America's armed forces Saturday, calling Independence Day a time to thank the men and women who defend freedom.

"For more than two centuries, from the camps of Valley Forge to the mountains of Afghanistan, Americans have served and sacrificed for the principles of our founding," Bush said in his weekly radio address. "Today, a new generation of American patriots is defending our freedom against determined and ruthless enemies."

DOJ_NMG_0038154

Bush plans to celebrate July Fourth at Fort Bragg, N.C., where he will have lunch with military personnel. The president will return to the White House Tuesday night to watch fireworks in the nation's capital.

On the holiday, Americans should recall the ideals that the nation's founders outlined in the Declaration of Independence, Bush said. He also encouraged every American to find a way to thank those who defend freedom.

He urged people to help America Supports You, a nationwide program set up by the Defense Department to communicate citizen support to military men and women at home and abroad.

"At this hour, the men and women of our armed forces are facing danger in distant places, carrying out their missions with all the skill and honor we expect of them," Bush said. "And their families are enduring long separations from their loved ones with great courage and dignity."

Cheney Applauds NASCAR At Florida Raceway (WT/AP)

The Washington Times, July 2, 2006

DAYTONA BEACH, Fla. (AP) -- The stock cars weren't the only things buzzing the track at Daytona yesterday -- Vice President Dick Cheney made his grand entrance when Air Force II flew in low over the crowd gathering for the Pepsi 400 NASCAR race.

Upon arrival at Daytona International Speedway, Mr. Cheney's motorcade went around the track at a relative crawl of 60 mph, passing fans on the infield who waved flags for their favorite drivers. The vice president spoke at a pre-race meeting, where he got a standing ovation from the drivers and their crews and his excited staff took pictures with Dale Earnhardt Jr.

Mr. Cheney wished the drivers a safe race and thanked them for all their visits with troops.

"NASCAR has developed a hell of a reputation, not only, obviously, for the stock-car racing, but also for being tremendous members of the community," he said.

Yesterday offered Mr. Cheney a double-dip in the all-important political state of Florida: visiting the Kennedy Space Center and then catching the race.

The vice president had hoped to see Space Shuttle Discovery blast off on the first shuttle mission in nearly a year, but thunderstorm clouds forced a postponement. Mr. Cheney said he was disappointed, especially because he brought his three granddaughters along for the occasion.

"We'll have to bring them back another day," he said. "It's a great program, and it's important that we keep going and keep our space program going."

Joining Mr. Cheney and his wife, Lynne, were granddaughters: Kate, 12; Elizabeth, 8; and Grace, 6.

The vice president's aides tried to extend exposure of Mr. Cheney's trip beyond the traditional audience, inviting a team from Sports Illustrated to join the traveling White House press. He also had interviews scheduled with Fox Sports and Motor Racing Network, which handles NASCAR's radio coverage.

More than 20 years ago, when Mr. Cheney was a congressman from Wyoming, he attended a shuttle launch. But the NASCAR race was a first for him.

The Pepsi 400 has become a popular event for national leaders. President Reagan was the first commander in chief to attend a race when he went in 1984. Both President Bush and his father have attended the race, and Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld attended last year.

The race is a particularly patriotic event because it is scheduled for the Independence Day weekend and draws a large military crowd.

Earlier yesterday, Mr. Cheney underwent his annual physical, which showed his overall heart condition was stable and that his high-tech pacemaker is working properly and has not been activated by any irregular heartbeats.

Mr. Cheney, 65, who has a long history of heart ailments, had an electrocardiogram and imaging to check on repaired aneurysms on the back of his knees, his spokeswoman said.

Doctors also checked the condition of an implantable cardioverter defibrillator (ICD), which was placed in his chest in June 2001.

"The vice president's cardiac status remains stable, his ICD is functioning properly and has not treated any arrhythmia," or irregular heartbeat, according to a statement from his spokeswoman, Lea Anne McBride.

Mr. Cheney is scheduled to have a stress test on a treadmill in the fall as part of a comprehensive cardiac evaluation.

Cheney Revs Up Schedule In Florida (LAT/ORL)

By Ludmilla Lelis

The Los Angeles Times, July 2, 2006

The vice president caps an unusually public day by hailing U.S. armed forces at the Pepsi 400.

DOJ_NMG_0038155

DAYTONA BEACH, Fla. — Playing off the patriotic themes that dominated the Daytona International Speedway this weekend, Vice President Dick Cheney spent his time at the Pepsi 400 praising the military and hailing its ties to NASCAR.

"On Independence Day weekend, we're reminded how fortunate we are to live in freedom and to call this place home," Cheney told the 150,000-plus fans before Saturday's race.

"We're grateful above all to the men and women who defend us," he said.

The vice president's visit to the track is the latest in a series of high-profile public appearances by Cheney, who usually stays out of the limelight.

Earlier Saturday, he was 75 miles south at Cape Canaveral, where he had hoped to see the space shuttle launch. It was postponed because of weather.

Cheney arrived in Daytona with a roar when Air Force II flew in low over the track as the crowd was gathering. When he got to the speedway, his motorcade took a turn on the track at a modest 65 mph.

A few race fans judged Cheney's appearance as a shrewd public relations move.

"I don't think they should mix politics and racing, but he just wants to be associated with the sport," said Russ Schlenker, 49, of Hernando. "Just trying to get the 'NASCAR dad' vote."

In his public statements, Cheney emphasized the heroism of the armed forces but didn't discuss the military mission in Iraq.

At the drivers' pre-race meeting, the vice president lauded ties between the auto-racing circuit and the military.

"I know you guys spend a lot of time supporting the troops and the men and women in the armed forces," he said, looking at the NASCAR drivers and their racing teams.

Cheney posed with drivers whose sponsors are branches of the military, including Greg Biffle (National Guard), Ken Schrader (Air Force) and Joe Nemechek (Army).

He declined in a TV interview later to reveal which driver was his favorite.

DOJ:

Gonzales Backs Handling Of Terror Suspects (AP-Y2)

By Nadia Abou El-magd, Associated Press Writer

AP2, July 1, 2006

In his first visit to Egypt, the U.S. attorney general on Saturday defended the transfer of terror suspects for incarceration and interrogation in other countries.

Human rights groups have raised concerns about the so-called extraordinary rendition of terror suspects, some of whom have charged they were tortured in the countries where they were sent. The U.S. has said it does not send anyone to countries that torture.

Attorney General Alberto R. Gonzales acknowledged the U.S. practice of sending terror suspects to prisons in their home countries. But he refused to confirm reports that Egypt, whose human rights record has been criticized by Washington, had received any of the suspects.

"I'm not going to confirm that there have been any (suspects sent to Egypt), and I'm certainly not going to talk about the numbers — it's intelligence activity and we just don't do that," Gonzales told reporters after meeting with Egyptian President Hosni Mubarak.

"All I can say is that we do have an obligation to seek assurances from any country in which we are returning someone, that the individual is not going to be tortured," he said.

Gonzales said the U.S. would send a Justice Department lawyer to be stationed in Cairo "so we can further cement our relationship and we have someone on the ground representing me."

Egyptian Interior Minister Habib el-Adly has denied that Egypt was torturing terror suspects from abroad.

Detainees have said they were transferred from the U.S. to alleged secret facilities in countries including Poland, Romania, Jordan, Syria and Egypt.

Italy is investigating allegations that 22 CIA agents kidnapped an Egyptian Muslim preacher, Osama Moustafa Hassan Nasr, from a Milan street in February 2003 and returned him to Egypt.

An Italian newspaper quoted his lawyer as saying that Nasr was tortured after his return.

Gonzales said he saw no contradiction between the U.S. promoting democracy around the world and running a facility like the detention center at Guantanamo Bay, Cuba, where activists and former detainees have alleged abuse has taken place.

DOJ_NMG_0038156

The Supreme Court, in a major rebuke to President Bush, said Thursday that his plan to put some Guantanamo detainees on trial before military commissions was unconstitutional because the commissions were not authorized by Congress and violated international law.

"We have procedures in place to ensure that those at Guantanamo in fact deserve to be at Guantanamo," Gonzales said. "We're looking for ways to deal with terrorists other than at Guantanamo if we can — the U.S. has no intention and no desire to be the world's jailers," he added.

Gonzales arrived in Egypt Wednesday and has met the country's ministers of justice and interior, as well as with the prosecutor-general.

He said the political situation in Egypt had improved despite criticism that government practices were oppressive.

"The promotion of the rule of law is very, very important, and the growth of democracy," he said. "Challenges exist, and we consider President Mubarak a valuable ally to the U.S."

US Attorney General Defends Special Military Tribunals (AFP-Y2)

By Joelle Bassoul

AFP, July 2, 2006

US Attorney General Alberto R. Gonzales has defended special military tribunals for terrorist suspects, saying they serve "a viable role in the war on terror."

"We are carefully reviewing the decision by the US Supreme Court," Gonzales told reporters during a trip to Cairo after meeting with Egyptian President Hosni Mubarak Saturday morning.

"We intend to work with Congress to develop procedures and practices that will meet the requirements set forth by the Supreme Court, but we continue to believe that military commissions would serve a viable role in the war on terror," he said.

The US Supreme Court on Thursday ruled that US President George W. Bush had overstepped his powers by creating military war crimes tribunals for Guantanamo Bay inmates.

In a 5-3 vote, the high court ruled that a military commission established to try Salim Ahmed Hamdan, a 36 year old Yemeni -- Osama bin Laden's former driver -- charged with conspiracy to commit war crimes and terrorism, violated US military law and the Geneva Conventions.

Following the ruling, the White House and other administration officials signalled they would try to consult with Congress to refine rules for such commissions, in line with the landmark Supreme Court judgement.

Gonzales said he hoped to try the suspects "in military commissions once we establish the procedures that will meet the requirements set forth by the Supreme Court."

Refering to the detention center in Guantanamo Bay, Gonzales said the US continued to believe it was "necessary".

"When the US captures someone on the battlefield, we have to have some way of holding them so that they do not come back and fight against us or fight against our friends and allies," he said.

Asked about the practice of renditions, the secret transfer of detainees by the CIA to their home countries, where in some cases they risk being tortured, Gonzales insisted that the US seeks assurances before returning the suspects.

"When we have in our custody an individual and their home country wants them returned, we are not going to return them without adequate assurances that they are not being mistreated," said Gonzales who refused to comment on renditions cases to Egypt specifically.

"We look at past records of the country in the treatment of people in their custody," he said.

"In respect to Egypt, let me say that we welcome the progress that is occuring here in Egypt," he said refering to constitutional amendments recently passed.

Italy has accused CIA operatives of involvement in what it says was a clandestine operation to kidnap Egyptian national Abu Omar in 2003, handing him over to Egyptian authorities for interrogation.

The cleric -- who was under investigation in Italy as part of an inquiry into international terrorism -- was the imam of a Milan mosque which had been under close surveillance since the September 11, 2001 attacks in the United States.

He was snatched from the street in February 2003 and flown from a US military base in northern Italy to Egypt, where his supporters say he was tortured.

"We do have a legal obligation not to render someone back to a country where we know they might be mistreated or tortured,' Gonzales reiterated.

Gonzales, who is the first US attorney general to visit Egypt, said that his department will send a permanent envoy to Cairo to "further cement the relationship" between the two countries.

DOJ_NMG_0038157

Earlier in the day, Gonzales discussed with Mubarak the situation in the Gaza strip, calling Mubarak's mediation efforts between the Israelis and the Palestinians "important in resolving this matter in a peaceful manner," in reference to the abduction Sunday of an Israeli soldier by Palestinian militants.

The Israeli army on Wednesday launched a large-scale offensive in the Gaza strip to rescue the soldier.

During his three-day visit, Gonzales met with justice minister Mahmud Abou Leil and interior minister Habib al-Adli.

Justice Kennedy Makes The Calls On Roberts Supreme Court (LAT)

By David G. Savage, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, July 2, 2006

WASHINGTON — John G. Roberts Jr. may be the new chief justice, but the Supreme Court is not truly the Roberts court, at least not yet.

In the most divisive cases before the court in the term that just ended, it was Justice Anthony M. Kennedy who determined the outcome every time. In unpredictable fashion, he sided some of the time with the court's conservative bloc and some of the time with its liberals.

His influence was dramatically displayed Thursday, when the court announced that it had struck down President Bush's specially created military tribunals for suspected terrorists.

As Justices Antonin Scalia and Clarence Thomas read their dissenting opinions in court that day, Roberts and Samuel A. Alito Jr., Bush's other new appointee, could do no more than listen in agreement.

It was 86-year-old John Paul Stevens, the court's last World War II veteran, who read the 5-3 majority opinion. He solemnly declared that the president was "bound to comply with the rule of law" and that he could not ignore congressional mandates and long-standing U.S military rules.

He paused to note that Kennedy, seated next to him, had joined most of his opinion, creating a majority. Liberals hailed the result, and conservatives lamented it.

While the issue before the court was the balance of power in government, the drama showed how little the balance of power within the high court itself had changed. Even when Roberts and Alito side with fellow conservatives Scalia and Thomas, they need a fifth vote to prevail.

For the last decade, Justices Kennedy and Sandra Day O'Connor, both Ronald Reagan appointees, had supplied the votes that decided the court's major cases. They usually joined with the conservatives on issues of crime, the death penalty, civil rights and states' rights, but with the liberals on abortion, gay rights and school prayer.

Now, with O'Connor in retirement, Kennedy stands alone at the center.

He voted with the conservatives more often than not, but joined the liberals in several major rulings. In one closely watched environmental case, Kennedy wrote a separate, solo opinion that was decisive.

On the issue of military tribunals, Kennedy made it clear that he shared the liberals' concern about unchecked presidential power.

The Constitution created "a system where the single power of the executive is checked," he wrote. Even in a national emergency, he said, "the Constitution is best preserved by a reliance on standards tested over time and insulated from the pressure of the moment."

This does not mean that suspected terrorists cannot be tried in military tribunals, Kennedy said — but that Congress should first debate the issue and pass a law.

Kennedy is hardly in the camp of the liberals. Just the day before, he spoke for a five-member majority that upheld the mid-decade redistricting plan engineered by former House Majority Leader Tom DeLay for Texas' seats in the U.S. House of Representatives.

The four liberals, led by Stevens, say "partisan gerrymandering" is unconstitutional. The conservatives, led by Scalia, counter that politics inevitably plays a role in the drawing of electoral districts and that there is no fair way to decide how much politics is too much.

Kennedy came down in between. He says that he finds partisan gerrymandering troubling, but that the Texas plan was not so extreme as to be unconstitutional.

Before 2003, he pointed out, the Democrats had drawn electoral districts that gave them a slim majority of seats in Congress at a time when nearly 60% of Texans were voting Republican. Measured against that map, DeLay's plan "can be seen as fairer," Kennedy said.

Developers and property-rights activists hoped a more conservative court, bolstered by Roberts and Alito, would sharply limit the Army Corps of Engineers' control over hundreds of millions of acres of wetlands. Environmentalists feared the same.

DOJ_NMG_0038158

Scalia wrote an opinion to do just that, and he was joined by Roberts, Thomas and Alito. He said federal environmental protection extended only to wetlands that were part of a continuously flowing stream. This would exclude many wetlands in the middle part of the nation and nearly all of those in West, where streams are dry for much of the year.

But in this case, Kennedy refused to go along. Instead, he wrote in a separate opinion that wetlands could be protected as long as environmentalists could show that filling them or draining them would affect downstream waters.

Earlier this year, Kennedy and O'Connor thwarted the Bush administration's move to void the nation's only "right to die" law. Oregon's voters had twice approved a measure that allowed dying people to obtain a dose of lethal medication from their doctors.

Bush's first attorney general, John Ashcroft, reinterpreted the federal drug control law and said it empowered him to strip Oregon's doctors of their right to prescribe medication.

In January, Kennedy, speaking for the court, overturned Ashcroft's order. The administration's position, he said, would "delegate to a single executive officer the power to effect a radical shift of authority from the states to the federal government to define general standards of medical practice in every locality."

Had Kennedy agreed with Roberts, Scalia and Thomas to support Ashcroft's view, the court would have split 4-4 and could have held the case until the next month, when Alito took O'Connor's seat. Then a 5-4 majority could have ruled in the administration's favor.

Kennedy, who turns 70 this month, joined the court after a tumultuous confirmation battle. In 1987, Reagan's first nominee, Robert H. Bork, was defeated in the Senate. His second, Douglas H. Ginsburg, withdrew after reports that he had smoked marijuana regularly as a law professor.

Kennedy, a Sacramento native with a reputation as a straight arrow, was nominated next and won unanimous confirmation in the Senate.

At first, he looked to be a reliable conservative, voting regularly with then-Chief Justice William H. Rehnquist. But in 1992, he split with the conservatives and voted with O'Connor to uphold the right to abortion and to maintain the strict ban on school-sponsored prayers.

Since then, many on the right have portrayed him as a traitor. Their ire grew in recent years when Kennedy voted to strike down the death penalty for defendants who are mentally retarded or younger than 18 at the time of the crime.

He also wrote the court's two major rulings in favor of gay rights. In one, he said gay and lesbian couples deserved respect and dignity, not condemnation by law. Scalia denounced his opinion as the first step toward same-sex marriage.

Despite the fiery exchanges over social issues, Kennedy has some conservative views that could loom large in the years ahead. For example, he has voted regularly against affirmative action, arguing that the government should not rely on race in making decisions. In the fall, the court will consider a challenge to voluntary school integration programs, and Kennedy could create a majority for the conservative bloc.

Last year, he voted to uphold the display of the Ten Commandments on public property. O'Connor joined a 5-4 majority to strike down such displays. Now, with Alito having replaced her, the court, with Kennedy, appears to have a majority to uphold religious displays.

The abortion issue also appears to turn on Kennedy's vote. Though he agreed in 1992 to maintain the legal right of women to choose abortion, he also said states had considerable authority to regulate it.

Six years ago, he disagreed with O'Connor when the court struck down a Nebraska law that banned intact dilation and extraction, which opponents call "partial-birth abortion." Kennedy called the practice "abhorrent" and similar to infanticide.

Congress then passed a federal ban on this form of abortion. It was struck down by federal courts relying on the Nebraska ruling.

This fall, the Supreme Court will take up an appeal. Kennedy, as usual, will probably hold the deciding vote.

*

(INFOBOX BELOW)

Major decisions this session

Key Supreme Court decisions in the just-concluded 2005-2006 session, and how the justices voted:

War on terrorism

President Bush overstepped his authority when he set up special military courts to try Al Qaeda suspects without the approval of Congress, the court said in Hamdan vs. Rumsfeld. These tribunals at Guantanamo Bay lack basic standards of fairness, the 5-3 majority said.

Justice John Paul Stevens wrote the opinion and was joined by Anthony M. Kennedy, David H. Souter, Ruth Bader Ginsburg and Stephen G. Breyer. Justices Antonin Scalia, Clarence Thomas and Samuel A. Alito Jr. dissented. Chief Justice John G. Roberts Jr. did not participate because he had ruled on the case when it was before the U.S. appeals court.

DOJ_NMG_0038159

End of life

Doctors in Oregon may prescribe lethal medication for people who are terminally ill and near death, the court said in Gonzales vs. Oregon. The 6-3 ruling upheld the nation's only "right to die" law and rejected a Bush administration order that would have stripped doctors of their license to prescribe drugs.

Kennedy wrote the opinion, joined by Stevens, Souter, Ginsburg, O'Connor and Breyer. Scalia, Thomas and Roberts dissented.

Wetlands

Federal environmental regulators may protect most wetlands from development if they can show that these swampy areas have some impact on the nation's rivers and lakes. The split ruling in Rapanos vs. U.S. rejected a move by property rights advocates to sharply cut back on environmental protection.

Kennedy wrote the key concurring opinion, and Stevens, Souter, Ginsburg and Breyer sided with the government. Scalia, Roberts, Thomas and Alito would have limited the protection for wetlands.

Redistricting

State lawmakers have broad power to redraw the lines of electoral districts to benefit the party in power, the court said. The five-member majority rejected a charge of "partisan gerrymandering" lodged against the Texas Republicans and former House Majority Leader Tom DeLay for a mid-decade change that gave the GOP six additional seats in Congress.

Kennedy wrote the opinion in League of United Latin American Citizens vs. Perry, and Roberts, Scalia, Thomas and Alito agreed with him.

Campaign funding

The government may not cap how much candidates spend for their campaigns, and contribution limits are illegal if they are too low, the court said in striking down a novel Vermont law. The 6-3 ruling was a defeat for liberal reformers who wanted to lessen the impact of money in politics.

Breyer wrote the opinion in Randall vs. Sorrell, and Roberts, Alito, Scalia, Kennedy and Thomas agreed with him.

Whistle-blowers

Public employees do not have a free-speech right to complain about serious wrongdoing in the workplace, the court said in Garcetti vs. Ceballos. The 1st Amendment protects employees when they speak out in public as citizens, but not for internal matters, the court said in its 5-4 ruling.

Kennedy wrote for the majority, which included Roberts, Scalia, Thomas and Alito. Stevens, Souter, Ginsburg and Breyer dissented.

Graphics reporting by David Savage

Kennedy Reigns Supreme On Court (WP)

By Charles Lane

The Washington Post, July 2, 2006

With O'Connor's Departure, Sole Swing Voter Wields His Moderating Force

It was the O'Connor court. Now it may be the Kennedy court.

The Supreme Court's just-concluded 2005-2006 term was a historic one, in which two new justices, Chief Justice John G. Roberts Jr. and Samuel A. Alito Jr., changed the court's style and ideological balance.

But by the end of the term, it was clear that the main impact of the turnover was to enhance the influence of a justice who has been at the court since 1988, 69-year-old Anthony M. Kennedy.

With the departure of centrist Justice Sandra Day O'Connor, the court is now frequently split between two four-justice liberal and conservative blocs, with Kennedy as the sole remaining swing voter.

An eclectic and sometimes inscrutable moderate conservative, Kennedy repeatedly cast the decisive vote on the most polarizing issues the court faced, from President Bush's military commissions, to the Clean Water Act, to the death penalty. He is poised to do so again next term when the court takes up the issues of abortion and school integration.

"Justice Kennedy seems to be asserting himself more and seems to be relishing the role," said Richard Lazarus, a law professor at Georgetown University who heads the school's Supreme Court Institute. "All the justices enjoy being more significant rather than less significant, and he has certainly asserted his role as a moderating force on both sides."

In the 17 cases during the 2005-2006 term that were decided by five-vote majorities, Kennedy was on the winning side 12 times, more than any other justice, according to figures compiled by the Supreme Court Institute.

In six of those cases, Kennedy voted with the conservative bloc, made up of Roberts, Alito, Antonin Scalia and Clarence Thomas. As a result, the court upheld most of Texas's Republican-drafted redistricting plan, restored the death penalty in Kansas, and ruled that police do not have to throw out evidence they gather in illegal no-knock searches.

But four times, Kennedy, a 1988 appointee of President Ronald Reagan, defected to the liberal justices, John Paul Stevens, David H. Souter, Ruth Bader Ginsburg and Stephen G. Breyer.

As a result, the court not only struck down Bush's military commissions, but also ruled that the police need permission from both occupants to search a home without a warrant, gave a Tennessee death row inmate a chance to win a new trial, and said that Texas violated the Voting Rights Act by diluting the voting power of Latino Democrats in one district. (Twice Kennedy was part of mixed left-right coalitions.)

Roberts voted in 10 five-justice majorities, the second-most on the court, but he joined the four liberals only once, in a minor procedural case.

The "swing voter" role is not entirely new to Kennedy, who has been in that position before, along with O'Connor.

Indeed, Kennedy is disliked by many conservatives because he has voted with liberals to uphold gay rights and abortion rights, and to strike down the juvenile death penalty.

But since O'Connor retired from the court Jan. 31, and Alito, who replaced her, has lived up to his conservative billing, Kennedy has been all alone as the swing voter -- with the added clout, and added pressure, that implies.

O'Connor used to tell audiences that, at the court, "we decide what cases to hear, and then we decide 'em." Though she often ruled only narrowly, she did not agonize.

Kennedy, by contrast, has been known to brood or to switch his vote in the middle of a case -- though he is more inclined than O'Connor was to rule broadly once he comes to a conclusion. He is a passionate free-speech advocate, and has a consistent record of opposing affirmative action.

While O'Connor saw herself as a fact-oriented problem-solver, Lazarus says, Kennedy "views himself as a major intellectual force."

More than some other justices, "Kennedy sees real values in conflict in the court's cases, and it's a question how you negotiate it," said Neil Siegel, who served as a Supreme Court law clerk in the 2003-2004 term and now teaches at Duke University's law school. "Sometimes he does it well and skillfully, and sometimes he just can't make up his mind and the legal system gets stuck in a kind of vertigo."

In the military commission case, Kennedy ruled unequivocally, joining almost all of Stevens's broad opinion. His few reservations came in a concurring opinion that also contained Kennedy's admonition that "concentration of power puts personal liberty in peril of arbitrary action by officials."

But at other times this term, Kennedy cut difficult issues very fine, drawing criticism from his colleagues.

In a key case on the scope of the Clean Water Act, Kennedy refused to join either the conservatives, who voted as a bloc to scale back federal power to regulate wetlands, or the liberals, who wanted to leave it intact.

Kennedy instead wrote a long opinion of his own. He agreed with the conservatives that a lower court had mistakenly allowed the federal government to block development on two Michigan properties, but disagreed with them about why. He said the lower court should reconsider the issue under a new legal test -- one that most analysts thought would end up producing the same result the liberals wanted anyway.

Kennedy's opinion would not change wetlands protection in the long run, Stevens wrote in a dissenting opinion joined by the three other liberals, but "will have the effect of creating additional work for all concerned parties."

Scalia, joined by the three conservatives, called Kennedy's proposal "perfectly opaque."

"He is a man in the middle, and the man in the middle is fully capable of causing muddle," said Douglas A. Kmiec, a Pepperdine University law professor.

The pressure on Kennedy could mount next term, when the court will rule on the constitutionality of a federal law banning the procedure opponents call "partial birth" abortion, and will decide whether local governments may consider students' race when assigning them to public schools.

Though Kennedy is on record in favor of Roe v. Wade , the 1973 decision that recognized a right to abortion, he dissented angrily from a 5 to 4 ruling in 2000 that struck down a state law banning partial-birth abortion.

That would seem to commit him to upholding the federal ban, legal analysts said, except that the 2000 case is binding precedent and Kennedy may "be acutely aware of a mere personnel change on the court causing a radical shift," Siegel said.

Kennedy has always voted against affirmative action, most recently in 2003 when he voted against race-conscious admissions policies at the University of Michigan's law school and undergraduate program.

But the cases the court has agreed to hear next term involve compulsory public education for students as young as kindergarten age. They also present the problem of how public schools can avoid resegregation, at a time when residential segregation persists and court-ordered school desegregation is largely a thing of the past.

Under the circumstances, legal analysts do not all agree that Kennedy necessarily relishes his situation.

"I'm not certain it's an enviable position to be in," Siegel said. "It's quite a burden to bear."

DOJ_NMG_0038161

Roberts Is At Court's Helm, But He Isn't Yet In Control (NYT)

By Linda Greenhouse

The New York Times, July 2, 2006

WASHINGTON, July 1 — As the dust settled on a consequential Supreme Court term, the first in 11 years with a change in membership and the first in two decades with a new chief justice, one question that lingered was whether it was now the Roberts court, in fact as well as in name.

The answer: not yet.

Chief Justice John G. Roberts Jr. was clearly in charge, presiding over the court with grace, wit and meticulous preparation. But he was not in control.

In the court's most significant nonunanimous cases, Chief Justice Roberts was in dissent almost as often as he was in the majority. His goal of inspiring the court to speak softly and unanimously seemed a distant aspiration as important cases failed to produce majority opinions and members of the court, including occasionally the chief justice himself, gave voice to their frustration and pique with colleagues who did not see things their way.

The term's closing weeks were particularly ragged. The court issued no decision in a major patent case that had drawn intense interest from the business community, announcing two months after the argument, over the dissents of three justices, that the case had been "improvidently granted" — they should not have agreed to decide it — in the first place.

So if it wasn't yet the Roberts court, what exactly was it?

Perhaps it was the Kennedy court, based on the frequency with which Justice Anthony M. Kennedy cast the deciding vote in important cases.

Or perhaps it was more accurately seen as the Stevens court, reflecting the ability of John Paul Stevens, the senior associate justice in tenure as well as in age, to deliver a majority in the case for which the term will go down in history, the decision on military commissions that rejected the Bush administration's view of open-ended presidential authority.

Chief Justice Roberts did not participate in that case because he had ruled on it a year earlier as an appeals court judge. Based on his vote to uphold the administration's position then, he almost certainly would have joined Justices Antonin Scalia, Clarence Thomas and Samuel A. Alito Jr., the newest member of the court, in dissent.

If none of these labels — Roberts court, Kennedy court, Stevens court — seem to fit precisely, it is probably because what the Supreme Court really was in its 2005-6 term was a court in transition.

For the justices, it was a time of testing, of battles joined and battles, for the moment, postponed.

The term's early period of unanimity, during which cases on such contentious subjects as abortion and federalism were dispatched quickly, with narrowly phrased opinions, reflected agreement not on the underlying legal principles but rather on the desirability of moving on without getting bogged down in a fruitless search for common ground. This was especially so in the term's early months, when Justice Sandra Day O'Connor was still sitting but was counting the days until a new justice could take her place.

Once Justice O'Connor retired in late January, after Justice Alito's confirmation, and as the court moved into the heart of the term, some of the court's early inhibitions seemed to fall away. Yet when its most conservative members reached out aggressively to test the boundaries of consensus in the term's major environmental case, Justice Kennedy unexpectedly pushed back and left them well short of their goal.

In that case, Chief Justice Roberts along with Justices Alito, Scalia and Thomas tried to cut back on federal regulators' expansive view of their authority under the Clean Water Act to define wetlands.

Justice Kennedy also deserted the conservatives in a redistricting case from Texas when he found a violation of the Voting Rights Act in the dismantling of a Congressional district that had previously had a Mexican-American majority. The action of the Republican-led Texas Legislature had deprived the Latinos of the ability to elect the candidate of their choice, Justice Kennedy said, leaving Chief Justice Roberts to complain in dissent, "It is a sordid business, this divvying us up by race."

Nonetheless, there was little doubt that in its transition, the court was becoming more conservative. A statistical analysis by Jason Harrow on the Scotusblog Web site showed that Justice Alito voted with the conservative justices 15 percent more often than Justice O'Connor had.

A separate analysis, by the Supreme Court Institute at Georgetown University Law Center, showed that Justice Alito and Chief Justice Roberts had the highest agreement rate of any two justices in the court's nonunanimous cases, 88 percent, slightly higher than the agreement rate between Justice O'Connor and Justice David H. Souter in the first half of the term, 87.5 percent.

Chief Justice Roberts agreed with Justice Scalia in 77.5 percent of the nonunanimous cases and with Justice Stevens, arguably the court's most liberal member, only 35 percent of the time. The least agreement between any pair of justices was between Justices Alito and Stevens, 23.1 percent.

DOJ_NMG_0038162

The court decided 69 cases with signed opinions in the term that began on Oct. 3 and ended on June 29. Nearly half were decided without dissent, a greater number than usual, although not dramatically so. Sixteen cases were decided by five-justice majorities, either 5 to 4 or 5 to 3, a proportion very close to the 10-year average.

One measure of the court's shift to the right is in dissenting votes. In the previous term, the justice who dissented least often was Stephen G. Breyer, who dissented in 10 of the term's 74 decisions. But this term, he had the second-highest number of dissents, 16; Justice Stevens had the most, 19. Justice Thomas and Justices Ruth Bader Ginsburg and Souter were also frequent dissenters. Of those who served the full term, Chief Justice Roberts had the fewest dissents, seven. Justice Kennedy had the second fewest, with nine.

Chief Justice Roberts's dissents, while few, came in some important cases. In addition to dissenting from the Voting Rights Act portion of the Texas redistricting decision, he also dissented from a decision reopening a 20-year-old death penalty case on the basis of new evidence; a federalism case, in which the majority found the states not immune from private bankruptcy suits; and a ruling that invalidated the personal assertion of authority by John Ashcroft, the former attorney general, to penalize doctors in Oregon who follow that state's Death With Dignity Act and prescribe lethal doses of medication for terminally ill patients who request it.

The court's next term, which begins Oct. 2, looms as a major test of the justices' fortitude and ability to work together, with cases challenging precedents on abortion and affirmative action already on the docket.

With the court having indicated in Hamdan v. Rumsfeld, the military commission case, that lawsuits now pending in the lower courts on behalf of dozens of detainees at Guantánamo Bay, Cuba, are still alive, the justices are likely to have further opportunities to address the profound issues of presidential power and judicial authority that these cases raise. This time, the chief justice will not need to stay silent, and the country that is just getting to know him will hear his voice.

Following are summaries of the term's major rulings.

Presidential Power

The court repudiated the Bush administration's plan to use military commissions to try Guantánamo detainees, ruling 5 to 3 that the commissions were unauthorized by statute and violated a provision of the Geneva Conventions.

The majority opinion in Hamdan v. Rumsfeld, No. 05-184, by Justice Stevens, set minimum procedural protections that any future commissions, even those authorized by Congress, would have to provide. Justices Kennedy, Souter, Ginsburg and Breyer joined the opinion. Justices Scalia, Thomas and Alito dissented. Chief Justice Roberts, who had voted as an appeals court judge to uphold the commissions, did not participate.

Elections

A splintered decision rejected a challenge to the Republican-driven mid-decade redistricting of Texas's Congressional map, finding that it was not an impermissible partisan gerrymander. Justice Kennedy wrote the opinion in League of United Latin American Citizens v. Perry, No. 05-204. Agreeing with the judgment on the gerrymander challenge were Chief Justice Roberts and Justices Alito, Scalia and Thomas. Justices Stevens and Breyer dissented. Justices Souter and Ginsburg expressed no view on the issue, making the vote 5 to 2 to 2.

In the same case, the court ruled that the dismantling of a district in southwestern Texas with a Latino majority, an action the State Legislature had taken to shore up the faltering prospects of the Republican incumbent, violated the Voting Rights Act. On this question, Justice Kennedy spoke for a 5-to-4 majority that included Justices Stevens, Souter, Ginsburg and Breyer.

The court voted 6 to 3 to strike down Vermont's campaign finance law, which both limited the amount that candidates could spend on their own campaigns and placed the country's lowest ceilings on contributions to candidates from individuals and political parties.

The fragmented majority did not offer a unified approach to contribution limits, leaving the court's path in this area uncertain. Justice Breyer wrote the controlling opinion in the case, Randall v. Sorrell, No. 04-1528, joined by Chief Justice Roberts and Justice Alito. Justices Kennedy, Thomas and Scalia joined the judgment.

Criminal Law

In Georgia v. Randolph, No. 04-1067, the court held that when the police lack a search warrant, they cannot enter a home if one occupant objects, even if another occupant gives permission. The vote was 5 to 3, with Justice Alito not participating. In his majority opinion, Justice Souter said the decision comported with "widely shared social expectations" about privacy in the home. Chief Justice Roberts filed his first dissenting opinion in this case. Justices Scalia and Thomas also voted in dissent.

The court ruled that evidence the police find when they search a home to execute a search warrant can be admitted in court despite an officer's failure to observe the constitutional requirement to "knock and announce" before entering. Justice Scalia, writing for the 5-to-4 majority, said the ordinary rule against admitting unconstitutionally obtained evidence should not apply in this circumstance — nor, he implied, in many other circumstances currently governed by the "exclusionary rule."

DOJ_NMG_0038163

This case, Hudson v. Michigan, No. 04-1360, was argued for a second time after Justice Alito joined the court; his vote with the majority determined the outcome. The others in the majority were Chief Justice Roberts and Justices Thomas and Kennedy.

The court was unanimous in ruling that inmates facing execution by lethal injection can invoke a federal civil rights law to challenge the state's choice of drugs and the manner in which they are administered. The decision, Hill v. McDonough, No. 05-8794, opened the door to lawsuits that would be prohibited by tight restrictions on petitions for habeas corpus. Justice Kennedy wrote the opinion.

The court ruled 5 to 3 that new evidence in a Tennessee murder case, including DNA evidence, sufficiently undermined the prosecution's theory of the case to require a new federal court hearing for the man who was convicted and sentenced to death for the crime 21 years ago.

The case, House v. Bell, No. 04-8990, was the first in which the court factored the results of modern DNA testing into consideration of whether a prisoner might qualify for a chance at habeas corpus that would otherwise be prohibited by procedural obstacles. Justice Kennedy wrote for the majority. Chief Justice Roberts dissented, along with Justices Scalia and Thomas. Justice Alito did not participate.

The court ruled 6 to 3 that foreign criminal defendants who have not been notified of their right under an international treaty to contact one of their country's diplomats are not entitled to special accommodation from courts in the United States. The decision, Sanchez-Llamas v. Oregon, No. 04-10566, rejected claims brought under the Vienna Convention on Consular Relations by foreign citizens convicted in Oregon and Virginia. Chief Justice Roberts wrote for the majority. Justices Breyer, Stevens and Souter dissented.

In a unanimous opinion, the court ordered a new trial for an inmate on South Carolina's death row on the ground that an evidentiary rule used in that state's courts had prevented the inmate from putting on a complete defense. Justice Alito, writing his first opinion for the court, said the rule was irrational and arbitrary. The case was Holmes v. South Carolina, No. 04-1327.

The court was deeply split on a basic question of death penalty law: the validity of the death penalty statute in Kansas under which a death sentence is automatic if the jury finds that the mitigating evidence and aggravating evidence are of equal weight. Voting 5 to 4 in an opinion by Justice Thomas, the court upheld the law, which the State Supreme Court had declared unconstitutional. Justice Alito's vote, following a reargument after he joined the court, made the difference. Justices Souter, Stevens, Ginsburg and Breyer dissented in the case, Kansas v. Marsh, No. 04-1170.

The court considered defendants' rights to cross-examine the state's witnesses, a right protected by the Confrontation Clause of the Sixth Amendment, in a pair of cases that were decided in a single opinion by Justice Scalia.

In the first part of the opinion in Davis v. Washington, No. 05-5224, the court was unanimous in ruling that a crime victim's emergency telephone call to 911 can be introduced as evidence at trial, even if the victim is not present for cross-examination, because a call to 911 does not produce the kind of "testimonial statement" to which the Confrontation Clause is addressed.

The court then went on to hold, by a vote of 8 to 1, with Justice Thomas dissenting, that a crime victim's statement to police officers who arrive at a scene should be considered "testimonial" if the police are investigating the crime rather than providing emergency assistance. Such a statement should therefore be banned from the trial if the person who gave it is not available for cross-examination, Justice Scalia said.

In another Sixth Amendment case, on the right to the assistance of counsel, the court ruled 5 to 4 that defendants who are wrongly deprived of the right to hire a lawyer of their choice are entitled to have a conviction overturned without the need to show that the first-choice lawyer would have achieved a better result. Justice Scalia wrote the opinion in the case, United States v. Gonzalez-Lopez, No. 05-352, joined by Justices Stevens, Souter, Ginsburg and Breyer.

Government Authority

The court ruled 6 to 3 that John Ashcroft, the former attorney general, acted without legal authority when he declared that doctors in Oregon who followed the procedures of that state's Death With Dignity Act to help patients commit suicide would lose their federal prescription rights and thus forfeit, as a practical matter, their ability to practice medicine.

No statute authorized the attorney general to take such action unilaterally contrary to "the background principles of our federal system," Justice Kennedy said in the majority opinion. The decision, Gonzales v. Oregon, No. 04-623, was a rebuff of the Bush administration, which had embraced Mr. Ashcroft's personal fight against assisted suicide and carried on the case after he left the government.

Chief Justice Roberts joined a dissenting opinion written by Justice Scalia. Justice Thomas also dissented. Justice Alito was not yet on the court when the case was decided, with Justice O'Connor in the majority, on January 17.

A pair of decisions on the question of state immunity from suit, also issued in January, before Justice Alito joined the court, gave strong indications that the Rehnquist court's federalism battles were far from over.

The court was unanimous in permitting a disabled Georgia prison inmate's lawsuit against the state to go forward under the Americans With Disabilities Act. But the unanimity was achieved only because the court limited the decision, Goodman v.

DOJ_NMG_0038164

Georgia, No. 04-1203, to little more than the statement of a truism: that Congress has the power to make the states liable to lawsuit when they violate the Constitution.

In this case, the inmate claimed that his mistreatment had been so egregious as to violate not only the disabilities law, but also the Constitution. Justice Scalia's opinion said that to this extent, the lawsuit could proceed.

In the second decision, the court split 5 to 4 in ruling that states are not immune from private lawsuits brought under federal bankruptcy law. Justice O'Connor joined the majority opinion by Justice Stevens in this case, Central Virginia Community College v. Katz, No. 04-885. The dissenters were Chief Justice Roberts and Justices Scalia, Kennedy and Thomas, who wrote the dissenting opinion supporting state immunity.

The court ruled that as a matter of constitutional due process, the government must take reasonable steps to make sure that homeowners have been notified before it sells a house for nonpayment of taxes. Chief Justice Roberts wrote for the 5-to-3 majority in this case, Jones v. Flowers, No. 04-1477. Justices Thomas, Scalia and Kennedy dissented, and Justice Alito did not participate.

The justices ruled 7 to 1 that the Postal Service may be sued by people who trip over packages that letter carriers have carelessly left in their path. The majority opinion by Justice Kennedy in this case, Dolan v. United States Postal Service, No. 04-848, was based on an interpretation of the Federal Tort Claims Act, not on the Constitution. Justice Thomas dissented, and Justice Alito did not participate.

Environment

A fractured decision in the term's major environmental case, defining federal jurisdiction over wetlands in the Clean Water Act, did not produce a majority opinion but did retain the ability of the government to continue enforcing the 1972 statute vigorously.

The court split 4 to 1 to 4 in the case, Rapanos v. United States, No. 04-1034, with Justice Kennedy in the middle. One group of four — Justices Scalia, Thomas and Alito, and Chief Justice Roberts — denounced federal regulators' open-ended approach to wetlands as "beyond parody" and would have redefined the term to land adjacent to open water and actually wet most of the time.

The other foursome, Justices Stevens, Souter, Ginsburg and Breyer, would have deferred to the longstanding judgment of the Army Corps of Engineers that a "wetland" can often appear dry and can be miles from a body of water, as long as it sometimes performs a filtering or runoff-control function. Justice Kennedy voted with the first group to send the case back to a lower court, but he proposed a standard much closer to that of the Stevens group.

In a second case under the Clean Water Act, the court ruled unanimously that operators of hydroelectric dams must meet a state's water quality requirements to qualify for a federal license. Justice Souter wrote the opinion in this case, S. D. Warren Company v. Maine Board of Environmental Protection, No. 04-1527.

Religion

In a significant application of the Religious Freedom Restoration Act, the court ruled 8 to 0 that a small religious sect based in Brazil has the right to import a hallucinogenic tea that the federal government had wanted to seize as a banned narcotic.

The tea, known as hoasca, is central to the sect's rituals, Chief Justice Roberts noted in his opinion for the court. He said the government had not met the religious freedom act's demanding standard for applying a generally applicable law — federal narcotics law, in this instance — in a way that impinges on religious observance. Justice Alito did not participate in the case, Gonzales v. O Centro Espírita Beneficente União do Vegetal, No. 04-1084.

Education

Voting 8 to 0, the court upheld a federal law that requires universities to forfeit all federal financing if any part of the university does not provide military recruiters with the same access to students as it provides other potential employers.

The law, known as the Solomon Amendment, was challenged by a coalition of law schools that objected to the military's exclusion of openly gay men and women. The law schools argued that their First Amendment rights to free speech and association had been violated by the requirement that they open their doors to military recruiters.

Writing for the court in this case, Rumsfeld v. Forum for Academic and Institutional Rights, No. 04-1152, Chief Justice Roberts said the speech in question was that of the government, not of the law schools, which he noted remained free to criticize the military and to express their views on its policies. Justice Alito did not participate.

The court ruled 6 to 2 that parents who disagree with a public school system's special-education plan for their children have the legal burden of proving that the plan will fail to provide the "appropriate" education that a federal law guarantees to children with disabilities. Justice O'Connor wrote the decision in the case, Schaffer v. Weast, No. 04-698. Chief Justice Roberts did not participate, and Justice Alito was not yet on the court.

DOJ_NMG_0038165

Separately, the court ruled 6 to 3 that parents who prevail at a special-education hearing are not entitled to reimbursement for the cost of hiring expert witnesses. Justice Alito wrote this opinion, Arlington Central School District v. Murphy, No. 05-18. Justices Souter, Breyer and Stevens dissented.

Employees' Rights

The court gave employees substantially enhanced protection against retaliation for complaining about discrimination on the job. Justice Breyer wrote the opinion in the case, Burlington Northern & Santa Fe Railway Company v. White, No. 05-259, which interpreted the anti-retaliation provision of the Civil Rights Act of 1964.

The court defined retaliation broadly as any "materially adverse" employment action that "might have dissuaded a reasonable worker" from making the complaint. Eight justices joined the majority opinion, and Justice Alito filed a separate concurring opinion.

Addressing the free-speech rights of government workers, the court ruled 5 to 4 that the Constitution does not protect public employees against retaliation for what they say in the course of performing their assigned duties.

Justice Kennedy's majority opinion in this case, Garcetti v. Ceballos, No. 04-473, drew a distinction between public employees' official speech, which he said supervisors were entitled to control, and their speech as citizens contributing to "civic discourse," for which they retained constitutional protection. The dissenters were Justices Stevens, Souter, Breyer and Ginsburg.

Abortion

The justices papered over, at least for this term, their fundamental differences on abortion, ruling narrowly and unanimously in a case from New Hampshire on access to abortion for teenagers facing medical emergencies. In an opinion by Justice O'Connor, her last before leaving the bench, the court reaffirmed that a medical-emergency exception was constitutionally required in a law that placed obstacles, like a parental-notice requirement and a waiting period, in the path of teenagers seeking abortions.

The more difficult question in the case, Ayotte v. Planned Parenthood of Northern New England, No. 04-1144, was that of what to do about New Hampshire's failure to include such an exception in its parental notice law. The justices sent the case back to the federal appeals court in Boston, which had banned enforcement of the law in its entirety, even for teenagers not facing a medical emergency.

That "most blunt remedy" would be justified, Justice O'Connor said, only if it was clear that New Hampshire's legislature, which enacted the law in 2003, would have preferred no law at all to one with the necessary health exception. Otherwise, she said, the appeals court should come up with a more limited remedy for the constitutional problem.

Patents

Indicating new interest in intellectual property law, the justices considered several patent cases but failed to offer much guidance in this burgeoning legal area.

The court handed a limited victory to eBay in its patent dispute with MercExchange, which successfully sued eBay for patent infringement on the method behind the online auction company's "Buy It Now" feature. The United States Court of Appeals for the Federal Circuit, which has sole jurisdiction over patent appeals, then granted an injunction against eBay's use of the technology, under the view that an injunction should automatically follow a finding of infringement.

In a unanimous opinion by Justice Thomas, the justices instructed the appeals court to make a case-by-case determination rather than apply an automatic injunction rule. But the opinion, eBay v. MercExchange, No. 05-130, left it unclear what presumptions and factors should go into that determination, and it was evident that the justices themselves had not agreed on a standard.

A Supreme Court Of One (WP)

By Dahlia Lithwick

The Washington Post, July 2, 2006

The new John G. Roberts Supreme Court is only one term old, and already we're all wrong about it.

Liberals had feared, and conservatives had feted, the end of judicial review as we know it, at least until last week's blockbuster ruling in Hamdan v. Rumsfeld proved that bit of conventional wisdom wrong practically before it had become conventional. Predictions of a new era of hands-off judicial minimalism may have been premature.

Yes, we are seeing the expected shift to the political right with the replacement of moderate Justice Sandra Day O'Connor by conservative Justice Samuel A. Alito Jr. But, more significant, the role of swing justice has itself swung from O'Connor to Justice Anthony M. Kennedy. On all the most divisive issues, today's court is now a Supreme Court of One.

Yes, Kennedy, 69 and on the court for 18 years, has inherited the power to decide crucial cases, and this term he showed us what that might mean. In Hamdan, he joined with the court's left wing to invalidate the military tribunals President Bush had concocted for the detainees at Guantanamo Bay, Cuba. And the majority opinion he joined, written by Justice John Paul

DOJ_NMG_0038166

Stevens, was neither minimalist nor mild: "In undertaking to try Hamdan and subject him to criminal punishment, the Executive is bound to comply with the Rule of Law that prevails in this jurisdiction."

But more crucial, Kennedy has appropriated O'Connor's trick of writing an opinion or a concurrence that goes on to become the law of the land. O'Connor was famous (and not always in a good way) for signing onto an opinion, but on narrower grounds than the four other justices in the majority. The trick is that the justice who decides the case most narrowly speaks for the whole court. And that's how O'Connor imprinted her views on an awful lot of jurisprudence.

But unlike O'Connor, who invariably pooh-poohed her pivotal role on the court by saying she simply had one vote like every other justice, Kennedy is said to relish it. In his controversial book "Closed Chambers," Edward Lazarus, a former clerk for the late Justice Harry A. Blackmun, claimed that Kennedy deliberately stakes out positions that would make him a "necessary but distinctive fifth vote for a majority."

The fact that Kennedy is not moored to any one ideology or interpretive theory has led him to some spectacular defections from the court's conservatives -- to the lasting fury of the right. It was Kennedy, after all, who allied with O'Connor and Justice David H. Souter to preserve the core holding of Roe v. Wade in 1992, and it was Kennedy who wrote the court's broadest defense for decriminalizing gay sodomy. Kennedy also voted with the court's liberals to strike down the death penalty for juveniles and the mentally disabled , and he wrote a crucial opinion prohibiting sectarian prayer at a public-school graduation.

Kennedy is rumored to be easily influenced by his colleagues, the media and his affection for all things foreign, making his critics even more nervous. It sometimes makes his fans even more so. Adam Cohen of the New York Times recently wrote of Kennedy that, at the very least, "there is something refreshing about a justice who genuinely seems to have an open mind."

For years, the law clerks' "tug of war for Kennedy's mind" that Lazarus described has been the stuff of insider speculation. Now that Kennedy is the court's lone swing vote, that spectacle has become increasingly public.

From Focus on the Family founder James C. Dobson, who famously called Kennedy "the most dangerous man in America," to advocates at the court, who more and more frequently respond to the justice during oral arguments as though they were addressing themselves to the burning bush, trying to influence Kennedy has become something of an Olympic event. The hottest game in Supreme Court brief-writing is to quote Kennedy gratuitously and often. In other words, flattering Kennedy has become something of an art.

The other justices are playing the quote-Kennedy game, too, presumably in hopes of wooing him to their side. Read, for example, the opinion and dissent in Rapanos et al. v. United States , the term's main environmental case. Each side made sure to send a love note to Kennedy.

The justices may also be cozying up to Kennedy in other ways: He won himself some sweet writing assignments this term. Some court-watchers have suggested that the bizarre trio of Kennedy, Roberts and Stevens, who jointly issued a strange concurring opinion in the Jose Padilla case last April, was yet another effort by the court's right- and left-wing leaders to show Kennedy a little more love. Roberts is a savvy insider who knows that, over the years, the abuse heaped on the court's moderates from the right has pushed them into the arms of the court's liberals. So Kennedy is now being love-bombed.

And what is the crucial swing voter doing with his newfound superpowers? While it's still too early to predict, the invaluable annual end-of-term tally done by SCOTUSblog shows that Kennedy voted with the majority 84 percent of the time. In the 11 cases decided 5 to 4 this term, Kennedy was in the majority 75 percent of the time. He wrote the second-highest number of opinions, the most concurrences and only two dissents. But again, that's also only half the story. The other half is how Kennedy used that vote to shape the law.

It was Kennedy who provided the fifth vote in Hudson v. Michigan , an amazing criminal law case, in which he voted with the court's four reliably conservative jurists -- Alito, Roberts, Antonin Scalia and Clarence Thomas -- to hold that the remedy for police violations of the centuries-old "knock and announce" rule, required whenever the cops serve a warrant, was, in effect, nothing. But while Scalia's majority opinion showed a readiness to end the practice of throwing out evidence obtained illegally, Kennedy's moderating fifth vote put on the brakes, by insisting that the general rule of excluding evidence gained illegally was not in jeopardy. Future challenges to the exclusionary rule may hereafter be posed to the Kennedy Court of One.

Kennedy also provided the key fifth vote in Rapanos . The case tested the authority of the Army Corps of Engineers to enforce the Clean Water Act, and the four conservative justices would have dramatically curtailed the powers of the Corps. It was Kennedy -- again writing separately -- who refused to go as far as Scalia urged. And it was Kennedy whose opinion in Rapanos will thus become the standard for the Corps as it fashions future policy. Looking forward to next year's big greenhouse gases case, which explores whether the Environmental Protection Agency has an obligation to regulate carbon dioxide, a lawyer for the Sierra Club has already suggested that " Rapanos means . . . we will write our brief for Anthony Kennedy and maybe a little bit for Roberts."

Kennedy's was the moderating fifth voice again in the cacophony of the Texas redistricting case, where he sided with the court's conservatives to defeat the claim that then-Rep. Tom DeLay's mid-decade redistricting was unconstitutional.

DOJ_NMG_0038167

Nevertheless, he joined with the liberals to find that a new congressional district violated the rights of Hispanic voters. Once again, a Court of One.

And Hamdan , probably the most consequential separation-of-powers case in recent memory, also pivoted on Kennedy's vote. He sided with the liberals, while refusing to go as far as they would have led him.

What does all this nipping and tucking, shucking and jiving mean for Kennedy and the court? He clearly plans to fill the shoes recently vacated by O'Connor; shoes she, in turn, inherited from Justice Lewis Powell. They each played the role of moderating a polarized court; building bridges, navigating toward the center -- a center where most of the nation was most comfortable. Each took abuse for that when they sat on the court. Each was largely celebrated for it when they retired. Kennedy, too, appears poised to hold that center together. Indeed more often than not, he seems to be leaving his options open, laying the groundwork for revisiting these issue more fully in the future, as he becomes more comfortable in this role.

Much of the soaring rhetoric for which Kennedy was famed in previous years -- opinions that brimmed with "the ineffable glory of unflinching human dignity" and such -- seems to have been toned down of late. But then, perhaps Kennedy doesn't need to write about the ineffable glory of anything anymore. He can just sit back and bask in it instead.

dahlia.lithwick@hotmail.com

Dahlia Lithwick covers legal affairs for Slate, the online magazine at www.slate.com

Supreme Court Freshmen (LAT)

The Los Angeles Times, July 2, 2006

THURSDAY WAS THE END OF the first term of the Supreme Court presided over by Chief Justice John G. Roberts Jr., but it was just the beginning of the debate about how the law of the land has been changed by the Roberts court. Our answer: So far, not very much.

As it does in every term, the court staked out new ground in some areas, including patent and business law, but continuity was more evident than change. The justices reaffirmed, or at least did not disturb, controversial precedents on abortion rights and the regulation of election spending.

Continuity was evident even in last week's dramatic decision invalidating the military commissions set up by the Bush administration to try suspected terrorists at Guantanamo Bay, Cuba. The 5-3 ruling echoed decisions two years ago holding that the president had overreached in the war on terror.

Less than a year ago, some liberal activists were warning that the confirmation of Roberts to succeed the late Chief Justice William H. Rehnquist would jerk the court unacceptably to the right. That critique was recycled a little more respectably when President Bush named Judge Samuel A. Alito Jr. to replace perennial swing vote Sandra Day O'Connor.

Both Bush appointees have lived up to their advance billing as conservatives. Moreover, in two cases that had to be reargued because the justices split 4 to 4, the substitution of Alito for O'Connor may have altered the outcome in a conservative direction.

Yet the seismic shift dreaded by liberals and dreamed about by conservatives hasn't occurred. Partly, that is because this was a transition year. Alito didn't join the court until halfway through the term, and O'Connor's colleagues sent her off into retirement as the author of that judicial rarity, a unanimous abortion opinion. (The nine justices agreed that the absence of a health exception in a New Hampshire parental-consent law didn't render the entire statute unconstitutional.)

But even when Roberts and Alito would have shifted the law dramatically, as they did in supporting a much narrower definition of wetlands subject to federal regulation, their colleagues balked. In that case, as in last week's decision on the commissions, Justice Anthony M. Kennedy, a moderate Ronald Reagan appointee, distanced himself from the conservative bloc. In other cases he voted with the conservatives, vindicating the observation that, just as the Rehnquist court was really the O'Connor court, the Roberts court is actually the Kennedy court.

Kennedy's influence is one explanation of why a Roberts-Alito counterrevolution failed to materialize. Another is the fact that neither of the new justices lived up (or down) to the popular characterization of them as clones of liberal boogeymen Antonin Scalia and Clarence Thomas.

For example, the new justices joined Kennedy last week in a Texas reapportionment case in leaving the door open to future constitutional challenges to "partisan gerrymandering" — although, like Kennedy, they concluded that the Republican-friendly congressional map midwifed by former Rep. Tom DeLay didn't violate the Constitution. Scalia, joined by Thomas, said such challenges could never be the judiciary's business.

Alito went some way toward refuting his nickname of "Scalito" by rejecting Scalia's pet theory: that in interpreting acts of Congress, the courts should not take account of legislative history.

Even allowing for these differences, it would be foolish to deny that, especially with the Alito appointment, Bush has succeeded in moving the court somewhat to the right. But Supreme Court nominations — consequences of presidential elections

DOJ_NMG_0038168

— often lead to realignment. President Clinton's appointment of Ruth Bader Ginsburg to replace Byron White moved the court somewhat to the left. Such adjustments are no reason for senators to balk at highly qualified nominees such as Roberts, Alito or Ginsburg.

The Court's Electoral Thicket (WP)

By George F. Will

The Washington Post, July 2, 2006

Last July 1 Sandra Day O'Connor announced her decision to vacate the seat from which she frequently operated as the swing vote on a Supreme Court divided 5 to 4 on important cases. Anthony Kennedy's past pronouncements suggested he would relish that role. Last Wednesday he played it in cases concerning Texas redistricting.

The cases involved several questions, the most interesting -- because it has come to the court before and we now know it will again and because it revealed a recurring and worrisome kind of judging -- was this: Was the redistricting by the Republican-controlled legislature such a partisan gerrymander as to be somehow unconstitutional?

The court's dusty answer to this question is symptomatic of the difference-splitting that characterized the last years of the Rehnquist Court. In a plurality opinion, Kennedy said there may be a "manageable, reliable measure of fairness" in redistricting, but no set of facts has sufficed for the court to discover it.

Antonin Scalia believes it is delusional to think that such a standard can be anything other than judges' cumulative hunches -- not a neutral principle found in the Constitution. Joined by Clarence Thomas, Scalia said Wednesday that no one "has put forth a judicially discernible standard" for deciding when a gerrymander is too partisan. The Kennedy position allows people to continue trying to concoct a constitutional violation (of the guarantee of equal protection of the laws), even though the court provides no guidance to lower-court judges. Scalia and Thomas believe redistricting is a "political thicket" (Justice Felix Frankfurter's phrase) courts should not enter.

By leaving open the possibility that there is a constitutional answer to the question of what constitutes a "too political" gerrymander -- the position seems to be: We don't know what the standard is, but we don't know that it doesn't exist -- the court has again practiced "split-the-difference jurisprudence." That phrase is from Judge J. Harvie Wilkinson of the U.S. Court of Appeals for the 4th Circuit, writing in the Stanford Law Review.

Wilkinson identifies difference-splitting in some late Rehnquist Court decisions that resulted in "a series of finely spun opinions that increasingly constitutionalized" some volatile political debates. One decision, in 2004, concerned political gerrymandering in Pennsylvania. Four justices said all claims of unconstitutionally partisan gerrymandering are nonjusticiable because there are no truly judicial criteria for adjudicating them. Four other justices suggested various legal theories for adjudicating. Kennedy split the difference: He voted to reject the claim of unconstitutional gerrymandering, but refused to "foreclose all possibility of judicial relief" if some "limited and precise" constitutional violation were "found."

Where can it be "found"? Inevitably, not in the Constitution's text, history and structure but in judges' intuitions about "fairness." Thus does constitutional doctrine become little more than the judiciary's temperament or the temper of the times. But elections, not courts, are supposed to take the nation's temperature.

In some "finely spun" Rehnquist Court decisions, a monument featuring the Ten Commandments on the Texas Capitol grounds was not unconstitutional, but Ten Commandments displays, with other historical documents, in the hallways of two Kentucky courthouses were unconstitutional. The University of Michigan's policy of giving favored minorities 20 extra points on a 150-point admissions index to achieve undergraduate "diversity" was unconstitutional, but its law school's use of race as a " 'plus' factor" to achieve "a 'critical mass' of underrepresented minorities" was constitutional -- assuming, as O'Connor thought it realistic and pertinent to do, that in 25 years race-conscious admissions policies will not be "necessary."

Wilkinson acknowledges that "splitting differences has real benefits": "The outcomes of cases are often sensible, the court itself is often statesmanlike, and the spacious language of the Constitution is often seductive. Splitting differences allows the court to appear simultaneously cautious and progressive."

And yet: "Americans deserve not a liberal court, not a conservative court, not even a wise or Solomonic court, but a court that respects the limits of its power and the place of others within the constitutional structure."

Wilkinson warns that "methodology matters supremely in the law, if it is not to become the kissing cousin of politics." Granted, "split-the-difference" jurisprudence can be institutional prudence, preserving the court's standing with a public more interested in judicial results than judicial reasoning. But when political reasoning supplants judicial reasoning, courts preserve their popularity by sacrificing their proper function.

"There is," Wilkinson says, "a thin line between the unabashedly pragmatic exercise of splitting differences and the practice of politics itself," so "splitting the difference ought not to be confused with judicial restraint." Eventually, the public will notice, and recoil against, courts supplanting democratic institutions as arbitrators of our differences.

DOJ_NMG_0038169

georgewill@washpost.com

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

Scrushy Will Appeal Corruption Conviction (WSJ)

By Valerie Bauerlein

The Wall Street Journal, July 1, 2006

HealthSouth Corp. founder Richard M. Scrushy vowed to fight his conviction on political-corruption charges with "everything we've got" and he said it was a mistake to limit his defense during the two-month trial to less than two days.

In an interview, Mr. Scrushy said his lawyers probably should have called 10 to 15 witnesses over about a two-week period to help undercut the federal government's allegations that he bribed former Alabama Gov. Don Siegelman to get a spot on a state panel that regulates hospitals. "We didn't put them up" because the prosecution's case seemed unconvincing, Mr. Scrushy said. "We didn't feel we needed to."

Mr. Scrushy said he will appeal his conviction Thursday by a jury in Montgomery, Ala., on five or six different legal grounds. Before the trial, his lawyers contended that the jury pool included too few African-Americans and that Mr. Scrushy should be tried separately from three other defendants in the case. Mr. Scrushy said Friday that those issues could be part of his appeal.

The 53-year-old Mr. Scrushy plans to take a one-week vacation and then return to his home outside Birmingham, Ala., to work on his appeal. He had hoped to travel to Africa this fall with a religious ministry he recently launched, but the guilty verdict has forced those plans to be put on hold.

Ralphs To Pay $70 Million For Illegal Hiring Scheme (LAT)

By Martin Zimmerman And Ronald D. White, Times Staff Writers

The Los Angeles Times, July 1, 2006

Under the plea deal, the grocery chain would admit it deceptively used hundreds of its locked-out employees during a labor dispute.

The Ralphs grocery chain said Friday that it had agreed to pay $70 million in fines and restitution to settle criminal charges that it illegally rehired locked-out workers during the supermarket labor dispute in Southern California more than two years ago.

Under a proposed agreement filed Friday in U.S. District Court in Los Angeles, Ralphs would plead guilty to five felony charges included in the 53-count grand jury indictment returned against the company in December.

Ralphs was charged with violating federal laws by secretly rehiring about 1,000 locked-out workers during the 4 1/2 -month strike and lockout from October 2003 to February 2004. The case had been scheduled to go to trial Aug. 15 before U.S. District Judge Percy Anderson, who must approve the plea agreement.

In the agreement, Ralphs admitted that it used fake names and Social Security numbers to pull off the deception. Authorities said the scheme was designed to help keep stores running during the labor dispute, the longest and largest in U.S. history involving the supermarket industry.

The labor strife affected 852 stores and nearly 60,000 grocery workers at supermarkets across Southern and Central California. The dispute cost the grocery companies more than $1.5 billion in sales before it ended on Feb. 29, 2004, when workers ratified a new contract whose terms were widely seen as a defeat for the union.

"This labor dispute affected nearly everyone in Southern California," U.S. Atty. Debra Wong Yang said in a statement. "I hope that the resolution of this case will provide some relief to the thousands of workers who were injured by the criminal conduct that unfairly prolonged" the dispute.

Ralphs said it would plead guilty to violating federal laws regarding identity fraud, pension reporting and Social Security and Internal Revenue Service record-keeping, as well as one count of conspiracy.

The grocery chain said it would pay a $20-million fine to the federal government and create a $50-million restitution fund. Most of the money would be paid to the 19,000 Ralphs grocery clerks and meat cutters who were locked out during the dispute.

Officials of the United Food and Commercial Workers union, which represented the grocery employees, estimated that some workers could receive as much as $3,000 from the settlement.

The amount each union member receives from the fund would depend on factors such as the worker's pay rate, the amount of regular strike pay received and how much money, if any, the worker made at other jobs during the labor dispute.

The fund also would be used to reimburse the union for benefits paid to Ralphs employees during the standoff and to reimburse the grocery workers' health and retirement funds.

The company also would be placed on three years' probation and would establish court-supervised training programs.

DOJ_NMG_0038170

Ralphs and its parent, Cincinnati-based Kroger Co., also agreed to cooperate with the government's continuing investigation into the illegal hiring.

The agreement doesn't prevent the government from prosecuting current or former employees of Ralphs or related companies that were involved in the illegal conduct. So far, no individuals have been charged in the case.

The U.S. attorney's office said Ralphs admitted that two of its executives who helped oversee the employee health and retirement funds concealed the illegal hiring from other fund trustees. The unnamed executives were serving as top negotiators in contract talks with the union at the time, the government said.

If convicted on all counts in the indictment, Ralphs and Kroger could have faced fines of more than $100 million, plus restitution for workers and the union.

The amount of money the grocery chain agreed to pay was less important than the signal a plea agreement sent to the business community, said Nelson Lichtenstein, a history professor and director of the Center for the Study of Work, Labor and Democracy at UC Santa Barbara.

"The fact that Ralphs had to plead guilty and admitted to the tactics they used during the long dispute is clearly a victory for the union," Lichtenstein said. "But it's also a shot across the bow to businesses who think the days of the Wild West have returned in labor relations."

At a news conference in the parking lot of a Ralphs store in Studio City, Rick Icaza, president of UFCW Local 770 in Los Angeles, said the company "made a big mistake. They should never have done what they did. If not for this illegal activity, this dispute would not have gone on for so long."

Workers said money from the settlement wouldn't come close to repairing the financial damage they suffered during the strike and lockout. But they said they felt vindicated by Ralphs' guilty plea.

"We know they were guilty, and they didn't get away with it. We feel validated," said Jackie Gitmed, 46, a cashier from Burbank who said she started working at Ralphs 30 years ago.

Gitmed said she accumulated $15,000 in debt during the labor battle and was still paying back relatives who had helped her.

Of the workers who crossed the picket line and were rehired under the cover of false identities, she said, "I'm not bitter, but we were supposed to all be in this together."

None of the workers who were illegally hired have been charged. "The investigation is focusing on the people most culpable for the criminal conduct," said Thom Mrozek, spokesman for the U.S. attorney's office.

Kroger had admitted earlier that managers at some Ralphs stores had falsified records to rehire workers, but said the practice was limited to only a few hundred workers and wasn't condoned by upper management.

"Most of our managers followed the law and adhered to company policies," Ralphs President Dave Hirz said in a statement Friday. "Nonetheless, the illegal hiring of some locked-out employees that occurred at Ralphs during the strike was wrong and we regret that it took place."

Kroger initially placed the number of illegally hired workers at about 200 but has since concluded that the number might have approached 300, company spokeswoman Lynn Marmer said.

Kroger said it already had set aside enough money to cover the costs of the settlement.

The labor dispute began when union workers went on strike Oct. 11, 2003, against Safeway Inc. supermarkets Vons and Pavilions rather than accept cuts in their health benefits and pay. Ralphs and Albertsons Inc., adhering to a secret pact among the chains, locked out their workers the next day.

In addition to the criminal charges, the agreement announced Friday would also settle a complaint the union had filed against Ralphs with the National Labor Relations Board.

The labor board's Los Angeles office had dismissed the complaint, but the union was appealing.

Ralphs and the other chains still face a state antitrust lawsuit over an agreement to support one another financially during the dispute.

And the companies have struggled to regain the customers they had lost to rivals.

"The hard line that the grocery chains took turned out to be a good deal more costly than they thought," UC Santa Barbara's Lichtenstein said.

KLA Finds Options-Dating Problem (WSJ)

By Charles Forelle

The Wall Street Journal, July 1, 2006

Internal Probe May Lead To an Accounting Charge, Restatement of Earnings

DOJ_NMG_0038171

KLA-Tencor Corp. said Friday that an internal investigation found that some stock options to executives and employees were wrongly dated, and said that the problems could lead to an accounting charge and possibly a restatement.

The semiconductor-equipment maker provided little detail about the probe's findings in a press release, but the possibility of an accounting charge strongly implies that the misdating benefited executives and raises the question of whether grants were deliberately backdated or otherwise manipulated to confer that benefit.

The firm said it anticipates needing to take a charge to correct its accounting, but it said that the investigation, conducted by a board committee, has not determined if the charge will be significant enough to warrant restatement of prior figures.

KLA-Tencor, San Jose, Calif., is the subject of separate probes into its option grants by federal regulators and prosecutors. Over the years, KLA has demonstrated a highly unusual pattern of option grants to top executives dated ahead of big run-ups in share price, often at low points.

Backdating an option grant without disclosing the maneuver or accounting for it runs afoul of securities and accounting regulations. Particularly when done without the permission of the company's board, backdating could expose individuals to criminal fraud charges.

Options entitle the recipient to profit when shares rise above the "strike price," normally set to equal the market value on the grant date. In such a case, an option is said to be granted "at the money" and only has value if the fortunes of shareholders improve.

Wrongly dated option grants cause accounting trouble because, under accounting rules in place until very recently, "at the money" grants qualified for preferential treatment and weren't recorded as an expense.

Conversely, "discount options" -- those whose strike price is below market value when granted -- had to be recorded as an expense under those rules. In effect, a backdated option is really a discount option for which the company has taken the preferential accounting treatment that only at-the-money options deserved.

Some 50 companies are facing federal investigations into their option-granting practices. The probes are focusing on backdating. Just Thursday, Apple Computer Inc. said it had found "irregularities" in option grants from 1997 to 2001, including one grant to Chief Executive Steve Jobs.

Many of KLA-Tencor's unusually dated grants went to Kenneth Levy, who is the founder of one of its predecessor companies, a former chief executive, and the current chairman.

Among the most remarkable of KLA's grants to Mr. Levy were his two in 2001. The first was dated in April, at the bottom of a steep dip in share price and the lowest closing price of the first half. The second was dated in October, at the lowest closing price of the year. Several other top executives received grants with the same fortunate dates, securities filings show.

Mr. Levy and other executives also received grants dated at the lowest prices of 1998 and 2000. All of his grants between 1994 and 2001 preceded quick run-ups in share price. A May article in The Wall Street Journal that examined Mr. Levy's grant pattern found that the chance of the grants being dated as they were purely by chance was tiny -- around one in 20 million.

Mr. Levy could not be reached for comment. A KLA spokeswoman declined to elaborate significantly on the company's press release. She declined to provide the names of the independent directors conducting the board's probe, saying that such information was confidential.

Write to Charles Forelle at charles.forelle@wsj.com3

MZM Manager Accused Of Violating FEC Rules (WP)

By R. Jeffrey Smith

The Washington Post, July 1, 2006

The director of a defense contractor's office in Martinsville, Va., was accused yesterday of illegally funneling campaign donations to Rep. Virgil H. Goode Jr. (R-Va.), an act that the contractor has said was meant to obtain Goode's help in arranging defense funding for his company.

A federal court filing by the U.S. attorney for the District of Columbia, Kenneth L. Wainstein, said that Richard A. Berglund, a facility manager for MZM Inc., had violated the Federal Election Campaign Act by "aiding and abetting" a scheme by MZM's owner to donate the funds in the name of others.

According to the filing, Berglund and his wife wrote $4,000 in checks to "Representative A" in March 2005 after MZM's owner, Mitchell J. Wade, handed Berglund an equivalent amount of cash. It says that Berglund gave another $4,000 he received from Wade to two MZM colleagues, who in turn donated it to the congressman.

Federal Election Commission records -- which describe Berglund as a retired lieutenant colonel -- show that he and his wife gave that amount to Goode that month. He made no other donations to lawmakers that year.

DOJ_NMG_0038172

Goode's office said in a statement that he is Representative A, but the lawmaker was unaware that the Berglund donations were illegal "straw" contributions. Wade, who sold MZM last summer, pleaded guilty in February to making a total of $38,000 in illegal "straw" contributions to the lawmaker in 2003 and 2005 through his employees and their spouses.

Wade targeted Goode, according to Wade's plea agreement, because Wade wanted to open an office in Goode's district and believed that Goode "had the ability to request appropriations funding for this facility and would be an advocate for funding for MZM." The plea stated that Wade did not inform Goode or his staff that the donations were illegal.

Wade handed the checks directly to "Representative A" at a March 2005 fundraising event, according to the court document filed yesterday. That was around the time that Wade requested Goode's help in earmarking funds for the facility, according to Wade's plea agreement.

In June 2005, Goode's staff "confirmed to Wade that an appropriations bill would contain $9 million for the facility and a related program. Wade thanked Representative A and his staff for their assistance," according to the plea agreement.

The document naming Berglund is typically used to state facts alleging wrongdoing by someone cooperating in an investigation. Berglund's listed phone is disconnected, and his attorney could not be reached for comment yesterday.

CRIMINAL LAW:

Judge Acquits 2 Ex-Detectives In Mob Killings (NYT)

By Alan Feuer

The New York Times, July 1, 2006

A federal judge tossed out the racketeering convictions of two retired New York City detectives yesterday — including eight murders for the mob — because the statute of limitations had run out, despite citing overwhelming evidence that the men had committed "heinous and violent crimes."

The ruling by Judge Jack B. Weinstein entirely reversed the conviction of the two detectives, Louis J. Eppolito and Stephen Caracappa, who were found guilty in April of some of the most stunning corruption charges in the city's history.

Although a jury found that Mr. Eppolito and Mr. Caracappa had participated, as paid assassins, in killings for the mob, the judge acquitted the two men on the murder counts of the racketeering conspiracy, though not on evidentiary grounds. But the judge left open the possibility that the prosecution could seek to retry the defendants on a drug charge, and Mr. Eppolito, alone, on a money-laundering count.

The ruling, in a 102-page order that touched upon Thomas More and the sanctity of the Constitution, was the latest and most severe turn in the 15-month case.

It shocked the United States attorney's office in Brooklyn, which said it would appeal. And it bitterly disappointed the families of the victims in the case, some of whom had given heart-rending testimony at the two men's sentencing last month, where they were given life terms.

The decision sent a surge of joy through the offices of the defendants' new lawyers, one of whom, Joseph Bondy, called it "the most substantial legal victory" in recent history.

It also threatened to disrupt the careers — and the book deals — of some investigators in the case. And it led to the bizarre prospect that the two detectives — whom Judge Weinstein outright accused in his order of being stone-cold killers — could walk free from federal detention in Brooklyn as early as next week.

The judge waxed eloquent in acknowledging that his decision might seem strange to some.

"It will undoubtedly appear peculiar to many people that heinous criminals such as the defendants, having been found guilty on overwhelming evidence of the most despicable crimes of violence, should go unwhipped of justice," he wrote.

"Yet our Constitution, statutes and morality require that we be ruled by the law, not vindictiveness or the advantages of the moment."

The judge also wrote that even though there was little doubt that Mr. Eppolito and Mr. Caracappa had "kidnapped, murdered, and assisted kidnappers and murderers," he had no choice but to let them go because the five-year statute of limitations in conspiracy cases had run out.

His ruling was hardly the first mention of the statute of limitations. Virtually from the outset of the case, Judge Weinstein said he was queasy about the decision to accuse the men of an overarching conspiracy that included the eight gangland murders, all in Brooklyn in the 1980's and 1990's, and a much more recent — and less serious — charge of selling an ounce of methamphetamine in Las Vegas last year.

DOJ_NMG_0038173

In October, the defense team seized upon the judge's qualms and moved to quash the case before the trial, saying, in essence, that the government had strapped the drug charge onto the murder charges "to freshen up" the case and to avoid the statute of limitations.

Judge Weinstein denied the motion, deciding instead to go to trial and see if the government could prove that an "ongoing criminal enterprise" indeed stretched from the streets of Brooklyn to the casinos and subdivisions of Las Vegas.

Judge Weinstein's ruling spiked that argument, and no matter how pained he seemed to be in vacating the convictions, he took the government to task. "The government's case against these defendants," he wrote, "stretches federal racketeering and conspiracy law to the breaking point."

There was a certain incongruity lurking in the fact that the statute of limitations was practically the first issue raised in pretrial hearings by the defendants' former lawyers, Bruce Cutler and Edward Hayes, who just this week were forced to appear in court to defend themselves against charges of incompetence that had been filed against them by the two detectives. Judge Weinstein threw those charges out.

Still, it was in keeping with the topsy-turvy nature of the case that the very argument that the fired legal team had offered in their former clients' defense was the one that eventually prevailed.

The judge's ruling provided a much more sweeping victory than the defendants would have gotten with a finding that their lawyers were incompetent.

In that case, they would have been retried. Now there can be no new trial on the racketeering charges, although a higher court could reinstate the convictions.

Reached at his office, Mr. Hayes was at first speechless — a rarity for a man who once sang "Danny Boy" in open court.

He said the prosecution had made a grave tactical error by not allowing the case to be tried in state court, which has no statute of limitations on murder, instead of using the federal racketeering charges, which have the five-year limitation.

"But this is a Justice Department that more than any in my lifetime has shown a mad-dog desire to control everything and to ignore the law," he said. "And they paid the price in this case."

Mr. Cutler said it would have been difficult for a jury to acquit on what some might see as a technicality, but he praised Judge Weinstein for his independence.

"I take comfort in the fact that there are judges who do what they think is right," he said.

Robert Nardoza, a spokesman for the United States attorney's office in Brooklyn, released a terse statement yesterday supporting the jury's verdict.

"The jury in this case unanimously found Eppolito and Caracappa guilty of racketeering and murder based on overwhelming evidence," the statement read.

"And based on the law that was given to them by the court, each of the 12 jurors specifically found that the defendants' heinous crimes were committed within the statute of limitations. We intend to pursue an appeal."

Judge Rubs Out Mob Cops Verdict (NYDN)

By John Marzulli, Daily News Staff Writer

New York Daily News, July 3, 2006

Despite having murdered, maimed and sold out informants to blood-thirsty mobsters, the Mafia cops' racketeering conviction was stunningly overturned yesterday - all because they apparently steered clear of the mob for the last five years.

The ruling left prosecutors and victims' relatives speechless, and even seemed to surprise allies of ex-NYPD Detectives Louis Eppolito. and Stephen Caracappa.

Brooklyn Federal Judge Jack Weinstein acknowledged there was no doubt the disgraced duo were hit men for the mob - guilty of being the most corrupt cops in NYPD history.

Yet he still threw out the convictions, which carried life sentences, on a technicality.

"The evidence at trial overwhelmingly established the defendants' participation in a large number of heinous and violent crimes," Weinstein, 84, wrote.

"Nevertheless . . . the five-year statute of limitations mandates granting the defendants a judgment of acquittal on the key charge against them: racketeering conspiracy," a decision that the judge admitted would appear "peculiar to many people."

Federal prosecutors vowed to appeal the ruling; Weinstein indicated that if he is reversed, the Mafia cops will begin their life sentences immediately.

For now, they will remain behind bars at the Metropolitan Detention Center in Brooklyn until Weinstein hears a likely bail application, sometime after he returns from vacation July 21.

Eppolito's new lawyer, Joseph Bondy, broke the staggering news to his client at the jail last night.

Bondy said a weeping Eppolito embraced him and said, "I feel as though my prayers were answered and that God is my true judge. I was afraid that I was going to spend the rest of my life in jail."

Eppolito told Bondy he would tell Caracappa what happened when he got back to the cell they share. Caracappa's lawyer isn't scheduled to see him until today.

A federal jury in April convicted Eppolito, 57, and Caracappa, 64, of participating in eight gangland murders.

The racketeering indictment charged that Eppolito and Caracappa. went on the payroll of the Luchese crime family in the 1980s in Brooklyn. It specified that the duo committed or helped commit the slayings between 1986 and 1990.

Despite a lull in their criminal activity in the late 1990s, their criminal enterprise resumed last year in Las Vegas, where they had settled after their retirement, the indictment charged.

The ex-cops' new legal team sought to overturn the verdict on two fronts: poor legal representation and the five-year statute of limitations.

Prosecutors seemed unprepared for Weinstein's ruling - and perhaps with good reason.

Earlier this month, Weinstein left no doubt at a sentencing hearing that he was convinced of both defendants' guilt. Then, last week, after Eppolito testified at a hearing for a new trial, the judge called him an immoral liar.

But Weinstein warned prosecutors on multiple occasions that he had serious misgivings about their theory connecting the Mafia cops' criminal activities in Brooklyn to their money laundering and drug crimes in Las Vegas.

Prosecutors noted yesterday that the jurors "specifically found that the defendants' heinous crimes were committed within the statute of limitations," according to a statement from Robert Nardoza, a spokesman for Brooklyn U.S. Attorney Roslynn Mauskopf.

But Weinstein concluded that the conspiracy ended when both detectives retired from the force.

The decision was vindication of sorts for the original defense attorneys, Bruce Cutler and Edward Hayes, who were blamed by their clients for the conviction.

"I'm happy that we have a courageous Judge Weinstein to do the right thing," Cutler said last night.

And in their exclusive gated community in Las Vegas, neighbors and friends crowded Caracappa's home to watch news reports of the legal victory on CNN.

"I know my husband will be unhappy that he's exonerated on a technicality," said Caracappa's wife, Monica. "But I will take my husband home any way I can."

Across the street, Fran Eppolito said she was "overjoyed" by the decision, though mindful the case is far from over. "I am very hopeful now, the most hopeful I've been in a long time. I just hope this works out in Lou's favor."

Eppolito and Caracappa had been suspected of being mob hit men since former Luchese underboss Anthony (Gaspipe) Casso ratted them out in 1994, revealing they had been leaking secret information to him for years.

Casso self-destructed as a witness, and it took authorities 10 years to flip jailed Luchese associate and Mafia cops go-between Burton Kaplan. The feds, rather than the Brooklyn district attorney, prosecuted the case because the rules of evidence would permit uncorroborated testimony by Kaplan. and other cooperating witnesses.

Brooklyn prosecutors now will await the U.S. Court of Appeals' decision before deciding whether to pursue state murder charges against the Mafia cops, said spokesman Jerry Schmetterer.

If Weinstein had dismissed the racketeering conspiracy charge before the verdict, the government would not be able to appeal, sources said.

Ex-cops' Convictions Tossed (NSDY)

By Anthony M. Destefano, Newsday Staff Writer

Long Island Newsday, July 3, 2006

Judge rules that statute of limitations requires reversal of guilty verdicts for racketeering

They did the crimes but might not do the time.

In a stunning development Friday, a federal judge threw out key racketeering conspiracy convictions against "Mafia Cops" Louis Eppolito and Stephen Caracappa - convictions that included involvement in eight gangland killings from 1986 to 1991 - because of a conflict with the federal five-year statute of limitations.

U.S. District Court Judge Jack B. Weinstein, in a 77-page ruling, said the trial "overwhelmingly established" the guilt of Eppolito, 57, and Caracappa, 64, in the slayings and other crimes, but wrote that the legal issue compelled him to acquit them.

"As a result of spillover prejudice resulting from the trial of that charge [racketeering conspiracy] with other crimes charged in the indictment, defendants are entitled to a new trial on the remaining charges," Weinstein said.

Weinstein ordered a new trial for both men on charges of drug dealing and, in Eppolito's case, money laundering. The retrial would involve charges that Eppolito and Caracappa were involved in a small methamphetamine transaction in Nevada, where they both lived after retiring from the Police Department.

"We intend to pursue an appeal," said Robert Nardoza, a spokesman for U.S. Attorney Roslynn Mauskopf.

Should the Second U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals reverse Weinstein's decision, the provisional sentences of life imprisonment that he had given Eppolito and Caracappa would be reinstated.

Bail applications for the jailed defendants, who were convicted April 6, are expected to be filed shortly.

Lawyers reacted with astonishment as news of the ruling ricocheted around the city's legal community.

"We won the case! We won the case!" an ecstatic Edward Hayes, who represented Caracappa at trial, said when told by a Newsday reporter of the decision.

Hayes and Bruce Cutler, who represented Eppolito at trial, split with their clients after the convictions. Eppolito and Caracappa said the lawyers' representation of them was poor, an assessment with which Weinstein disagreed. The defendants hired new lawyers, who brought the motions that resulted in Friday's acquittals.

"I guess Rae [Koshetz] and I didn't do such a bad job after all," Hayes said of work that he and his co-counsel did in researching the statute-of-limitations issue for the trial.

"Judge Weinstein has a reputation as a brilliant and independent jurist, and this opinion confirms that," said Dan Nobel, Caracappa's new lawyer.

Eppolito's new lawyer, Joseph Bondy, could not be reached.

Legal experts and officials said the statute-of-limitations issue always was a troublesome part of the case.

Eppolito and Caracappa were indicted on March 9, 2005. The most recent killing in the case took place in May 1991. Generally, under federal criminal law, crimes alleged in a racketeering conspiracy have to have occurred within five years of the indictment.

Before the trial, Weinstein frequently expressed reservations about whether crimes so far in the past could be prosecuted within the five-year statute of limitations.

To address the conflict, federal prosecutors charged Eppolito and Caracappa with involvement in a Nevada drug sale in late 2004 and early 2005. Prosecutors maintained that the Nevada crime was part of the original racketeering enterprise conspiracy, thus extending the alleged conspiracy beyond the crucial cutoff date of March 9, 2000.

Weinstein denied a defense pretrial motion to dismiss the indictment, saying the nature of the alleged crimes required a full trial. When the jury convicted Eppolito and Caracappa in April, the panel specifically found that the conspiracy continued beyond March 9, 2000.

In his decision Friday, Weinstein stressed that prosecutors had proved the defendants were involved in eight slayings, two kidnappings and other wrongdoing. But as a matter of law, he said that after Eppolito's and Caracappa's retirement from the Police Department, by early 1990, "the conspiracy that began in New York in the 1980s had come to a definitive close."

By the time the defendants moved to Las Vegas, Weinstein said, any concealment done there was not part of the conspiracy.

JUDGE: KILLER MOB COP DUO GUILTY AS SIN - & I HAVE TO LET THEM WALK (NYPOST)

By Zach Haberman

The New York Post, July 3, 2006

A judge says he has no choice but to let the mob cops get away with murder.

In a bombshell decision, Brooklyn federal court Judge Jack Weinstein yesterday tossed out on a legal technicality the racketeering conspiracy conviction against ex-NYPD Detectives Louis Eppolito and Stephen Caracappa for acting as mob moles and hit men while wearing their gold shields.

The judge said that evidence presented at trial pointed heavily toward the disgraced duo kidnapping and murdering for Luchese crime family underboss Anthony "Gaspipe" Casso between 1986 and 1990. But the five-year statute of limitations has expired on those charges, he said.

"The evidence presented at trial overwhelmingly established the defendants' participation in a large number of heinous and violent crimes, including eight murders," Weinstein said in the 77-page decision.

"They kidnapped, murdered and assisted kidnappers and murderers, all while sworn to protect the public against such crimes," the judge said, apparently agreeing with the jury's findings.

"Nevertheless, an extended trial, evidentiary hearings, briefings and argument establishes that the five-year statute of limitations mandates granting the defendants a judgment of acquittal on the key charge against them - racketeering conspiracy."

DOJ_NMG_0038176

Prosecutors vowed to appeal - and sources said the Brooklyn DA's office is mulling whether to charge them with murder in state court.

Highly decorated detectives Eppolito, 57, and Caracappa, 64, were convicted in April of helping Casso commit eight gangland slayings - including the kidnapping of diamond dealer Israel Greenwald in 1986.

The two also were found guilty of handing Gambino family associate James Hydell over to Casso, who tortured and killed him for an attempted hit on the Mafia big's life.

When the mob cops were sentenced to life in prison on June 5, Weinstein said: "This is probably the most heinous series of crimes ever tried in this courthouse."

The surprise ruling yesterday brought Eppolito's daughter, Andrea, to tears when she heard the news from Eppolito's new lawyer, Joseph Bondy.

"I'm ecstatic and elated," she told The Post. "We've always maintained his innocence. We've always believed in him."

"This is the first step in getting my father back in my life," Andrea, 29, said in a telephone interview from Las Vegas.

"This is such a victory for my father."

Bruce Cutler and Ed Hayes, who represented the pair at trial, argued that the statute of limitations negated the crimes - whether they committed them or not.

Weinstein apparently agreed with them, saying , "The conspiracy that began in New York in the 1980s had come to a definite close" when the pair moved to Las Vegas in the mid-1990s. While there, Eppolito allegedly laundered drug money from mob associate Burton Kaplan.

"The defendants no longer had access to confidential law enforcement information and were no longer in contact with their old associates in the Luchese crime family" in Vegas, Weinstein wrote.

"Their enterprise had effectively been put out of business by their own retirements and their compatriots' arrest," he said, referring to Casso and Kaplan, who testified at trial that he was the go-between for the cops and Casso.

Caracappa's new lawyer, Daniel Nobel, said his client had not yet been told the good news, but said it should not be considered a shock.

"Judge Weinstein repeatedly cautioned [the prosecutors] that they risk exactly this result," said Nobel, noting that the judge warned them numerous times throughout the trial that he was irked by the statute-of-limitations issue.

When Weinstein released them on bail the first time, he called the connection between the murder charges and the Las Vegas money-laundering and drug charges "very thin."

Yesterday, the judge said the jury's verdict on the money-laundering and drug-dealing charges resulted from a "spillover prejudice" of the murder charges and ordered a retrial for those counts. He did not provide a definitive date for the new trial.

The retrial would only address the charges stemming from their years in Las Vegas. But sources said Brooklyn DA Charles Hynes is mulling the possibility of trying the mob cops for murder in state court, where no statute of limitations exists on murder.

Eppolito's lawyer said his client still doesn't know about the decision.

"I would imagine he would think it's April Fool's Day or that I'm joking with him," said Bondy, adding that he plans to make a motion to get Eppolito sprung on bail.

Weinstein had released the pair on $5 million bail last July, when they were facing murder charges, so both lawyers believe they have a good shot of getting them out of Brooklyn's Metropolitan Detention Center. They have been stuck in the same cell on 23-hours-a-day lockdown.

The feds are sticking to their guns.

"The jury in this case unanimously found Eppolito and Caracappa guilty of racketeering and murder based on overwhelming evidence," said Brooklyn U.S. Attorney's Office spokesman Robert Nardoza. "Based on the law that was given to them by the court, each of the 12 jurors specifically found that the defendants' heinous crimes were committed within the statute of limitations."

"We intend to pursue an appeal," Nardoza said.

"It's a very good day," said Hayes. "It does reaffirm our trial strategy, of course."

Louis Eppolito Jr. said he's thrilled by his father's legal victory, but was quick to note: "There's going to be a lot of angry families out there."

'Mafia' Cops' Convictions Upset (PHDN)

By Larry Mcshane

Philadelphia Daily News, July 3, 2006

NEW YORK - In a stunning blow to federal prosecutors, a Brooklyn judge yesterday tossed out the racketeering convictions of two former police detectives who were found guilty two months ago of participating in eight murders while on the payroll of a brutal mob underboss.

Louis Eppolito and Steven Caracappa, who have been described as the most corrupt officers in New York police history, were also granted new trials on lesser charges by U.S. District Judge Jack Weinstein. Less than a month ago, Weinstein had told the "Mafia Cops" that they were responsible for "the most heinous series of crimes ever tried in this courthouse."

But the judge, in yesterday's 77-page ruling, said he was compelled to set aside the verdict - in spite of what he called their obvious guilt - because the racketeering statute of limitations for the worst of the pair's crimes had passed.

"The evidence at trial overwhelmingly established the defendants' participation in a large number of heinous and violent crimes," he wrote. "Nevertheless... the five-year statute of limitations mandates granting the defendants a judgment of acquittal on the key charge against them - racketeering conspiracy."

Federal prosecutors immediately promised to appeal the decision.

The detectives either committed or facilitated the murders while working with the NYPD between 1986-90, prosecutors said. But once the pair retired to Las Vegas in the '90s, "the conspiracy that began in New York in the 1980s had come to a definite close," the judge ruled. "The defendants were no longer in contact with their old associates in the Luchese crime family."

Weinstein granted the pair a new trial on drug charges and Eppolito a new trial on money-laundering charges, saying their convictions on those charges had been tainted because they were linked to the most serious counts.

He added, however, that if an appeals court reverses his ruling, Eppolito and Caracappa should be denied a new trial and required to serve life in prison.

Defense attorneys had argued that the statute of limitations had expired on the most serious allegations against the pair, who allegedly spent four years on the payroll of both the New York Police Department and Luchese crime family underboss Anthony "Gaspipe" Casso. Testimony showed the two earned $65,000 for one of the slayings.

Prosecutors had countered that the murders were part of an ongoing conspiracy that lasted through a 2005 drug deal with FBI informant Steven Corso.

"I am very happy," said Edward Hayes, Caracappa's trial lawyer. "It's exactly what we argued during the trial. I am very happy for my client, and I do feel it is a vindication of our trial strategy."

In one of the trial's many strange twists, Hayes was called to court earlier this week to testify after Caracappa sought a new trial based on poor representation at the trial.

Weinstein threw out the racketeering charges just 25 days after he told the pair they would receive life in prison on their convictions. There's now a chance that the pair, jailed immediately after their April 6 convictions, could be out on bail next week.

Judge Tosses `Mafia Cops' Convictions (LAT)

By Ellen Barry, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, July 3, 2006

He rules the statute of limitations has expired, and orders a new trial on lesser charges.

NEW YORK — In a stinging rebuke to federal prosecutors, U.S. District Judge Jack Weinstein on Friday threw out the convictions of the so-called Mafia Cops, saying that the government's case stretched the law "to the breaking point" by charging them with racketeering after the five-year statute of limitations had expired.

Weinstein did not mince words, however, in addressing the defendants — retired New York police detectives Louis Eppolito and Stephen Caracappa. He said the trial "overwhelmingly established" that the two men had "kidnapped, murdered and assisted kidnappers and murderers, all the while sworn to protect the public against such crimes."

"It will undoubtedly appear peculiar to many people that heinous criminals like the defendants … should go unwhipped of justice. Yet our Constitution, statutes and morality require that we be ruled by the law, not by the vindictiveness or the advantages of the moment," Weinstein wrote in his 77-page memorandum. He ordered that the two receive a new trial on lesser charges of money laundering and dealing drugs.

Robert Nardoza, a spokesman for U.S. Atty. Roslynn Mauskopf, said prosecutors planned to appeal Weinstein's decision.

The ruling marks a sudden reversal of fortune for Eppolito and Caracappa.

On April 6, a jury found them guilty of 70 counts of racketeering in one of the most sensational cases of police corruption in New York's history. In a monthlong trial, witnesses testified that the two friends had formed a partnership with Anthony "Gaspipe" Casso, an underboss with the Lucchese family. In exchange for a shared $4,000 monthly retainer, they would pass along police information about mob figures and occasionally act as hit men themselves.

"They didn't deliver us from evil, they themselves were evil personified," Mauskopf said the day their convictions were announced. "They used that shield, they used that power to murder, to kidnap — all for the mob, all for their own greed."

DOJ_NMG_0038178

After the verdict, Eppolito and Caracappa fired their high-powered attorneys and last week asked for a mistrial on the grounds that their defense was not competent.

Eddie Hayes, who represented Caracappa at trial, said Weinstein's decision vindicates his defense strategy, which he said leaned heavily on the statute of limitations issue — knowing it would not be compelling to the jury.

"I thought the government overreaching here was clear from the beginning, and I always said that," said Bruce Cutler, who represented Eppolito. "If you ask me if I expected it, I didn't expect it." Still, Cutler said, he was "gratified."

The statute of limitations question first arose last summer, when the former detectives were indicted. Weinstein called it a "weak link in [the government's] allegations."

Prosecutors had strong evidence linking Eppolito and Caracappa to eight murders between 1986 and 1990, including one in which they turned on police lights, pulled a man's car over and shot him in the head. Those crimes clearly fell outside the five-year statute of limitations for racketeering, and Weinstein urged prosecutors to charge them under federal murder-for-hire laws.

Prosecutors reframed their indictment several times but, for reasons they have not explained, opted to stick with racketeering. They argued that Eppolito and Caracappa had continued their conspiracy in Las Vegas with a cluster of lesser crimes committed between 1994 and 2005.

In Friday's decision, Weinstein said the government had failed to prove there was a continuing conspiracy.

"A retired contractor who opens a delicatessen in his retirement may encourage his old employees and clients to buy their lunches at his new store, and time on job sites may have taught him what brand of pastrami those customers will prefer; that does not mean he remains in the construction business," the judge wrote.

Weinstein added that although he had concerns about the statute of limitations before the trial began, he chose to allow the trial to proceed "in order to preserve the government's right to appeal" if he should reverse the jury's verdict.

Weinstein, 85, has made headlines with some regularity during his 40 years on the bench. In 1997, he ordered Vincent "The Chin" Gigante — who had worn a bathrobe and slippers as street clothes for years — to appear "properly attired, shaved and barbered." Gigante complied.

More often, he has drawn notice for using his power in the name of reform, as in a 1965 case of 23 draft-dodgers who fled to Canada. Weinstein decided the fugitives deserved representation and appointed counsel for them, said Stephen Gillars, a professor at the NYU School of Law.

"The word 'maverick' fits nicely in the best of senses," Gillars said. Weinstein's decisions have been overturned by the U.S. 2nd Circuit Court of Appeals for "going too far out on a limb," he said.

The decision in the Mafia cops case, though, focuses on a narrow legal issue. In explaining his decision, Weinstein quoted the play "A Man for All Seasons," in which Sir Thomas More argues that even the devil deserves the full benefit of law: "This country's planted thick with laws from coast to coast — men's laws, not God's — and if you cut them down, do you really think you could stand upright in the winds that would blow then?"

NEW HEARTBREAK FOR VICTIMS' KIN (NYPOST)

By Zach Haberman And Jennifer Fermino

The New York Post, July 3, 2006

Less then three months ago, Betty Hydell was rejoicing that the dirty cops who helped kill her son got what they deserved - a guilty verdict.

But yesterday, when an FBI agent called her Staten Island home and told her their conviction had been overturned, she wondered if the evil pair would have the last laugh.

"We thought it was over," she said.

"I couldn't believe it. I couldn't see why the judge would do this. He called it a 'hideous' crime."

Louis Eppolito and Stephen Caracappa kidnapped James Hydell in 1986 and delivered him to a mobster. His body was never found.

His sister, Elizabeth Hydell, said, "This is insane. They're getting away with these murders."

Authorities told the families they would appeal.

The relatives' reaction - a mixture of sadness, anger and confusion - mirrored the other families who lost loved ones at the bloodstained hands of the Mafia cops who took orders from the wrong side of the law.

"I think this whole thing makes a mockery of our judicial system," said Danielle Lino, whose father, Ed Lino, a Gambino soldier, was shot in the head by Caracappa.

It is unclear how the ruling by U.S. District Judge Jack Weinstein will affect the six pending civil suits against Eppolito and Caracappa.

zach.haberman@nypost.com

Shock, But Some Praise, After Legal Ruling (NYT)

By Robert D. McFadden

The New York Times, July 1, 2006

The wife and daughter of one murder victim called it a shock. Lawyers for the men who had been convicted called it sound legal reasoning, a vindication of their trial strategy, and said that freedom on bail — not life in prison — might be next. Prosecutors, carefully avoiding hints of disappointment, promised to appeal.

After months of twists and turns in a federal case that ended in guilty verdicts for two former city police detectives, including convictions in eight murders for the mob a generation ago, Judge Jack B. Weinstein's decision yesterday to toss out the convictions on a statute-of-limitations ruling stunned practically everyone involved, although the defendants' lawyers were calmly making "I-told-you-so" statements.

While reaction was swift and predictable — an abyss between victims' families and their lawyers on one side, and defendants and their representatives on the other — there was general agreement that Judge Weinstein had made a hard decision on principle, according to law, and some called it courageous.

The judge acknowledged that the evidence at trial had overwhelmingly established that Louis J. Eppolito and Stephen Caracappa had committed killings for the mob, kidnappings and other "heinous and violent crimes." He noted, though, that a five-year federal statute of limitations had lapsed, compelling him to set aside the jury's verdict in his courtroom on April 6.

"It was really a very courageous decision," said Joseph A. Bondy, Mr. Eppolito's latest lawyer. "We're relieved, obviously. Mr. Eppolito and his family are relieved beyond words." Mr. Bondy — who succeeded Bruce Cutler, the trial lawyer, after Mr. Eppolito accused him of incompetent representation (a charge not upheld in a post-trial hearing) — said he would seek bail for his client next week.

Mr. Cutler, sounding a bit bruised by his former client's accusation, calling it a "distasteful calumny," said he had mixed feelings about the new turn. But instead of talking about Mr. Eppolito, he focused on his trial defense, which cited the statute of limitations as a flaw in the prosecution's case. He said he was gratified that the judge — a jurist of "courage and independence" — had agreed.

As for losing the trial, Mr. Cutler said the gravity of the accusations — cold-blooded murders for hire, kidnapping and other crimes — had made it "hard for the jury to say not guilty" on a fine point of law.

Edward Hayes, who represented Mr. Caracappa during the trial, also praised Judge Weinstein and called his ruling "the second major rejection for the Justice Department in two days," apparently referring to the United States Supreme Court's repudiation on Thursday of the Bush administration's plan to place Guantánamo Bay detainees on trial before military commissions.

Mr. Hayes, who was also accused of incompetent defense by his client in a failed bid for a new trial, said he had not talked to Mr. Caracappa about the latest ruling. Asked if he would ever represent Mr. Caracappa again, he said: "No. I defended him once. I showed him what kind of man I was, and he showed what kind of man he is. I'm not bitter. It's a business."

Judge Weinstein's ruling was a stunning blow to prosecutors, who had presented evidence on violent crimes as part of a larger racketeering conspiracy. The judge held that the conspiracy begun in New York in the 1980's had ended when the defendants retired to Las Vegas and were no longer in contact with the Luchese crime family, which had hired them.

Prosecutors with the United States attorney's office in Brooklyn had argued that the murders were part of a continuing conspiracy that lasted through a 2005 drug deal with a federal informant and that the statute of limitations thus did not apply. Speaking for the office, Robert Nardoza issued a short statement.

"The jury in this case unanimously found Eppolito and Caracappa guilty of racketeering and murder based on overwhelming evidence," it said. "And based on the law that was given to them by the court, each of the 12 jurors specifically found that the defendants' heinous crimes were committed within the statute of limitations. We intend to pursue an appeal."

The ruling was wrenching news to the slain men's families, some of whose members had made impassioned statements at the trial. Michal Weinstein, 30, the daughter of Israel Greenwald, a diamond dealer killed in 1986 and whose remains were discovered under the floor of a Brooklyn garage in 2005, said her mother had called her with news of the decision.

"We want to see that whoever is responsible — well, we know who's responsible — for our father's murder is punished, in accordance with the law," Ms. Weinstein said in a phone interview. "It's taken the breath out of everybody. It's just shocking. I'm still in shock, honestly."

Her mother, Leah Greenwald, 52, said that while shocked by the ruling, she respected it. "We, my daughters and I, do not feel betrayed, but we are shocked and we still believe that ultimately the law will work," she said, her voice calm but with a hint of a quaver. She became more emotional as she spoke of 19 years of not knowing her husband's fate.

DOJ_NMG_0038180

At one point in the early 1990's, she said, the family rented an apartment a block away from the Nostrand Avenue garage, near Avenue I, where her husband's remains were found. "I lived there for two years, I parked my car right across the street," she said bitterly. "We were looking for him, and now that we know, it is simply unbelievable that he was so close."

The Greenwalds' lawyer, Benjamin Brafman, called Judge Weinstein "wise and careful" and noted that, while disappointed in his decision, "I respect his ruling." The family, he said, would "continue to pursue justice for the murder of their father/husband in a civil forum and in any future criminal proceedings at either the state or federal level."

Gerald L. Shargel, a lawyer who has defended mobsters, including John J. Gotti, the late don of the Gambino crime family, said the prosecution "had to have known that it was a reach" to use the racketeering conspiracy charge "because the statute of limitations really was pushing the envelope." Mr. Shargel had no role in the trial of the turncoat detectives.

If the prosecution's appeal is denied, new trials on lesser drug and money-laundering charges could follow. Mr. Shargel said that New York State had no statute of limitations on murder, and that the case might have been — or still could be — prosecuted by state authorities. "Jurisdiction had everything to do with this case," he said.

Victims' Families Shocked At Reversal (NSDY)

By Carl Macgowan, Newsday Staff Writer

Long Island Newsday, July 3, 2006

Leah Greenwald said she was shocked Friday when she heard that the disgraced cops accused of killing her husband may go free.

"This is horrible," said Greenwald, of Fresh Meadows. "It's very upsetting because according to the evidence, they definitely are guilty."

Former detectives Louis Eppolito and Stephen Caracappa had been convicted of taking part in eight murders for the Lucchese crime family. Brooklyn federal judge Jack Weinstein threw out the racketeering convictions Friday.

A murder tied to the cops was that of Israel Greenwald, a Brooklyn gem merchant, who was believed to have been killed in 1986.

The Greenwald family is suing Eppolito, Caracappa and the city for $500 million. The former detectives and the city have been sued by the families of at least five other victims.

"Judge Weinstein is a wise and careful judge, and although disappointed by his decision, I respect his ruling," Greenwald's Manhattan attorney, Benjamin Brafman, said in a statement. "On behalf of the Greenwald family, we will continue to pursue justice for the murder of their father/husband in a civil forum and in any future criminal proceedings at either a state or federal level."

Michaelangelo Matera, attorney for the family of Edward Lino, who the detectives were accused of killing in 1992, said he didn't expect Weinstein's decision.

"We were extremely shocked by the judge's decision," Matera said. "We are looking forward to the appellate process and feel hopeful that the guilty verdicts will be reinstated."

Victims' Kin Call Ruling 'So Absurd' (NYDN)

By Greg B. Smith, Daily News Staff Writer

New York Daily News, July 3, 2006

Anger and disbelief.

That's how families of the murder victims reacted after a judge tossed the Mafia cops' convictions despite concluding they had committed some of the most heinous crimes he'd ever seen.

"I never heard of anything so stupid," said Betty Hydell, whose son Jimmy was kidnapped and turned over to a mob hit man in 1986. "I thought this was all over."

"We were surprised to hear this. I'm sure the family is going to be upset," said Mark Longo, an attorney representing the family of Nicholas Guido, a telephone installer who was killed by mistake on Christmas Day 1986.

In April, a jury convicted Louis Eppolito and Stephen Caracappa on all counts in a wide-ranging criminal conspiracy that prosecutors say dated to their days as a decorated NYPD detectives.

They were found guilty of participating in eight murders, one kidnapping and an attempted murder - as well leaking the names of informers to the mob, and warning Luchese crime family gangsters when they were about to be busted.

Brooklyn Federal Judge Jack Weinstein threw out the racketeering conviction because he found prosecutors failed to show the cops participated in a continuing conspiracy into 2000 - the statute of limitations cutoff.

But the legal distinctions in Weinstein's ruling carried little weight with the victims' kin.

DOJ_NMG_0038181

Hydell's daughter, Linda, was the last person to talk to her brother the day he was kidnapped and killed in September 1986.

She called yesterday's ruling "so absurd it's not even funny."

"It's gotta end somewhere. They were convicted on 72 counts. What are people going to say?" she said. "There's no closure on this for my family. It just keeps getting worse and worse and worse."

There was similar reaction from the family of Israel Greenwald, a jeweler who was murdered because a mob associate feared he would become an FBI informer.

Greenwald's wife, Leah, said she respected the judge's decision but said she was upset because next week the two cops are expected to ask the judge to be released on bail.

"Of course we are upset because we do not want them to be free after knowing that they are guilty," she said. "In our minds they are guilty, and we want them to be in jail."

Glorious New Day For Family Of Ex-cop (NYDN)

By Michelle Caruso, Daily News Staff Writer

New York Daily News, July 3, 2006

When Louis Eppolito's wife and daughters got word that his convictions were overturned, "it was like the world stopped," his eldest daughter told the Daily News yesterday.

"We were stunned. We had not been given much reason to hope," Andrea Eppolito said of the judge's ruling.

Then there were free-flowing tears of joy during an emotional three-way conference call among Andrea, 29, her mother, Fran, and sister Deanna, 28.

"We were all crying, my mother, my sister and me. It was like everything was in slow motion. We are so elated. This is such a blessing," Andrea said.

"My mother just kept saying, 'He's gonna come home. He's coming home! He's coming home!' over and over. The world is good, more than good," she added.

Andrea knows her father still has a big fight on his hands. He will first have to apply for release on bail while awaiting retrial on federal money-laundering and drug charges, and there's no guarantee he'll get it.

"We're going to try and hope for bail. When my father was out on bail before, he obeyed all the terms and conditions, so that should count in his favor," she said.

And if he comes home, "We will shut the doors and sit together as a family for some quiet personal time to reflect, as a family. Then afterwards, there will be a party," she said.

Eppolito said she is optimistic about the retrial ahead, even though it will mean more stress, legal fees and time. But she says she thinks the ex-cop's new lawyer, Joseph Bondy, will give the case 100%.

"I believe in my father. I believe in Joe Bondy and I believe in the law. We are so grateful to have a second chance."

"We will fight as a family, the way we always have. We'll fight until it's done," she said.

Eppolito says she is not daunted by the judge's contention that, even though he was legally bound to toss the convictions, he still thinks her father and his co-defendant, Stephen Caracappa, are guilty of murders and disgracing their police shields.

"If that is the judge's personal opinion, I am grateful that he upheld the law and his integrity," she said.

"I realize my father will never again be considered an innocent man. Some people will always believe the story told by the government's witnesses," she said.

"But he is innocent, and I want him to be vindicated. I want him sitting on the couch with his wife and kids and his dog, enjoying his old age. He spent two decades on the police force. He's earned it," she said.

Hacker Attacks Hitting Pentagon (BSUN)

By Siobhan Gorman, Sun Reporter

The Baltimore Sun, July 2, 2006

But NSA's methods for safeguarding data are growing obsolete

WASHINGTON -- The number of reported attempts to penetrate Pentagon computer networks rose sharply in the past decade, from fewer than 800 in 1996 to more than 160,000 last year - thousands of them successful. At the same time, the nation's ability to safeguard sensitive data in those and other government computer systems is becoming obsolete as efforts to make improvements have faltered and stalled.

A National Security Agency program to protect secrets at the Defense Department and intelligence and other agencies is seven years behind schedule, triggering concerns that the data will be increasingly vulnerable to theft, according to intelligence officials and unclassified internal NSA documents obtained by The Sun.

When fully implemented, the program would build a new encryption system to strengthen protections on computer networks and would more effectively control the access of millions of people to government computer systems and buildings.

Launched in 1999, the program was to have been completed last year, but it fell behind in part because of differences between the NSA and the Pentagon. The NSA is trying to revamp the program, although the deadline has slid to 2012, with the most substantive security improvements planned for 2018.

An internal NSA report in April 2005 described the problem as "critical," noting that 30 percent of the agency's security equipment does not provide "adequate" protection; another 46 percent is approaching that status.

"Much of the existing cryptographic equipment is based on ... technologies that are 20-30+ years old," said the report from the agency's information security directorate. At the same time, it noted, technology for breaking into computer systems has improved, which "gives our adversaries enhanced capabilities."

Pentagon computers, in particular, are under constant attack. Recently, Chinese hackers were able to penetrate and steal data from a classified computer system serving the Joint Chiefs of Staff, according to two sources familiar with the incident. A security team spent weeks eliminating the breach and installing additional safeguards.

The Pentagon declined interview requests for two information security officials, but a spokesman said in a written statement that the NSA is continually assisting the Pentagon to "maintain best security practices" and raise the level of information security.

NSA spokesman Don Weber said in a statement that because information security is a core mission of the agency, "any speculation that we, along with our partners would leave national security systems vulnerable, is unfounded."

Among 18 current and former officials and security experts interviewed for this article, several would speak only on condition of anonymity because many details of the program are sensitive and reveal vulnerabilities in the nation's defenses.

Encryption, which is an electronic lock, is among the most important of security tools, scrambling sensitive information so that it can ride securely in communications over the Internet or phone lines, and requiring a key to decipher.

Powerful encryption is necessary for protecting information that is beamed from soldiers on the battlefield or that guards data in computers at the NSA's Fort Meade headquarters. Without updated encryption, sensitive information could be stolen by China or other countries that have regularly tried to break into U.S. government systems to steal military and intelligence secrets. There are emerging concerns about Iran's desire to do so, as well.

"This stuff is enormously important," said John P. Stenbit, the Pentagon's chief information officer until 2004. "If the keys get into the wrong hands, all kinds of bad things happen. You don't want to just let a hacker grab the key as it's going through the Internet."

The NSA report warned that "serious risks" in the Pentagon's security system jeopardize its ability to execute its missions effectively. A December 2005 NSA planning document described the program as crucial for ensuring adequate protection for all national security programs.

"It's a pretty critical thing to do right ... because the government relies on confidential communications so heavily," said Martin Roesch, founder of Sourcefire, a computer security company in Columbia, Md. "It's kind of a fundamental capability."

A growing threat As the program, known as Key Management Infrastructure, has faltered, the potential for penetrating government computers has grown. Intelligence officials have said that as many as 100 countries pose legitimate threats to U.S. government computers and those of companies doing government work.

In the past decade, reported attempts to hack into Pentagon computers have grown 200-fold, according to the Pentagon.

"Numerous states, terrorist and hackers groups, criminal syndicates, and individuals continue to pose a threat to our computer systems," Maj. Gen. Michael D. Maples, director of the Defense Intelligence Agency, warned Congress this year. "Over the last few years, hackers have exploited thousands of [Department of Defense] systems."

In addition to the NSA's aging security technology, some of the tools required for encrypting data lack security protections and are vulnerable, so an infiltrator could uncover and possibly replicate the tools to access government data, according to the NSA's December 2005 planning document.

Intelligence specialists say potential attacks could include foreign governments snooping for U.S. intelligence and military secrets and using identity information to create false IDs, which could enable them to gain access to military or intelligence facilities, computers and even weapons systems, they said.

"What's at stake here is the security of the nation, because we are under monster attack from China, Russia, Israel, France and so on," a former government official said.

News reports last year revealed a major Chinese campaign called Titan Rain that targeted unclassified Pentagon computer networks and others at the Energy and Homeland Security departments. In a Miami case, the Justice Department charged two men this year with channeling military technology secrets to China that were obtained through hacking. It brought similar charges against three others last fall in a case in Los Angeles.

DOJ_NMG_0038183

"The threat is much larger than we ever thought it was," said David Szady, a former top counterintelligence official at the FBI and the CIA. The Chinese "have been able to develop their military and their systems on the backbone of United States technology."

Another country emerging as a concern is Iran. "They certainly are able to, and would have an interest in doing it," said one former senior intelligence official.

Cracking the government's aging encryption system would require a high level of training of the type most likely occurring in countries such as China or Russia.

But as commercial code-breaking technology improves, intelligence experts said, it is possible that a technically astute terrorist or even an unusually focused teenage hacker could infiltrate government computers.

If hackers can break through weak encryption systems on government and contractors' computers, they can hunt through different networks for bits and pieces of information to thread together and assemble a fairly good idea of U. S. defense capabilities - with the intent of either copying them or devising a system to defeat them, said one former NSA employee.

The new system would address a number of the security challenges that exist with the explosion of wireless, networked communication devices, according to internal NSA documents. The most sensitive data is generally held in internal systems that are not exposed to the Internet. But the Pentagon and other government agencies are increasingly using Internet-based communications.

And as the demand grows for "smart" identification cards with computer chips that verify the card holder's identity, so does the need for sophisticated ways to manage who is being assigned cards, so that the cards do not end up in the wrong hands, said Stephen Kent, a chief scientist at BBN Technologies who has chaired government panels on information security.

False starts Sprawled across several government agencies, but centered at the NSA, the Key Management Infrastructure program is actually a compilation of about 25 programs; its costs, which are classified, are difficult to gauge. One estimate pegs spending so far at $2 billion or more, said a former government official familiar with the program. Other estimates are in the hundreds of millions.

A critical problem with the project, according to several current and former intelligence officials, is one that has afflicted other large programs at the agency: poor management.

Like other major NSA efforts - such as the failed Trailblazer program to rapidly sift out threat information, and the troubled Groundbreaker program aimed at upgrading the agency's computer networks - an ever-changing game plan has caused many of the project's problems, current and former senior intelligence officials said.

One former senior intelligence official said that the NSA had unrealistic expectations from the start and repeatedly opted for delays to try to perfect the program. That left the government with aging security protections in the quest for security nirvana, the official said.

"NSA often will say, 'Well, this is not totally secure, so you can't use it,' when the only alternative is nothing," the former official said. "My worry is this push for perfect security is the enemy of good security.

NSA officials have also had a difficult time forging consensus among the agencies involved with the project, especially the Pentagon, according to former officials familiar with the conflict.

"Anybody who doesn't like the way you're doing it can essentially withdraw," the former senior intelligence official said. "It's a program that is actually planned for failure."

After several false starts, the first phase of the program was canceled in 2003, and its replacement has been in the planning stages since then.

The NSA is re-evaluating the program, intelligence officials said. That reassessment - owed at least in part to pressure from Maj. Gen. Dale W. Meyerrose, the chief technology officer under spy chief John D. Negroponte and the Pentagon - is expected to produce a new blueprint, Meyerrose said in an interview. It also coincided with incoming NSA Director Lt. Gen. Keith B. Alexander's agency-wide review.

Under the current plan, the initial phase will be completed in 2012. Even then, it would at best provide only a level of security equivalent to the existing system, current and former government officials said. The agency would, however, be able to upgrade the revised system, which is not possible now, they said.

Meyerrose acknowledged that the project has taken "a little longer than we thought." He chalked it up to a lack of leadership in the intelligence community to get behind the program, which he said would change under the new spymaster. The program's planners, he said, underestimated how difficult it would be to "synchronize" all the moving parts of the program.

After the first false start, the NSA asked the consulting firm Booz Allen Hamilton, which was involved in aspects of the project, to take on a broader role to get the program's many segments working together. But the NSA is unhappy with the firm's performance, which it deemed slow and rigid, one former government official said. A spokesman for Booz Allen declined to comment, citing confidentiality agreements.

DOJ_NMG_0038184

Booz Allen's contract is slated to end in October, and the NSA plans to do the work on its own, probably with assistance from a new contractor, the former official said.

Although Richard C. Schaeffer, in charge of the NSA's information security division, characterized the current timetable for the program as "aggressive" in a statement to The Sun, some officials are concerned that the schedule is sliding again, according to a former government official familiar with the program. The NSA was supposed to award a contract for the revamped program last December, but that shifted to June and then to October.

"It's pretty scandalous. It certainly has been a start, restart, start, restart," said one former intelligence official. "It seems stunning to me."

Meanwhile, given the pace of technology, every year that the project slips, it becomes less relevant, said a former government official familiar with the project.

"You're going to introduce something that is completely obsolete," he said.

While 2012 is the target date for wrapping up the current phase of the program, Meyerrose said, some portions will be implemented in the interim.

But some intelligence officials said they are concerned that components of the program could be delayed until 2018, when the next phase of more substantive security changes is to be completed, and the April 2005 NSA report highlights this possibility.

The program's delay also is likely to hold up some major Pentagon efforts that rely on secure information, such as the Global Information Grid, a network under development that aims to manage all national security information around the world, former intelligence officials said. Both the NSA report and planning documents emphasize the dependency of this network and other defense programs on the key management program.

"If you can't communicate securely, the enemy has the potential to know what you're doing," one former official said. "Information security is Job One."

siobhan.gorman@baltsun.com

Sex Offender Law Limited (KCS)

By Joe Lambe, Laura Bauer

The Kansas City Star, July 1, 2006

The Missouri Supreme Court ruled Friday that thousands of sex offenders no longer have to register, because the law requiring it does not apply retroactively.

As a result, although the court unanimously upheld the state's sex offender registry law, only those convicted after the law took effect Jan. 1. 1995, now will have to register.

The law previously required people to register if they were convicted after July 1, 1979. This involved more than 11,000 offenders to register, but Friday's ruling lopped off about 16 of 27 years of registration.

The ruling written by Judge Laura Denvir Stith also said nothing prevented publishing the information about those who have registered. Offenders before 1995, however, can now move to new addresses that will not have to be listed.

"The fact that the Missouri Supreme Court upheld the state's sex offender registration law was an important victory," attorney general spokesman John Fougere said. "We will work with the General Assembly to ensure that the maximum amount of information possible about all sex offenders will continue to be made available to Missouri's citizens."

Jackson County Prosecutor Mike Sanders said the ruling would affect about half of the 1,400 offenders registered in the county.

Capt. Randy Gibson of the Greene County Sheriff's Department in southwest Missouri worries about public safety. His county has roughly 650 on its registry, and up to half would be affected.

"I think the public has a right to be concerned," Gibson said. "I don't look upon this as a victory for victims or the safety and security of the public."

The ruling came in a lawsuit filed by Kansas City lawyer Arthur A. Benson II on behalf of 11 offenders in Jackson County.

Benson praised the ruling, even with the continued publishing possibility.

"The information is going to get stale very fast, and nobody will be interested in it," Benson said.

The court found that the law violated the state constitution by applying a civil law retroactively. But the court ruled against plaintiffs on many other constitutional issues.

Benson said the ruling reflected "a general sense of fair play in the Missouri Constitution."

Many of his 11 Jane or John Doe clients pleaded guilty to minor crimes long before 1995 in exchange for nothing on their records, he said, but then were slammed years later with registration.

DOJ_NMG_0038185

His clients also contended the law was overly broad. Missouri, unlike most states, required registration for things like nonsexual child abuse and parental kidnapping. Some of the Does had to register for life for such crimes or for teen romances when one party was underage.

The Supreme Court said the broadness issue was moot because of changes passed this year by the General Assembly. Nonsexual abuse no longer requires registration, and some low-level offenders as of Aug. 28 can petition to get off the lists after two or 10 years.

Only one of the 11 plaintiffs was convicted after the 1995 law went into effect, and that one was registered for nonsexual child abuse, Benson said. All of them should no longer have to register.

The registry law in Kansas is not retroactive, and offenders have to register only if their sex crimes occurred after April 14, 1994.

Advocates have said the growing lists have become too hard to administer but question whether ignoring many past offenders is the way to narrow them.

Marc Klaas, who has pushed for sex offender reforms since a convicted rapist kidnapped and killed his daughter Polly in 1993, said Friday's ruling in Missouri was a mistake.

Lists nationwide have become too unwieldy for sheriff's departments to enforce, he said, but the best way to deal with that is not cutoff dates but to exclude low-level crimes and those with little risk of re-offending.

"If you're not retroactive," Klaas said, "you're creating a false sense of security. … Is the guy who commits the same crime the day before the law goes into effect any less dangerous than the guy who commits it the day after? Of course not."

Gibson and Missouri Highway Patrol officials said they would wait until the state attorney general's office interpreted the ruling to know how to proceed.

"We'll clean the list the way the Supreme Court wants us to, but we don't want to inadvertantly take someone off that should still be there," said Capt. Chris Ricks, a patrol spokesman.

He said his department would contact the governor's office and attorney general as early as next week.

·A Friday ruling by the Missouri Supreme Court upheld the state's sex offender law.

·But it ruled the law could not be applied retroactively, meaning thousands of sex offenders no longer have to register if they were convicted before the law took effect in 1995.

CIVIL LAW:

High-Drama, Low-Frequency Protest (NYT)

By Henry Fountain

The New York Times, July 2, 2006

The Senate nearly approved a constitutional amendment last week that would allow Congress to outlaw flag-burning, falling one vote short of the two-thirds majority needed to send it to the states for approval.

Opponents, mostly Democrats, warned that if it passed the amendment, the Senate would be tinkering with the Bill of Rights to ban a form of protest that is rare.

Just how uncommon is it?

"My impression is that probably in all of American history there's been something like a few hundred flag burnings," said Robert Justin Goldstein, a retired political science professor at Oakland University in Michigan and an expert on the issue. There has probably been a similar number of other types of desecration, including ripping and defacing the flag, Mr. Goldstein said.

"Flag desecration really became famous in this country during the Vietnam War period," he said. "But the general sense is that the news media has not been paying a whole lot of attention to the subject in recent years."

While many incidents are serious protests, others appear to be the work of people with too much time or alcohol on their hands. In a Senate speech, Senator Orrin G. Hatch, the Utah Republican who was the chief sponsor of the amendment, listed 17 cases since 2003. The latest include one early last month in West Haven, Conn., in which an apparently drunken man ripped up two small flags, threatened a bystander while using a racial slur and then chugged a beer in front of police officers before his arrest on breach-of-peace and other charges.

CIVIL RIGHTS:

Feds File Lawsuit Against Sarasota (BRAH)

DOJ_NMG_0038186

The Bradenton Herald, July 1, 2006

Sarasota County officials broke federal law when they denied permission for housing for disabled people, according to a lawsuit filed Friday by the U.S. Justice Department.

The complaint, filed in U.S. District Court in Tampa, alleges the county refused to allow Renaissance Manor Inc. to operate six homes for individuals with mental illness and a history of substance abuse. The homes are similar to other houses in the county occupied by residents who share living space and common facilities, according to a Justice Department news release.

According to the government's complaint, the homes are allowed under Sarasota County's zoning code, but the county determined that the homes broke the code because of the residents' disabilities. The complaint also alleges that the county retaliated against Renaissance Manor by refusing to release grant funds it had been previously awarded.

"The residents of these homes should not be refused an equal opportunity for housing in their community," said Wan J. Kim, assistant attorney general for the Civil Rights Division.

Sarasota County officials said late Friday they had not seen the complaint, but they defended the county's housing practices.

"We have always supported housing for disabled persons. as well as programs for people recovering from addiction," said Deputy County Administrator Susan Scott, in a statement. "Our attorneys will be responding to the issues raised."

The suit seeks monetary damages to compensate the victims, civil penalties, and a court order barring future discrimination.

The federal Fair Housing Act prohibits discrimination in housing on the basis of race, color, religion, sex, familial status, national origin and disability.

Early Voting Critics Eye Appeals Court (WT)

By Jon Ward, The Washington Times

The Washington Times, July 1, 2006

ANNAPOLIS -- A group opposing early voting in this fall's election will now take its lawsuit to Maryland's Court of Appeals, after a county judge yesterday denied its request to keep alive a petition drive that would stop early voting and let voters decide whether they want it in the future.

"I'm disappointed that they ruled so narrowly, but we expected that this would go to the Court of Appeals," said Tom Roskelly, chairman of Marylanders for Fair Elections, a group backed by Gov. Robert L. Ehrlich Jr.'s re-election campaign.

"It's one more bump in this legal road we have to navigate," Mr. Roskelly said.

Mr. Ehrlich, a Republican, officially registered yesterday as a candidate, along with running mate Kristen Cox. He called the two bills that established early voting "power grabs by the leadership of the Maryland General Assembly."

Mr. Ehrlich has also said that early voting will make voter-fraud easier to commit.

Mr. Roskelly's group is pressing forward with the petition drive and yesterday submitted to Secretary of State Mary D. Kane about 200,000 signatures, roughly twice the number needed.

The two petitions against the bills require about 51,000 signatures each to halt early voting this fall and place it on the ballot for voters to decide whether it is implemented in the future.

The group had already submitted 40,000 signatures May 31, but State Board of Elections Administrator Linda H. Lamone said the signatures were insufficient.

Miss Lamone said the group had fallen 138 signatures short on May 31 on its petition against the initial early-voting bill, which was passed in 2005, vetoed by Mr. Ehrlich, then passed by a veto override in the Democrat-controlled legislature this year.

Mr. Roskelly accused Miss Lamone of trying to stifle the petition drive by declaring the signatures insufficient, and he has cast doubt on the honesty of her count.

"They can make all the baseless, groundless charges they want," said David Paulson of the Maryland Democratic Party. "It doesn't hide the fact that they failed."

The group also said it was denied a request to observe the signature verification and requested a recount.

In the group's lawsuit, members argued that the validity of the signatures should not have been determined until yesterday's deadline had passed and all signatures had been submitted.

Anne Arundel County Circuit Judge Paul Hackner yesterday dismissed the suit.

Judge Hackner said he thought the group's argument was "nonsensical," according to the Associated Press.

The petition drive against the second bill, which passed this year and set up early voting locations in what Republicans said were overwhelmingly Democratic precincts, is going forward.

The State Board of Elections will now verify those signatures and hold on to the signatures on the petition against the first bill until the Court of Appeals rules on the lawsuit.

DOJ_NMG_0038187

Cruel And Unusual (SLPD)

By Jeremy Kohler

St. Louis Post-Dispatch, July 1, 2006

For those opposed to the death penalty, a humane execution might be a contradiction of terms.

For those who don't care if a condemned man suffers in his last moments, it might be a pointless concern.

The nation has walked a fine line between those views for more than a century in seeking ways the founding fathers intended to permit to snuff capital criminals.

States used hangmen's nooses, gases, electricity and, finally, injections. But new challenges have raised questions about the legality of lethal injections, and about the future of capital punishment in the 38 states where it's legal.

In May, the U.S. Supreme Court ruled that inmates could challenge lethal injections as being unconstitutional. Now a wave of suits has halted the death penalty in some states, including Missouri.

At the crux of the issue, critics say some inmates have been insufficiently numbed and may have suffered excruciating pain that was not evident to witnesses.

In Missouri, those claims were helped by the disclosure last week that the state's executions for the past decade have been largely in the hands of a dyslexic surgeon who confessed he sometimes makes mistakes with figures.

U.S. District Judge Fernando Gaitan Jr. halted Missouri executions, saying he had grave concerns that the inmates were being subjected to "unacceptable risk" of unconstitutional suffering.

Gaitan amended his earlier ruling in the case of inmate Michael Taylor, of Kansas City. He gave corrections officials until July 15 to come up with a new protocol.

Also last week, a federal judge in Little Rock, Ark., postponed an execution, saying if the inmate became conscious during the execution he would suffer pain "that will never be rectified."

The two rulings had Missouri's corrections director, Larry Crawford, wondering whether the state could ever perform another execution in compliance with Gaitan's order.

In Illinois, a moratorium on executions remains in place. Former Gov. George Ryan halted all executions in 2000 after 13 people condemned to death were found to have been wrongfully convicted. Illinois uses lethal injections for its executions.

Moreover, days before leaving office in January 2003, Ryan granted clemency to all of the 167 death row inmates in Illinois because of the flawed process that led to these sentences.

Most of the states that have capital punishment rely on lethal injection, using a series of three injections that has lately come under intense scrutiny.

First a general anesthetic is administered to knock out the inmate. Then comes a drug that paralyzes. Finally the inmate is injected with a drug that triggers a heart attack.

The final drug would be excruciatingly painful if the inmate was not given enough anesthetic, but the inmate could be unable to show that he or she was in pain, because of the other drugs' effects, according to testimony in Taylor's case.

Other options

Experts note that states could use injections that are less likely to cause pain.

Dr. Mark Heath, an anesthesiologist from Columbia University in New York, testified in Taylor's case - and in several other similar cases nationwide - that it would be more humane to execute humans the same way animals are euthanized: with an overdose of a barbiturate.

The condemned inmate would simply go to sleep and not wake up.

Heath testified that Missouri was the only state using lethal injection that did not have written protocols that could prevent "ad hoc changes or vagaries or misunderstandings or absent-mindedness or other problems that can occur when a complex endeavor is undertaken by a group of people."

Crawford pointed out that simply giving an overdose of barbiturate could prolong executions and make deaths linger over an hour.

That might cause less pain, he said, but might not pass any more constitutional muster. Crawford said he believed Missouri's system of three injections was better.

A painless death "would be a wonderful goal but we come into this world in pain and we all suffer some discomfort, and in this case it's as painless as we can make it," he said.

"Not gruesome"

States have tried to make executions quick, painless and "not gruesome," said Deborah Denno, a Fordham University law professor and expert in executions.

"But those goals don't mesh very well," she said.

DOJ_NMG_0038188

Chief among Gaitan's concerns was that Missouri's lethal-injection program was largely controlled by a dyslexic doctor, called John Doe I in court records.

Missouri had no apparent protocol for executing prisoners other than Doe's whim, he wrote in a 16-page decision. Among Gaitan's requirements was that a certified anesthesiologist prepare the lethal-injection drugs. John Doe I is not an anesthesiologist.

The American Medical Association has urged its members to steer clear of involvement in executions. Crawford said he did not know if state officials would be able to find an anesthesiologist, although he said he was trying.

Crawford declined to provide Doe's real name, saying he was concerned that identifying the doctor would pose a threat to Doe's safety.

Crawford said he never had any reason to question Doe. "This is being portrayed as being a performance issue," he said. "There is no indication there has been any performance deficiency."

Other states have executed prisoners without a doctor, he noted. He said he did not know about Doe's dyslexia until the surgeon's recent testimony.

Crawford said he was aware at all times that Doe was risking his reputation and his medical career by working on executions and that he felt "very, very fortunate to have a medical professional willing to assist in what he believes is an ethical level of involvement."

He said it was possible that the state would not be able to find an anesthesiologist who would be willing to participate in an execution.

"That would effectively stop executions," he said.

Denno said she thought it was more likely that states would find ways to change their procedures to skirt constitutional questions.

Corrections officials "know people who would be willing to conduct these executions," she said. "It might be a little difficult but they'll get one."

The question, she said, is "What are the quality of these people?"

Scandal At The Coast Guard Academy (NYT)

The New York Times, July 2, 2006

The Coast Guard Academy in New London, Conn., which first accepted women in 1976, has a higher proportion of women in its student body — about 30 percent — than do any of the nation's other military service academies. The Coast Guard is also the only military service to open every available job to women.

But recently the Coast Guard Academy has drawn attention for a very different reason. For the first time in its 130-year history, the academy court-martialed a cadet, convicting him on sodomy, indecent assault and extortion charges after four female cadets accused him of assaulting them. The stories that emerged from the trial are enough to make any reasonable person question how such allegations are handled at the academy.

Last week two Connecticut members of Congress took up the issue. Christopher Shays, a Republican, led hearings on how officials are responding to reports of sexual assaults in the service academies. Rosa DeLauro, a Democrat, inserted a request in a Homeland Security spending bill for the Government Accountability Office to monitor the Coast Guard Academy's progress in responding to sexual harassment claims.

That scrutiny is necessary, as shown by an announcement earlier this year by the academy that it would start involving women in sexual harassment investigations to improve handling of such cases. It is frankly surprising, and somewhat appalling, that such a basic step was not taken years ago.

The academy's defenders say that the case is the rare exception and that the Coast Guard, with its strong record of welcoming women into the service, is unfairly getting a black eye. But the women who are performing so many functions in the service deserve assurance that their concerns will be taken seriously. The American people expect no less.

ANTITRUST:

Microsoft Races To Meet Deadline Before Europe Imposes A Fine (NYT)

By Kevin J. O'Brien

The New York Times, July 1, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0038189

BRUSSELS, June 30 — For nearly three months, Microsoft says, 300 of its engineers have been working nearly nonstop to come up with the documentation for its server software that the European Commission has sought since an antitrust ruling in 2004.

After two years of dragging its heels — at least in the view of the commission's antitrust staff — Microsoft is now presenting itself as productive and cooperative. The commission's threat of another fine on the company is driving the last-minute frenzy.

But the commission's vote on the fine, which if assessed in full would total about 420 million euros ($527 million), may come just before Microsoft crosses the finish line.

A European Union advisory committee is scheduled to discuss the commission's draft decision to impose the fine on Monday, but no action is expected.

Neelie Kroes, the European competition commissioner, has threatened a maximum fine of 2 million euros a day, starting from Dec. 15, 2005, the commission's original deadline for submission of the data.

Jonathan Todd, a spokesman for Ms. Kroes, said the commission intended to decide on the fines before the end of July. But he would not say whether this burst of activity would forestall any penalties.

Even if Microsoft met its deadline and delivered the documentation, the commission could impose the fines anyway for not having delivered the protocols in the form the commission wanted by Dec. 15.

Ms. Kroes accused Microsoft on Dec. 15 of having provided "incomplete and inaccurate" material. The independent trustee in the case called the material "totally unfit" for use by rival software makers, and a consulting firm for the commission agreed.

After what Brad Smith, Microsoft's general counsel and lead lawyer on the European case, called a "breakthrough" hearing in Brussels in March, Microsoft says it finally knew what the commission wanted and it has been rushing to provide it. But Mr. Smith said he knew the commission might impose the daily fines anyway.

Microsoft plans to hand over the last batch of computer codes sought by the commission on July 18. Mr. Smith said the deadline for delivering the communications protocols had been set with the commission's monitoring trustee, Neil Barrett, a British computer expert.

"We pulled together people from across the company and took them off jobs to work on this project," Mr. Smith said by telephone from Redmond, Wash., this week. "It is really something that has strained our resources to the limit.

"Some people are literally spending 24 hours a day at the office," Mr. Smith added.

The European Commission ruled in March 2004 that Microsoft had used its Windows operating system to dominate the market in software for servers, the computers that form the backbone of most office computer systems and the Internet.

But Microsoft appealed the decision and the commission's record fine of 497.2 million euros. The European Court of First Instance is not expected to rule on the appeal until next year. But in December 2004, the same court ruled that Microsoft had to disclose the protocols before the appeal was decided.

For the last 18 months, the commission and Microsoft have been at odds over the protocols. To break the impasse, the commission appointed Mr. Barrett, a London author and occasional Microsoft critic, as trustee in the dispute last October.

Even then, Microsoft and the commission battled, until a closed hearing of Microsoft and commission staff lawyers on March 29-30 in Brussels, when the company changed tack, according to those involved. Thomas Pfenning, a German engineer who had worked on Microsoft protocols in Redmond, where Microsoft is based, since 1995, approached Mr. Barrett after the hearing. Mr. Barrett agreed to meet again with Microsoft in London.

A week later, on April 6, three Microsoft engineers — Henry Sanders, a general manager for Windows networking; Bill Laing, general manager of the server division; and Iain McDonald, director of program management for Windows server products — flew to London and met with Mr. Barrett, two of his assistants and three representatives of the European Commission for two days.

Both sides agreed on a format for the protocols and the timetable for delivering them, Mr. Sanders said. On his way to Heathrow Airport, Mr. McDonald gazed at the London Underground map and suggested naming stages of the project after stops on London's Circle Line.

Microsoft has delivered the first five batches of protocols, code-named Tower, Liverpool, Moorgate, King's Cross and Baker.

On Friday, it delivered Edgware Road. On July 18, the journey is to end at Paddington station.

The protocols cover server software and elements of Microsoft's new desktop operating system, Vista, which will not be sold until 2007.

Michaels Takes $6 Billion Buyout (WSJ)

By Mike Spector, Dennis Berman

The Wall Street Journal, July 1, 2006

Bain, Blackstone to Acquire Arts-and-Crafts Retailer; Options Probes Continue

Michaels Stores Inc. Friday said it accepted a more than $6 billion takeover bid from a private-equity group comprising Bain Capital and Blackstone Group, completing a nearly three-month process of fielding offers for the arts-and-crafts retailer.

The winning takeover group paid $44 a share for the Irving, Texas, retailer. Michaels shares rose 8.5%, or $3.24, to $41.24 at 4 p.m. Friday in New York Stock Exchange composite trading. Michaels has 137 million shares outstanding.

Michaels, the largest arts-and-crafts retailer in the U.S. and Canada by sales, has been attractive to private-equity groups because of its heavy cash flow, which could help to pay down debt incurred in the deal. The retailer generated operating cash flow of $364 million in its fiscal year ended Jan. 28.

"This transaction delivers outstanding value for all Michaels Stores' shareholders and represents a powerful endorsement of our company's strategy, performance and business prospects," said Charles J. Wyly Jr., Michaels chairman. The company "is well-positioned for future growth," he added.

Michaels put itself up for auction in March at the same time that its chief executive, R. Michael Rouleau, retired.

The sale comes amid a Securities and Exchange Commission investigation of Michaels. The SEC is looking into possible irregularities in stock-options grants at the company, which may have boosted the pay of some executives. The company in June said the SEC had asked it to preserve documents related to stock-options grants since 1990. Michaels has set up its own internal committee to investigate its potential tax liability in the case.

In addition, a federal grand jury in New York subpoenaed documents from the company related to its stocks-options practices. The Internal Revenue Service and the Manhattan District Attorney are scrutinizing the company. Michaels also faces two lawsuits related to the matter.

J.P. Morgan Chase & Co. advised Michaels on the takeover. Michaels, which reported $3.68 billion in revenue last year, owns more than 1,000 stores in the U.S. It also owns Aaron Brothers stores.

The Michaels buyout is the latest example of private equity's appetite for retailers with strong cash flows. In 2004, Target Corp. sold its Mervyn's division to a private-equity group including Sun Capital Partners Inc. and Cerberus Capital Management for $1.65 billion. Last year, Warburg Pincus and Texas Pacific Group teamed up to purchase luxury retailer Neiman Marcus Group Inc. for $5.1 billion.

Others could follow. Pier 1 Imports Inc., retailer of imported furniture and home decor, hired J.P. Morgan Chase in May to help it study strategic alternatives.

"We are delighted to partner with the Michaels management team to help build on its already strong position in an attractive industry and capitalize on the significant growth opportunities that lie ahead," said Matt Levin, a managing director at Bain Capital. "Our deep experience in the retail sector reinforces our conviction that Michaels has the best store locations, a broad and attractive assortment of products for crafters of all ages, and a sustainable competitive advantage thanks to smart investments in systems and infrastructure. We look forward to helping Michaels achieve its full long-term potential."

ENVIRONMENT/INDIAN AFFAIRS:

Indian Vote Affected If Act Expires (AP)

AP, July 1, 2006

SIOUX FALLS, S.D. (AP) -- Landmark provisions in the federal Voting Rights Act of 1965 soon could expire, taking away powerful deterrents to discrimination against Indian voters in South Dakota and threatening to halt an upward trend in voter turnout on reservations.

In the past 30 years, the provisions have forced South Dakota to submit 3,048 voting law changes in Todd and Shannon counties for approval by the Department of Justice and have required Lakota speaking interpreters at polling places in 11 counties.

Provisions of the Voting Rights Act are the underpinning of a renaissance in Indian voting, resulting in a 122 percent increase in turnout in Shannon County on the Pine Ridge Reservation, and a 139 percent increase in Todd County on the Rosebud Reservation, between 2000 and 2004.

They have helped Indian candidates get elected to local, county and state offices, said a representative of the American Civil Liberties Union and a founder of the LaCreek Civil Rights Committee.

But they've had little practical effect on South Dakota elections, Secretary of State Chris Nelson said.

Whatever their impact, they hang in the balance as Congress attempts to reauthorize the Voting Rights Act this summer. The effort is being held hostage by a handful of House members from Georgia and other Southern states who want those states exempted from Justice Department scrutiny of election procedures. Republican House leaders will not let the reauthorization bill come to the floor until that issue is resolved.

DOJ_NMG_0038191

The Voting Rights Act requires the Justice Department to approve or "preclear" election law changes in jurisdictions that have a past history of voter discrimination. The ACLU used that provision of the act in three key federal lawsuits affecting South Dakota. It successfully sued to force Buffalo County to redraw county commission lines so the majority of Native American voters were not packed into a single district.

Preclearance cases

In the Alfred Boneshirt and Elaine Quick Bear Quiver v. (then Secretary of State) Joyce Hazeltine lawsuits in 2002, the ACLU was able to extend preclearance to Todd and Shannon counties.

The verdicts in those suits triggered Nelson to submit to the Justice Department the thousands of changes in election rules in Shannon and Todd counties, going back to 1972, with a rationale explaining why those changes were not discriminatory. The Justice Department has upheld every one, Nelson said.

"It's clear those counties needed to be doing the preclearance work. It's unfortunate we had to go through the legal process to get to that. If the ACLU had come to us and asked, we could have done it without litigation," Nelson said.

But Jennifer Ring, executive director of the ACLU of the Dakotas, said "we consider preclearance a critical check in the Voting Rights Act because of something you can't see - jurisdictions complying with the law."

Because of the successful litigation, election officials have refrained from making changes that would have harmed Native American voters, she said, because they knew those changes would not be precleared.

Ring cited as an example the South Dakota Legislature discussing eliminating legislative District 28B in Harding, Butte, Meade, Perkins and Corson counties, and 28A in Ziebach, Dewey and Corson counties, and going to an at-large system.

Those districts, comprising the Standing Rock and Cheyenne River reservations and nearby counties, have a high probability of electing Native American legislators. Eliminating them would reduce the chances of Native Americans being elected, Ring said.

"Frankly, because they knew it would not preclear, they ended up not doing it," she said. "If we lose preclearance, that would be a significant step backward."

Lakota interpreters

Having the Justice Department scrutinize election changes "at least levels the playing field," Craig Dillon said. He's a founder of the LaCreek Civil Rights Committee that has registered thousands of Native American voters in Shannon, Todd and Bennett counties since 2002.

"We need to continue with preclearance and with interpreters. Basically leave the Voting Rights Act intact, the way it is. If it ain't broke, don't fix it," Dillon said.

Because of the Voting Rights Act, the state this year took on the task of providing instructions in Lakota for using computerized voting machines in 11 counties near reservations.

"It was much more difficult than we anticipated," because there are not Lakota words that directly describe computers and computer functions, Nelson said. "But we got it done for the primary."

"The reports we've got back are, 'Yeah, you got it right.' "

Because of the Voting Rights Act, auditors in those counties also are responsible for ensuring that Lakota speakers are on hand at the polls to explain voting procedures to voters who want such instruction in that language.

While Nelson said auditors tell him the interpreters are not widely used, Dillon insisted that "in Indian Country, where I'm from, the interpreter, I think, is essential. We still have a large number of Native American people who go to the polls who speak only Lakota."

Ring said: "It's not that they don't understand any English. They do. It's that they understand better in their own language."

Gerald Betelyoun, an Oglala Sioux Tribe member and Bennett County Commissioner, said: "The Lakota people are kind of shy, the elderly especially. If they see another Native sitting there that can speak Lakota, they usually go up and ask questions about where to vote."

What would change?

Nelson does agree that interpreters play a valuable role in welcoming Indian voters into the state electoral process by honoring the Lakota culture and language. If the Voting Rights Act is not reauthorized before next year, he does not know if auditors will look to shed a complicating factor in putting on an election by doing away with interpreters.

"I would hope you would have a debate on a local basis," Nelson said, and Native American constituents would let auditors know they value interpreters.

But Nelson thinks Congress will reauthorize the Voting Rights Act this summer.

DOJ_NMG_0038192

If the provisions affecting Indian Country are allowed to expire, "it not does not mean everything that has been done over the last 40 or 50 years is not there anymore," Ring said. "It means a level of protection disappears. It probably means more litigation."

Betelyoun, who was elected in 2002 and is running again this year, credited the Voting Rights Act with helping him get elected. His experience on the county commission is an illustration of the value of bringing Native American voters into the state political process.

Betelyoun said he decided to run to address huge Native American dissatisfaction with a former Bennett County sheriff. Once he became a commissioner, Betelyoun became a member of the committee that oversees law enforcement.

"It's been pretty good since I've been on there," he said. "The sheriff's deputies treat everybody equal. They do not just pick on the Natives."

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

Drug Probe Targets Aristide (MH)

By Jay Weaver And Jacqueline Charles

The Miami Herald, July 2, 2006

· This is the first of two parts.

Jean-Bertrand Aristide was a modern-day Moses to Haiti's poor masses, a former Catholic priest who rose to the presidency by promising to wash away the country's bloody and corrupt past.

But since his ouster as president in 2004, U.S. authorities have been investigating detailed accounts alleging that Aristide and several top aides sought and took millions of dollars in bribes from drug traffickers in Haiti, The Miami Herald has learned.

So far, a federal grand jury probe in Miami has led to 22 convictions of mostly Haitian drug traffickers, ex-police officers and a high-ranking politician close to Aristide. Although the exiled former president is a main target of the ongoing investigation, he has not been charged.

The allegations against the ex-president come from numerous sources, but the evidence has not risen to a level to press a case against Aristide, say U.S. law enforcement officials, who have been hampered by a lack of financial records.

Still, The Miami Herald has learned from interviews with about 20 law enforcement officials, defense lawyers and others involved in the case that Aristide has been accused of being at the center of his country's narco-trafficking and money-laundering activities from 2001 to 2004.

Authorities have gathered evidence, including testimony by cooperating defendants convicted in the case, alleging that:

· Soon after he took office in early 2001, Aristide held a meeting at his Port-au-Prince home with his presidential security chief, two government security advisors, the national police chief and a district commander to organize a scheme to shake down Colombian and Haitian drug smugglers for kickbacks for both his personal and political activities.

· Drug traffickers bribed Aristide to turn a blind eye to shipments of Colombian cocaine through Haiti, directly paying him hundreds of thousands of dollars in cash during regular visits to his home.

· Convicted drug kingpin Beaudouin "Jacques" Ketant personally delivered $500,000 a month in a suitcase to Aristide's home, he told authorities. He said the suitcase had a combination lock set to 7-7-7 at Aristide's request because that was his favorite number.

· Traffickers gave Aristide $200,000 to buy a helicopter in 2002, but the president pocketed the money and instead used government funds to rent a helicopter from Miami-based Biscayne Helicopters. Those same traffickers also bought a $75,000 ambulance in Miami that was shipped to Haiti for the president's private charitable Aristide Foundation.

· Traffickers spent hundreds of thousands of dollars on carnival festivities in February 2002 that were arranged by the Aristide government. They also paid for some of Aristide's July birthday celebrations, his Lavalas Family Party and his foundation.

· At Aristide's direction, some of the traffickers' bribes helped buy weapons smuggled into Haiti to equip national police officers as well as pro-Aristide street gangs that harassed his opponents during his second term as president, between 2001 and 2004, according to former Haitian law enforcement officials and drug traffickers who are cooperating with U.S. investigators.

ACCUSERS CALLED `LIARS'

Lawyer for Aristide calls accusations `inconceivable'

Aristide's longtime lawyer, Ira Kurzban, said he does not believe the allegations against the former president.

DOJ_NMG_0038193

Speaking generally, Kurzban said that the federal prosecution is politically motivated and that the U.S. government's witnesses are "liars" seeking to reduce their prison sentences by fingering the former president in their money-laundering and cocaine enterprise.

"It is inconceivable to me that Aristide would do anything for personal gain," Kurzban said, commenting on the ex-president's character. ``He was not a person interested in money."

So far the U.S. investigation has been built on testimony from many of the 22 mostly Haitian cocaine smugglers, police officers and others convicted in Miami in the past 2 ½ years. The probe, spearheaded by the Drug Enforcement Administration (DEA) with help from the Internal Revenue Service, has focused on cocaine smuggling during Aristide's second presidential term.

The investigation continues as the Haitian government carries out its own separate inquiry into the Aristide administration and foundation records, so far concluding that the president had looted government coffers, Haitian government records show. The interim government that replaced Aristide two years ago filed suit in Miami last year to recover "tens of millions of dollars" allegedly stolen by the former president and others from Haiti's treasury and its phone company. Neither the Haitian investigation nor the civil suit alleges drug trafficking.

To this day, the 52-year-old Aristide remains intensely popular in Haiti and has expressed a desire to return home from exile in South Africa after the recent election of President René Préval, once an Aristide ally. That would upset Haiti's domestic politics and Préval's relations with the U.S. and French governments, which regard Aristide as a destabilizing factor in Haiti.

CLAIMS UNSUPPORTED

Probers report absence of incriminating records

While several witnesses have testified against the former president in the U.S. drug-trafficking probe, investigators have told The Miami Herald that they have yet to uncover bank records and other financial statements that support the claims. The absence of such documents to solidify their case against Aristide has prevented authorities from seeking a federal indictment in Miami, U.S. law enforcement officials said.

Efforts to reach Aristide for comment on this story failed. Kurzban, who represented the Haitian government as its lawyer from 1991 to 2004, said he did not believe that the ex-president would agree to an interview.

Kurzban, who still speaks on Aristide's behalf, said that while people in Haiti were well aware of the country's drug-trafficking problem, it came as a "shock" to him when he learned that Aristide and others in his government became targets of a U.S. criminal investigation.

He said that, if anything, Aristide cooperated with the federal government in the crackdown on cocaine smuggling in 2003, including allowing Ketant to be turned over to U.S. authorities. He said that money donated to the Aristide Foundation went to the poor for relief programs such as rice subsidies.

Haiti, an impoverished country where cash and corruption go hand in hand, has long been a significant transit point for Colombian cocaine headed for U.S. streets. From there, it sometimes is smuggled directly to the United States. Another route: from Haiti to the Dominican Republic, west to Puerto Rico and then to the U.S. mainland.

During Aristide's second term as president, an estimated 10 percent of all cocaine smuggled into the United States flowed through the Caribbean corridor, especially Haiti, according to a 2006 federal report by the National Drug Intelligence Center.

Shortly after the Aristide government turned over Ketant to U.S. officials, the U.S. government broadened its drug investigation by looking into the Aristide leadership.

It was during a 2004 sentencing in federal court in Miami that Ketant accused Aristide of turning Haiti into a "narco-country" and being a "drug lord." Not under oath at the time, Ketant was sentenced to 27 years in prison and ordered to pay $30 million in fines and forfeitures.

Behind the scenes, he began to cooperate as a key witness for prosecutors, providing details on his alleged payoffs to Aristide and others in exchange for a free hand to ship cocaine through Haiti to the United States. His testimony triggered some of the indictments against the 21 others on money-laundering or cocaine-smuggling charges, U.S. law enforcement officials said.

Another major witness was Aristide's former security chief, Oriel Jean, who was convicted last year in a separate federal case of money-laundering and sentenced to three years. He fingered the same drug traffickers, police officials and politicians -- including Aristide.

And during his testimony at two Miami trials last year, he linked Aristide to at least two people implicated in Haiti's drug trade and the U.S. investigation.

In sworn testimony at those trials, Jean said he was introduced in late 2001 or early 2002 to one drug lord, Serge Edouard, by Hermione Leonard, then the director of the national police's Port-au-Prince district and a woman who was close to Aristide.

"She told me that the president is aware that she has contacts" with major drug traffickers, he testified at Edouard's trial, without elaborating. Leonard, wanted by the DEA, is believed to be hiding in the Dominican Republic.

Jean also testified at trial that he and Aristide approved a national security ID card for Edouard in 2002. He testified that the security badge allowed Edouard to travel throughout Haiti without being stopped by police. Edouard was convicted in that trial on drug charges and is serving a life sentence.

Defense attorneys for Ketant and Jean declined Miami Herald requests to interview their clients.

Ketant also has told authorities that among other drug traffickers who paid off Aristide and members of his inner circle were Ketant's brother, Hector, and Gilbert Horacious, according to sources familiar with the case. Ketant said Horacious was a longtime friend of Aristide's who introduced him and other traffickers to the Haitian president, according to sources familiar with the case.

Ketant's brother was fatally shot in Haiti in 2003, and Horacious was gunned down last year in the Dominican Republic. Shortly after Aristide fled the country on Feb. 29, 2004, hundreds of thousands of dollars in rotted $100 bills were found hidden in his home, according to U.S. news reports. U.S. federal investigators analyzed some of the bills but could not figure out where the money had come from.

ASSOCIATES ACCUSED

Several are alleged to have laundered money

While investigators have struggled to piece together a paper trail leading directly to the former president, they have identified several people in his government who allegedly helped launder drug money for him.

The Miami Herald has learned that the Ketant brothers and other major traffickers made cash contributions to the Aristide Foundation through one of its high-ranking members.

According to traffickers and U.S. law enforcement officials, Aristide allegedly ordered Port-au-Prince district police chief Leonard to pass any seized drugs on to Edouard and other Haitian traffickers for resale. The smugglers, in turn, donated some of the tainted proceeds to the Lavalas party or the foundation, they said.

Aristide also instructed Haitian Sen. Fourel Célestin, who represented the Jacmel area southwest of the capital, to solicit donations from drug traffickers for Lavalas, according to convicted drug smugglers, ex-police officers and U.S. law enforcement officials.

Convicted last year after a plea deal with Miami prosecutors, Célestin admitted taking a $200,000 bribe to help secure the release of two detained Colombian traffickers. Célestin is now cooperating with prosecutors.

Under federal law, prosecutors would not have to prove that Aristide was personally involved in moving loads of cocaine to the United States -- only that he allowed traffickers to use his country and received kickbacks in return. If Aristide comes under a U.S. indictment, the threat of extradition to the United States might keep him from pushing to return to Haiti, according to legal observers. It may also keep Préval from worrying too much about the prospect of his former mentor's return.

After February's presidential election, Préval said that Aristide, like all Haitians, could legally come home. But he added a cautionary note, saying Aristide "must decide whether he wants to return, if there are legal and other actions" pending against him.

EU Arms Market Widens Bidding (WT)

By Gareth Harding, The Washington Times

The Washington Times, July 2, 2006

BRUSSELS -- The European Union took a major step toward opening its notoriously closed armaments market yesterday with a new code of conduct aimed at boosting competition.

The union's 25 members currently spend $62 billion to $75 billion a year buying new defense goods, but there is little cross-border competition or tendering for contracts because the arms industry is exempt from normal EU rules.

Until now, defense ministries have jealously guarded their right to hand lucrative contracts to national industries without having to justify their decisions or open the tender to normal procurement practices. But dwindling defense budgets and the pressures of the single market, which allows for the free flow of goods across national borders, have prodded governments to tentatively open their markets.

Under the code of conduct, which will apply in all EU states except for Spain, Denmark and Hungary, defense ministries are obliged to post new tenders on an Internet notice board and all European arms companies are free to compete for the contracts. Although the code is not legally binding, EU officials hope peer pressure will force defense ministries to comply.

"This regime will create new opportunities for companies across Europe, strengthen our defense, technological and industrial base and offer better value for money to the armed forces and to taxpayers," said Nick Whitney, head of the European Defense Agency.

DOJ_NMG_0038195

In an interview with The Washington Times, Mr. Whitney said European governments were spending too much on soldiers' wages and pensions -- personnel costs consume half of the union's $225-billion-a-year defense budget compared with one-quarter in the United States -- and too little on high-tech hardware.

"We have more men and women in uniform than in America, yet if you compare the collective European deployable military capability, then it really bears no comparison," he said.

The Briton, who manages the newly created agency, also said European governments should spend more on defense research and technology, noting that on average only 1.25 percent of their defense budgets goes for developing cutting-edge weapons, compared with more than 6 percent in the United States.

"If we carry on like that, we will not be able to sustain a competitive defense industry in Europe," Mr. Whitney said.

EU defense ministers gave the green light to set up a common defense research fund in March but remain split over how to finance it.

Mr. Whitney said the United States had nothing to fear from a more robust and competitive European defense industry, but urged Washington to follow Brussels' example in opening up its defense equipment market.

Decrying what he called "fairly strong protectionist currents" in the United States, the EU official said it was "a lot more difficult for European companies to access the American defense market than vice versa."

IMMIGRATION:

Guv Ties Cannon's Win To Immigration (DESMN)

By Lisa Riley Roche

Deseret News, July 2, 2006

Rep. Chris Cannon's victory in the Republican primary shows that Utahns agree with his more comprehensive approach to immigration reform, Gov. Jon Huntsman Jr. said Thursday.

The immigration issue dominated the race between Cannon and his challenger in the primary, John Jacob. Jacob accused Cannon of supporting amnesty for illegal immigrants, because the five-term congressman backs President Bush's proposed guest-worker program.

The primary race was widely seen as a referendum on immigration reform, which has stalled in Congress because lawmakers can't agree on what to do about the estimated 12 million undocumented workers currently in the United States.

Cannon beat Jacob, a real-estate developer, with 56 percent of the vote. The race attracted national attention, with a political-action committee opposed to illegal immigration spending $40,000 on radio ads supporting Jacob.

Huntsman said during the taping of his monthly news conference that airs on KUED Channel 7 that the primary results reflect what most Utahns — and most Americans — support in terms of immigration reform: increased border security and a way of dealing with the "human component," those workers who are already here.

The governor said Cannon addressed those issues. But there was never "a fully articulated view from the Jacob campaign other than (to) deal with the border," Huntsman said.

"I do believe that if we can take anything from the results of the election, it would be that comprehensive reform is what Americans and Utahns are looking for," the governor said, adding he hoped the election would serve as a call to Congress to take quick action.

Huntsman and Arizona Gov. Janet Napolitano, a Democrat, put together a resolution on immigration reform that was adopted earlier this year by the Western Governors' Association. The resolution included calls for both increased security and a guest-worker program.

The Utah governor's involvement in the issue stemmed from his visit a year ago to Mexico City, where he met with Mexican President Vicente Fox. Huntsman was there to pitch an alliance between Utah and Mexico, but Fox wanted to talk about immigration.

So the governor, who also used the trip to extend a formal invitation to Fox to come to Utah, agreed to raise the issue with his Western counterparts. In May, Fox spent about a day in the state, speaking out against building a wall along the U.S.-Mexico border.

Huntsman traveled to the border earlier this month to visit Utah National Guard troops working on the wall. They were among the first deployed under President Bush's latest effort to curb illegal immigration, Operation Jump Start.

Both Cannon and Jacob agreed on the need to strengthen the border. But they differed greatly on what should be done with illegal immigrants who have already crossed into this country.

DOJ_NMG_0038196

Jacob said illegal immigrants should be sent back to their home countries, while Cannon backs a guest-worker program that would allow them to stay in the United States for employment.

E-mail: lisa@desnews.com

In Armed Forces, And Now Citizens (LAT)

By Tony Perry, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, July 2, 2006

SAN DIEGO — In what the keynote speaker called a marriage of two great American traditions — "service to country and the game of baseball" — 53 active-duty U.S. military personnel were sworn in as new citizens Saturday night before the Padres-Giants game.

The crowd at Petco Park cheered as if the home team had just rallied for a victory.

It was an emotional moment for some of the new citizens.

"When I go back to Iraq and if something bad happens to me, they'll send my body home with an American flag," said Navy Petty Officer 2nd Class Xiomara Suttles, 33, who was born in El Salvador. "Now I know that that flag will be from my country."

Most of the Marines and sailors have served either in Iraq or the Persian Gulf, with more deployments to come.

"It's like I'm finally a true part of the country I'm serving," said Petty Officer 2nd Class Hector Estrella, 26, who was born in Mexico. He has done three six-month overseas deployments in seven years.

"I feel I owe this to my Marines," said Cpl. Selia Seiffert, 30, of Germany. "This way, if we're fighting in Iraq, they'll know I am just as much an American as they are and they can trust me."

Since Sept. 11, a number of measures sponsored by the Bush administration have led to an expedited process for active-duty military personnel to become U.S. citizens.

Before the changes, military personnel often were stymied by the military and civilian bureaucracy and the constant shifting of duty stations.

Since the changes, more than 20,000 military personnel have become citizens, 75 of them posthumously. Officials estimate that more than 40,000 military personnel remain eligible for citizenship.

To enlist, noncitizens must be legal residents (green-card holders). Noncitizens are not eligible to become commissioned or warrant officers, and are restricted from certain high-security jobs.

Federal Magistrate Barbara Major administered the oath of citizenship to the 53, who represented 20 countries.

Debra Rogers, San Diego district director of U.S. Citizenship and Immigration Services, called them "true-blue American heroes who have put their lives on the line to protect our way of life."

Sandy Alderson, Padres chief executive officer and a former Marine infantry officer, in his keynote remarks, quoted the song "America" by Neil Diamond:

"Everywhere around the world
They're coming to America
Every time that flag's unfurled
They're coming to America."

With citizenship comes opportunities as well as obligations, and the new citizens pondered both. Many waved small American flags as the fans, settling in for the second part of an Independence Day weekend doubleheader, waved and whistled.

Cpl. Victor Ortiz, 21, of Mexico, who served in Ramadi, Iraq, during some of the heaviest fighting, said that being a citizen will "open doors for me." He wants to join law enforcement when his tour is complete.

Sgt. Nate Greenough, 25, of England, who served two tours in Iraq, will leave the service soon to become a sheriff's deputy in Orange County. Citizenship is a requirement before he can pin on the badge.

Besides, Greenough said, he's felt American for a long time and already has acquired the requisite love of hot dogs and baseball. "I've been there, done that, and now I get the T-shirt," he said, laughing.

For some, explanations of what the future will bring as a U.S. citizen came with difficulty.

"It's uplifting, that's all I can say, it's uplifting," said Petty Officer Willie Nuas, 29, who was born in the Philippines.

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

Cheneys Take Tour Of Hangar (FLTODAY)

By Jim Waymer, Florida Today

Florida Today, July 2, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0038197

Vice President Dick Cheney had seen a shuttle launch once before, but hoped Saturday that his three granddaughters would get their chance.

Storm clouds thwarted their hopes, however, for a roaring light show at liftoff. The booms would have to come at their next destination, NASCAR's Pepsi 400 in Daytona Beach.

"I was especially looking forward to having my grandchildren here," Cheney told reporters from atop the Operation Support Building, shortly after the launch controllers ordered a scrub.

"But we just got a tour of the Atlantis," he said. "At least we got to see that."

Earlier, Cheney had walked through the Orbiter Processing Facility at Kennedy Space Center, where he, his wife, Lynne, and their three granddaughters, Kate, 12, Elizabeth, 8, and Grace, 6, scoped the underbelly of shuttle Atlantis.

"There's actually 25,000 of these," Scott Thurston, a Kennedy Space Center manager, told them as they gazed up at the tiles underneath the shuttle.

Thurston then led Cheney and his family to the nose of the shuttle, where they peered up into the front wheel well of the extended landing gear.

Moments after the Discovery launch was called off, Cheney said he was "very impressed" by the tour of Kennedy Space Center and said of the space program: "It's a great program. It's important that we keep it going."

Other politicians on hand for the launch Saturday echoed similar support for the shuttle program, tempered with concerns about the consequences of another mishap.

"This is a critical launch," U.S. Rep. Dave Weldon, R-Indialantic, said. "We need this mission to go successfully for the future of our manned space flight program. . . . The support for NASA is very strong."

But that support could erode for the shuttle program, he said, should the space agency have another significant accident prompting further safety concerns.

Sen. Bill Nelson, D-Orlando, emphasized the importance of a smooth shuttle mission to ensure enough flights to finish the International Space Station by 2010 and to maintain and repair the Hubble Space Telescope.

"There's a lot riding on this launch because of the necessity of doing at least 16 flights to complete the space station," Nelson said. A 17th flight would include needed repairs to Hubble.

Shuttle Launch Postponed; NASA To Try Again Today (WP)

By Guy Gugliotta

The Washington Post, July 2, 2006

CAPE CANAVERAL, Fla., July 1 -- Under a murky sky studded with lightning-bearing thunderheads, flight controllers on Saturday scrubbed the launch of space shuttle Discovery 11 minutes before liftoff and scheduled a second try for Sunday.

"It is not a good day to launch," Shuttle Launch Director Mike Leinbach told mission control after polling his team during a scheduled "hold" 16 minutes from liftoff. "We're not going to make it today." Five minutes later, Leinbach called Commander Steven Lindsey aboard Discovery and told the crew that the launch had been scrubbed.

The team will try again at 3:26 p.m. Sunday, but Leinbach warned that conditions are likely to be about the same as they were Saturday, or perhaps even a little worse, with low clouds rolling in to the Kennedy Space Center off the Atlantic Ocean to the east, and high thunderheads, known as "anvils," drifting in from the west.

NASA guidelines prohibit liftoff if anvils lurk within 20 miles of the Kennedy launch facility, where the shuttle has to land if there is an aborted launch, and within a 10-mile radius of Launch Pad 39B, where Discovery sits waiting for blastoff.

Tech. Sgt. Matt Timmermann of the Air Force weather squadron said the weather was "observed" in violation of the 20-mile restriction when the scrub was ordered, and had a "growing probability" of violating the 10-mile rule.

The weather provided a disappointing anticlimax to a near-flawless three-day countdown, marred only by the failure of a heater used to keep fuel for one of the shuttle's thruster jets from freezing. The shuttle uses the thrusters to steer the orbiter in space.

Mission control decided early Saturday afternoon that the glitch did not hamper shuttle operations, and decided to put the thruster on standby and use other thrusters during the mission. NASA officials said the broken heater could not be swapped out in time for Saturday's launch attempt.

Lindsey and a crew of six are flying to the international space station for a 12-day mission to resupply the station, repair station equipment and test shuttle machinery. The mission could be extended for an extra day to test repair techniques for the shuttle's heat-shielding.

Wearing bright-orange launch suits, the crew members were strapped into their seats in Discovery beginning about 12:30 p.m. At that time, weather conditions for launch were toggling between "green" for "go" and "red" for "no-go," with frequent changes.

DOJ_NMG_0038198

The trend, however, was downhill. A dazzling central Florida dawn had prompted the Air Force weather squadron to raise the probability of launch from 40 percent, where it had hovered most of the week, to 60 percent.

But by 11 a.m., chances had returned to 40 percent, and around 2 p.m. conditions turned "red" as angry-looking clouds rolled in from east and west, covering more than half the sky. The shuttle, simply by passing through an anvil cloud, can trigger a lightning storm.

Clouds Force Delay Of Shuttle Launching For At Least A Day (NYT)

By John Schwartz And Warren E. Leary

The New York Times, July 2, 2006

CAPE CANAVERAL, Fla., July 1 — NASA scrubbed the launching of the shuttle Discovery minutes before its scheduled liftoff Saturday as threatening clouds encroached on the 20-mile boundary around the Kennedy Space Center.

The postponement came on the first day of a 19-day launching window, just before the start of a 10-minute span in which the launching pad enters the same orbital plane as the International Space Station.

Liftoff is now scheduled for a 10-minute window starting at 3:26 p.m. on Sunday, but current weather forecasts put the likelihood of adverse conditions at 60 percent.

Conditions for Monday, according to forecasters working with the National Aeronautics and Space Administration, are likely to be even worse.

The 12-day flight to the space station is to be the second mission for the Discovery since the loss of the shuttle Columbia and its crew of seven when it broke apart while re-entering the atmosphere on Feb. 1, 2003.

Delays have always been part of the space program because of the complexity of spaceflight technology and the vagaries of weather.

Hopes at NASA for good weather were high throughout the morning, which dawned bright and relatively clear. Dozens of government officials, including Vice President Dick Cheney, came to the space center for the launching.

All morning, the issue causing more concern than the weather was a heater for one of the shuttle's six small thrusters that was not operating properly. But mission officials decided to work around that problem and launch anyway, since shuttle pilots are trained to work without all six thrusters.

Storms are another matter, however, and NASA does not launch when anvil-shaped clouds are near because of the potential for lightning.

A single anvil cloud began to dissipate before 3 p.m., but others began massing behind it. At 3:15, half an hour before the scheduled liftoff at 3:49, Bruce Buckingham, a NASA spokesman, announced, "We are still no go for weather."

The clouds near the launching site began to dissipate, but clouds massed over the landing strip — another condition that prohibits liftoff because good visibility there is needed in case the flight is aborted soon after liftoff and the shuttle has to be brought back to the Kennedy landing site. Two minutes before the countdown was to resume, Michael Leinbach, the launching director, decided to delay resuming it to see if the weather would clear before the day's window closed. Though the seven astronauts had been strapped into their seats in the shuttle, with the hatch shut at 2 p.m., the mission managers gave the order to cancel liftoff at 3:42.

Mr. Leinbach apologized to the commander, Col. Steven W. Lindsey of the Air Force. "Sorry to break your string," he said, "but we're not going to launch today." Mr. Leinbach added, "We're going to try again tomorrow."

Colonel Lindsey agreed. "We'll launch when we're ready," he said. "Hopefully, tomorrow will look better."

In a brief interview on NASA television, Mr. Leinbach said, "We played it till the end," but ran out of time.

"We can't control the weather, and we have very strict rules," he said. "It was very disappointing for the entire launch team."

But he added, "We're not going to launch the vehicle unless it's safe."

The weather for Sunday, he said, is also at "60 percent no-go," with a high probability of clouds.

Normally, NASA waits a day after two unsuccessful launching attempts to give the astronauts, ground crew and mission controllers the rest that allows them to remain sharp; two more consecutive days of launch attempts would follow. If the shuttle cannot be launched before July 19, the next window opens in August.

Mr. Cheney, who was at Cape Canaveral with his wife and three granddaughters, said he was disappointed, according to [a wire service].

"I was really looking forward to today, especially looking forward to having my grandkids here," he said. "But it was not to be today. Maybe it will work tomorrow."

Weather Nixes Shuttle Launch - Again (AP-Y2)

By Marcia Dunn

DOJ_NMG_0038199

AP2, July 2, 2006

Stormy weather prevented NASA from launching Discovery for the second day in a row Sunday, extending a yearlong grounding of the space shuttle prompted by persistent trouble with fuel-tank foam.

Launch officials said they would try again Tuesday, on the Fourth of July, after giving the work force some rest and a chance to replenish the shuttle's on-board fuel. The weather was expected to improve by Tuesday, although rain was still in the forecast.

Launch director Mike Leinbach said it will be tight getting Discovery ready for a Tuesday afternoon launch — only the second liftoff of a shuttle since the 2003 Columbia disaster — and that any thunderstorms on Monday could put his team behind.

He halted the countdown just an hour after the seven astronauts boarded the fueled spaceship.

"Looking out the window it doesn't look good today," shuttle commander Steven Lindsey radioed from the cockpit. He noted that July Fourth would be "a good day to launch." It would be the first time NASA has ever launched a crew on the holiday.

The afternoon sky was considerably darker than on Saturday and left NASA with little choice but to call off the flight to the international space station. Thunderstorms were moving in quickly from the west, and lightning was detected within a few miles of the launch pad. The astronauts rode back to crew quarters in the rain.

The back-to-back delays cost NASA an estimated $2 million in overtime pay and fuel costs.

"After a year of preparation and after a very careful countdown, you don't want to get into a rush and do something that is not smart from a weather standpoint," said deputy shuttle program manager John Shannon, chairman of NASA's mission management team. "Nobody is going to remember that we scrubbed a day or two days a year from now. But if we go launch and get struck by lightning or have some other problem, that will be very memorable."

Shannon said he told his team, "What a great gift NASA could give to the nation to return the shuttle to operation on Independence Day."

"If the weather is good, that's exactly what we'll do," he said.

Among the invited guests who returned for the second launch attempt were family members of the perished Columbia astronauts. Vice President Dick Cheney was back in Washington after a brief visit to the space center Saturday.

Last month, NASA Administrator Michael Griffin approved launching the shuttle despite the concerns of two top agency managers who wanted additional repairs to the foam insulation on the external fuel tank. Columbia was brought down by a chunk of flyaway foam, and a piece broke off Discovery's redesigned tank last July, barely missing the shuttle.

"I've kind of steeped myself in this problem over the last month, and I am quite confident that we've got a very good chance of flying and flying safely," Griffin said Sunday in an interview on CNN's "Late Edition with Wolf Blitzer."

Griffin has repeatedly pointed out that if Discovery were damaged during launch, the astronauts always could take refuge on the space station until a rescue vehicle is sent up.

Sen. Bill Nelson (news, bio, voting record), D-Fla., who flew on a space shuttle in 1986 right before the Challenger disaster, defended Griffin's decision on Sunday and said it was an acceptable risk.

NASA's top safety officer and chief engineer recommended at a flight readiness review meeting two weeks ago that the shuttle remain grounded until design changes are made to the foam that insulates 34 brackets on the fuel tank. Without this foam, dangerous ice could form on the metal brackets once the tank is filled with super-cold fuel.

As it is, more than 35 pounds of foam were removed elsewhere in what NASA described as the biggest aerodynamic change ever made to the shuttle's launch system. Shuttle managers said they wanted to fly with only one major change at a time.

Once in orbit, Discovery's crew will test shuttle-inspection techniques, deliver supplies to the space station and drop off German astronaut Thomas Reiter for a six-month stay.

NASA hopes to add an extra day to Discovery's 12-day flight to test spacewalking methods for repairing possible damage to the ship's thermal skin. By replenishing the shuttle's on-board fuel now, the astronauts will have a better chance of getting that additional day in orbit.

___

On the Net:

NASA: http://spaceflight.nasa.gov

Cheney's Heart Condition Is Called Stable (NYT)

By Sheryl Gay Stolberg

The New York Times, July 2, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0038200

WASHINGTON, July 1 — Vice President Dick Cheney, who has a long history of heart disease and underwent surgery last year to repair aneurysms in arteries behind his knees, was pronounced in stable cardiac health after a routine annual physical examination on Saturday.

Tests at George Washington University Hospital found that Mr. Cheney's cardiac pacemaker was working properly and had not been activated due to arrhythmia, or irregular heartbeat, said Mr. Cheney's spokeswoman, Lea Anne McBride.

Stent-grafts implanted in the popliteal arteries behind Mr. Cheney's knees last September are "wide open," Ms. McBride said, allowing oxygen-rich blood flow to his legs.

When Mr. Cheney went into the hospital for the knee operation, his spokesman said at the time that doctors had planned to implant a stent-graft behind his right knee only, and to repair the aneurysm behind the other knee later.

But in the operating room, his doctors decided to repair both aneurysms on the same day. It is rare that the procedure is performed on both knees at the same time, medical experts said.

Mr. Cheney, 65, has had four heart attacks, the first when he was 37 and the fourth on Nov. 22, 2000, in the thick of the dispute between former Vice President Al Gore and President Bush over the outcome of the 2000 presidential election. Mr. Cheney has also had quadruple heart bypass surgery and two angioplasties, procedures to clear blockages in the arteries.

The physical on Saturday consisted of several tests, including an electrocardiogram, follow-up imaging of the repaired aneurysms and a check of Mr. Cheney's implantable cardioverter defibrillator, also known as a pacemaker, that he has had since 2001. A stress test on a treadmill is scheduled for the fall, Ms. McBride said.

"The vice president's cardiac status remains stable, his I.C.D. is functioning properly and has not treated any arrhythmia," Ms. McBride said in a statement, adding, "The vice president feels great."

After the checkup, Mr. Cheney and his wife, Lynne Cheney, and three of their grandchildren flew to Florida. They stopped first in Cape Canaveral, with hopes of seeing the launching of the space shuttle Discovery. But the mission was postponed.

The Cheneys then headed to Daytona to see a NASCAR race.

Physical: Cheney's Heart Condition Stable (AP-Y2)

By Deb Riechmann, Associated Press Writer

AP2, July 2, 2006

Vice President Dick Cheney's high-tech pacemaker is working properly and has not been activated by any irregular heartbeats, according to his annual physical on Saturday that showed his overall heart condition was stable.

The 65-year-old Cheney, who has a long history of heart ailments, had an electrocardiogram and imaging to check on repaired aneurysms on the back of his knees, his spokeswoman said.

Doctors also checked the condition of an implantable cardioverter defibrillator, which was placed in his chest in June 2001.

Cheney has had four attacks; the first in 1978, when he was 37, and the fourth on Nov. 22, 2000, after the election that made George W. Bush president.

"The vice president's cardiac status remains stable, his ICD is functioning properly and has not treated any arrhythmia," or irregular heartbeat, according to a statement from his spokeswoman, Lea Anne McBride.

Cheney is scheduled to have a stress test on a treadmill in the fall as part of a comprehensive cardiac evaluation.

Dr. Bernadette Aulivola, a vascular surgeon at Loyola University Health System in suburban Chicago, said it was a good sign that Cheney's defibrillator had not been activated since it was last checked.

"If he had had an irregular heartbeat, the ICD would have kicked in," Aulivola said.

The physical did not slow Cheney's pace.

The vice president's schedule for the rest of Saturday: flying to Florida to watch the shuttle Discovery blast off from the Kennedy Space Center and then heading for the Pepsi 400 at the Daytona International Speedway.

In addition to the four heart attacks, the vice president has had quadruple bypass surgery and two artery-clearing angioplasties.

In September, he underwent six hours of surgery on his legs to repair a kind of aneurysm, a ballooning weak spot in an artery that can burst if left untreated. Cheney had flexible stent grafts put in his knee arteries. The stents, when fully opened, keep the rushing blood from touching the weakened artery walls.

"The stent grafts used to treat the popliteal artery aneurysms are wide open," McBride said.

That they are open means the blood flow to the grafts is normal and haven't clogged, Aulivola said. Patients who have had this kind of surgery typically are given intermittent checkups, often once a year, Aulivola said.

She said the upcoming stress test, which will determine if the blood flow to Cheney's heart is adequate, is unrelated to the vice president's aneurysms.

DOJ_NMG_0038201

Cheney was carrying a newspaper and was accompanied by his security detail when he enter the George Washington University Medical Center at about 7 a.m. He left less than three hours later, walking to his motorcade and waving at cameras but saying nothing.

Bush Faces 60th Birthday With Wisecracks (AP-Y2)

By Jennifer Loven, Associated Press Writer

AP2, July 2, 2006

The most powerful man in the world turns 60 on Thursday and he just can't seem to stop talking about it. Barely a week has gone by this year that President Bush has not brought up his advancing age at least once.

"How you doing, sir?" a reporter asked Bush at a news conference a few hours after a middle-of-the-night return from a grueling sprint to Baghdad. "I'm doing all right, thank you," the president replied. "A little jet lagged, as I'm sure you can imagine. Nearly 60."

In his State of the Union address, the president referred to his upcoming birthday as "a personal crisis." It was a laugh line — used to segue to a call for overhauling programs, such as Social Security and Medicare, soon strained by Bush's baby boomer generation.

In fact, Bush is nearly always cracking wise when the topic of his age comes up. The humor, however, contains unmistakably wistful notes, revealing a president who is least somewhat pensive both about aging and his relevance after he leaves the White House in 31 months.

Bush's "I'm getting old" preoccupation puts him in good company.

Cher, Bill Clinton, Dolly Parton, Donald Trump, Sylvester Stallone, Diane Keaton, Suzanne Somers, Reggie Jackson and Jimmy Buffet also are turning 60 in 2006. They are part of the first wave of the 78-million strong baby boomers to enter their senior years.

Karl Pillemer, a professor of human development at Cornell University, said the president's musings are reflective of the group.

Boomers brought advances in the civil rights and women's rights movements. But the generation also introduced America to what Pillemer called "the new narcissism." And now, members of this group are presented with a slew of sometimes bewildering roles: seeing their children enter adulthood; contemplating grandparenthood; watching their parents age and die; retiring from work; and dealing with physical and intellectual limitations.

"For many boomers, turning 60 is a fairly significant shock," Pillemer said. "The generation that believed it would be young forever, clearly will not. ... The boomers are having a hard time with the existential reality of life not being one open-ended opportunity after another."

Dr. J. Edward Hill, the immediate past president of the American Medical Association and a family physician from Tupelo, Miss., has seen many patients display Bush's chatty angst. But he said the president's joshing around is one of the healthiest approaches.

"When you worry about something, you talk about it," he said. "The stints of humor are critically important."

In speech after speech, Bush has referred to himself as the "old president — getting older by the minute, by the way"; as one of "the gray-haired folks"; as "getting older"; and as just flat-out "old."

He often reflects on how he considered 60 practically ancient as a younger man, but has been inspired by changing circumstances to adjust his perspective. "It's all in your mind," he said recently in Omaha, Neb. "It's not that old, it really isn't."

"When are you turning 60?" he quizzed Pete Navarro, a somewhat wrinkled Florida man participating with the president on a panel in May on Medicare's new prescription drug benefit. Bush deflated a bit when Navarro reported that his 60th birthday was not until next January. "Oh, January. You're a lot younger than I am," the president said.

Most often, the famously competitive and fitness-crazed president brings up the physical ravages of time. He jokes about losing his hearing (a frequent source of ribbing by his staff as well), about how knee problems turned him to riding his bike after years of jogging, or about how he is too old for the basketball court.

Bush even broods aloud about his life expectancy, estimated to be an additional 19 years for the average American male his age. "I don't know about you all, I plan on just kind of stretching it out a little bit," he told GOP donors in Indiana in March.

Like most presidents, Bush has grayer hair, more lines and a few extra pounds than when he took office. Yet he still has the health statistics and energy of a much younger man.

Those close to him say Bush is entirely comfortable with the milestone, in part because of the discipline that allowed him to turn 20 years ago from a life of excessive partying and career meandering and never look back.

DOJ_NMG_0038202

He also revels in remaining in shape, even markedly improving his fitness, thanks to intense, six-days-a week workouts. The president may have traded running shoes for a mountain bike, but he pushes himself hard, so much so that he has made news several times when hairpin rides sent him tumbling to the ground.

"I'm sure it makes it easier, especially when you're whipping people half your age — some of them trained to kill people, like Secret Service agents," White House counselor Dan Bartlett said.

The president's most recent physical, conducted last July, found he had a resting heart rate in the range of a well-trained athlete and nothing worse than mild hearing loss, skin lesions from sun damage, occasional acid reflux and joint stiffness. His physicians placed him in a "superior" fitness category for men his age.

Age milestones are common for commanders in chief.

Ten other presidents have turned 60 in office. Dwight Eisenhower had his 70th birthday in the White House, as did Ronald Reagan. Seven others turned 50, including Clinton.

The president's 60th celebration looks barely different from other recent birthdays, just a bit bigger.

About 150 close friends and family are dining with Bush and his wife, Laura, who turns 60 herself in November, on July 4 in the White House residential quarters. Afterward, they will gather on the Truman Balcony for Washington's dramatic fireworks show — and no doubt keep Bush from his usual 9 p.m. bedtime in the process.

Minding Medicare's Drug Gap (LAT)

By Ricardo Alonso-zaldivar And Rong-gong Lin Ii, Times Staff Writers

The Los Angeles Times, July 2, 2006

The program leaves a $2,850 hole in coverage. Now half a year into the plan, 3.4 million seniors may have to decide how to pay or avoid the costs.

WASHINGTON — When Congress created the Medicare prescription drug program, it adopted an unusual idea to hold down costs: the so-called doughnut hole.

The program pays most of a participant's drug bills until expenses reach $2,250 in a year. Then it stops paying until costs exceed $5,100. That leaves a hole of $2,850 that seniors with serious prescription needs are expected to manage on their own.

Now, six months into the drug program — the first new major healthcare benefit for the elderly in decades — 3.4 million seniors are approaching the doughnut hole.

Most of them are middle-class seniors with multiple chronic illnesses. (The poor are exempt from the gap.) Some have already experienced an abrupt surge in prescription costs.

Melvin Kinnison, 65, of Huntington Beach was shocked to discover that the out-of-pocket cost to refill his prescription for antiseizure medication was jumping to $178 from $10. He left the pharmacy empty-handed.

"It hit me like a slap in the face," said Kinnison, a former Los Angeles County sheriff's deputy.

Kinnison is trying to figure out how to handle a monthly tab for heart, diabetes and acid reflux medications that has climbed to $1,000 from $80. "I thought Medicare is supposed to be helpful," he said. "It sure isn't."

Sensing a political opportunity, some Democrats are campaigning on a promise to shrink or close the doughnut hole. As November's congressional elections draw nearer, more seniors will confront the gap.

But the significance of the issue extends beyond the immediate problem. At stake is a basic approach of the Bush administration and many conservatives and business leaders for dealing with the cost crisis in healthcare. They say consumers must be made to take more responsibility for their medical affairs. Costs are growing so fast, they say, the government and private employers cannot shoulder the burden alone.

They say seniors can avoid problems like Kinnison's if they purchase a plan that covers the doughnut hole. The Medicare drug benefit is delivered through private insurance plans, which individuals choose. The plans that cover the doughnut hole — most plans don't — charge higher premiums. Of the estimated 23 million seniors enrolled in the Medicare benefit, about 2.4 million paid extra for some level of gap coverage.

Medicare Administrator Mark B. McClellan also points out: "Even among the people in plans with a doughnut hole, there are steps consumers can take" to make sure they never reach the hole, such as using lower-cost generic drugs and monitoring costs.

"What millions of these beneficiaries had before was no coverage at all for their prescription expenses," McClellan said.

He urged concerned seniors to call (800) MEDICARE to find out about generics. Medicare officials also advise seniors to carefully read their drug plans' monthly statements, which contain information on how close they are to the gap.

In the long run, some experts suggest, some seniors may wish to switch from traditional Medicare to managed care plans, which are more likely to provide coverage in the doughnut hole. Seniors can also anticipate the gap and save ahead for it.

Those strategies may help many seniors, but not everyone, critics of the doughnut hole say.

DOJ_NMG_0038203

The higher premiums for blanket coverage may be beyond the reach of some. Generics are not available for all drugs. And a senior's health needs can change, making it difficult or impossible to plan ahead.

Moreover, such careful management is itself an obstacle for some seniors, whose medical and other problems complicate the situation.

Some doctors worry that vulnerable patients may fall victim to the gap, unable to pay the suddenly higher costs of their medicines.

"There is a huge amount of evidence from research and clinical experience that seniors skip medicines when the price is too high," said Dr. Joshua Sharfstein, Baltimore's public health commissioner.

"If we find that people are skipping their medications, that is a subject of concern."

Some seniors say their solution to the gap will be to import medications from Canada, which is illegal. But if they saved money, they'd take longer to reach the other side of the gap, when "catastrophic" drug coverage kicks in at the $5,100 mark.

Industry experts say a hole in the middle of an insurance benefit is highly unusual. Most medical insurance plans have a yearly deductible. And some prescription drug plans limit how much they will pay each year.

Under the Medicare drug benefit designed by Congress, beneficiaries pay the first $250 in drug costs for the year. The plan then pays 75% of the next $2,000. After that comes the $2,850 doughnut hole, for which seniors are solely responsible. Then, when a beneficiary's drug bills for the year exceed $5,100 ($250 plus $2,000 plus $2,850), Medicare pays 95%.

"I think this is unique," said Dan Mendelson, president of Avalere Health, a healthcare research and consulting firm.

The company's research shows that 15% of stand-alone drug plans for seniors with traditional Medicare offer coverage in the gap. Among managed care plans, 24% offer coverage in the gap.

Economist Jack Rodgers of PricewaterhouseCoopers likened the Medicare benefit to two plans rolled into one: The first offers limited coverage of medication, with a cap at $2,250; the second provides a more generous benefit for higher bills. In between is the doughnut hole.

"A lot depends on whether you look at the doughnut or you look at the hole," said Rodgers, adding that he believed the availability of enhanced plans, albeit for higher premiums, would soften the impact of the gap.

Recent estimates by PricewaterhouseCoopers indicate that 3.4 million beneficiaries will have to pay full freight in the gap.

An additional 2.4 million have signed up for enhanced plans that provide doughnut hole coverage, mostly for generic drugs.

And 10 million are low-income beneficiaries, whose coverage in the gap is subsidized by the government.

The remaining seniors will not spend enough to reach the gap.

Those who have no coverage in the doughnut hole will have to ride what some experts call a benefits roller coaster.

"For the first five, six, seven months of the year, everything is hunky-dory," said Ronald Ozminkowski, a senior researcher with the information firm Thomson Medstat. "Then come July and August, they're on their own and they will have to start paying everything out of their own pockets. That will last most of the rest of the year, until the federal government says, 'OK, enough is enough.' "

And the cycle starts again the following year.

By analyzing national data on prescription spending, analysts are trying to calculate when patients with different kinds of ailments will hit the gap.

"Patients with illnesses like rheumatoid arthritis and multiple sclerosis, who use very expensive drugs, will accelerate through the gap in two to three months," said Mendelson, of Avalere Health. "Those with more common disorders such as high cholesterol and diabetes will take longer to hit the doughnut hole, generally in the fall."

Democrats say the coverage gap can be closed if Congress grants Medicare authority to directly negotiate lower prices with drug manufacturers. Eliminating the gap with tax dollars would be expensive, perhaps costing more than $10 billion a year now, and bigger sums in the future.

But Leonard Cleveland, 68, a retired machinist who lives in El Monte, said a $2,850 gap was too much for people with fixed incomes. "If they just shortened the gap, people could make it through, [with a] credit card or whatever," Cleveland said.

His wife, Helen, who is partially blind and on medication for depression, back pain, allergies and migraines, has fallen into the gap.

"I didn't think it would total up that fast," said Cleveland, who cares for his wife and a 42-year-old daughter who is disabled.

Dr. John Hsu, a research physician with Kaiser Permanente in Oakland, said drugs shown to be highly effective for common problems such as high blood pressure and diabetes should be provided to beneficiaries at no cost, even in the coverage gap.

"A lot of forms of cost-sharing are like blunt instruments," Hsu said. "With any medication that we have good, reliable data on, we need to think hard about encouraging its use and not putting any barriers in front of patients."

DOJ_NMG_0038204

And, because failure to take prescribed medicines could mean that untreated illnesses become more serious, it might even save Medicare money.

*

*

(INFOBOX BELOW)

"Doughnut hole"

Some seniors enrolled in Medicare's drug benefit plan fall into a gap after their costs reach $2,250, which leaves them responsible for paying the next $2,850.

Who is covered

Low income (no gap): 44%

Costs are less than $2,250 (no gap): 31%

Face coverage gap: 15%

Paid for extra coverage: 11%

--

Numbers do not add up to 100% due to rounding.

--

Source: PricewaterhouseCoopers analysis for Healthcare Leadership Council

Saving The Majority (MUL)

By Robert Novak Column

Robert Novak, July 2, 2006

WASHINGTON, D.C. – Facing the real prospect of losing control of the Senate in this year's elections, Majority Leader Bill Frist called together 10 other Republican senators for a Tuesday night strategy session on "saving the majority."

Frist, who is not seeking re-election in 2006, took copious notes about the ideas put forth. But no consensus was reached on how to deal with possible loss of GOP Senate seats in Pennsylvania, Ohio, Missouri, Montana and Rhode Island, with mediocre compensating prospects for defeat of Democratic incumbents.

The need for Republicans to cure their addiction to costly earmarks was raised at the meeting, but hardly any of the senators present showed interest in the subject.

SAVING THE VETO

House Majority Leader John Boehner is credited with cooling off opposition by Appropriations Committee Chairman Jerry Lewis sufficiently to save the administration-backed line-item veto in the House June 22.

Lewis had been giving a run-around to Republican Rep. Paul Ryan, sponsor of the bill providing Presidential authority to veto parts of a spending bill (subject to approval by both houses of Congress). Boehner reminded Lewis that President Bush and the congressional Republican leadership supported the Ryan bill. Consequently, the majority leader urged the chairman not to mobilize the 36 Republican Appropriations Committee members against the line-item veto.

As a result, Lewis e-mailed his committee members that he would vote against Ryan's bill but was not calling on his fellow appropriators to follow him. That ended the danger that monolithic opposition by the Appropriations Committee would turn enough other Republicans to kill the measure. The bill passed, 247 to 172, with Republican appropriators supporting it, 27 to nine.

FUNDING MCCAIN

The Rasika restaurant in downtown Washington was jammed at 6 p.m. last Wednesday for a fund-raising reception benefiting Sen. John McCain's political action committee.

Republicans were willing to pay $5,000 each to hear McCain speak. They wanted to be on record as present to help the prospective front-runner for the 2008 Republican Presidential nomination.

Included among those attending were some of Washington's top GOP lobbyists: Charlie Black, Wayne Berman, Scott Reid and Rick Hohlt. Also present was Sen. John Warner, whose fellow Virginia senator -- George Allen -- is McCain's potential opponent for the Presidential nomination.

FUNDING 'LITTLE ITALY'

Rep. Jeff Flake, continuing his persistent but unsuccessful crusade against congressional markups, last Wednesday ran into implied accusations of anti-Italian bias when he opposed another $150,000 federal subsidy for the Arthur Avenue Retail Market in the Bronx's "Little Italy."

DOJ_NMG_0038205

Noting that this unauthorized appropriation brings to $700,000 the taxpayers' money spent on the market servicing Italian food merchants, Flake declared, "There is a lot of federal prosciutto ... for a private Italian grocery market." He added, "I would argue that this is one cannoli the taxpayer doesn't want to take a bite out of."

Those words apparently offended Democratic Rep. Jose Serrano, whose Bronx district includes the Arthur Avenue Market. "The gentleman from Arizona's use of certain ethnic words like 'cannoli' and 'prosciutto' indicate that he takes this more lightly than he should," Serrano told the House.

Serrano's subsidy was one of nine earmarks, totaling nearly $3 million, that Flake tried to eliminate last Wednesday. All his efforts were rejected.

GOP'S MICHIGAN CHOICE

Although Oakland County Sheriff Mike Bouchard faces opposition in the Michigan Republican primary Aug. 8, he took part in a strategy session in Washington last Wednesday attended by incumbent GOP senators.

Bouchard is heavily favored to be nominated over the Rev. Keith Butler, a former Detroit city councilman. Bouchard was invited to the midday meeting at the last minute by Sen. Elizabeth Dole, the Senate Republican campaign chairman.

The Republican challenge in Michigan against first-term Democratic Sen. Debbie Stabenow has attracted little national attention so far. However, national Republican strategists consider Stabenow one of the few vulnerable Democratic Senate incumbents in 2006.

Farm Program Pays $1.3 Billion To People Who Don't Farm (WP)

By Dan Morgan, Gilbert M. Gaul And Sarah Cohen

The Washington Post, July 2, 2006

EL CAMPO, Tex. -- Even though Donald R. Matthews put his sprawling new residence in the heart of rice country, he is no farmer. He is a 67-year-old asphalt contractor who wanted to build a dream house for his wife of 40 years.

Yet under a federal agriculture program approved by Congress, his 18-acre suburban lot receives about $1,300 in annual "direct payments," because years ago the land was used to grow rice.

Matthews is not alone. Nationwide, the federal government has paid at least $1.3 billion in subsidies for rice and other crops since 2000 to individuals who do no farming at all, according to an analysis of government records by The Washington Post.

Some of them collect hundreds of thousands of dollars without planting a seed. Mary Anna Hudson, 87, from the River Oaks neighborhood in Houston, has received $191,000 over the past decade. For Houston surgeon Jimmy Frank Howell, the total was $490,709.

"I don't agree with the government's policy," said Matthews, who wanted to give the money back but was told it would just go to other landowners. "They give all of this money to landowners who don't even farm, while real farmers can't afford to get started. It's wrong."

The checks to Matthews and other landowners were intended 10 years ago as a first step toward eventually eliminating costly, decades-old farm subsidies. Instead, the payments have grown into an even larger subsidy that benefits millionaire landowners, foreign speculators and absentee landlords, as well as farmers.

Most of the money goes to real farmers who grow crops on their land, but they are under no obligation to grow the crop being subsidized. They can switch to a different crop or raise cattle or even grow a stand of timber -- and still get the government payments. The cash comes with so few restrictions that subdivision developers who buy farmland advertise that homeowners can collect farm subsidies on their new back yards.

The payments now account for nearly half of the nation's expanding agricultural subsidy system, a complex web that has little basis in fairness or efficiency. What began in the 1930s as a limited safety net for working farmers has swollen into a far-flung infrastructure of entitlements that has cost $172 billion over the past decade. In 2005 alone, when pretax farm profits were at a near-record $72 billion, the federal government handed out more than $25 billion in aid, almost 50 percent more than the amount it pays to families receiving welfare.

The Post's nine-month investigation found farm subsidy programs that have become so all-encompassing and generous that they have taken much of the risk out of farming for the increasingly wealthy individuals who dominate it.

The farm payments have also altered the landscape and culture of the Farm Belt, pushing up land prices and favoring large, wealthy operators.

The system pays farmers a subsidy to protect against low prices even when they sell their crops at higher prices. It makes "emergency disaster payments" for crops that fail even as it provides subsidized insurance to protect against those failures.

And it pays people such as Matthews for merely owning land that was once farmed.

DOJ_NMG_0038206

"We're simply administering it the way Congress established," said John A. Johnson, a top official at the U.S. Agriculture Department.

Today, even key farm-state figures believe the direct-payment program needs a major overhaul.

"This was an unintended consequence of the farm bill," said former representative Charles W. Stenholm, the west Texas Democrat who was once the ranking member on the House Agriculture Committee. "Instead of maintaining a rice industry in Texas, we basically contributed to its demise."Freedom to Farm

The program that pays Matthews was the central feature of a landmark 1996 farm law that was meant to be a break with the farm handouts of the past. Subsidies began when the Roosevelt administration stepped forward to support millions of Depression-era farmers suffering from low prices. By the early 1990s, U.S. agriculture was a productive marvel, yet was still mired in government controls and awash in complex subsidies.

When the Republicans took control of Congress in 1995, they brought a new free-market philosophy toward farm policy. In a break with 60 years of farm protections, they promoted the idea that farmers should be allowed to grow crops without restrictions, standing or falling on their own. The result was the 1996 bill, which the Republicans called Freedom to Farm.

The idea was to finally remove government limits on planting and phase out subsidies. But GOP leaders had to make a trade-off to get the votes: They offered farmers annual fixed cash payments as a way of weaning them off subsidies.

That sweetener was needed to win over wheat-state Democrats -- led by Senate Minority Leader Tom Daschle (S.D.) -- and GOP House members from rice and cotton districts. Wheat growers alone stood to receive $1.4 billion in the first year. The payments for rice growers were increased by $52 million at the last minute in an effort to win support from Sen. David Pryor (D-Ark.).

The new payments were calculated on a farm's "base acres," or production dating to 1981. For example, if a farmer had planted 400 acres of rice, he was entitled to a check of about $100 an acre, or $40,000, every year. The amount per acre varied depending on past production.

The payments were unrestricted -- farmers got them whether or not they grew any crops, or whether prices were high or low.

Owners could do almost anything they wanted with their land, as long as they did not develop it. They could leave it fallow or rent it for pasture. They could set up a hunting retreat. Or, as happened in some Louisiana parishes, landowners could collect payments while planting stands of commercial timber.

Supporters said these annual payments gave farmers the flexibility to switch from one crop to another as market conditions changed, or even to sit it out in a year of low prices. In addition, the payments fit with international trade rules that frown on traditional price supports.

The annual payments were dubbed "transitional" and were supposed to decline over seven years. Many lawmakers assumed they would eventually end. But two years later, farm prices fell sharply, and the Republican-led Congress gave in to the farm lobby.

Sen. Thad Cochran (R-Miss.) used his power as chairman of the Appropriations subcommittee on agriculture to push through $3 billion in "emergency" assistance to grain, cotton and dairy farmers. That was only the beginning of a retreat by Republicans fearing retribution at the polls in key "red" states with broad farm constituencies.

"The original intent was to make a step in the direction of eliminating farm programs," said then-House Majority Leader Richard K. Armey (R-Tex.), who led an unsuccessful fight in the 1990s to trim the subsidies. "By 1998, there was no zeal left."

Instead of cutting, Congress ended up expanding the program, now known as direct and countercyclical payments. A program intended to cost $36 billion over seven years instead topped $54 billion.

"The farm policy we're pursuing now has no rhyme or reason, and we're just sending big checks to big farmers," said Gary Mitchell, now a family farmer in Kansas who was once a top aide to then-Rep. Pat Roberts (R-Kan.), the 1996 bill's House sponsor. "They're living off their welfare checks."

Efforts to overhaul the farm subsidy network have been repeatedly thwarted by powerful farm-state lawmakers in Congress allied with agricultural interests.

"The strength of the farm lobby in this town is really unbelievable," Armey said. "I don't think there's a smaller group of constituents that has a bigger influence."'Cowboy Starter Kits'

Farmers and landowners benefited from the 1996 law whether their land once grew wheat, corn, cotton or any of the other subsidized crops. But nowhere is the impact more evident than in the sunbaked Texas rice country that spreads southwest from Houston to the Colorado River and east to the Gulf of Mexico.

In 1981, the Texas rice belt extended over about 600,000 acres. By last year, USDA records show, the amount of planted rice had shrunk to 202,000 acres, partly because landowners were able to get farm payments even if no rice was grown on their land.

DOJ_NMG_0038207

In fact, so many landowners and farmers are collecting money on their former ricelands -- $37 million last year alone -- that the acres no longer used for rice outnumber the planted ones.

"So many wealthy people are getting so much money off this, it's going to be hard to cut," said Michael Wollam, a rice farmer from Brazoria County.

At a housing development rising from old rice fields on the outskirts of El Campo, 70 miles southwest of Houston, local real estate broker John K. Petty purchased a 75-acre tract from investors in July 2002. He held on to it for a few months, then carved it up and resold it for housing.

"At one time, the area was all farmed in rice," Petty said. Now, the dusty tract is perfect for what he calls "cowboy starter kits," residential tracts owned by nonfarmers but still large enough to keep a horse in the back yard.

Petty informed potential buyers that because their land had once been an active rice field, they could collect an annual payment from the USDA on the portion that was not developed. They did not have to grow rice or anything else.

"If you have 10 acres and build a house on one, you can continue to get farm payments on those other nine acres without farming," the USDA's Johnson said.

Petty used it as a selling point.

"Does it increase the marketability?" Petty asked. "Sure it does."

Duane Korenek bought 17 acres at the site and is building a house. Korenek said it was "common knowledge around here" that the new owners could collect farm payments. He has received about $2,550, USDA records show.

A few hundred yards up a gravel and dirt road, oilman Rene Hamman purchased 20 acres in May 2003. His two-story house and garage sit on part of the land and are appraised at $338,140, records show. His payments have been about $4,500, according to USDA records. "The money is free," Hamman, 48, said, adding that he thought the money should go to real farmers. "You don't have to do anything but keep the ground."

When Donald Matthews bought his 18-acre tract from Petty in 2002, he never expected to receive farm subsidies on his property, appraised at $381,000.

"I was informed by Mr. Petty that there was a 'rice base' and I was entitled. I said, 'What do you mean I'm entitled? I'm not going to farm rice.' "

But nine of Matthews's acres are classified as agricultural land, for which he has received more than $5,000, records show.

Matthews said he originally was not going to take the money. But he said Petty told him that it would just go to other landowners. "I thought, heck, why should I do that? I wasn't going to give it to somebody else to put in their pocket." Instead, he uses the money to fund scholarships at the county fair and two local high schools, he said.

"Still, I get money I don't think I'm entitled to," he said.

In some Texas counties, the federal payments open the door to another benefit: property tax reductions.

"When a property owner receives a federal payment, the land is considered agricultural use and is assessed at that lower rate," explained Tylene Gamble, the chief appraiser for Wharton County, where El Campo is located. The discount can be dramatic. For example, she said, a parcel might be assessed at $55 an acre for agricultural use but $3,000 for regular use. "It's big," Gamble said.

Gamble is trying to enforce local rules that require landowners to actually farm to qualify for the lower tax rate. But she is hampered by the federal government's definition of farming, "which does not require you to actually farm. There is a conflict there between the federal definition and our definition," she said.

Gary Underwood, director of agricultural appraisals for sprawling Harris County, which includes Houston, said owners are building $500,000 houses on old rice fields and qualifying for tax breaks.

He singled out one tract where the owner built a 4,000-square-foot single-story house on five acres in Katy, a booming suburb. The house sits on one acre. The other four acres get a tax break and a farm payment. "I can't touch him," Underwood said.The Big Landowners

The large landowners who control vast sections of the once-sprawling rice fields outside Houston have been some of the biggest beneficiaries of the 1996 law, USDA records show.

Diana Morton Hudson is a corporate securities lawyer whose 87-year-old mother, Mary Anna Hudson, owns an interest in two tracts of land in nearby Matagorda County. USDA records show that Mary Anna Hudson has received $191,000 since 1997 on land she doesn't farm. "We just pay someone to mow it, and it just sits there," Diana Hudson said.

Later, she added: "I'm a corporate securities lawyer. I couldn't even locate these two parcels in Matagorda."

Houston heart surgeon Jimmy Frank Howell has received $490,709 since 1996 in payments tied to old rice tracts on a vast ranch near Raywood in Liberty County where he now raises cattle, USDA records show. The last rice produced on the 10,000-acre property was "probably over 10 years ago," according to Susan Cotton, Howell's business manager. "We're not rice producers anymore."

DOJ_NMG_0038208

For Guy F. Stovall III, an El Campo banker who helps oversee thousands of acres of family lands in Wharton, Matagorda and Jackson counties, the 1996 farm law was a chance to get out of rice farming and convert properties inherited from his grandparents to other uses.

But 10 years later, taxpayers are still paying for the transition. Records show the land owned by Stovall and two trusts set up by his grandparents have generated $1.8 million in rice subsidies since 1996.

Stovall stopped growing rice and began renting the land for grazing cattle. The family continues to grow some crops, such as sorghum and soybeans.

Stovall said that is exactly the kind of transition Congress intended with Freedom to Farm. He estimates that 50 to 60 percent of his government payments go to soil, water and other improvements, such as filling in irrigation ditches and putting up fences.

"There are bullfrogs where there were none, and we're starting to see quail," he said. "There are less chemicals flowing into our bays, and it reminds me of the environment when I was a kid.'"'Hell of a Deal'

Among the most fervent critics of the annual payments are hundreds of Texas farmers who rent land on which they grow rice. Under the rules, tenants receive the money if they operate the farms. But landlords can simply increase rents to capture those payments.

Other landlords have evicted the tenants from land they had farmed for years. Then the landowners can collect the checks themselves, even if they do not farm.

Congress "made slaves out of every farmer who was a tenant," said Stephen J. Zapalac, a former Matagorda County rice farmer who now runs a farm credit office in Bay City.

In 1998, Zapalac was leasing 2,500 acres, most of it for rice farming. One landlord canceled a lease for 1,400 acres in 1998, he said, and a second cancellation followed for the rest in 2004.

"As soon as they figured they could take the payments, they said, 'I don't need you anymore,' " he said. "They were renting me land for $40 an acre, but they could get $125 an acre from the government."

Some of the rice land he lost has been turned into pasture for cattle, while the landlord continues to receive the rice money.

"You can sell the calves and still stick the rice payment in your pocket," Zapalac said. "It's a hell of a deal."

For years, Rex Bailey III, a rugged 6-foot-5 rice farmer, sharecropped near Angleton, Tex., an arrangement in which he and his landlord divided the costs and shared in profits and government payments.

"It was all based on what was produced," he said. "We shared the risk."

That changed in 2002, when the owners of one tract changed their arrangement with Bailey, 55, from sharecropping to a fixed annual rent, pegged to capture the $90 an acre that the government was paying him on 214 acres.

"A lot of landlords increased their rental rates to equal or exceed the direct payments," Bailey said. "They know what the payment is, so that's what the rent is. Even though the payment is in my name, I turn around and give it to" the owner.

In 2004, the property was sold to Shin Shan Chu, an elderly investor who lives in Vancouver, Canada. Once a year, Bailey, who still grows rice on part of the 4,000 acres, cuts a $25,000 check and sends it to Chu, whom he has never met.

Reached by telephone, Chu said he hoped to eventually "develop some residential buildings there. It's very nice land, very flat, very close to the city."

Chu, who also owns and leases 17,000 acres of farmland in west Texas, grew up in mainland China and Taiwan, worked in electronics and moved to Vancouver 36 years ago. He described himself as nearly 80.

"It's just an investment," he said of his farm holdings. "I'm waiting for the money."

Researchers Alice Crites and Don Pohlman contributed to this report.

Hiring Federal Lobbyists, Towns Learn Money Talks (NYT)

By Jodi Rudoren And Aron Pilhofer

The New York Times, July 2, 2006

TREASURE ISLAND, Fla. — Rebuffed on several requests for state and federal financing to help rebuild its crumbling bridge, this small resort town was all but resigned to raising the money by doubling the 50-cent bridge toll, increasing property taxes and issuing bonds.

But in a last-ditch gambit, city officials hired a federal lobbyist who had known the local congressman for four decades. Within weeks, the congressman, Representative C. W. Bill Young, called the mayor to say he had slipped a special $50 million appropriation, known as an earmark, into an omnibus bill.

The city had originally sought $15 million. But Mr. Young — a Republican who was then the all-powerful chairman of the Appropriations Committee and, as his lobbyist friend knew, believes public roads should be free — raised it to eliminate the toll.

DOJ_NMG_0038209

Since that windfall three years ago, Treasure Island has continued to pay $5,000 a month to the lobbying firm, Alcalde & Fay, and has continued to reap earmarks: $500,000 to fix a sewer plant, $625,000 to repair wooden walkways over the dunes, $450,000 for pedestrian crosswalks.

"They're worth every penny they get," said Mayor Mary Maloof, who led a parade of antique cars to open the new bridge on June 10. "When we started talking about it, there were plenty of eyebrows raised that we would be doing such a thing. But it's turned out to be a valuable tool for helping us cover costs."

Cities and towns — and school districts and transit authorities and utility agencies — across the country are increasingly reaching for that same toolbox, putting lobbyists on retainer to leverage their local tax dollars into federal tax dollars.

Since 1998, the number of public entities hiring private firms to represent them in Washington has nearly doubled to 1,421 from 763, as places like Treasure Island, population 7,514, have jumped onboard with behemoths like Miami that have long had lobbyists.

Most of these new clients had never sought earmarks — some had never even heard of them — before someone knocked on their door, essentially offering big pots for a pittance. Others had read in the newspaper about neighbors with lobbyists building bridges or beach walks and felt pressure to keep up with the municipal Joneses.

"We're all in competition for the same dollars, and you want all the advantages you can have," said John Litton, city manager in Lake Mary, Fla., about 20 miles north of Orlando.

The collective bill over eight years has topped $640 million.

Enlisted almost exclusively to land earmarks, lobbyists for local governments have boomed alongside a broader explosion in such appropriations, to 12,852 items worth $64 billion last year from 4,219 pet projects totaling $27.7 billion in 1998. The prolific earmarking does not change the overall budget's bottom line, but how the pie is cut: dollars are doled out, often in secret, at the whim of a lone legislator — often under the influence of a lobbyist — rather than through a competitive process.

It is against the law to use federal money to hire lobbyists. Yet local officials' near-unanimous justification is that the lobbyists pay for themselves many times over through the infusion of federal funds.

Ronald D. Utt, a senior fellow at the Heritage Foundation and a frequent critic of earmarks, said he was most troubled at seeing firms solicit public clients with virtual guarantees that they could deliver "dollars for pennies" (or billions for millions).

"The mystery to me is the way they are able to promise returns," Mr. Utt said, pointing to the revolving door between Congressional appropriators' payrolls and lobby shops, as well as to lobbyists' generous campaign contributions. "It goes beyond mere influence peddling to just outright, classic third-world corruption."

The most vivid case of earmark-related corruption came with the conviction this year of Jack Abramoff for trading huge fees from Indian tribes for influence with lawmakers. Public entities have also played a prominent role in the current federal investigation of the links between Representative Jerry Lewis, the current Appropriations Committee chairman, and the lobbying firm Copeland Lowery Jacquez Denton & White, leading to subpoenas of several of the firm's government clients in Mr. Lewis's Southern California district.

Lobbyists say there is nothing improper in their political activity. In fact, they use it as a selling point. In a 2002 proposal to the City of Pembroke Pines, an Alcalde lobbyist pointed to monthly fund-raisers the firm held at its offices in Arlington, Va., and said attending events "very frequently" for Republicans and Democrats alike "does allow us to better our local government clients."

Although local officials are rarely active in the campaign-contribution race that accompanies the earmarks derby, the firm's employees have given upward of $200,000 to more than 100 politicians since 1997, nearly half in Florida and in other states where it has clusters of public clients.

"Because we enjoy a considerable clientele from the private sector," the Alcalde proposal read, "we are able to significantly participate in the political and fund-raising process that might at times better enable us to access public policy makers on behalf of all the firm's clients."

Beyond any question of quid pro quo, however, some critics say the new ubiquity of private lobbyists paid with public money perverts basic democratic tenets. Of the 250 top-grossing firms in Washington, 48 have state, local and tribal governments as their leading source of revenue, far more than any other sector, according to the Center for Public Integrity, which monitors lobbying.

Tim Phillips, president of Americans for Prosperity, one of several Washington watchdog groups critical of earmarks, said it was local politicians' mandate to make their needs known — and the job of members of Congress to look out for them.

"If you're a mayor or a city councilman and you have to hire a lobbyist, what a gross admission of failure on your part," Mr. Phillips said. "I would think they have a fiduciary responsibility to not put taxpayer dollars into lobbyists when they're elected to be, really, the lobbyist for the people."

The mayors and city council members, though, point to the special appropriations as proof of their fiscal prudence.

DOJ_NMG_0038210

Alcalde & Fay is one of three firms — along with Patton Boggs and the Ferguson Group — that collected $25 million from public clients in the past eight years, much more than any other lobbyists. A close look at Alcalde & Fay's 44 public clients in Florida alone shows that, since 2001, $9.8 million in lobbying fees translated into $173 million in earmarks, or a return of $18.41 on every dollar spent.

In Treasure Island, each dollar to Alcalde & Fay yielded $285.83 in federal money.

A Game Changed

To understand how the game has changed, consider the visit of West Virginia University leaders to Senator Robert C. Byrd's office one day in 1989.

They went to see Mr. Byrd — a Democrat long known as the "prince of pork" for pumping money into hometown projects, and then the chairman of the Appropriations Committee — about a research center. When the senator learned the delegation included several lobbyists, he directed them to wait in the lobby.

Mr. Byrd asked for an $18 million earmark, then withdrew the request after an article in The Washington Post revealed that the lobbying firm, Cassidy & Associates, was the origin of the university's idea for where to seek the money.

"I'm on the Appropriations Committee — if I can't do it, nobody can," The Post quoted Mr. Byrd as saying. "Why do you waste your money on a lobbyist when I'm being paid to be your senator?"

These days, such comments seem quaint.

Some lawmakers still insist that lobbyists are unnecessary for local governments, but far from being kicked out of meetings on Capitol Hill, the lobbyists typically arrange them.

When Ms. Maloof, the Treasure Island mayor, makes her annual pilgrimage to Washington to press her case, her lobbyist, L. A. Bafalis — a former Republican Congressman from Florida — picks her up at the airport and escorts her through the day's meetings, paying for lunch in the Capitol's members-only dining room.

A typical monthly retainer is $5,000, with raises over time — and success. For that, according to interviews with more than a dozen Alcalde & Fay clients, the firm sends weekly e-mail messages detailing available federal grants and arranges once-a-year visits to Washington. In between, some clients speak to their lobbyists weekly, while others go a month or more without a phone call.

The Municipalities Practice Group at Alcalde, which accounts for about half the firm's client roster and a third of its $12 million annual revenue, was born with the firm, in 1973. Hector Alcalde had been chief of staff to a congressman from Tampa for a dozen years, and his first client was the Tampa Port Authority, which still pays the firm about $80,000 a year, according to Senate reports.

The City of Tampa eventually signed on, too. And the surrounding county, Hillsborough. Then the neighboring county, Pinellas. The City of Clearwater, 23 miles west of Tampa, became a client in the 1990's, and it was Alcalde & Fay's success in getting Clearwater $22 million in 2000 to replace its own bridge that got Treasure Island's attention.

And so on.

In the 2002 pitch to Pembroke Pines, Alcalde & Fay boasted of having 35 public clients on its roster, including many of the town's neighbors. Now it has 85.

"All of them say, 'We're paying taxes, this is a way for us to get back our fair share of what we're paying into,' " said Andy Wahlquist, a partner who handles several of the firm's public clients in Florida.

Noting the proliferation of earmarks, Kevin Fay, the firm's president, said, "They're compelled to try to get some of that money if the programs are out there."

A snapshot analysis shows that hiring a lobbyist seems to help.

Looking at the 10 Florida cities with populations closest to Treasure Island's, none have lobbyists registered with the Senate; the only earmark among them was $25,000 last year for a veterans' memorial at Alachua City Hall.

North Miami Beach and Homestead, Alcalde & Fay clients with about 40,000 residents each, got a combined $13 million in earmarks in the past five years, while six cities of similar size got none. (Dunedin, population 35,691, lacked a lobbyist but got three earmarks totaling $2.7 million while its congressman, Mr. Young, ran the Appropriations Committee.)

Local leaders say they lack both the knowledge of bureaucratic procedures and the political contacts to navigate the complex world of federal appropriations. Besides, they are thousands of miles from Washington, picking up garbage and running recreation programs and putting police officers on beats.

Cyndie Goudeau, the Clearwater city clerk, said she could comfortably approach her own congressman, Mr. Young, "but if I walk into a representative or a senator's office that's not from this area, they don't know me from a man on the moon."

"But they know Danielle, they know Hector Alcalde, they know that firm," Ms. Goudeau said, referring to Danielle McBeth, the Alcalde partner who handles Clearwater's account. "If we didn't have one, we wouldn't be getting the funding we're getting."

DOJ_NMG_0038211

In the past five years, Clearwater has collected 37 earmarks totaling some $30 million, or $26.25 for each dollar paid to Alcalde & Fay. Besides the sleek, curvaceous bridge leading from downtown to the city's island beaches, the city collected $4 million to transform the streetscape along the water, $1.5 million for a homeless shelter, $1 million for police technology and more.

"In a perfect world, you wouldn't need them," Ms. Goudeau said as she showed off the bridge one recent morning. "But the world's not perfect."

Flying to Washington in February, Joe A. Martinez, chairman of the Miami-Dade County Commission, studied biographies of members of the transportation committee he hoped to persuade to finance a new commuter rail line. He noticed one, Representative Corinne Brown, from Florida, but she is a Democrat — he is not — and from Jacksonville, the other end of the state.

So he called Mr. Alcalde. It turns out that Ms. Brown's daughter, Shantrel Brown Fields, is an associate at the firm.

"I had a meeting with her the next day," Mr. Martinez said of Representative Brown. "I got results."

Last year, Miami-Dade spent more than any other government entity on lobbying, $1.36 million. Totaling fees for the past eight years, it ranks sixth, with $6.7 million; topping the charts are the Metropolitan Water District of Southern California and the Gila River Indian Community, which each spent more than $10 million.

Spreading the Wealth

In general, the largest states had the most public entities with lobbyists — and the biggest fees — but there are notable exceptions: Louisiana ranks fifth, for example, with its government agencies spending nearly $24 million from 1998 to 2005, and Puerto Rico ranks ninth, with $19 million, about the same as Michigan, Illinois and Pennsylvania, which have two or three times Puerto Rico's 3.8 million people.

Mr. Martinez said that after taking over as Miami-Dade chairman last year, he decided to slash the lobbying budget in half, fire 8 of the 11 firms on contract and send his own employee to open a Washington office. But that employee does not have the contacts, Mr. Martinez said: "He doesn't have access to all these people."

Large governments like Miami-Dade — along with ports, airports and public utilities — have long had people in Washington looking out for their interests. What has changed in the past few years is the number of smaller entities looking to get in on the action.

The number of cities with lobbyists, for example, has grown to 511 from 234 in 1998, and the number of counties has also doubled, to 186 from 85. Fifty-nine public school districts had lobbyists last year, up from 19 in 1998, while the number of police and fire departments with their own paid representatives jumped to 16, from just 2.

In Florida, Lake Mary, population 13,922, signed up for $5,000 a month in 2002, joining the two nearby county governments, the local airport, the wastewater authority and the nearby towns of Sanford (population 49,252) and Oviedo (population 30,800) on Alcalde & Fay's client list. But after three years, $220,000 and half a dozen requests for money, all Lake Mary got was a $100,000 clock tower that plays Christmas and wedding music. So the City Council terminated the contract last year, then promptly hired another lobbyist, based in Orlando.

"We felt that if we were going to invest that kind of money, we wanted to attempt to try to get more return on our investment," Mr. Litton said. "Sometimes in the bigger firms you kind of envision yourself as just a number."

Of Alcalde's 44 Florida government clients, half a dozen got no earmarks in the past five years; five more got less than a dollar back in earmarks for every dollar spent on lobbying. The City of Tampa and Orange County also recently fired Alcalde & Fay upon changes in their elected leadership.

"If there's a long list of clients that have something in common with Orange County, i.e., being a local government in central Florida or the state of Florida, then it would occur to me that there's the potential, at least, to dilute your effectiveness," said the county's new mayor, Richard T. Crotty. "There's only so much money to go around, and if you cut the pie 40 ways instead of two ways, that's not as good a deal."

If Alcalde & Fay has cornered the Florida market, Bradley Arant Rose & White dominates Alabama, its home state. Robertson, Monagle & Eastaugh, an Anchorage firm, represents nearly half the public entities in Alaska with lobbyists. Then there are firms like Marlowe & Company, in Washington, which sells itself as an expert in getting money to prevent beach erosion.

Rather than creating a conflict of interest, partners of Alcalde & Fay said that having a geographic cluster of clients allowed them to concentrate on a certain Congressional delegation. They said they were careful to present each client's priorities and, as Mr. Wahlquist put it, never "go to the Hill with more than one client in mind."

A Need for Professionals

DOJ_NMG_0038212

The four-lane, 1.4-mile bridge connecting this spit of land with St. Petersburg was built in 1939, when Treasure Island was unincorporated and had just a handful of homes. By 2003, it rated 3.3 out of 100 on a standard bridge rating. "At zero, you're in the water," said Don Hambidge, the public works director.

Chuck Coward, the former city manager, said the city planned to issue $25 million in bonds backed by toll revenue, and to seek $15 million from the federal government and $10 million from the state. But, he said: "Treasure Island's a very small city. It's not savvy in federal politics."

"We thought we had a worthy project, we thought there were a lot of attributes to it, but we were not skilled in presenting those," Mr. Coward said, recalling several years of requests without results. "After talking with Clearwater, we thought very certainly some professional assistance would be appropriate."

Mr. Bafalis, the lobbyist assigned to Treasure Island, had served in the State Legislature and in Congress with Mr. Young before a failed bid for the governor's nomination in 1982. He mentioned Mr. Young's aversion to tolls when he first met with Mr. Coward on Sept. 23, the day before Mr. Coward met with Mr. Young about the bridge.

Like Mr. Bafalis, Mr. Young declined to be interviewed for this article. But his chief of staff, Harry Glenn, said the removal of the toll had been key to obtaining the earmark, not hiring the congressman's old friend.

"When asked the question whether a city or county needs to hire a lobbyist, he has always told them they don't need to hire a lobbyist to work with their own congressman," Mr. Glenn said. "That's his job. Those are the people he was elected to represent. He doesn't need to work through somebody else to schedule a meeting with a mayor or a city council member."

At the bridge ceremony, where residents nibbled "no toll house cookies," it was Mr. Young who got thanked, not Mr. Bafalis. A 1927 fire engine was the first vehicle to roll across, followed by a forest green Ford Tudor Deluxe as old as the original bridge and two dozen more classics, like a 1959 turquoise Impala and a 1967 cherry Camaro convertible, both complete with fuzzy dice.

Though only one lane flowed in each direction — the two other lanes should be done by next summer — residents were relieved to have their evacuation route reopened in time for hurricane season, and to be able to cut as much as 40 minutes from their commute into town.

The City Council, meanwhile, may yet consider raising property taxes this summer. Without the toll, they would otherwise have no money for maintenance of the new bridge. Unless Alcalde & Fay helps find another earmark.

Federal Standards Put Schools In Quandary (MH)

By Matthew I. Pinzur

The Miami Herald, July 2, 2006

More than 500 high-poverty Florida schools could be forced under the federal No Child Left Behind law to privatize, become charters, replace most of their staffs or make other major changes -- even though some have repeatedly received A or B grades from the state.

A handful of low-performing schools have already faced that choice under Florida's own education accountability laws. But it could become far more widespread next year unless those schools make unprecedented gains on the state's high-stakes standardized test.

"This calls for a drastic change of culture, an entirely new environment," said Rod Paige, the former U.S. secretary of education who oversaw the creation of No Child Left Behind in 2001.

But Florida's education commissioner suggested in an interview Friday that he may defy the federal law -- and risk losing millions in funding -- if he cannot convince Congress or federal education officials to take a more moderate stance.

"My first duty is to the state of Florida's accountability system; I will act accordingly," Education Commissioner John Winn told The Miami Herald. ``I'd be hard pressed to demand an A school make wholesale restructuring."

No Child Left Behind created a ladder of penalties for schools that fail to meet federal standards. The strongest sanction forces a school to plan for dramatic restructuring if it falls short for five consecutive years. If it fails a sixth time, that plan must be immediately implemented.

In Florida, 535 public schools have missed the goal -- known as Adequate Yearly Progress -- for four years. And because AYP standards become more difficult every year, the percentage of schools making it dropped this year from 36 to 28 percent.

It will likely drop further as the targets soar toward 100 percent proficiency. Within a few years, Paige said, huge numbers of urban schools will confront restructuring.

"It would seem the day of reckoning is coming," said Jack Jennings, president of the Center on Education Policy, an independent public-school advocacy group in Washington.

DOJ_NMG_0038213

The federal government's jurisdiction over schools is limited. The No Child penalties apply only to the high-poverty schools that receive federal money under Title I. But that list includes hundreds of South Florida schools. Seventy-nine schools in Miami-Dade County and 32 in Broward have already missed AYP for four consecutive years.

HIALEAH SCHOOL EYED

Among those is Palm Springs Elementary, a Hialeah school of more than 900 students that has received A grades from the state since 2003.

"A staff that's been successful and helped maintain an A school -- why would you restructure it?" asked Roxana Herrera, who recently became Palm Springs' principal.

The apparent disconnect between Florida's school grades and federal AYP is rooted in the two systems' completely different way of interpreting student performance on the Florida Comprehensive Assessment Test.

The school grades are determined almost entirely on two factors: what percentage of students scored a 3 or higher that year on the FCAT's five-level scale and what percentage improved their score since the prior year.

No Child Left Behind measures what percentage of students in various demographic groups are scoring at least a 3 on the exam, which is considered proficient. The target percentage increases every year until 2014, when 100 percent of students must be proficient.

If any one of the nine demographic groups misses the target, the entire school fails to make AYP. At Palm Springs, for example, the school failed to make AYP in 2004 because only 28 percent of special-education students had proficient reading scores -- the goal that year was 31 percent.

"You've got A or B schools that out of 39 criteria has missed one," Winn said. ``To restructure that school based on that, I'm going to be hard pressed to get on the bandwagon regarding that."

There are a handful of loopholes in the rule, but the basic message never changes: Within the next decade, all public-school students in the country must be proficient at reading and math.

"There's a lot of states that aren't yet focused on it, and that's because the numbers have [not] been overwhelming, but they're building," Assistant U.S. Secretary of Education Tom Luce said, speaking June 2 at an education reporters' conference in New Orleans.

HOPING FOR A CHANGE

Indeed, Winn has pinned his hopes on changes to the law. No Child Left Behind needs congressional reauthorization in 2007, and Winn said he hopes the rules will be changed to account for differing levels of achievement instead of the yes-or-no system that now exists.

But the law will not be changed in time for next year's exams. Without a quick change, he said, the 2007 results will be ``a train wreck."

To avoid it, Winn wants federal officials to approve a "growth model," which would allow schools to make AYP even if they fall short of the goals, as long as their students are on pace to catch up. Such a model was rejected this year, but Florida was encouraged to tweak its plan and reapply.

Without it, Winn said, many schools will fall further and further from the federal goals.

"It's like me playing golf -- I throw up my hands and say I'm never going to make it," Winn said. ``We've never raised [Florida's system] to the level of hopelessness, but I think we're on the tipping point of that for No Child Left Behind."

Gov. Jeb Bush has long insisted there is no contradiction between the two systems, but this spring he said Florida's system was more effective.

"That's no disrespect to anybody in Washington, D.C," Bush said June 14. ``I believe our system [school grades] is the most comprehensive system of measuring how schools are doing based on student learning."

Local districts, meanwhile, are left with little guidance about what to do if federal law tells them to restructure dozens or hundreds of schools.

"This has always been a problem, the idea of putting public school systems in a vise between their own state requirements and No Child Left Behind," Miami-Dade Superintendent Rudy Crew said. ``If the state and federal government will get on the same page, it will avoid districts being at risk of being in this conflicting environment altogether."

A few states began measuring AYP earlier than Florida and have already breached restructuring. California recently dealt with 271 schools, and Michigan had 133.

But according to Jennings' group, the vast majority elected for the vaguest of the law's requirements: ``Undertaking any other major restructuring of the school's governance that produces fundamental reform."

In Michigan, for example, those plans included reorganizing the school's governance and changing the curriculum -- strategies often used in Florida for schools that repeatedly earn F grades.

DOJ_NMG_0038214

While those plans seem less drastic than the law's other options, the Center on Education Policy's study of Michigan suggests they work: Eighty-five percent of the state's restructured schools made AYP the following year.

TOUGH TALK

"What happens with politicians is that they talk tough when they sign laws and pass laws, but that doesn't necessarily mean that's how the law is going to be implemented," Jennings said.

But as AYP becomes more difficult to achieve, internal reforms may not be enough. Moreover, the law says little about what happens to schools that continue to miss AYP after the sixth year.

Paige said policy-makers and public pressure will likely force those schools to confront the more draconian options.

"I'm not surprised they're looking first to these kinds of steps," said Paige, now chairman of Chartwell Education Group, a consulting firm. ``But eventually, I think it is going to go to the kinds of things conceptualized in the legislation."

The School Testing Dodge (NYT)

The New York Times, July 2, 2006

Many of the nations that have left the United States behind in math and science have ministries of education with clear mandates when it comes to educational quality control. The American system, by contrast, celebrates local autonomy for its schools. When Congress passed the No Child Left Behind Act, it tried to address the quality control problem through annual tests, which the states were supposed to administer in exchange for federal dollars. But things have not quite worked out as planned.

A startling new study shows that many states have a longstanding tradition of setting basement-level educational standards and misleading the public about student performance. The patterns were set long before No Child Left Behind, and it will require more than just passing a law to change them.

Policy Analysis for California Education (PACE), a research institute run jointly by Stanford and the University of California, showed that in many states students who performed brilliantly on state tests scored dismally on the federal National Assessment of Educational Progress, which is currently the strongest, most well-respected test in the country.

The study analyzed state-level testing practices from 1992 to 2005. It found that many states were dumbing down their tests or shifting the proficiency targets in math and reading, creating a fraudulent appearance of progress and making it impossible to tell how well students were actually performing.

Not all states have tried to evade the truth. The tests in Massachusetts, for example, yield performance results that are reasonably close to the federal standard. Not so for states like Oklahoma, where the score gap between state and federal tests has averaged 48 points in reading and 60 points in math, according to the PACE report. The states that want to mislead the government — and their own residents — use a variety of dodges, including setting passing scores low, using weak tests and switching tests from year to year to prevent unflattering comparisons over time. These strategies become transparent when the same students who perform so well on state tests do poorly on the more rigorous federal exam. Most alarming of all, the PACE study finds that the gap between student reading performance on the state and federal tests has actually grown wider over time — which suggests that claims of reading progress in many states are in fact phony.

States have always resisted the idea of one national set of tests, citing local autonomy. But if the United States wants to equal its competitors abroad, it must move away from a patchwork system based on weak standards and a frankly fraudulent system of student assessment. Under one promising proposal, the government would finance creation of a rigorous, high-quality test that would be provided free to the states — as long as they agreed to use federal scoring standards. That would finally give the country an accurate and all-encompassing view of student performance.

OTHER NEWS:

Tech Faceoff: Net Neutrality, In The Eye Of The Beholder (WP)

By Kim Hart And Sara Kehaulani Goo

The Washington Post, July 2, 2006

Stark Contrasts in the Debate Over the Future of the Internet

From Capitol Hill to Silicon Valley, it's become one of the most controversial and confusing topics to hit the tech industry this year: network neutrality. The term is confusing, the ad campaigns have further clouded the issue, and it's no longer easy to tell who's for it and who's not.

Whatever becomes of the concept could affect what you pay for connectivity, the sites you'll have access to and the types of services (think video, music and Internet phone offerings) you'll be able to use.

DOJ_NMG_0038215

Net neutrality is the push to prohibit a pay-for-speed Internet pricing structure that the cable and phone companies -- those that provide high-speed Internet connections -- have proposed.

To better understand it all, go back to the old "information superhighway" analogy, where the phone and cable lines that connect your computer to the Web are the on-ramps to that highway. Should the companies who built those on-ramps -- Verizon Communications Inc. and Comcast Corp. in the Washington region -- be allowed to impose a toll system that charges Web companies such as Google Inc. a higher fee to reach your computer faster than its competitors, such as Yahoo Inc.?

Is that the essence of a free-market system? Or is it one that creates inequality on a road that should have no tolls at all? The jury -- in this case, Congress -- is still out.

* * *

Q Why should I care about net neutrality?

AThe absence of a net-neutrality provision in a revision of the Telecommunications Act could result in fewer choices, according to proponents. Currently, similar Web sites take about the same amount of time to load in a Web browser. If Congress takes no action, the "load time" for some sites -- those that don't pay a premium, for example -- could be longer than others. Likewise, Internet service providers could favor partners that offer music or video downloads, Internet calling or online shopping, slowing access to competing sites. Big companies, such as Google and Microsoft Corp., will be able to pay higher fees to have their sites come up more quickly. But this could stifle innovation and start-up Internet companies, especially those that have little revenue but require a lot of bandwidth, such as online video site YouTube.

Net-neutrality opponents, however, argue that these scenarios aren't happening now and that net neutrality attempts to solve a problem that doesn't exist. From a business perspective, opponents say, Internet providers understand that customers won't tolerate that sort of treatment of the Internet. It's in their best interests to keep all Internet traffic flowing at an equal speed.

Could the number of Web sites I can access be limited?

On this point, both sides say yes -- but for different reasons. Proponents say that without net neutrality, inexpensive free-speech vehicles such as blogs and social-networking sites could be stifled. Likewise, Internet start-up companies would have a tougher time competing for a presence on the Web against the big players. Opponents believe, however, that a government-regulated Internet would deter deep-pocketed technology companies such as Google, Microsoft and Yahoo from investing in a more robust Internet infrastructure. Video and voice features, which take up more room in the Internet pipeline, clog the networks and decrease the speed for everyone. If the tech companies don't pitch in for upgraded networks, the congestion will slow things down for everyone, opponents say.

Would net neutrality affect my ability to download music, watch videos or make phone calls over the Internet?

It could. Proponents cite a scenario in which your Internet provider launches its own music- or movie-download service and puts it on "the fast-download lane" in front of competing services such as iTunes, Yahoo Music and others. More importantly, they say, we've already seen this sort of abuse with Internet phone services. Last year, the Federal Communications Commission sided with Vonage when it complained that a small Internet service provider based in North Carolina was blocking its service to customers. The decision made clear that the FCC won't stand for phone companies blocking their competitors, but current rules don't prevent them from giving their own service priority or charging higher fees to their competitors.

Net-neutrality opponents make the same "congested Internet" argument on this point. But they enhance their position by noting that today's non-neutral market keeps the Internet competitive, forcing iTunes, YouTube and others to invest in an upgrade of the network. Regardless of how you get your Internet service, Web sites could differentiate themselves from other sites by finding new ways to offer speedy delivery. That, in turn, could lead to further innovation and more choices for consumers, they say.

Would net neutrality affect my choices for an Internet provider or how much I pay?

Both sides say no. But those who favor net neutrality worry that if phone and cable companies start charging tech companies for enhanced speeds, the costs could be passed on to the consumers -- in the form of increased prices for music downloads or service fees on online retail sites. Those against net neutrality argue that if the tech companies help pay for the future upgrades needed to deal with increased traffic, then the cable and phone companies won't have to raise rates to offset those upgrade costs. Likewise, they also could create pricing structures that give consumers a choice for the levels of Internet service they want. Heavy users could pay more, while light users could opt for a lower-priced plan.

What happens next?

The net-neutrality issue has been included in a larger telecommunications bill being considered by Congress. The House has already approved its version, but it's unclear whether the bill has enough support in the Senate to move ahead.

As of now, the bill favors telecommunications companies that want the FCC to monitor the issue of access to the Internet. Many Democrats oppose the current bill unless it includes tougher language that would make it illegal for telecom firms to impose a priority pricing structure. It's unlikely that they'll reach a compromise before September, but many lobbyists and lawmakers say the net-neutrality issue could prevent the entire telecom bill -- which includes other provisions such as new rules for cable franchises -- from moving forward until next year.

DOJ_NMG_0038216

White House Suitors Deluge New Orleans (WT)

By Christina Bellantoni, The Washington Times

The Washington Times, July 2, 2006

NEW ORLEANS -- Visiting Louisiana and Mississippi has become increasingly important for politicians considering a White House bid.

Although New Hampshire and Iowa hold the first-in-the-nation presidential primary and caucuses, the Gulf Coast region ravaged by Hurricane Katrina has emerged as a crucial stop for 2008 contenders.

Sen. George Allen, Virginia Republican, recently walked amid the rubble of what were once homes in New Orleans neighborhoods. Others interested in the presidency also have taken a tour.

"If you are going to be a serious, credible politician, you are going to have to be able to talk intelligently about what Katrina did to this region, and the first step in that is going to be to come and visit now," said Brian Brox, assistant professor of political science at Tulane University.

Mr. Allen pledged to help New Orleans because he views it as a unique American city.

"I don't think that by 2008 this is all going to be built back," he told The Washington Times on June 22 before taking a damage survey by helicopter.

Wearing his signature cowboy boots, Mr. Allen stood atop piles of debris in homes that had been destroyed by Lake Pontchartrain's floodwaters.

"It's just so heartbreaking," he said. "If this were a carpet-bombing in a war, you couldn't have more devastation."

Sen. Mary L. Landrieu has hosted dozens of other lawmakers here, but the Louisiana Democrat is reaching out especially to potential presidential candidates, telling them: "You've got to see what's not working, so hopefully, if you get to be president, you can help fix it."

Other Louisianans agree that seeing is believing.

"There's nothing more effective than showing people like this. You just can't tell from TV," said Sen. David Vitter, Louisiana Republican.

Mr. Allen said smelling the mud and listening to survivors helped him realize the magnitude of the situation and that he was particularly moved by the vast number of family-owned shops and small businesses left in ruins.

After touring the flood-ravaged lower 9th Ward and St. Bernard Parish, he wondered aloud how the neighborhoods could be rebuilt in a place that is "tempting nature."

"It is literally decimated. People cannot live in places that are dangerous," Mr. Allen said.

Mr. Allen, facing a tougher-than-expected re-election battle in the fall, has been criticized for traveling outside Virginia as he simultaneously explores a White House bid. The senator insisted that the New Orleans trip was necessary as he votes on recovery funding and serves on the Energy and Natural Resources Committee, which is tackling coastal issues after Hurricanes Katrina and Rita.

Mr. Allen was briefed on the challenges of the coastal wetlands. He said New Orleans should be able to share in the royalties from deep-sea energy exploration.

Both Mr. Allen and Sen. Evan Bayh, Indiana Democrat, evoked presidential themes at a press conference with Mrs. Landrieu and Mr. Vitter.

"We're all neighbors, and Americans need to stick together," Mr. Allen said.

Mr. Bayh called the rebuilding efforts a "test of America," adding: "We need to learn the lessons of this disaster."

The lawmakers were mentioned briefly in the papers the next day, but some television stations provided no coverage. Observers note that the photos will remain.

"Just like kissing pigs here in Iowa, it's a great photo opportunity," said Steffen Schmidt, a political science professor at Iowa State University.

Former Virginia Gov. Mark Warner, who has been mentioned as a Democratic presidential candidate, was in New Orleans last week on a fact-finding mission to see how he could help with children's health care challenges. He took with him Virginia specialists.

After Katrina hit, Mr. Warner sent his chief of staff to help New Orleans officials.

Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton, New York Democrat who also took the Gulf Coast tour with Mrs. Landrieu, has called for an independent investigation of the failed government response to the hurricane.

DOJ_NMG_0038217

Political observers said that theme will work for 2008 presidential candidates from both parties. Republicans can say Democratic state and local officials failed to demonstrate proper leadership, while Democrats can criticize blunders made by the Bush administration and the Federal Emergency Management Agency, Mr. Schmidt said.

Sen. Joseph R. Biden Jr., Delaware Democrat, visited New Orleans in March but expressed reservations beforehand that it would seem like "we're all down there grandstanding."

"The risks are real in terms of looking like they are being exploitive," said Linda Fowler, a government professor at Dartmouth College.

Other potential presidential hopefuls who have toured the damage in New Orleans include: Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist, Tennessee Republican, Republican Sens. Sam Brownback of Kansas and John McCain of Arizona, and Democratic Sens. Christopher J. Dodd of Connecticut and John Kerry of Massachusetts.

Sen. Russ Feingold, Wisconsin Democratic, plans a visit this month.

Kerry Faces Hard Road In Presidential Bid (AP-Y2)

By Mike Glover, Associated Press Writer

AP2, July 2, 2006

Seeking the presidency is harder the second time around. As the race for 2008 builds, Democratic Sen. John Kerry has left little doubt about his intentions to try again after his narrow loss to President Bush in 2004. He isn't the only also-ran considering another marathon.

Sen. John McCain (news, bio, voting record), R-Ariz., has the look of a White House hopeful. Three Democrats — 2004 vice presidential nominee John Edwards, retired Army Gen. Wesley Clark and Sen. Joe Biden of Delaware — sound a lot like presidential candidates; Al Gore, the Democrats' nominee in 2000, says he has all but ruled out running for president in 2008.

Kerry faces a challenge of major proportions, convincing Democratic activists that a candidate who just lost an election can still carry his party's White House hopes.

"I think the Democratic Party, unlike the Republican Party, has had a historic reluctance to give people a second chance," said Democratic activist Jerry Crawford, a Des Moines lawyer who was chairman of Kerry's 2004 campaign in Iowa.

It's rare when Democrats give the nomination to a candidate who just failed.

Adlai Stevenson got a second chance against President Eisenhower in 1956, but many suspect that Democrats were pessimistic about the odds of unseating a popular president. Their doubts were realized when Stevenson lost again.

Republicans, on the other hand, are more willing to give their nominees another try. Richard M. Nixon lost the presidency in 1960 and won the White House in 1968. Bob Dole sought his party's nomination in 1980 and 1988. He secured the GOP nod in 1996 but lost the general election to President Clinton.

Dole said the climb gets steeper on the next try.

"I think the advantage is the first time you are fresh and new to a lot of people and they haven't formed a judgment about you," the former Kansas senator said. "The second time around, some people might say he's had his chance, we need a new face."

Kerry's allies acknowledge the struggle but are unwilling to give up the cause.

"Historically, the Democratic Party has tended to shoot its wounded," said former New Hampshire Democratic Chairman Joe Keefe. "John Kerry has done everything within his power to rewrite that chapter."

The Massachusetts senator has raised nearly $9 million for candidates and the party and has campaigned actively across the country.

In statements the party's liberal base has welcomed, Kerry has said he was wrong to vote for the Iraq war resolution in 2002 and has called for an end to the conflict.

The Vietnam War veteran also has come out in favor of a timetable for withdrawing U.S. troops from Iraq. But he got precious little support, even among fellow Democrats, in recent Senate debate.

The amendment failed 86-13 and Kerry's push for the measure frustrated some in the party leadership.

Kerry has made three trips to Iowa. The state's caucuses launch the nominating season and Kerry's surprising victory in January 2004 propelled him to the nomination.

Attitudes have changed among state Democrats, with a recent Des Moines Register poll putting Kerry a distant third behind 2004 running mate Edwards, the former North Carolina senator, and New York Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton.

Democratic consultant and Kerry ally Jenny Backus said Kerry must overcome "the Democratic curse" of dismissing losing candidates, no matter how well they perform.

"He has grown from the devastation of the last election," said former Sen. Max Cleland of Georgia. "A lot of people who are reacting to Kerry are reacting to the Kerry of '04."

DOJ_NMG_0038218

Kerry, who raised $233 million as a presidential candidate, had about $15 million left after the November 2004 election. That was a sore point with many Democrats who questioned why he did not spend it all to unseat Bush.

Kerry gave about $3 million of that money to various Democratic committees and spent about $2 million to buy the e-mail donor list from his campaign. After covering various campaign debts, he had millions left and has been adding to his accounts since then.

As Kerry moves to involve himself in the next campaign, some point to the flaws in his last run as evidence he shouldn't be the standard bearer again.

"I think he has to make an argument that he could do better than he did in 2004," said Democratic strategist Jeff Link, who is consulting with the political action committee of Iowa Gov. Tom Vilsack, a potential Kerry rival.

"We had an unpopular president who had launched an unpopular war and Democrats were as motivated as I've ever seen them, but he couldn't close the sale. I think that's going to give a lot of Democrats pause," Link said.

John Norris, who managed Kerry's campaign in Iowa and ran his field operations in the general election, said candidates learn valuable lessons in a national campaign that could be put to use in a second bid. Sadly, he said, voters do not see it that way.

"That sentiment you talked about is really strong out there," Norris said. "You know, 'He's had his chance.' I think that's shortsighted."

Link said there is an inherent reluctance to give a candidate a second chance, regardless of how well they performed. He worked for Gore during the disputed 2000 election.

"I was a very strong supporter of Al Gore and when he sort of put his toes in the water in 2004 he didn't find the support I think he had hoped for," Link said. "And he had arguably won the 2000 election."

Veteran Democratic strategist Ron Parker said it isn't a very complicated set of dynamics.

"For most folks, Kerry's selling point was less about ideology, about experience, it was the fact that he was the most electable candidate," Parker said. "It turns out that wasn't true and that opens the door for somebody new in 2008."

Crawford, a close ally of Bill Clinton, said electability is critical to the Democrats.

"We, as a party, are going to get to January of 2008 and take a look at the national landscape. And if it looks like Hillary Clinton can win a general election, the great possibility is she will be our nominee," Crawford said. "If we get to January of 2008 and it looks like she can't win a general election, then it's open season and we'll go from there."

Between Polar Opposites Is This Equator: Text Me (WP)

By Zachary A. Goldfarb

The Washington Post, July 2, 2006

Ring, buzz, vibrate: You've got a political message on your cellphone.

Sending text messages to cellphones is catching on this year as a method for reaching supporters.

On Thursday, the political action committee of former senator John Edwards (D-N.C.) went live with a messaging service. People who sign up for the One America Committee's text-messaging database receive on their phone: "Thanks 4 joining my mobile team. Please text me your name & email. Visit us @ http://oneamericacommittee.com. I'll be in touch. John."

"Senator Edwards and Mrs. Edwards are very interested in utilizing all the latest technologies to communicate with people," said Kim Rubey, Edwards's spokeswoman. "Communicating with text messages is a great way to stay in touch with people who are incredibly busy."

The technology comes from a firm called the Rights Group, which has worked on mobile phone advocacy with organizations such as the American Civil Liberties Union.

"It's a very good way to increase the number of people you're in ongoing contact with," said Jed Alpert, the company's chief executive. "You can enroll at different points of contact, at live events, in print media or on the Web.

"We get response rates that are 10, 20 even 30 times what response rates are to e-mail because open rates are so high with text messaging," Alpert said.

Embattled Sen. Rick Santorum (R-Pa.) recently started using text messaging.

At a women's outreach breakfast in the Harrisburg area last month with Mary Matalin, a former adviser to Vice President Cheney, attendees were invited to join Santorum's text-message database. In response, they received: "From Keeping Women's Docs in PA to Allowing Parents the Freedom to Work from Home, Rick Santorum is Leading 4 Women. Look 4 Msgs with More Information."

"We wanted to find a way to reach some of the busiest voters. Almost everyone has a cellphone at their fingertips," said Virginia Davis, Santorum's spokeswoman. She said people who sign up will get "periodic updates on what the senator is up to."

DOJ_NMG_0038219

Right now, the text-messaging feature is limited to Santorum's women's outreach efforts, but it could be expanded to other groups, such as veterans or students.Kerry's Treasury Department

John F. Kerry, the Democratic presidential nominee in 2004, has a big electronic address book -- it contains 3 million e-mail addresses -- and he hasn't been shy about using it to promote Democratic causes and to position himself for a presidential run in 2008. Now, insiders say, it's also bringing in quite a bit of money for Democrats nationwide.

Kerry insiders said reports for the quarter that ended Friday show he has given or raised nearly $10 million for Democratic candidates and committees since November 2004. That's $1.5 million in the past three months. Kerry has raised a total of $13.5 million this cycle.

Just last week, Kerry sent out an e-mail to raise money for the Senate candidacies of incumbent Maria Cantwell (Wash.), Claire McCaskill (Mo.), Rep. Sherrod Brown (Ohio) and incumbent Bob Menendez (N.J.). Kerry has given or raised $2.3 million for 18 Senate candidates and $6 million for 36 committees.

Other potential 2008 presidential candidates have also been active in giving and raising money.

Kerry's 2004 running mate, former senator John Edwards, has raised $6.5 million this cycle for fellow Democrats. He does not give funds to other committees.

Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton (N.Y.) has raised and given $8 million to Democratic candidates and committees this cycle.

Former Virginia governor Mark R. Warner's Forward Together has raised $8.2 million and donated $810,000 to candidates and party committees since the political action committee was formed last year. Warner aides could not specify how much he has raised for other candidates, but he has done more than 25 events for candidates since last November.Bush, Yea or Nay?

President Bush isn't running for office this year, but candidates are doing their best to make 2006 a referendum on him.

Two new television ads have popped up in the Senate contests in Connecticut and Nebraska that feature the chief executive.

In Connecticut, businessman Ned Lamont, who is challenging Sen. Joseph I. Lieberman in an Aug. 8 Democratic primary, has launched an ad that morphs the incumbent into the president. The commercial features images of Bush paired with audio from Lieberman, creating the effect that Bush is speaking with the Connecticut Democrat's voice.

"Joe Lieberman may say he represents us, but if it talks like George Bush and acts like George Bush, it's certainly not a Connecticut Democrat," the narrator says. Lamont is hoping to capitalize on anti-Bush sentiments in the state to defeat Lieberman, one of the Democrats most closely aligned with the president.

In Nebraska, Sen. Ben Nelson (D), who is seeking reelection in Nebraska, is playing the opposite game.

In an ad that slams his GOP challenger, former Ameritrade Holding Corp. executive Pete Ricketts, the narrator says: "We know no one's more independent than Ben." Bush appears in a clip from his visit to the state in February 2005 in which he praises Nelson as "a man with whom I can work, a person who's willing to put partisanship aside to focus on what's right for America."

Since Bush uttered those words, Nelson's political team has viewed them as political gold -- essentially an endorsement of the senator's centrist politics by a president who carried the Cornhusker State with 66 percent in 2004.

The Power Of Hillary (WP)

By James Carville And Mark J. Penn

The Washington Post, July 2, 2006

"Hillary Clinton really is one of the weakest . . . nominees with whom the Democrats could be saddled."

"Democrats are worried sick about her chances."

"Just give someone else a chance, so we in the Democratic Party can elect a Democrat."

"She cannot possibly, possibly win."

Yada, yada, yada.

We've heard all this "Hillary can't win stuff" before. In fact, the quotes above aren't from recent weeks but from six years ago, when many pundits -- and Democrats -- said there was no way that Hillary could get elected to the Senate. She won by 12 percentage points.

We don't know if Hillary is going to run for president, but as advisers who have worked on the only two successful Democratic presidential campaigns in the past couple of decades, we know that if she does run, she can win that race, too.

Why? First, because strength matters. Our problems as a party are less ideological than anatomical: Our candidates have been made to look like they have no backbone. But the latest Post-ABC News poll shows that 68 percent of Americans describe Hillary Clinton as a strong leader. That comes after years of her being in the national crossfire. People know that Hillary has strong convictions, even if they don't always agree with her. They also know that she's tough enough to handle the viciousness of a national campaign and the challenges of the presidency itself.

DOJ_NMG_0038220

One thing we know about Clinton campaigns: Nobody gets Swift Boated.

The woman who gave the War Room its name knows how tough politics at the presidential level can be. Adversaries spent $60 million against her in 2000, and she endured press scrutiny that would have wilted most candidates. She gave as good as she got, and she triumphed.

For those who think that the politics of personal destruction might be rekindled against Hillary or her husband, we can only remind people how consistently that approach has backfired in the past. Bill Clinton would certainly be a huge asset if Hillary decided to run.

In fact, Hillary is the only nationally known Democrat (other than her husband) who has weathered the Republican assaults and emerged with a favorable rating above 50 percent (54 percent positive in the latest Post-ABC poll).

Yes, she has a 42 percent negative rating, as do other nationally known Democrats. All the nationally un known Democrats would likely wind up with high negative ratings, too, once they'd been through the Republican attack machine.

The difference with Hillary is the intensity of her support.

Pundits and fundraisers and activists may be unsure of whether Hillary can get elected president, but Democratic voters, particularly Democratic women and even independent women, are thrilled with the idea.

The X factor for 2008 -- and we do mean X -- is the power of women in the electorate. Fifty-four percent of voters are female. George Bush increased his vote with only two groups between 2000 and 2004: women and Hispanics. Bush got 49 percent of white female voters in 2000 and 55 percent in 2004. Of his 3.5-percentage-point margin over John Kerry, Bush's increase with women accounted for 2.5 percentage points. The rest came from a nine-point increase among Hispanic voters: from 35 percent in 2000 to 44 percent in 2004. We believe that Hillary is uniquely capable of getting those swing voters back to the Democratic column.

Hillary's candidacy has the potential to reshape the electoral map for Democrats. Others argue they can add to John Kerry's 20 states and 252 electoral votes by adding Southern states, or Western or Midwestern, depending on their background. Hillary has the potential to mobilize people in every region of the country.

Certainly she could win the states John Kerry did. But with the pathbreaking possibility of this country's first female president, we could see an explosion of women voting -- and voting Democratic. States that were close in the past, from Arkansas to Colorado to Florida to Ohio, could well move to the Democratic column. It takes only one more state to win.

Finally, for those who believe that Hillary's electoral chances are tied to ideology, not leadership qualities, we believe that she is squarely in the mainstream of America. Some people say she is too liberal, some that she is too conservative. We think her 35 years of advocacy for children and families and her tenacious work in the Senate to help ensure our security after Sept. 11 and to help middle-class families will serve her well. We think she represents the kind of change the country is yearning for: a smart, strong leader. She would take the country in a fundamentally different direction: closing deficits, not widening them; expanding health care coverage, not shrinking it. Fighting terrorism without isolating us from the rest of the world.

We don't know whether Hillary will run. But we do know that if she runs, she can win.

James Carville, a Democratic political consultant and commentator, was chief strategist in Bill Clinton's 1992 presidential campaign. Mark J. Penn was a key strategist in Clinton's 1996 bid for re-election and in Hillary Clinton's 2000 Senate campaign.

Slamming Bush, Biden Declares Candidacy (NHUL)

By John Distaso

Union Leader, July 2, 2006

Bedford – After more than 30 years in the United States Senate and nearly 20 years after his first try for his party's Presidential nomination, Joseph Biden has no doubts about making another run for the White House.

"I'm in," the Delaware Democrat said Friday as he began a five-day visit to the first-in-the-nation primary state.

"I know I'm supposed to hedge, but I'm in."

Biden dropped out of the 1988 nomination race amid allegations of plagiarism. He then suffered a cerebral aneurysm virtually on the eve of the New Hampshire primary.

He recalls being given a 30 percent chance of surviving.

"I'm lucky," he said. "I'm a respecter of fate. But barring something like that happening to me or my family, I am in."

Biden said he won't be surprised if, as the fourth longest-serving member of the Senate, he's labeled the "consummate insider."

But, he said, the label doesn't really apply.

Biden, 63, realizes that among the hard left activists in his party, his stance on the Iraq war — to stay and fight until the job is done — is unpopular. But he is asking for their trust that a "neo-isolationist" foreign policy is the worst possible alternative for the country at this point in history.

DOJ_NMG_0038221

Regarding the Iraq war, terrorism, and overall foreign policy, Biden considers himself a “muscular Democrat.”

In an interview at the Bedford Village Inn, Biden said the Bush administration’s policy has made the United States more vulnerable to terrorism, not less.

The ranking Democrat on the Senate Foreign Relations Committee and former chairman of the Senate Judiciary Committee, Biden said his “bluntness” and the fact that he shuns the Washington “political rounds” and “embassy rounds” will show voters he is not typical of the Capitol Hill genre.

“But the very thing that may prevent me from being viewed as the consummate insider is the very thing that may get me in trouble — and that is a tendency to say what I think,” he said.

While he is employing consultants, such as long-time friend former Democratic national chairman David Wilhelm, who managed Bill Clinton’s 1992 campaign, Biden said, “I’ll have my counsel be my own counsel.”

While admitting to being “agnostic” on what he considers less important issues, Biden said, “There are certain core things I’m not prepared to back off on,” including, he said, a belief that Sens. John Kerry and Russell Feingold’s calls to withdraw troops from Iraq by a specified date in mid-2007 is a mistake.

Biden said 2008 may also be “the one year maybe in the better part of a century when it’s much better to be a senator than a governor. I don’t think the country is looking for on-the-job training.”

He said four of the seven Presidents he has served with were former governors, and each “took at least two years to figure out what their foreign policy was. And I think the public is looking for someone who seems to have strength and the substance, the intelligence, to implement what he or she says."

Biden said his Senate experience “is the thing that’s given me the confidence to believe I’m the best qualified person to be President. I’m wrong about a lot of things, but I haven’t been very wrong about the foreign policy side of the equation.”

A key missing component of George W. Bush’s foreign policy, Biden said, is the ability to “project to the world what your values are, and what you value.”

“We need a much, much, much more robust doctrine of public diplomacy,” said Biden, including programs not unlike the cold war’s Radio Free Europe.

He said Donald Rumsfeld should resign as defense secretary in the wake of the Haditha killings to show the world “we take responsibility for mistakes and we’re ready to change.”

The United States must remain the world’s most powerful force by expanding the military and moving from reliance on high-tech weapons “to having a force large enough to be able to deal with the exigencies of the world.”

But even as a “muscular Democrat,” he said, “the rules of engagement are very different for me.

“It’s a matter of having to rebuild alliances by rebuilding faith in our country. Other countries don’t doubt our physical might. They doubt our judgment. That’s where we’ve been so badly damaged.”

Biden said a U.S. Supreme Court decision last week outlawing military tribunals for detainees suspected of terrorism was valuable.

“When we depart from the rule of law, does it help us or hurt us in our overall fight and objective, to take on terror?” said Biden. “It hurts us, and the court’s decision is positive and will help us in the international community.”

Biden said he proposed opening discussions with Iran immediately after 9/11, when thousands marched in the streets to show empathy for the United States. “There was an opportunity because the Iranians were worried about terror turning on themselves.”

He said Bush refused to negotiate.

Biden said Bush correctly handled Afghanistan, “but then the hubris began. We defeated the Taliban almost too quickly, and (the administration) immediately turned their attention away from solidifying Afghanistan, nailing the Taliban and bin Laden, and turning to this new adventure (in Iraq).

“In retrospect, it’s clear to me they had no intention of doing anything other than going to war in Iraq,” Biden said. “This is going to (go) down as the single most tragic foreign policy mistake of this century.”

Biden said that if the United States had not gone to Iraq, Saddam Hussein, “left unfettered,” would have gained access to a nuclear weapon in five to seven years.

But if “we had kept the no-fly zone going, inspections, and if the Kurds had continued building a serious state that was growing, you would have continued to put pressure on Saddam, and I think we would have eventually brought Saddam down in a process where his own military would have decided he was too much of an impediment for them.”

Biden said that with Saddam at least contained, “we could have been able to keep the rest of the world with us and focused on really doing what the President promised us. By now, we would have crushed the Taliban and would have had a much better chance of having eradicated the bulk of al-Qaida and bin Laden.”

Now, Iranian leaders "like things just the way they are," said Biden. "We’re tied down and there is no full-blown civil war.

DOJ_NMG_0038222

"The irony of all ironies is that Tehran is much more secure today because Saddam's gone and the Taliban is gone," he said. "They ought to be sending us a 'thank you' note.

"It did not have to be this bad."

Graham Defies Easy Labels (TSSC)

By James Rosen

The State (SC), July 2, 2006

WASHINGTON — When Lindsey Graham first came to Congress almost a dozen years ago, he quickly became known as a Republican attack dog who helped lead the House impeachment of President Clinton.

These days, conservative activists are less enchanted with the first-term senator from South Carolina.

Graham worked with U.S. Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton, D-N.Y., to boost military health-care benefits for Guardsmen and Reservists. He's joined with U.S. Sen. Charles Schumer of New York, another Democratic scourge for many Republicans, to clamp down on China's currency manipulation.

A former military lawyer who is still a colonel in the Air Force Reserves, Graham sometimes sits on the service's Court of Criminal Appeals. He was an early critic of the U.S. military's excessive interrogation practices at Abu Ghraib prison in Iraq and elsewhere.

In the "Gang of 14" last year, Graham and 13 other senators from both parties prevented Republicans from trying to force rule changes in order to end Democrats' use of the filibuster to block President Bush's most controversial judicial nominees.

Much like his friend and mentor, U.S. Sen. John McCain, R-Ariz., Graham disdains party-line politics and revels in his independence.

"People are always telling me what I think and why I'm doing something," Graham said last week in an interview. "Usually, they're just full of it."

Graham, 50, has no time for special interest groups and politicians of any political persuasion who "want you to hate the people they hate" and cannot tolerate compromise.

"I readily look for opportunities to work with Democrats to solve problems important to my state and the nation," he said. "If Senator Clinton is willing to come to the middle to provide better benefits for the military, I will get a car and drive her."

HIGH PROFILE

Scarcely 41 months into his Senate term, Graham has become one of the most visible and sought-after members of Congress. A regular on the Sunday morning news shows, he is often trailed around Capitol Hill by TV camera crews and recorder-toting reporters. His office fields dozens of requests each week for interviews, speeches and other appearances.

"Lindsey Graham is a very, very smart guy, and he's also a creative guy," said Charlie Black, a prominent GOP consultant in Washington. "Lindsey thinks of himself as a problem solver. That's why he's out front and involved in a lot of things."

Graham's articulateness and high profile have led some political analysts to cast him as a possible 2008 presidential candidate — a job for which he adamantly denies having even the slightest interest.

Why all the attention?

"I take stands on complicated issues, and I get involved in fights that are sometimes emotional," he said. "Hard political fights are something that I feel like I was sent here to engage in. So, if you get involved in the hard political fights every time, dealing with the tough issues, you're going to stand out. That is part of our modern politics. And if I'm standing out in a way that people believe I could serve at the highest level of government, I think it helps my state."

IN LINE WITH BUSH

Radio talk show hosts, conservative activists in South Carolina and outside the state, and prominent evangelical Christians, including James Dobson and the Rev. Pat Robertson, lacerated Graham last year for his willingness to compromise on judicial nominees.

Under the deal he and the rest of the Gang of 14 hammered out, Democrats agreed to allow up-or-down votes on Bush's more conservative nominees while reserving the right to filibuster — a stalling tactic that requires 60 votes to be stopped — only in limited, extreme cases.

Despite the heat he took for his role in the compromise, Graham believes time has proved him right.

"From a Republican point of view, we have gotten judges confirmed on very close votes that had been filibustered for years," he said. "Alito and Roberts are sitting on the Supreme Court without a filibuster. I think it was a good deal for the Senate, a good deal for President Bush and a good deal for the country."

Even as he touts his independence, Graham says his "conservative voting record is second to none."

Graham regularly acts on his core conservative beliefs, as he did Tuesday in voting for a constitutional amendment prohibiting desecration of the flag, which came within a vote of passing the Senate.

DOJ_NMG_0038223

Graham also has stood fast with Bush on Iraq, criticizing the treatment of some detainees but supporting the broader war effort.

The senator is also more open to the reality of global warming as a serious environmental threat, an increasingly important issue for many evangelical Christians but one still resisted by Bush.

At the same time, Graham backs Bush's more moderate approach to immigration reform, which couples stronger border protections with provisions to grant illegal workers temporary visas and even a pathway to eventual citizenship. House Republicans, backed by conservatives back home, want the border strengthened before considering other reforms.

STILL A CONSERVATIVE

The American Conservative Union, which grades lawmakers on a scale of 1 to 100 each year based on key votes, gives Graham a lifetime ranking of 91. While he points to that figure as proof of his conservative credentials, 19 Republican senators — including Jim DeMint of South Carolina at 98 — have higher numbers.

Other rating groups give Graham high conservative marks, too, though some not as high. To the extent that such comparisons are valid, Graham is less conservative than more than one-third of his Senate Republican colleagues.

"I genuinely and earnestly believe in conservative solutions to the problems facing our country, but I also genuinely and earnestly believe that the big problems of my time can never be solved without some bipartisanship," Graham said.

Whit Ayres, a Republican pollster in Alexandria, Va., said Graham has a rare ability to balance ideology and practical politics.

"He has an unerring sense for what will work politically while remaining true to his principles," Ayres said. "He is a maverick who figures out unusual ways to promote conservative policies and goals."

Graham said he long ago gave up trying to please everyone.

"Some people are not going to like me because I won't stand up in front of the country and spew out a bunch of hate toward my political opponents," Graham said. "I'm just not going to build a career around that. It would hurt my state if I spent my time up here trying to cater to the meanest and nastiest people in politics."

James Rosen covers Washington for The State and other McClatchy newspapers in South Carolina.

GOP Aims To Use A War To Win An Election Battle (LAT)

By Doyle Mcmanus And Peter Wallsten, Times Staff Writers

The Los Angeles Times, July 2, 2006

Republicans are once again making the fight against terrorism a campaign cornerstone. So far, Democrats have not been as engaging.

WASHINGTON — President Bush says Democrats want to "wave the white flag of surrender" in Iraq. Vice President Dick Cheney accuses the opposition party's leaders of "defeatism" in the global war on terrorism. And House Republican leader John A. Boehner of Ohio charges Democrats who applauded last week's Supreme Court ruling on detainees with advocating "special privileges for terrorists."

Ever since the Sept. 11 attacks, Republicans have made an uncompromising stance against terrorism a cornerstone of their campaigns. It helped the GOP to take control of the Senate in 2002 and Bush to win reelection in 2004.

Now, in the face of increasing violence in Iraq and eroding public support for the war at home, Republicans are turning again to the theme of toughness — with gloves off.

The environment is not entirely hospitable. A car bomb killed scores of people in a busy Baghdad market Saturday, a day after the Army announced that American soldiers were accused of raping an Iraqi woman and then killing her and three family members. Polls find most voters say they want to see Democrats take control of Congress this fall.

But Republicans believe toughness still sells.

"Foreign policy looked like a minus for Republicans this year," GOP pollster Frank Luntz said, "but it's turning into a plus…. The public doesn't endorse the Republican policy, but they actually reject the Democratic alternative…. By comparison, the Republicans do well."

Republican strategists hailed last week's Supreme Court ruling on detainees at the Guantanamo Bay naval base in Cuba, which held that Bush had overstepped his powers by refusing some legal protections for alleged terrorists.

"The Supreme Court ruling on Guantanamo was a real blessing in disguise," said Whit Ayres, another GOP pollster. It "allows us to have a debate on whether terrorists should receive the same legal protections as American military personnel…. It's hard to see Republicans losing when that's the debate."

Democratic leaders say, at least in public, that they are confident they can win that debate.

But the Democrats' response so far has been less unified, less pointed and less memorable than the Republicans' attacks.

DOJ_NMG_0038224

"The Democratic leadership has not been very good at this," said George P. Lakoff, a linguistics professor at UC Berkeley who has advised some Democrats on ways to sharpen their message. "They're still debating whether you should say as little as possible and hope the Republicans fail, or stand up for what you believe."

Last week's Los Angeles Times/Bloomberg poll found that 54% of voters said they wanted to see Democrats capture control of Congress this fall, whereas 34% favored Republican control. Voters said they thought Democrats would do a better job than Republicans on issues including the economy, immigration and Iraq. The one exception was national security and terrorism: 39% of registered voters said Republicans would do a better job; 30% favored Democrats.

The poll also found that Bush's approval rating on his handling of the war on terrorism had improved markedly since April — a swing at least partly attributable to signs of progress in Iraq, including the death of Abu Musab Zarqawi, the leader of Al Qaeda in Iraq.

The Republicans' new offensive on national security was launched last month by the White House, which encouraged Republican leaders in Congress to press for a debate on Iraq.

As the debate approached, Bush embarked on a surprise, made-for-TV mission to Baghdad. On the same day, the president's top strategist, Karl Rove, accused Democrats of wanting to "cut and run" from Iraq.

In a June speech to New Hampshire Republicans, Rove charged that Sen. John F. Kerry (D-Mass.) and Rep. John P. Murtha (D-Pa.), who have proposed a timetable for U.S. withdrawal from Iraq, were "ready to give the green light to go to war, but when it gets tough, and when it gets difficult, they fall back on that party's old pattern of cutting and running," according to the Union Leader newspaper.

The next day, Bush signaled that Republicans would paint the Democrats as pushing a plan that would "embolden" terrorists.

"What's going to matter [in the 2006 elections] is who has got the plan that will enable us to succeed in Iraq," he said.

At a fundraising event last week for Sen. Jim Talent (R-Mo.), Bush said: "There's a group in the opposition party who are willing to retreat before the mission is done. They're willing to wave the white flag of surrender. And if they succeed, the United States will be worse off, and the world will be worse off."

And after Thursday's Supreme Court decision on Guantanamo, House Majority Leader Boehner went a step further, accusing his Democratic counterparts of giving Al Qaeda "a show of support" by praising the court ruling.

A statement released by Boehner's office was headlined, "Capitol Hill Democrats Advocate Special Privileges for Terrorists." It noted that House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi (D-San Francisco) had applauded the court's ruling that alleged terrorists were entitled to "the basic guarantees of our justice system." The statement also said that Al Qaeda was "surely pleased at the show of support from Capitol Hill Democrats."

Some Republican strategists think Boehner may have gone too far.

"That's too extreme," Luntz said. "What you don't want to do in this debate [is] go over the top."

A spokesman for Boehner, Kevin Smith, said that the majority leader stood by his statement and that it fit into the GOP's campaign plan.

"Nancy Pelosi's statement was weak and sympathetic to the rights of terrorists," Smith said.

Pelosi spokesman Brendan Daly replied: "Republicans are resorting to their tired tactics of distort, distract and divide. Instead of actually doing something to protect our nation, such as implementing the 9/11 commission recommendations or hiring more border control agents, they are doing what that always do: trying to incite fear and attack Democrats. It won't work."

Pelosi said in her statement that the Supreme Court ruling provided "a reminder of our responsibility to protect both the American people and our constitutional rights. We cannot allow the values on which our country was founded to become a casualty in the war on terrorism."

So far, issues of national security and terrorism haven't turned up much in races for the House, where Democrats are hoping to erase the Republicans' 15-seat majority.

"House races aren't about national security," said Carl Forti, a spokesman for the National Republican Congressional Committee, which is coordinating GOP House campaigns.

"House races are about pocketbook issues."

But national security is already a theme in several close Senate races, including the contest in Missouri, where Bush campaigned last week.

Talent, the Republican incumbent, faces a tough challenge from Democratic State Auditor Claire McCaskill. Talent has been a strong supporter of Bush's policy in Iraq. McCaskill, a moderate, did not endorse either of two Democratic proposals on a withdrawal from Iraq that came before the Senate last month, leading Talent's campaign to accuse her of being "wishy-washy."

DOJ_NMG_0038225

In Virginia, Republican Sen. George Allen — who is exploring the possibility of running for president — is facing furious attacks on his national security credentials from Democratic nominee James H. Webb Jr., a Vietnam veteran who served as secretary of the Navy in the Reagan administration before leaving the Republican Party.

Allen has accused Kerry and other Democrats of being "weak in the knees."

Webb said he did not endorse Kerry's position.

Democrats Look Beyond City Limits (WP)

By Chris Cillizza

The Washington Post, July 2, 2006

Candidates Turn New Attention To Rural Voters

When Claire McCaskill ran for governor in 2004, she followed a tried-and-true blueprint for Missouri Democrats: She focused heavily on turning out voters in the urban strongholds of St. Louis and Kansas City while working to cut her losses in the vast rural reaches of the state.

She lost.

This year, McCaskill, the state auditor, is back for another statewide race -- against Republican U.S. Sen. James M. Talent -- but with a new commitment to rural areas.

McCaskill formally announced her campaign for the Senate in Houston, Mo., in the state's southern reaches, and since then has made four rural tours through towns such as Hannibal, Springfield, Branson and Mexico. On those trips she travels in a 31-foot RV with her mother, Betty Anne.

"What 2004 demonstrated is that we have ignored rural Missouri at our own peril," McCaskill said.

The wooing of rural voters is essential to Democrats' hopes for taking back the Senate this November, party strategists say. Rural voters wield real electoral power in Missouri, Pennsylvania, Ohio, Montana, Tennessee, Virginia and Arizona -- all of which are being targeted this fall by Democrats.

Sen. Charles E. Schumer (N.Y.), chairman of the Democratic Senatorial Campaign Committee, said the Bush administration's economic policies have created an opening for his party to argue that rural voters have a self-interest in backing Democrats. "The way to get in is not to try to avoid being who we are, but put far greater emphasis on the issues of common ground and talk to people in a language that they speak," he said.

The raw numbers are daunting. Exit polling in the 2004 presidential race showed Bush carrying rural areas 57 percent to 42 percent over Sen. John F. Kerry (D-Mass.). Similar margins have fueled Republican victories on the state and local levels, where candidates have repeatedly used social issues such as abortion and same-sex marriage to advantage over Democrats.

Republican Rep. Robert Aderholt, who represents a largely rural district in Alabama, expressed skepticism about Democratic attempts to make inroads among his constituents.

"Most rural Americans tend to be more conservative," he said. "They see the Democratic Party nationally, and certainly no one has ever labeled [Democratic National Committee Chairman] Howard Dean or [House Minority Leader] Nancy Pelosi a conservative."

Focus groups conducted in 2005 by Democracy Corps, a consortium of Democratic consultants, reinforced that sentiment. "Democrats had lost all credibility as champions of the middle class; as a result, voters saw no real difference between the parties on the economic and quality-of-life issues that mattered most to them," wrote pollster Karl Agne.

But developments over the past year, such as higher gas prices and increased health-care costs, have created a sense of pessimism among rural Americans, according to more recent focus groups conducted by Agne in places such as Little Rock and Golden, Colo. While Iraq remains the dominant issue for this voting bloc, it is the "growing economic pressures facing these voters that really caused fireworks," Agne said.

Hoping to capitalize on this discontent, the Democratic Senatorial Campaign Committee is reviewing the voting patterns of rural and exurban voters in the targeted states and has sought advice from Sen. Ken Salazar (D-Colo.) and Gov. Timothy M. Kaine (D-Va.).

"The successful campaigns of Ken Salazar in 2004 and Tim Kaine in 2005 prove that Democrats are capable of making inroads with these communities and can, at the very least, reduce the large deficits in exurbs that have fatally damaged other candidates in recent history," Schumer wrote in a memo to his colleagues.

How successful Democrats are in this effort will be one of the determining factors in which party controls the Senate in 2007.

This fall's contest in Virginia between Sen. George Allen (R) and James Webb (D), a secretary of the Navy in the Reagan administration, is an example.

DOJ_NMG_0038226

Once viewed as a long-shot race, Virginia now counts among Democrats' top eight potential takeovers. Their optimism springs from a belief that Webb's r?sum? as a decorated Vietnam War veteran and longtime Republican will allow him to blunt the traditional GOP edge in largely rural central and southwestern Virginia.

Steve Jarding, a strategist for Webb, said the key for Democrats to be competitive in rural America is simple: Just show up. "You can't write it off," he said. "We need to quit conceding turf to Republicans."

It was not by accident then that Webb announced his candidacy in Gate City, in the far southwestern part of the state. Scott County, of which Gate City is part, voted 65 percent for President Bush in 2004 and 63 percent for Allen when he defeated then-Sen. Charles S. Robb (D) in 2000. Webb must improve on those numbers to have any realistic chance of winning, analysts say.

While Webb's r?sum? may be appealing to rural voters, his positions on issues are out of whack with their beliefs, said Allen campaign manager Dick Wadhams. He said that while Democrats make "cosmetic" arguments on why they can appeal to rural voters, there is no substance beneath that style.

"Showing up at a NASCAR race wearing a flannel shirt does not do anything to change the reality that Democrats are by and large out of touch with rural voters on fiscal and cultural issues," Wadhams said.

James G. Gimpel, a professor of government at the University of Maryland, said that while recent Republican struggles have narrowed the partisan gap among rural voters, the perceived liberalism of national Democrats makes any wholesale shift among this group unlikely.

"If you don't prime rural voters on the issues that they care about, a lot of them will go your way because they are Democrats," Gimpel said. "If you remind them of how conservative they are and how liberal the national Democratic party is, those Democrats would say they will vote for the man, not the party."

GOP Woos Values Voters, Pushes Hot-button Issues (SLPD)

By Deirdre Shesgreen

St. Louis Post-Dispatch, July 1, 2006

Forget about immigration overhaul, lobbying and ethics reform, and even the Iraq war.

Last week, House Republican leaders unveiled an election-year "values agenda" that included a gay marriage ban, abortion restrictions and legislation preserving the words "under God" in the Pledge of Allegiance, among other items. And the Senate spent two days debating a constitutional amendment to ban flag desecration before defeating it, just a few weeks after an amendment banning gay marriage met the same fate.

These hot-button cultural issues are designed to rev up the Republican base and cut into Democratic support among rural blue-collar voters; they are so-called "wedge" issues that in the last election helped propel George W. Bush to a second term and boosted Republican majorities in Congress.

That 2004 vote sent Democrats reeling, with many calling for a re-examination of the way they talked about faith and politics and a new push to win back "values voters" who over the last few election cycles have come to see the Democratic Party as reflexively anti-religion.

Last week's action by Republicans shows the GOP is ready for a replay of the culture wars.

"Radical courts have attempted to gut our religious freedom and redefine the value system on which America was built," House Speaker Dennis Hastert, R-Ill., said in a statement unveiling the House agenda. "We hope to restore some of those basic values" with these legislative proposals.

It's unclear whether Democrats, despite their soul-searching, will be able to reframe the debate with their own moral tilt and cut into the established GOP advantage on these issues.

Sen. Barack Obama, D-Ill., suggested in a speech last week that Democrats had fallen into a trap of their own making on religious issues and had made little progress despite evidence of the serious electoral ramifications.

"At best we may try to avoid the conversation about religious values altogether, fearful of offending anyone or claiming that ... constitutional principles tie our hands," Obama said in a speech to Call to Renewal, a liberal Christian group focused on eliminating poverty.

"At worst," Obama said, "there are some liberals who dismiss religion in the public square as inherently irrational or intolerant ... (with some) thinking that the word 'Christian' describes one's opponents, not people of faith."

That may have been a subtle jab at Howard Dean, now head of the Democratic National Committee, who last year sparked an uproar when he said of the GOP: "They all behave the same. They all look the same. It's pretty much a white, Christian party."

"Red meat" in Missouri

DOJ_NMG_0038227

Del Ali, an independent pollster whose firm conducts polls for the Post-Dispatch, said there's no evidence that Democrats have gained ground on these sensitive social issues. But he said the public may not get as riled up about gay marriage or other "values" subjects this election as they did in 2004.

In this sour political climate, Ali said, voters are not going to wake up "every morning saying 'I don't care what the price of gas is ... I hope no one's burning the flag."

Still, he said, the GOP's move last week is a strategic one that could make a small but significant difference in a few House and Senate key races, particularly in an election where turnout of each party's base will be crucial.

In Missouri, for example, Sen. Jim Talent, R-Mo., needs some "red meat" issues to make sure conservative voters in the southern part of the state are motivated to get to the polls, Ali said. Talent supported both constitutional amendments barring flag desecration and gay marriage.

Talent's Democratic challenger, Claire McCaskill, has been playing up her rural roots in an effort to blunt Talent's advantage among those voters. So it was no surprise that McCaskill moved quickly last week to neutralize the flag issue, saying that she, like Talent, would have voted for the measure.

In Washington, Democrats have been trying out all sorts of new strategies to woo evangelical voters. Last month, Dean went on Pat Robertson's "700 Club" show and declared that Democrats have "an enormous amount in common with the Christian community."

Senate Democrats have called in a half-dozen or so liberal religious activists, authors and others to help them reframe key issues in values-laden language.

Democrats stress that their retooling has not been about shifting positions but about finding new ways to talk about Democratic priorities - from protecting the environment to increasing health care coverage. For example, they have tried to reframe economic issues, such as tax cuts geared toward the wealthy or budget cuts aimed at the poor, in moral terms.

"When you've got an estate tax debate that proposes a trillion dollars being taken out of social programs to go to a handful of folks who don't need and weren't even asking for it, you know that we need an injection of morality in our political debate," Obama said in his speech.

Courting evangelicals

Republicans and conservative activists shrug off the Democratic efforts, saying they can't repackage their positions on issues that matter most to conservative Christian voters.

"When your party is pro-abortion, pro-gay rights, and pro-flag burning ... how do you say that in a nicer way?" said Connie Mackey, of the Family Research Council, a prominent Christian advocacy group. "I don't know how you can sell that."

Mackey said the GOP's recent focus on such issues will help re-invigorate evangelical voters who have otherwise become somewhat disenchanted with Republicans over immigration and other issues.

But Mackey also noted that congressional Republicans have not been able to deliver on most of those issues, causing further consternation.

Another bill on the House Republicans "values agenda" is a proposal, sponsored by Rep. Todd Akin, R-Mo., to prevent federal courts from declaring as unconstitutional the words "under God" in the Pledge of Allegiance. But that measure could not even muster a majority in a committee vote last week.

"There's room for a lot of improvement," Mackey said. She acknowledged "a dip in enthusiasm" among conservative Christians, but added, "when the time comes around, there's still a base that can be counted on."

Jim Wallis is a liberal Christian activist and author of "God's Politics: Why the Right Gets It Wrong and the Left Doesn't Get It." He said he has seen some progress among Democrats, although they've been "slower" to adapt than grass-roots activists.

"I think a lot of Democrats are learning that they can't cede the entire territory of moral values and religion to a religious and political right without them defining the entire conversation, which they did in 2004," said Wallis, among those called in by Senate Democrats for advice.

Religious conservatives had "insisted there were only two moral values questions: abortion and gay marriage," he said. But now issues from poverty in the United States to violence in Sudan are on the agenda, with Democrats talking about those issues in the context of their "moral compass."

EDITORIAL WRAP-UP

Backtracking In Darfur (WP)

The Washington Post, July 2, 2006

Sudan's dictator gets nastier.

DOJ_NMG_0038228

THIS YEAR, Sudan's government declared that it would allow United Nations peacekeepers into the western region of Darfur once a peace deal had been concluded. Then a peace deal was signed in May, and the government reversed itself. President Omar Hassan al-Bashir recently swore that "there will not be any international military intervention in Darfur as long as I am in power."

"We will not accept colonial forces coming into the country," he continued, attributing U.S. pressure for intervention to "Jewish organizations." Meanwhile, Mr. Bashir has some interesting organizations on his side. Ayman al-Zawahiri, the deputy leader of al-Qaeda, recently accused the United Nations of preparing to occupy Sudan and divide it.

U.N. Secretary General Kofi Annan was due to meet Mr. Bashir this weekend. But his chances of persuading the president to change his mind seem negligible. It's not that Mr. Bashir has any principled objection to "colonialist" peacekeepers; he has already accepted a 10,000-strong U.N. deployment in Sudan's south as part of a previous peace agreement. It's simply that Mr. Bashir has calculated that he can snub the international community with impunity. As well as ruling out peacekeepers for Darfur, Mr. Bashir has recently imposed a two-day suspension on most Western aid efforts in Darfur and is blockading humanitarian access to the victims of another crisis in Sudan's east. His fighters are exporting instability to neighboring Chad. And he has missed a deadline in the Darfur peace deal for submitting a timetable for disarming the genocidal janjaweed militia.

History has demonstrated that Mr. Bashir's regime is susceptible to foreign pressure. Sustained diplomacy pushed him into a peace deal with the south and forced him to allow a small contingent of African Union peacekeepers into Darfur. But the external pressure has to be consistent to work, and recently the international community has appeared divided. Sudan's Arab neighbors have been passive in the face of the extermination of Muslim civilians in Darfur; the African Union has blown hot and cold on Sudan's behavior. China, which has a stake in Sudan's oil industry, has sometimes used its U.N. Security Council seat to resist ultimatums to Sudan's government.

Some of the ingredients of progress in Darfur are already in place. The U.N. is busy planning for a peacekeeping deployment, and a peace deal exists, at least on paper. The priority is to reconstitute the diplomatic coalition that has successfully put pressure on Sudan's government in the past and that can clear the way for a U.N. deployment and hold the government to its commitments under the peace deal. Worrisomely, President Bush's point man on Sudan, Deputy Secretary of State Robert B. Zoellick, is leaving for Wall Street, and his ambassador to the United Nations, John R. Bolton, recently refused to accompany his Security Council colleagues on a trip to Sudan. But if Mr. Bashir's shameless outpourings are not enough to solidify diplomatic efforts to isolate his regime, it's hard to know what would be.

A Noncommittal Fed (LAT)

The Los Angeles Times, July 2, 2006

TALK ABOUT IRRATIONAL EXUBERANCE. Stock markets surged Thursday because of what the Federal Reserve didn't say.

As expected, the central bank raised its short-term interest rate a quarter-point, the 17th consecutive hike since mid-2004. The Federal Open Market Committee explained that although economic growth was slowing, other factors "have the potential to sustain inflation pressures." With customary ambiguity, the committee said its next moves would depend on how the outlook for economic growth and inflation evolved.

The Fed's statement was simply a variation of "That depends," a time-honored, noncommittal answer to practically any question about the future. Still, it was notably different from the news release that followed the committee's previous meeting on May 10. Then, the Fed explicitly warned that more interest-rate hikes might be needed.

The contrasting levels of noncommitment sparked the largest daily run-up in the Dow Jones Industrial Average since March 2003. Then, on Friday, the Commerce Department reported slower growth in consumer spending and a steadying rate of inflation, which could relieve pressure for more rate hikes.

All the recent volatility and confusion about discerning the Fed's real intentions should lead Chairman Ben S. Bernanke to forge ahead with one of his long-standing pet ideas: having the Fed publicly set a target for inflation. The Fed's governors have an informal comfort range of 1% to 2% for "core" inflation, the index that excludes volatile energy and food prices. Before joining the board, Bernanke argued that the Fed should publicly declare a target for inflation and focus on keeping inflation within that range. Doing so would set people's expectation of inflation, which would in turn reduce the pressure to raise wages and prices, according to Bernanke and other proponents of public targets. It's an approach taken by about two dozen central banks around the world.

Public inflation targets would be a natural extension of the Fed's slow, steady drive toward transparency. Alan Greenspan started the process by ending the Fed's Wizard-of-Oz habit of hiding its deliberations behind a curtain of confidentiality. Bernanke has continued the trend, in part by making notably less oblique pronouncements than Greenspan. Having a clear target would further enhance the Fed's predictability.

DOJ_NMG_0038229

USDOJ- Office of Public Affairs

From:	USDOJ- Office of Public Affairs
Sent:	Monday, July 03, 2006 8:29 AM
To:	USDOJ- Office of Public Affairs
Subject:	Attorney General's News Briefing for Monday, July 03, 2006
Attachments:	agnb060703.pdf; agnb060703.doc

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL'S NEWS BRIEFING

PREPARED FOR THE OFFICE OF PUBLIC AFFAIRS, U.S. DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE

TO: THE ATTORNEY GENERAL AND SENIOR STAFF

DATE: MONDAY, JULY 3, 2006 7:45 AM EDT

TODAY'S EDITION

Terrorism News:

Senators Predict Congress Will Establish Military Commissions For Detainees Soon 2
GOP Intensifies Criticism Of Media Over Anti-Terrorism Program Leaks 5
Document Outlines Bali Bombers' Final Hours....5
WSJournal Says Islamists Should Not Turn Somalia Into Refuge For Terrorists....5

Homeland Response:

L.A. Police Chief, Others, To Press Homeland Security For Greater Sharing Of Intelligence 6

War News:

Sunni Lawmakers Boycott Iraqi Parliament....6
Iraqi Government Publishes "Most Wanted List."....6
Violence Continues In Iraq 7
Further Details Of Alleged Iraq Rape Surface....7
Senate Intelligence Committee "Statements" Investigation Stalled....7
Bush Seen As Uninterested In Seeking Democratic Support For Iraq Policy....7
Raid Reveals Tensions Between US Forces, Afghan Government....7
US Military Faces Shortfall In Special Forces Troops 8
Pentagon Officers Said To Be Resisting Rumsfeld, Cheney On Iran Bombing Plans....8

DOJ:

Kennedy Emerges As Swing Vote On High Court....8
GOP To Focus On Judicial Confirmations 9

Corporate Scandals:

Impact Of US Abramoff Probe Into Ex-Guam Governor Remains Unclear....9
Tenet CEO Faces Challenge Of Moving On After Settlement With DOJ 10
Austin Banker Nearing Victory In S&L Case 10
BP Traders Lost $10 Million, Court Documents Show 10
Bermuda Unit Said To Be At Center Of Refco Collapse 11
SEC Sues To End German Bond Investment Scheme....11

Criminal Law:

DOJ Issues New Subpoena For Jefferson Emails....11
Indictment Seen As Wild Card In Ney's Electoral Chances....11
Government Corruption Cases Persist In Connecticut....11
Missouri Supreme Court Ruling Alters Rules For Sex Offenders....12
Irving, Texas, Police May Be Chastised Over Amber Alert....12
ABC News Poll Finds 65% Favor Death Penalty For Murder .12

Civil Rights:

Hollywood, Florida, May Seek More Time In Religious Discrimination Lawsuit....12
La Tuna Federal Prison Inmates Claim Rights Violations....12
Texas Redistricting Verdict Could Result In "Ripple Effect." ..13
Hitchens Says Congress Should Not "Waste" More Time On Flag Amendment....13

Antitrust:

US Investigating Kosher Slaughterhouses For Possible Antitrust Violations....13
Second Quarter Merger Activity Was Prolific 13
Despite Consolidation, Growth Opportunities Elusive For Commercial Satellite Industry....13

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

FBI Agent Came Close To Linking Cole, 9/11 Plots....14
Post-9/11 Criticism, Private Sector Pay Driving Senior Officials From FBI 14

Blagojevich Says He Acted To Identify, Punish Hiring Misconduct 14
Longtime Scarpa Girlfriend Emerges As Key Witness Against DeVecchio 15
FBI Investigating West Virginia's "Prince Of Pork." 15
Illinois Man Pleads Guilty To Hoax Terror Threat 15

Immigration:

Sensenbrenner Suggests Voters Would Punish GOP If Senate Bill Enacted 15

Congress-Administration:

Bush To Name Connaughton To Lead Maritime Administration 16
Coburn Plan Seeks To Inform Public On Government Spending 16
USDA Program Benefits Farmers Even In Good Years 17
Feingold, Obama Pushing Senate To Adopt Ethics Reforms As Rules Change 17
Bush's Fitness Seen As Remarkable As He Turns 60 17
Professor Questions Whether MBA Has Made Bush Better President 17
Bush, McCain Rapprochement Seen As Based On Pragmatic Considerations 18

Other News:

Emanuel, Dean At Odds Over Party Strategy 18
GOP Sees Chance To Increase House Majority 18
GOP Pressing "Suburban Agenda." 19
Conservative Republicans Now Opposing 527 Reform 19
Mormon, Muslim Presidential Candidates Face Voter Uneasiness 19
New Jersey Budget Impasse Could Shutter Casinos, Close Beaches 20
Virginia Gay Marriage Ban Spurs Fundraising Boom 20
Critics Say Petitions To FDA Delay Approval Of Generic Drugs 20
Weather Delays Space Shuttle Launch For Second Day In A Row 20
Academic Bill Of Rights Taking Hold In Many States 21
Lawmakers Say Spot On Colbert Show Raised Profiles With Constituents 21
House, Senate Clash Over Proposal For Walkway On Capitol's East Front 21
Former DHS Official Says FEMA Director Should Be Allowed To Focus On Disaster Response 21
Carter Says FOIA Should Be Amended To Keep Pace With International Standards 22
Thornburgh Says Media Shield Law Must Be Carefully Crafted 22
Schwarzenegger's Conservative Former Aide Reverses Support For Term Limits 22
New Republic Says Baucus Should Be Dropped From Finance Panel 22
Author Says US Is Better At Educating Girls 22
Mallaby Calls Concept Of Energy Independence "Pipe Dream." 23
Herbert Makes Case For Minimum Wage Increase 23
Pastor Says Americans Need Formal Day Of Rest 23
NYTimes Says Congress Should Intervene To Clarify Clean Water Act 23
WPost Sees Promise In Ruling On Vermont Campaign Finance Laws 23
NYTimes Says US Must Improve Science Education 24
WPost Says Maryland Governor's Race Should Be "Hard-Hitting, Substantive Campaign." 24
Personnel News 24

Editorial Wrap-Up:

New York Times: 24
Washington Post: 25
Wall Street Journal: 25
Los Angeles Times: 26

The Big Picture:

Headlines From Today's Front Pages 26

Washington's Schedule:

Today's Events In Washington 27

TERRORISM NEWS:

Senators Predict Congress Will Establish Military Commissions For Detainees Soon.

The Financial Times (7/3, Alden) reports, "The US Congress looks set to co-operate with President George W. Bush in devising rules for military commissions to try alleged terrorist detainees. This follows last week's historic Supreme Court decision that struck down the president's claim that he could set the rules on his own authority." US lawmakers' reaction to the ruling dominated the Sunday political shows. GOP Sen. Arlen Specter, appearing on CBS's Face the Nation (7/2, Schieffer), said, "The Judiciary Committee had hearings on Guantanamo last June. And I made a trip there, and it's been apparent to us for some time that the Supreme Court was going to impose some restrictions. And we had legislation ready to go. And I think that we should now have hearings in the Judiciary Committee, which we've scheduled for July 11th." M The Washington Times (7/3, Pfeiffer) notes Sen. Carl Levin, Michigan Democrat, "told CBS that his panel will 'have hearings in a couple of weeks.'"

DOJ_NMG_0038232

Sen. Lindsey Graham, also a Republican, on Fox News Sunday (7/2, Wallace) said, "I think what we will do this month, I hope, is to get some input from the great legal minds of our time, particularly military lawyers, retired and active duty military judge advocates. … And I would hope Congress would have hearings about what to do in light of this decision and that we will sit down together…in August, write legislation and hopefully vote by September."

The New York Times (7/3, Toner) "both parties were treading carefully in a political and legislative terrain suddenly reconfigured by the Supreme Court. Most leaders on Sunday pledged bipartisan cooperation, but some fault lines were clear." Democratic Sen. Charles E. Schumer "said on 'Meet the Press' on NBC that 'this White House has felt it could just change things unilaterally.' Mr. Schumer added, 'Had they come to Congress a few years ago on this issue, my guess is they would have gotten most of what they wanted.'" But "in light of the court ruling, Mr. Schumer called on Attorney General Alberto R. Gonzales to create an independent commission to conduct 'a top-to-bottom legal review of all of the administration's ongoing antiterror measures.'" USA Today (7/3) reports "senior Democrats called for a broader review of whether Bush overstepped his war powers," and notes Schumer's comments.

On ABC's This Week (7/2, Stephanopoulos), Democratic Sen. Dianne Feinstein said, "This is the time for the Congress to come together, both political parties, and we can do this, and the President, and work out the parameters of whether it is a special authorized commission, whether it is a military tribunal. But that gives the detainees the rights that the Constitution provides, and this is our strength. It is not our weakness." And Democratic Sen. Jack Reed, on Fox News Sunday (7/2, Wallace), said, "The President declared that he essentially was operating in his own capacity as commander in chief, and I think the court reined him back, and I think it's appropriate. … What it insists is that the President come to the Congress and in a deliberate fashion and a democratic fashion we give him the authority that he needs."

In an analysis piece, the Los Angeles Times (6/3, Schmitt) says the ruling "has apparently presented the Bush administration and its allies in Congress with two choices -- both fraught with risk. They can use the GOP majorities in the House and Senate to put a quick congressional seal of approval on something close to the existing system, but run the risk that it too will be struck down by the high court." Or "they can follow the path suggested by the court and devise a system embracing the procedural and other principles of the U.S. Uniform Code of Military Justice and the Geneva Convention, but risk the possibility that few, if any, of the alleged terrorists will be convicted." And "both choices, as well as attempts to chart a middle course, could set off the kind of protracted, internally divisive debate that the White House and GOP political strategists would not relish with the November elections approaching."

McCain Contends "All Of Us" Would Like To See Guantanamo Shut Down. Sen. John McCain, on ABC's This Week (7/2, Stephanopoulos), said, "All of us and the president has said he'd like to see Guantanamo shut down, but it's not Guantanamo itself, it's the status of these detainees. And I believe that if we use the Supreme Court decision correctly, we will move forward and adjudicate these cases."

Experts Offer Tips On Complying With Court Ruling On Guantanamo Tribunals. Time (7/10, Thornburgh) reports that the Supreme Court's ruling in Hamdan v. Rumsfeld says that if the Bush Administration wants to hold special military tribunals to try terrorism suspects at Guantnamo Bay, "it can't just declare them legal -- it needs to work with the other branches of government to make them so." Time notes that while the ruling was a "rebuke to the Administration's claim that it alone can decide how to defend Americans from terrorism," the High Court did not say "Guantnamo has to be closed. In fact, there are plenty of people who believe it's possible to comply with the court's ruling while protecting American citizens and extracting useful intelligence from detainees." Time lists several ways the Administration can fix Guantanamo, including working with Congress, repatriating the "small fish," who have been determined not to have committed any hostile act against Americans or their allies, processing the habeas corpus cases, living by the Geneva rules and lifting the "veil of secrecy" over the prison.

DOJ_NMG_0038233

Bush, GOP Seen As Likely To Utilize Hamdan Decision As Campaign Issue. The Washington Post's Dana Milbank, on The Chris Matthews Show (7/2, Matthews) said, "Bush will be celebrating Hamdan the way the Muslims celebrate Ramadan. … Now he can campaign against the Supreme Court, they can put legislation before the congress that gives him exactly what he wants, force the democrats to vote against them and say 'those guys want to release all the terrorists.' It's going to be the 2002 and 2004 campaign all over again." Later in the program Milbank added, "It's Max Cleland all over again. You need one issue, one sort of wedge, and…this is exactly what the president wants."

The Weekly Standard's Bill Kristol, on Fox News Sunday (7/2, Wallace), said, "This is going to be a great debate for Republicans in Congress for the next few months. … Democrats are either going to have to basically acknowledge that the president has been right all along by authorizing what he wanted, and they're going to have to rebuke the Supreme Court's interpretation of the Geneva Conventions, or the Democrats are going to be in the position of saying that Al Qaida deserves protections like normal prisoners of war or like normal people in the American justice system."

WSJournal Says Case Should Be Election Issue. The Wall Street Journal (7/3) editorializes, "The Court's opinion masks its own power grab by asserting that the executive must defer more to Congress in designing military commissions." But "the Court's own deference to Congress is selective in the extreme, as it simply chose to ignore the clear intent of the Detainee Treatment Act that Congress passed only last December." The Journal adds, "We…certainly hope the Administration presses its case for military commissions to the Congress, including just how much due process protection the Members think al Qaeda detainees really deserve. An election is coming in which the prosecution of the war on terror will again be a major issue. By all means let's debate the proper care and handling of Osama's bodyguard."

GOP Lawmakers Blast Court's Interpretation Of Geneva Convention. The AP (7/3, Yost) reports, "Two Republican senators said Sunday that Congress must rein in the Supreme Court ruling that international law applies to the Bush administration's conduct in the war on terror." On Fox News Sunday (7/2, Wallace) Sen. Lindsey Graham criticized the "Geneva Convention aspects" of the Hamdan decision, calling them "breathtaking." Graham argued that the "question for this country is should Al Qaida members who do not sign up to the Geneva Convention, who show disdain for it, who butcher our troops, be given the protections of a treaty they're not part of. My opinion -- no. They should be humanely treated, but the Geneva Convention cannot be used in the war on terrorists to give the terrorists an opportunity to basically come at us hard without any restrictions on how we interrogate and prosecute."

Sen. Mitch McConnell, on NBC's Meet The Press (7/2, Mitchell) said, "a very disturbing aspect of the decision was that the court held common Article 3 of the Geneva Conventions applicable to American servicemen. Now this means that American servicemen potentially could be accused of war crimes. I think Congress is going to want to deal with that as well when it enacts these military commissions, and I think we need to do it soon. And so we'll be dealing with that in the coming weeks. … I think we will have to act on this very soon, either in July or in September. Certainly in the next couple of months."

Rep. Peter King, on CNN's Late Edition (7/2, Roberts) noted that "the Geneva Conventions apply to soldiers of established armies, of established governments, not to terrorists who are on the run, who are basically rag-tag operations and do not swear allegiance to a particular country. … Because if we apply the Geneva Convention to them, that means all you ask them is their name, rank and serial number."

Kristol Says Court Committed "Act Of Judicial Imperialism." The Weekly Standard's Bill Kristol, on Fox News Sunday (7/2, Wallace), added, "What the court did find -- let's just be literal about this -- is that Common Article III of the Geneva Conventions applies to Al Qaida. That is a breathtaking finding. It is contrary to every understanding of what that article has meant for the last 50 years. It is a pure act of judicial imperialism. … And I think the Congress is going to have to repudiate the court."

Stevens Opinion Said To Reflect 1946 Ruling Penned By Rutledge. The Washington Post (7/3, A19, Lane) reports in its "Full Court Press" column, "Justice John Paul Stevens wrote last week's Supreme Court opinion striking down President Bush's plan to put suspected terrorists on trial before military commissions. But in a real sense, the opinion's author was Wiley B. Rutledge, the justice for whom Stevens clerked during the court's 1947-1948 term, and for whom he has expressed great admiration in the years since." Rutledge's "most famous dissenting opinion came in 1946, when he wrote that the majority of the court was wrong to deny a petition for habeas corpus by Tomoyuki Yamashita, the Japanese general sentenced to death by a U.S. military commission in the Philippines for atrocities committed by his troops. … It is hard to imagine anyone less popular in the United States than Yamashita. But the man whose case was before the court last week, Osama bin Laden's former aide, Salim Ahmed Hamdan, might qualify. Nevertheless, Stevens defended not Hamdan, but Hamdan's rights."

DOJ_NMG_0038234

GOP Intensifies Criticism Of Media Over Anti-Terrorism Program Leaks. The CBS Evening News (7/2, story 4, 2:20, Mitchell) reported, "A battle between the press and the White House is heating up tonight." CBS (Calvi) added Rep. Peter King has "cosponsored a congressional resolution condemning press reports that revealed a secret government program. The program was designed to monitor millions of bank transactions to try to catch terrorists." President Bush (Wednesday): "There can be no excuse for anyone entrusted with vital intelligence to leak it and no excuse for any newspaper to print it." Calvi: "'The Wall Street Journal,' 'The New York Times' and the 'Los Angeles Times' all reported on the surveillance program on the same day, but it's been 'The New York Times' that's been the focus of criticism, including by the editorial page of the 'Wall Street Journal.'" Bill Keller, Executive Editor, "The New York Times": "The 'Times' is an easy target for conservatives partly because our opinion pages tend to be pretty tough on the Bush Administration." Calvi: "Now, the Administration is considering its options." Rep. King "tells CBS News he'll be asking the Attorney General to investigate how the information was obtained by the 'Times' and file criminal charges against any leakers and reporters who refuse to reveal those sources."

McCain Calls For Prosecution Of Terror Money Tracking Program Leakers. The New York Post (7/3, Orin) reports that Sen. John McCain has ""joined the chorus of critics who say The New York Times was wrong to out a top-secret terror money-tracking program, and he called for prosecuting the leakers." Speaking on ABC's This Week, McCain said, "Tracking the money is always a vital tool, and members of Congress were kept informed and agreed to this program," adding, "So, no, I don't think [the Times] should have published it." The Post adds, "McCain also challenged the Times' claim that it didn't reveal any real secrets, saying, 'If The New York Times thinks the story was inconsequential, the legitimate question is: Why was it on the front page?' Asked if the Times should be prosecuted, McCain replied, 'I think we should go after the leakers first.'"

Document Outlines Bali Bombers' Final Hours. The New York Times (7/3, Bonner) reports from Indonesia on "the playbook for a suicide bombing, including even a minute-by-minute choreography of the bombers' final hours. The Indonesian police uncovered the document from the computer of one of the planners of an attack last October in Bali, which killed 20 people when three men walked into separate restaurants and blew themselves up." The document "offers a rare glimpse into the minds of the most cunning terrorist plotters and of the kind of meticulous planning that lies behind their operations. It also shows what even a small, local group with few resources can do, and the difficulty of thwarting their plans." The 34-page document, titled "The Bali Project," was "found on the computer of Azhari Husin, a Malaysian-born engineer educated in Australia and Britain who became a master bomb maker and was one of the most dangerous terrorists in Southeast Asia until he was killed in a shootout with the police last November." The document "was given to The New York Times by a person who requested anonymity because it had not been officially released. It was first reported on by Tempo, an English-language weekly newsmagazine here."

WSJournal Says Islamists Should Not Turn Somalia Into Refuge For Terrorists. An editorial in the Wall Street Journal (7/3) says, "There's no appetite in the US for a large military intervention in Somalia, but that doesn't mean the new regime should think it is immune from outside attention. So here's a suggestion: Send an emissary to the new Islamist government and propose a deal: Hand over the 1998 embassy bombers, refuse safe harbor to al Qaeda operatives, do not invade Somaliland and Puntland. Agree to that, and we will be able to get along. Don't agree, and the US will do what it must to disrupt any terrorist camps or terrorist activity within its borders. … The Somali Islamists need to understand that if they attempt to turn their country into another refuge for terrorists, it will end as badly for them as it did for the Taliban."

DOJ_NMG_0038235

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

L.A. Police Chief, Others, To Press Homeland Security For Greater Sharing Of Intelligence. The Los Angeles Times (7/1, Winton, McGreevy) reported, "Los Angeles Police Chief William J. Bratton said Friday that he and other big-city police chiefs will meet this month with top Homeland Security officials amid complaints that the federal agency isn't doing enough to share information with local law enforcement nationwide." Bratton said it is not so much that DHS doesn't "share intelligence," but that "they don't have intelligence." DHS spokesman Russ Knocke described the upcoming meeting as "an opportunity for the secretary to sit down with the chiefs of police for major cities and talk about information sharing." Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff "wants to 'listen to the concerns of the police chiefs and personally work to address the concerns,'" said Knocke.

The AP (7/1) reported that Bratton said, "The good news is: We've seen some significant improvements in intelligence provided over the last year." The AP continued that Knocke "said that last year the federal agency provided more than 1,200 bulletins, notices and other dispatches to local law enforcement agencies." However, he added that DHS is "the first to say there is more work to be done."

WRC-TV Washington, DC (6/30) reported on its website that DC Police Chief Charles Ramsey is among those "complaining about a lack of information sharing during terror threats." Ramsey told NBC4 that he had sent a letter to Secretary Chertoff "and he has agreed to meet sometime in July along with out key staff people, and I'll have some of the police chiefs who are also concerned. Then we'll sit down and talk about it."

WAR NEWS:

Sunni Lawmakers Boycott Iraqi Parliament. The New York Times (7/3, Semple) reports, "The main Sunni Arab political bloc began a boycott of Parliament on Sunday to protest the kidnapping of a Sunni legislator and threatened to withdraw its members from the prime minister's cabinet unless the lawmaker was freed within the next 48 hours." The "walkout" was "the first serious disruption in Iraq's new government and reflected the fragility of the power-sharing arrangement in the face of the relentless sectarian violence overwhelming the nation." The legislator, Tayseer Najah al-Mashhadani, and eight of her guards "were kidnapped by people suspected of being Shiite militiamen on Saturday while driving into Baghdad from her home north of the capital."

The Washington Post (7/3, A15, Partlow) reports, "The decision by the Sunni Accord Front, which holds 44 seats in the 275-member parliament, threatens to pull the legislature apart." Sunni legislators "blamed the abduction on Shiite-led militias aligned with the majority political parties in Iraq. Some accused the Iraqi security forces, who were near the kidnapping site in the Shaab neighborhood, of standing by and allowing Mashhadani's convoy to be captured." The Los Angeles Times (7/3, Roug) also reports the story.

Iraqi Government Publishes "Most Wanted List." The Financial Times (7/3, Negus) reports, "The Iraqi government on Sunday published a "most wanted" list topped by family and former associates of deposed president Saddam Hussein who reportedly finance and direct the insurgency." The list, "planned in parallel with the government's national reconciliation plan – suggests that the government considers a reconstructed Ba'ath party to be its most dangerous foe."

The AP (7/3, Juhi) notes Saddam's "wife and eldest daughter are among 41 people on the Iraqi government's most wanted list, along with the new leader of al-Qaida in Iraq, a top official announced Sunday." Saddam's wife, Sajida Khairallah Tulfah, "was No. 17, just behind the ousted leader's eldest daughter, Raghad. Sajida is believed to be in Qatar, and Raghad lives in Jordan, where she was given refuge by King Abdullah II."

ABC World News Tonight (7/2, lead story, 2:50, Brown) reported, "Remember the deck of cards the US military put out just after the war? Most of those have since been killed or captured, and the violence continued. The list of 41 names was released by the national security adviser here, who said they're all killers. And will be hunted down, one by one. He said the international police agency, Interpol, has been informed." Mouwafak Al-Rubaie, Iraqi National Security Adviser: "This list shows those who are trying to destroy our country." The CBS Evening News (7/2, story 3, 1:55, Cowan) said it was "the latest step in the government's security crackdown that has failed so far to stem the violence in Iraq."

DOJ_NMG_0038236

Violence Continues In Iraq. The CBS Evening News (7/2, story 2, 0:10, Mitchell) reported, "Another bloody day in Iraq. South of Baghdad, four were killed and 22 wounded after a bomb went off. This one day after a car bomb in a Baghdad market killed more than 60."

Further Details Of Alleged Iraq Rape Surface. The Washington Post (7/3, Knickmeyer) reports the version of the alleged rape and murders by US GIs told by a neighbor, Omar Janabi. It gives the victim's age as 15 and contains his account of finding the family's bodies, as well as graphic descriptions of the bodies from death certificates. The Post writes, "The case is at least the fourth American military investigation announced since March of alleged atrocities by U.S. forces in Iraq. The rape allegation makes the Mahmudiyah case potentially incendiary in Iraq. Rape is seen as a crime smearing the honor of the family as well as the victim in conservative communities here."

Senate Intelligence Committee "Statements" Investigation Stalled. In the National Review (7/17), Byron York says the Senate Intelligence Committee "is engaged in a protracted investigation of the public statements of President Bush, Vice President Cheney, top administration officials, lawmakers in the House and Senate, and even officials of previous administrations to determine whether they exaggerated, cherry-picked, misrepresented, or otherwise manipulated intelligence in the run-up to the war." But it is "not going well. In fact, the 'statements investigation' is the main roadblock to completion of what is called 'Phase Two' of the committee's probe of pre-war intelligence." After Democrats "first proposed to investigate only Bush administration officials," Chairman Pat Roberts "pointed out that many members of Congress, as well as many members of the Clinton administration, had also made statements about Iraq's supposed WMD capabilities." But Roberts added when "senators evaluate each statement in light of the intelligence that was available at the time, he proposed, they should do so blindly — that is, not knowing the identity of the speaker, so they would not allow any biases to influence their judgment on the appropriateness or inappropriateness of the statement." It would "not be an exaggeration to say that Democrats — behind the scenes, of course — went bonkers over that suggestion." What had "started as a way to criticize the Bush administration threatened to backfire on Democrats."

Bush Seen As Uninterested In Seeking Democratic Support For Iraq Policy. In the New Republic's TRB column (7/10), Peter Beinart says, "Why doesn't George W. Bush want to win in Iraq? Seriously. The past several weeks have forced him to choose between two big goals: Demonizing Democrats to help the GOP retain control of Congress and fostering a domestic climate that gives the new Iraqi government the best chance to survive. And, again and again, he has chosen door number one." Swallowing the concessions needed from the US to secure the Iraqi government "will require a bipartisan bargain -- the kind of ceasefire required for difficult domestic changes like reforming Social Security or the tax code." But "over the past several weeks, President Bush has done exactly the opposite. Rove and company immediately wielded Zarqawi's death as a partisan club, saying that, if Democrats had their way, he'd still be loose."

Raid Reveals Tensions Between US Forces, Afghan Government. The New York Times (7/3, Gall) reports from Kabul, "A joint military raid by American and Afghan forces on an unobtrusive house here in the capital on March 20 has pointed up the tensions between the American military and the Afghan Defense Ministry over the conduct of counterinsurgency raids, particularly in Kabul, the Afghan defense minister says." The raid "was led by masked American special forces, and included eight members of a unit of the Afghan National Army. The involvement of Afghan soldiers prompted the defense minister, Gen. Abdur Rahim Wardak, who had no advance notice of the raid, to bar Afghan Army personnel from taking part in any raids on houses or compounds."

Two British Soldiers Killed. The Washington Post (7/3, A16, Tran) reports, "An insurgent attack on a British base killed two soldiers and an Afghan interpreter, military officials said Sunday, while at least 20 insurgents were killed in clashes and coalition airstrikes." An AH-64 Apache attack helicopter "crashed Saturday in an accident in southern Afghanistan, killing one crew member, the US military said."

Pakistani Journalist Sees Dire Situation In Afghanistan. Ahmed Rashid, a Pakistani journalist, writes in the Washington Post (7/3, A21), "The current political and military meltdown in Afghanistan was entirely predictable and avoidable. For the past three years Afghans, their president, Hamid Karzai, and foreign experts have been warning that the failure of the United States and the international community to provide sufficient economic, military and reconstruction resources to the fledgling Afghan government would lead to a Taliban resurgence and disillusionment among the Afghan people. That is exactly what has happened." But "there is still a way out of the mess if the international community and the Afghans pull together, rather than being at odds with one another. Karzai set the ball rolling late last month by calling for a joint strategy in a critical meeting with the most important foreign players in Kabul." Rashid adds the UN Security Council "needs to give the UN officials in Kabul the responsibility for coordinating the international response to the crisis and economic and political strategies with the Afghan government."

DOJ_NMG_0038237

US Military Faces Shortfall In Special Forces Troops. USA Today (7/3, Brook) reports, "The Army, Navy and Air Force face shortages of elite special operations forces that are playing a leading role in the war against terrorism, military records show." The shortfall of Army special operations, Navy SEALs and Air Force "combat controllers persists as the Pentagon seeks to expand the forces by 15% over the next four years to bolster the anti-terrorism campaign. One reason for the shortage is the intense training. The Navy says only 35 of 166 candidates will qualify as SEALs." USA Today adds, "Retention also is a problem. Some veterans can make $780 a day as civilian security contractors in Iraq, says Rep. Jim Saxton, R-N.J., chairman of a House Armed Services subcommittee that oversees special operations troops. Bonuses as high as $150,000 have helped stanch that loss, he says."

Pentagon Officers Said To Be Resisting Rumsfeld, Cheney On Iran Bombing Plans. In the New Yorker (7/10-17), Seymour Hersh writes that included with the Bush White House's offer to Iran to negotiate over its nuclear program if it suspended its uranium enrichment program included "an unspoken threat: The US Strategic Command, supported by the Air Force, has been drawing up plans, at the President's direction, for a major bombing campaign in Iraq. Inside the Pentagon, senior commanders have increasingly challenged the President's plans, according to active duty and retired officers and officials." Senior officers "have told the Administration that the bombing campaign will probably not succeed in destroying Iran's nuclear program. They have also warned that an attack could lead to serious economic, political, and military consequences for the US." A retired four star general, "who ran a major command, said, 'The system is starting to sense the end of the road, and they don't want to be condemned by history. They want to be able to say, 'We stood up.'" The New Yorker adds the "discord over Iran can, in part, be ascribed to Rumsfeld's testy relationship with the generals. They see him as high-handed and unwilling to accept responsibility for what has gone wrong in Iraq." But Rumsfeld is "not alone in the Administration where Iran is concerned; he is closely allied with Dick Cheney, and," a Pentagon consultant said, "'the President generally defers to the Vice President on all these issues,' such as dealing with the specifics of a bombing campaign if diplomacy fails."

Iran Rejects Western Deadline On Nuclear Proposal. The New York Times (7/3, Fathi) reports, "Iran on Sunday again rejected a deadline to respond to an international proposal to end the standoff over its nuclear program, saying it would respond a month. 'We do not consider such statements as constructive and invite them to wait for our answer until next month,' said Hamidreza Assefi, the Foreign Ministry spokesman, the ISNA news agency reported. The next month in the Iranian calendar begins July 23." Assefi "was responding to a statement made at a meeting of the Group of 8's foreign ministers on Thursday in Russia, during which they demanded Iran make a 'clear and substantive' response to the proposal in a week. P resident Mahmoud Ahmadinejad had previously said Iran would give its answer around Aug. 23."

Iran To Cut Refined Oil Imports, Ration Gasoline. The Washington Times (7/3, Mihailescu) reports, "Iran, which relies on imports for almost half its refined petroleum products, plans to halt those imports and introduce gasoline rationing later this year, the government announced." The decision "appears related to a plan to allow the nation's heavily subsidized gasoline to spike in price in order to reduce the smuggling of fuel to neighboring countries, a practice that aggravates shortages and costs the country billions of dollars every year."

DOJ:

Kennedy Emerges As Swing Vote On High Court. The Christian Science Monitor (7/3, Richey) notes that with the addition of President Bush's two nominees, Chief Justice John Roberts and Justice Samuel Alito, the supreme Court "has grown more conservative." The Monitor also notes that Justice Anthony Kennedy "will likely decide how far to the right the law moves under the new lineup of justices at the nation's highest court." According to the Monitor, "In years past, Kennedy shared the swing-vote designation with O'Connor. But with her departure he occupies the court's decisive center alone. That puts Kennedy in an even more powerful position than O'Connor, legal analysts say. … Kennedy's power was on full display last week when he joined the court's liberal wing to forcefully strike down President Bush's plan to put terror suspects on trial before military commissions at Guantánamo Bay, Cuba."

DOJ_NMG_0038238

Roberts Court Seen As Less Contentious Than Rehnquist's. Time (7/10, Rosen) reports that that Supreme Court's first year under Chief Justice John Roberts "has not been ordinary. As evidenced last week when the court struck down the Bush Administration's use of military tribunals, the Justices are suddenly unafraid to talk to one another in personal terms." By the time the Court adjourned for the summer, "the usual decorous costume drama that is a Supreme Court term had morphed into something much closer -- in vitriol, tension and drama -- to a soap opera." Time notes, however, that despite "the impression left by its rush of final decisions, the Roberts court is, at least so far, less fractured than the court led for 19 years by William Rehnquist. Almost half its decisions this year had no dissents, compared with 38% in Rehnquist's final term, and the tally of 16 cases decided by a 5-to-4 vote is seven fewer than under Rehnquist."

GOP To Focus On Judicial Confirmations. The Washington Times (7/3, Hurt) reports, "In coming weeks, Republicans on Capitol Hill plan for the first major push on judges since Chief Justice John G. Roberts Jr. and Justice Samuel A. Alito Jr. were confirmed to the Supreme Court." In "the nearly six months since Justice Alito was confirmed, only 14 federal judges have been seated." That's "the slowest six-month period since early 2004, according to documents kept by the Department of Justice's Office of Legal Policy." The Times adds, "The plans for renewed emphasis on judges comes after a consortium of conservative leaders expressed deep displeasure with both the White House and Republican leaders on Capitol Hill in recent months over the slowed pace of confirmations." The conservatives wrote "a letter to Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist, Senate Majority Whip Mitch McConnell and other Republican leaders in the body." The "83 signers of the letter…include such conservative icons as Paul Weyrich, Alan Keyes, Richard Viguerie, Abigail Thernstrom, David A. Keene, L. Brent Bozell III and Bill Donohue."

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

Impact Of US Abramoff Probe Into Ex-Guam Governor Remains Unclear. The Guam Pacific Daily News (7/3, Kang) reports, "The fallout over the federal investigation of a possible link between disgraced lobbyist Jack Abramoff and former Democratic Gov. Carl Gutierrez remains unclear. The U.S. Department of Justice on Friday issued a report on the replacement of Frederick Black as the island's U.S. Attorney, in which lobbyist Jack Abramoff told investigators he was helping Gutierrez get rid of Black. Gutierrez on Saturday denied those allegations. Former Guam delegate and Democratic gubernatorial candidate Robert Underwood, in a phone interview from Seattle, said the case warrants further investigation. In particular, he said, inquiries should be made into whether Abramoff received monetary compensation of any kind and where that money might have come from. Gutierrez on Saturday said he nor his administration never paid Abramoff for any lobbying efforts." Underwood "went on to say that if any additional information of a conspiratorial nature is revealed in subsequent investigations, those responsible should be prosecuted. Accountable 'First of all, the voters should hold them accountable and secondly the law should hold them accountable,' he said."

The Guam Pacific Daily News (7/3, Daleno) reports Gutierrez "praised a recently released federal investigation into the removal of former acting U.S. Attorney Fred Black, saying Black's smear of his replacement, Leonardo Rapadas, is a 'prime example of his operations.' Gutierrez yesterday released a written statement responding to the report, accusing Black of blocking local attempts at self-government. During a Saturday interview with the Pacific Daily News, Gutierrez denied statements in the Department of Justice report that lobbyist Jack Abramoff was working on his behalf to get Black removed." Gutierrez "acknowledged meeting with Abramoff during a dinner in the nation's capital, where the topic of Black's nomination came up, but he did not elaborate on what happened after that, saying only that he found it 'interesting' that Abramoff wanted to meet him. A Justice Department Office of Inspector General report, released Friday in Washington, D.C., states that Abramoff told federal investigators he began working on behalf of Gutierrez, who was governor at the time, to lobby for the removal of Black when certain Gutierrez administration officials were under federal investigation."

DOJ_NMG_0038239

The Guam Pacific Daily News (7/2, Limtiaco) reports, "Former Democratic Sen. Mark Charfauros yesterday acknowledged that he probably was lobbyist Jack Abramoff's closest friend on Guam, but he disputed a U.S. Department of Justice report released yesterday." Charfauros said he "did ask his friend Abramoff for help in securing a confirmed U.S. Attorney for Guam, but said he was not working with Gutierrez on the matter and did not send the e-mail stated in the report. 'No way. I'd like to see that e-mail. That didn't happen. I never filed any kind of e-mail, saying that nominations are gonna come out of Carl Gutierrez. Carl Gutierrez had nothing to do with this whole issue,' Charfauros said." The Guam Pacific Daily News (7/2, Daleno, Tamondong) reports Abramoff "has told federal investigators and said in e-mails that he worked on behalf" of Gutierrez to remove Black.

Tenet CEO Faces Challenge Of Moving On After Settlement With DOJ. The Wall Street Journal (7/3, Rundle) reports Trevor Fetter "inherited a financial and legal morass in 2003, when he took the top job at Tenet Healthcare Corp., the big hospital operator. Now, with most of the company's legal woes behind him, Mr. Fetter is turning to his next task: moving on." Tenet last week "agreed to pay the Justice Department $725 million to settle a host of investigations, including allegations that it gamed the Medicare system to generate lucrative payments it didn't deserve." Fetter's "biggest challenge will be to persuade doctors to send more patients to Tenet hospitals, many of which languished as Tenet conserved cash in anticipation of the Justice Department settlement. Today, those hospitals lack the latest CT scanners and other high-tech equipment that doctors crave."

Austin Banker Nearing Victory In S&L Case. The Austin American-Statesman (7/3, Elder) reports, "Austin real estate developer Alfred Hughes was close to giddy when he acquired an El Paso savings and loan in 1988. 'We're sitting on top of the world,' he said after federal regulators approved the purchase. 'We're very comfortable working in a regulated environment.' Less than two years later, regulators shuttered El Paso Federal Savings and Loan. For the past 16 years, Hughes has been trying to collect the $46.5 million he says the government cost him by improperly closing and then liquidating the institution. Among the assets Hughes lost when the thrift closed was his ownership of 4,500 acres of Steiner Ranch in western Travis County, now a development of high-end homes." While the "legal battle may roll on, in a continuing echo of the massive savings and loan crisis of the 1980s and early 1990s, Hughes won a big victory last month. Senior Judge James Merow of the U.S. Court of Federal Claims awarded Hughes the full amount, ruling that a 1989 federal law had unfairly imposed new financial requirements on thrifts."

BP Traders Lost $10 Million, Court Documents Show. Bloomberg (7/3) reports, "The three BP Plc traders accused by regulators of attempting to corner the U.S. propane market lost $10 million when they failed to sell their inventory, court documents show. The traders in February 2004 sought to make more than $20 million by holding most of the propane on a pipeline that ships the heating fuel from a hub in Texas to the U.S. Midwest and Northeast, according to transcripts filed June 28 with the U.S. District Court in Illinois by the Commodity Futures Trading Commission. Instead, they were stuck with much of the fuel as the market plunged on March 1." BP, "which made $2.8 billion trading oil and gas in 2005, and other oil companies are facing increased scrutiny from U.S. regulators and lawmakers as near-record oil prices have boosted gasoline, heating oil and natural gas prices to records in the past year."

Levin, Coleman Want More Oversight Of Energy Markets. The Financial Times (7/3, Grant) reports United Kingdom energy firm BP, "has suspended three Houston-based traders at the centre of an alleged propane price manipulation scheme, as alarm rose in Washington over the need to police energy markets. Senior US senators have warned congress that 'too many trades' are occurring without regulatory oversight." Sen. Carl Levin said, "It's time to put the cop back on the beat in these markets to make sure ordinary Americans aren't ripped off." The Times adds Levin's "call, in a bipartisan report to congress last week by the Senate's Permanent Subcommittee on Investigations, is the clearest sign yet that lawmakers believe the US energy markets are still open to manipulation years after the collapse of Enron exposed the weakness of lightly regulated energy markets." Sens. Levin and Norm Coleman "urged congress to 'eliminate the Enron loophole' by extending the power of the Commodity Futures Trading Commission, the US futures industry regulator, to oversee over-the-counter (OTC) energy markets."

DOJ_NMG_0038240

Bermuda Unit Said To Be At Center Of Refco Collapse. The Wall Street Journal (7/3, Mollenkamp, Mcdonald, Mckay) reports on the failure and bankruptcy filing of hedge fund manager Refco, "one of the largest and swiftest failures in recent Wall Street history. Refco, one of the world's largest commodities brokerages, was a global trading hub for corporations, government agencies, individual clients and hedge funds. And yet its spectacular collapse came out of nowhere." There are "thousands of big and small investors trying to recover about $1.8 billion of assets missing from client accounts." The "inside story of Refco's collapse" is now "emerging in federal bankruptcy-court proceedings in lower Manhattan and in related civil and criminal actions. At its center is Refco Capital Markets Ltd. of Hamilton, Bermuda. Court proceedings have uncovered a host of unusual practices by the Bermuda unit that appear to have contributed both to Refco's rapid growth and to its catastrophic fall."

SEC Sues To End German Bond Investment Scheme. USA Today (7/3, Smith) reports Las Vegas investor Jeffrey Weston "has been snapping up Germany Weimar Republic bonds from the 1920s on the premise that $1,000 in IOUs payable in gold then are today worth about $1 billion apiece," persuading "dozens of investors to give him $7.7 million to purchase the antique certificates, which lost much of their value after Adolf Hitler came to power in 1933." Last week, the Securities and Exchange Commission "said Weston had spun a fantastic tale while spending $2 million of investors' money on a house and cars and tucking away $454,000 more in Swiss bank accounts." The SEC "sued to halt Weston's promotions, freeze his funds and recover what authorities say might be only pennies on the dollar. The FBI and Texas authorities also are investigating, court records show."

CRIMINAL LAW:

DOJ Issues New Subpoena For Jefferson Emails. Roll Call (7/3, Bresnahan) reports, "The Justice Department has issued a new subpoena for e-mails from Rep. William Jefferson (D-La.), who is at the center of an ongoing bribery and corruption investigation." The subpoena, "approved by a federal grand jury in Alexandria, Va., was sent last week to James Eagan, Chief Administrative Officer of the House." The Jefferson probe "is being overseen by the US attorney's office in Alexandria." The subpoena "was read into the Congressional Record on Thursday evening, as required under House rules, but did not specify that Jefferson was the target of the request."

Indictment Seen As Wild Card In Ney's Electoral Chances. USA Today (7/3, Lawrence) reports, "There's often a caveat these days when Ohio Republicans talk about re-election prospects for their embattled congressman, Bob Ney. As state Rep. Clyde Evans put it at a recent GOP barbecue, 'Unless he's indicted, I think he'll do very well.'" Ney "hasn't been charged and says he has done nothing wrong. He also says he'll run even if he's indicted. … Some of Ney's past backers, however, say an indictment would change their votes. Some already are considering a switch to Democrat Zack Space, 45, an attorney and hotel developer from Dover."

Government Corruption Cases Persist In Connecticut. The Washington Post (7/3, A3, Fahrenthold) reports the "past few years have revealed so many tales of graft, malfeasance and all-purpose criminality by public servants in Connecticut that it's hard to choose the most brazen." A "tradition of bad behavior by officeholders persists here, despite numerous prosecutions and attempts at reform. If more proof were needed, it has come in the past few weeks, with three new scandals involving current or former big-city mayors." When Gov. John Rowland "resigned, pleaded guilty and was sentenced in March 2005 to a year and a day in jail, 'everybody thought that was going to be the end of it,' said John M. Orman, a professor of politics at Fairfield University in Fairfield, Conn. Instead, he said, the continuing parade of misdeeds has helped the state live up to a new nickname, 'Corrupticut.'" The Post adds the "recent scandals here include the tearful, nationally televised admission on June 20 by Bridgeport Mayor John M. Fabrizi (D) that he had used cocaine while in office." Other cases "include a former mayor and city council member from Middletown -- who pleaded guilty late last month to fraud for embezzling money from his law clients -- and a new charge against Joseph Santopietro, the former mayor of Waterbury."

DOJ_NMG_0038241

Missouri Supreme Court Ruling Alters Rules For Sex Offenders. The St. Louis Post-Dispatch (7/2, Franck) reports, "Thousands of offenders would no longer be required to provide information for Missouri's sex offender registry after a ruling Friday by the Missouri Supreme Court, according to the lawyer behind the litigation. While the high court upheld the constitutionality of the state's sex offender registry law, it ruled that the statute should not apply to nearly all of those convicted of crimes prior to 1995, when the law took effect. One key exception is sexually violent predators, who will stay on the list regardless of when their crimes occurred. Just how many of Missouri's more than 11,000 registered sex offenders would be affected by the ruling was unclear Friday. Tim Hull, a spokesman for the Missouri Highway Patrol, which maintains the list, said officials must review the ruling in detail. But Arthur Benson II, the lawyer who brought the case, estimates that thousands would no longer have to be registered as sex offenders. Currently, the registry includes offenses from 1979 to the present. Crimes committed during more than half of those years would not be included in the registry." Benson said the ruling "addresses 'the height of unfairness' in the current law, which requires people to register even for crimes they committed years before the registry law was conceived."

Denver Post Urges Online Safety Precautions For Minors. The Denver Post (7/3) editorializes, "There has been a great deal of concern recently - among lawmakers, in the courts and in the media - about the dangers faced by children on the Internet. Indeed, the statistics about online predators are frightening. Just in the last three years, 7,600 offenders have been caught and arrested for sexual solicitations. According to a U.S. Department of Justice survey, 1 in 5 girls and 1 in 10 boys admitted to being sexually solicited on the Internet. The Internet has proven to be a riveting tool for children - it provides an incredible opportunity for students to gain a broader view of the world, collect research for school projects, and keep in contact with family and friends. … It doesn't make sense to deal with Internet risks by locking up your children's computer, but it's vital for parents and guardians to monitor their online use. Through awareness, parent-child communication and a few safety precautions, kids and teens can appreciate the benefits of the Internet while dodging most of the dangers."

Irving, Texas, Police May Be Chastised Over Amber Alert. The Dallas Morning News (7/2, Mosier) reports, "The Irving Police Department could face an informal reprimand for issuing an Amber Alert for 2-year-old Elian Majano, who disappeared from a park more than a week ago and is still missing. Evidence of abduction is a requirement for activating the regional alert system, but Police Chief Larry Boyd said there was no such evidence in this case. The task force that runs the local system reviews each alert to determine whether it was warranted. There were 'no signs of abduction, but we couldn't rule it out,' Chief Boyd said."

ABC News Poll Finds 65% Favor Death Penalty For Murder. ABC World News Tonight (7/2, story 6, 0:30, Harris) reported, "Today marks 30 years since the United States Supreme Court ruling that reinstated the death penalty. A new ABC News poll finds that support for capital punishment has fallen over the past decade, but when it comes to the worst crimes, most Americans remain in favor of it: 65% approve of executing people convicted of murder. Since July 2nd, 1976, 1,029 people have been put to death in this country, more than a third of them in Texas."

CIVIL RIGHTS:

Hollywood, Florida, May Seek More Time In Religious Discrimination Lawsuit. The Miami Herald (7/3, Wright) reports Hollywood, Florida, "is expected to ask a federal judge today for more time to settle a religious discrimination lawsuit brought against the city by an Orthodox synagogue. Jury selection is scheduled to start at 9 a.m. before Judge Joan Lenard in U.S. District Court in Miami. The city last week offered a last-minute deal to end the five-year dispute with the Hollywood Community Synagogue Chabad Lubavitch. Now, the congregation wants time to consider the offer. Even if the settlement is accepted, Hollywood leaders may face a fresh round of lawsuits -- this time from neighbors concerned that the deal would allow the synagogue to expand without their input or city approval."

La Tuna Federal Prison Inmates Claim Rights Violations. The El Paso Times (7/3, Roberts) reports, "Inmates held at the various La Tuna federal prison facilities are convinced they have been denied visits, thrown in 'the hole' for minor infractions and denied access to the prison law library because they went public with a lawsuit claiming the federal Bureau of Prisons isn't following its own procedures. Requests for interviews with two of the inmates have been denied twice by La Tuna officials who said it was for the safety of the prisoners. By mail, those inmates have said they want to be interviewed. In that correspondence, they have claimed they are experiencing retaliation for their lawful actions." But La Tuna spokesman Israel Jacquez said, "That's just simply not true. These guys went to the press. That's their right. ... If we believe a staff member is retaliating against an inmate, no matter how frivolous the allegation may be, it is referred to the office of internal affairs."

DOJ_NMG_0038242

Texas Redistricting Verdict Could Result In "Ripple Effect." The Washington Times (7/3, Aynesworth) reports last week's Supreme Court ruling "on the constitutionality of the 2003 Tom DeLay-led Texas redistricting coup was a distinct victory for the Republican Party, but it could spawn some interesting fallout." In order to make the 23rd CD compliant "with the Voting Rights Act, some predict that several additional districts will have to be retooled." Rep. Henry Bonilla said, "Anyone who thinks there isn't going to be a ripple effect when countless counties are traded with other congressional districts is not seeing the big picture." The Times ads the "worst that could happen from the Republican viewpoint, several political analysts say, is that Mr. Bonilla might lose the reconstituted 23rd District."

Hitchens Says Congress Should Not "Waste" More Time On Flag Amendment. Christopher Hitchens writes in Wall Street Journal (7/3) that the "so-called 'flag-burning' amendment should never be allowed to waste any more congressional time. … It's easy enough to boast that 'these colors do not run.' However, those who mistake the symbol for the essence are manifesting not a show of spirit for the former but a pathetic lack of confidence in the latter."

WPost Praises McConnell Stance On Flag Burning Amendment. An editorial in the Washington Post (7/3, A20) says the recent Senate debate over a flag burning amendment "managed to bring out some of the worst in politicians of both parties. … If there is a hero in this episode, it is the man who would succeed Mr. Frist as leader, Majority Whip Mitch McConnell (R-Ky.). Mr. McConnell could have put the amendment over the top by abandoning his opposition. To his credit, he didn't, and he was joined by two other Republicans, Sens. Lincoln D. Chafee (R.I.) and Robert F. Bennett (Utah). As Mr. McConnell explained in a column posted on his Senate Web site, 'No act of speech is so obnoxious that it merits tampering with our First Amendment. Our Constitution, and our country, is stronger than that.'"

ANTITRUST:

US Investigating Kosher Slaughterhouses For Possible Antitrust Violations. The Asbury Park Press/AP (7/3) reports, "The federal government is investigating kosher slaughterhouses and suppliers for possible antitrust practices, according to a lawyer for one of the firms. AgriProcessors Inc., the world's largest kosher slaughterhouse, received a grand jury subpoena requesting documents and was cooperating with the investigation, attorney Nathan Lewin said Friday." It was "not immediately clear exactly how many slaughterhouses and suppliers were involved in the probe. The U.S. Department of Justice did not immediately return a phone call for comment from The Associated Press late Friday."

Second Quarter Merger Activity Was Prolific. The Wall Street Journal (7/3, Berman) reports a "strong first quarter for mergers continued in the second quarter, as deals rolled in from seemingly every sector: Banks, stock exchanges, oil companies, real-estate firms and consumer-products companies. It was one of history's largest and most diverse corporate-buying sprees, with nearly $1 trillion in deals around the world." The "frenetic deal-making produced the third most-active quarter since Thomson Financial began keeping track in 1985. It amounted to more than $916 billion of announced transactions, according to Thomson, up about 35% from about $676 billion a year earlier."

Despite Consolidation, Growth Opportunities Elusive For Commercial Satellite Industry. The Wall Street Journal (7/3, Pasztor) reports that while "consolidation and cost cutting have swept across the commercial-satellite industry," the "surviving operators are finding growth opportunities as elusive as ever." Intelsat Ltd. and PanAmSat Holding Corp. "are set to complete a $3.2 billion merger today, creating a closely held company whose fleet of more than 50 orbiting spacecraft will make it the largest and most diversified global satellite-services operator." But in "an industry with huge capital-investment needs and average annual growth rates hovering around 3% or less, the combined company faces major integration, personnel and marketing challenges to break out of that historical slow-growth pattern."

DOJ_NMG_0038243

The Washington Post (7/3, D1, Witte) reports Intelsat Ltd. of Washington will "become the world's largest commercial satellite operator today when it completes its purchase of the firm that had been its toughest domestic competitor." The combined company "will lose money. PanAmSat earned $72.7 million last year, but Intelsat lost far more, about $325 million. Already deep in debt, Intelsat is borrowing heavily to finance the purchase."

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

FBI Agent Came Close To Linking Cole, 9/11 Plots. The New Yorker (7/10-17, Wright) reports on the story Ali Soufan, who, at the time of the attack on the USS Cole in 2000, was "the only FBI agent in the city [New York] who spoke Arabic, and one of only eight in the country." Soufan's language skills, "his relentlessness, and his roots in the Middle East made him invaluable in helping the FBI understand al Qaeda, an organization that few Americans were even aware of before the embassy bombings." During the Cole investigation, an al Qaeda suspect told Soufan "that several months before the Cole attack he and one of the bombers had delivered thirty-six thousand dollars to Khallad, the one-legged al Qaeda lieutenant, in Bangkok. The money," the suspect added, "was meant only to buy Khallad a new prosthesis." But Soufan "was suspicious of this explanation," because "money always flowed toward an operation, not away from it. He wondered if al Qaeda had a bigger plot underway." In November, 2000, "a month after the Cole bombing, Soufan sent the agency the first of several official queries. On Soufan's behalf, the director of the FBI sent a letter to the director of the CIA, formally asking for information about Khallad, and whether there might have been an al Qaeda meeting somewhere in Southeast Asia before the bombing. The agency said that it had nothing." But if the agency "had responded candidly to Soufan's requests, it would have revealed its knowledge of an al Qaeda cell that was already forming inside the US," which eventually became the 9/11 conspiracy.

Post-9/11 Criticism, Private Sector Pay Driving Senior Officials From FBI. Under the headline "An Exodus of Agents," Time (7/10, Bennett, Zagorin) reports in its "Notebook" section, "Office birthday parties must make FBI Director Robert Mueller a little nervous these days." The rumors that Deputy Director John Pistole "was going to bolt for a lucrative job in the private sector" when he turns 50 this month "got so loud that Pistole took it upon himself to assure Mueller that he wasn't leaving," citing, in part, the departure of "so many other senior officials." Time adds, "Years of pummeling by the press and Congress, plus wrenching changes produced by the bureau's shift in focus to antiterrorism, have depressed morale, even in the highest ranks. That has coincided with lucrative employment offers to agents from firms desperate for experienced security chiefs in the wake of 9/11." Time notes, "Members of the Senate Judiciary Committee have been debating whether the brain drain at the FBI poses a threat to national security," and "Mueller seems to agree. When promoting agents to senior-executive levels, he 'is trying to extract some promise as to how long they are willing to stay,' says Michael Mason, who runs the administrative side of the FBI." Sen. Charles Grassley "suggested to TIME that 'the FBI needs to appeal to the patriotic spirit of its senior managers.' But beyond that, the bureau is offering few tangible perks to make working there more attractive. … Mason, however, is optimistic that the new generation of agents will make the sacrifices necessary for the job."

Blagojevich Says He Acted To Identify, Punish Hiring Misconduct. The AP (7/2, D'Alessio) reported, "Gov. Rod Blagojevich insisted Saturday that misconduct in his administration is limited to isolated events by people who are soon punished, even though his own inspector general found a top Blagojevich aide took part in a 'concerted effort' to subvert the law. 'As you police the system, every so often you're going find some people who violate the rules. The test of leadership is what do you do about it? Do you act and do you pursue it? Do you work with other law enforcement agencies to ferret more of it out?' he said. 'Those are the things we've been doing.'" The AP noted, "Blagojevich acknowledges he has been interviewed by the FBI. Prosecutors have issued subpoenas for hiring records and other information from state agencies, but Blagojevich won't say which agencies."

Former Illinois IG Alleged Hiring Fraud Connected To Blagojevich's Office. The Chicago Tribune (7/2, Long, Chase) reported, "Far-reaching allegations of state hiring abuses detailed by the governor's executive inspector general can be summarized in the report's account of one employee who still works at the Illinois Department of Employment Security. George Rada got his job when the agency violated state hiring practices, then he became a key conduit for Gov. Rod Blagojevich's patronage office to improperly influence hiring at the agency, according to the report obtained by the Tribune." The Tribune noted, "The September 2004 report by then-Inspector General Zaldwaynaka 'Z.' Scott said Rada and an associate, Surami 'Sudi' Garcia, effectively ran the human resources division in the agency instead of the personnel directors they served."

DOJ_NMG_0038244

Chicago Tribune Hopes Fitzgerald Will Complete Probe Before Election. The Chicago Tribune (7/2) editorialized, "The FBI and the office of Illinois Atty. Gen. Lisa Madigan have been digging into reports of state hiring abuses since last year. But Friday's disclosure that the feds have 'implicated multiple state agencies and departments' in politically motivated hiring comes as Blagojevich must stand uneasily for re-election." The "voters deserve what they didn't get in 1998 before Ryan was elected governor: a sense of the nature and sweep of a federal investigation. … Our hope…is that to the extent possible, the federal investigation of the Blagojevich administration either culminates or collapses before voters must make their quadrennial choice." Playing on Blagojevich's prior election pledge, the Tribune added, "What Illinois does need is an end to business as usual."

Longtime Scarpa Girlfriend Emerges As Key Witness Against DeVecchio. In a widely-distributed story, the AP (7/3, Hays, McShane) reports Linda Schiro, longtime girlfriend of Colombo family associate Gregory Scarpa Sr., "has emerged as a key witness against an FBI agent accused in what a prosecutor has labeled one of the worst cases of law enforcement corruption in the nation's history." R. Lindley DeVecchio "allegedly fed Schiro's late boyfriend inside information that led to four mob slayings," but DeVecchio lawyers question her credibility, saying that "her story has changed drastically over time." However, "authorities insist that Schiro's initial reluctance to detail the relationship between the agent and the mob capo was motivated by fears for her life. Only recently was she persuaded to tell the truth, they say."

Judge Waiving DeVeccio House Arrest To Watch Holiday Fireworks. The Washington Post (7/2, A2, Whoriskey) reported Lindley DeVecchio "wants to see fireworks this Fourth of July. Trouble is, he has been charged with four counts of second-degree murder related to some mob slayings" and is "under nightly house arrest in Sarasota, Fla. But to the astonishment of prosecutors, a judge last week granted DeVecchio's request that he be allowed to see the Sarasota fireworks 'in light of the defendant's service to the U.S. government.' DeVecchio is a former FBI agent. 'We've been opposed to the whole bail thing from the beginning,' said Jerry Schmetterer, a spokesman for the district attorney's office in Brooklyn, N.Y."

FBI Investigating West Virginia's "Prince Of Pork." ABC World News Tonight (7/2, story 5, 2:45, Harris) reported in its "Your Money" segment that Rep. Alan Mollohan, dubbed the "Prince of Pork," is "very good at bringing home the bacon for his district. So good, in fact, that the FBI is now taking a hard look at whether this Democrat from West Virginia is breaking the law." ABC (Cochran) noted that Mollohan has earmarked "half a billion dollars over the past ten years" for organizations in his district, and "those dollars provided lucrative contracts and high salaries for his supporters. Investigators want to know whether in return those supporters helped Mollohan become a multimillionaire. … Mollohan says he inadvertently misstated some transactions but insists he did nothing illegal." Mollohan: "I'm proud of the efforts we've undertaken…and if being the 'Prince of Pork'…merits that designation, then I'm proud of that."

Illinois Man Pleads Guilty To Hoax Terror Threat. The Chicago Tribune (7/2) reported, "A man accused in a terrorism hoax pleaded guilty in the case Friday and faces up to 41 months in prison." Gilbert Romero "in June 2005 told the FBI that a terrorist attack was to be carried out against the Chicago headquarters of a U.S. company. The claim came after Romero was detained in Lake County on state charges, according to his plea agreement."

IMMIGRATION:

Sensenbrenner Suggests Voters Would Punish GOP If Senate Bill Enacted. GOP Rep. F. James Sensenbrenner, in a letter to the editor of the Wall Street Journal (7/3), responds to the Journal editorial "The Tancredo Republicans." Writes the congressman, "House Republicans are committed to enacting border security and immigration legislation, but not if it makes the current situation worse. … In November, voters will judge members of Congress based upon whether they lead with an understanding of voters' concerns, as House Republicans are committed to doing, or whether they ignore voters by enacting legislation, such as the Senate amnesty bill, that the public doesn't support."

DOJ_NMG_0038245

House GOP Believes Enforcement-Only Immigration Bill Is Political Winner. In the National Review (7/17), Kate O'Beirne says, "Rather than merely blocking action on a Senate bill they refuse to support, a unified House GOP caucus has decided to go on offense in order to wring the maximum political credit from being on the right side of their reading of public opinion." Because House Republicans "fear the appearance of compromising with a Senate bill they are convinced is wildly unpopular, they have -- according to a leadership aide -- no intention of taking part in a conference to hammer out differences between the House and Senate unless 'there is a sea change in either public or Senate opinion.'" Congressional Republicans "who will be facing the voters are firmly convinced that backing border security now will mean job security in November."

LATimes Criticizes Senate Negotiators. The Los Angeles Times (7/3) editorializes, "Last week saw the first narrowing of the chasm between the Senate's recent comprehensive immigration bill and the House of Representatives' punitive enforcement-only package from December. Trouble is, the overtures are all going in the House's direction. … Pro-reform senators are making two classic negotiating mistakes: confusing their opponents' line-in-the-sand intransigence with a negotiating ploy, and elevating the importance of making a deal above its actual content."

Border Arrests Rose In 2006. The Washington Times (7/3, Seper) reports, "US Border Patrol agents have detained 901,428 foreign nationals seeking to sneak into the United States in the past nine months -- more than 3,300 a day -- up from the 890,358 apprehended in the same period last year." Border Patrol spokesman Michael Friel "said the number of apprehensions, monitored since the Oct. 1 start of fiscal 2006, was a 1 percent increase over detention totals in the first nine months of fiscal 2005. H e also said that although arrests had edged up, the number of apprehended non-Mexicans, known as "other than Mexicans" or 'OTMs,' had declined by about 16 percent."

Mexican Program Uses Remittances To Assist College Students. The CBS Evening News (7/2, story 6, 3:35, Mitchell) reported, "Most Mexican immigrants do maintain strong ties with their homeland, sending nearly $20 billion home last year." CBS (Pinkston) added that in Indaparapeo, "many families here depend on money sent by relatives living abroad, but Indaparapeo does something no other community does. In addition to helping individual relatives, the residents of this town and those who have migrated to the US are transforming their entire community, one student at a time." 47 low-income students "are sponsored by an innovative scholarship program funded by Indaparapeans in the United States and operated by residents still living in Mexico." Thanks to "matching funds from the Mexican government, each student receives a monthly stipend of up to 1,500 pesos, about $150, enough to pay for tuition even at some private universities. In exchange, scholarship recipients are required to participate in community service projects such as lending a hand to children with special needs or tutoring high school students in nearby villages. The goal is to connect scholarship recipients more closely to their communities with the hope that they will use their skills in Mexico after graduation."

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

Bush To Name Connaughton To Lead Maritime Administration. The Washington Times (7/3) reports, "Last week, President Bush announced that he would nominate Sean T. Connaughton to lead the Maritime Administration at the Department of Transportation." Connaughton, a lawyer, "unsuccessfully sought the Republican nomination for lieutenant governor last year, losing in the primary to William T. Bolling. Mr. Bolling went on to win the seat." Connaughton "has served as a senior transportation associate for the American Petroleum Institute."

Coburn Plan Seeks To Inform Public On Government Spending. The New York Times (7/3, Deparle) reports, "Exasperated by his party's failure to cut government spending, Senator Tom Coburn, Republican of Oklahoma, is seeking cyberhelp." Coburn "wants to create a public database, searchable over the Internet, that would list most government contracts and grants -- exposing hundreds of billions in annual spending to instant desktop view. … While advocating for openness, Mr. Coburn is also placing a philosophical bet that the more the public learns about federal spending, the less it will want." Coburn's plan, "hailed by conservatives, is also sponsored by a Democrat, Senator

DOJ_NMG_0038246

Barack Obama of Illinois, and applauded by liberal groups that support activist government. The result is a showcase of clashing assumptions and the oddest of coalitions, uniting Phyllis Schlafly, a prominent critic of gay rights, with the National Gay and Lesbian Task Force." The House "unanimously passed a version of the proposal in late June, though in a form that had drawn outside criticism. The House bill creates a database that would omit contracts, which typically go to businesses, but would include about $300 billion in grants, which usually go to nonprofit groups." Liberal "critics see a revival of what they call old partisan efforts to 'de-fund the left,' by reducing grants to liberal groups or adding conditions that limit their activities."

USDA Program Benefits Farmers Even In Good Years. A front page story in the Washington Post (7/3, Morgan, Cohen, Gaul) reports on the loan deficiency payment, a little-known USDA program that was "intended to boost farmers' incomes when prices are low. The farmers do not have to sell at distressed prices to collect the money. They can bank the government payments and sell when prices are higher. Since September, the program has cost taxpayers $4.8 billion. Most of that money -- $3.8 billion -- went to farmers…who sold at higher prices, according to a Washington Post analysis of USDA payment data." According to the Post, "The LDP has become so ingrained in farmland finances that farmers sometimes wish for market prices to drop so they can capture a larger subsidy."

Feingold, Obama Pushing Senate To Adopt Ethics Reforms As Rules Change. Roll Call (7/3, Newmyer) reports, "In a bid to salvage some progress from the fizzling drive to overhaul lobbying and ethics laws, Democratic Sens. Russ Feingold (Wis.) and Barack Obama (Ill.) are pushing their colleagues to adopt as a rules change a slate of reforms from a package the Senate passed months ago." A resolution the pair introduced late last week "would immediately ban gifts, meals and tickets from lobbyists, require pre-approval for privately funded trips and expand revolving-door prohibitions, among other items." While the Senate approved the changes, 90-8, "as part of a broader reform package in March, that bill has stalled awaiting House action." The House "approved its version of the measure in May but has yet to name conferees, and negotiations over the bills have run aground on disagreements about campaign finance and earmark provisions." Roll Call adds, "Obama and Feingold wrote to Senate leaders last week, asking their resolution be adopted as soon as Senators return from the July Fourth recess." Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist's office "did not respond to a request for comment." Senate Minority Leader Harry Reid, "who has sought to portray a GOP 'culture of corruption' as a central theme in his party's midterm messaging, stopped short of a full-throated endorsement of the approach."

Bush's Fitness Seen As Remarkable As He Turns 60. The CBS Evening News (7/2, story 10, 2:40, Mitchell) reported, "The first wave of baby boomers turns 60 this year, and the big day for President Bush comes on Thursday." Ten predecessors "have turned 60 in office, but it's a good bet none was as healthy as number 43." CBS (Axelrod) added, "As the Baby Boomer-in-Chief approaches his birthday this week, he's in top shape, even if he does seem to be dreading the big six-oh just a bit." President Bush (June 7): "I know I'm not supposed to talk about myself, but in a month I'm turning 60. For you youngsters, I want to tell you something, when I was your age, I thought 60 was really old. [laughter] It's all in your mind. It's not that old. Really isn't." Axelrod: Bush's fitness is "a remarkable feat considering that during his five years in office, this President has dealt with 9/11, wars in Afghanistan and Iraq, and a constant threat of terrorism." Bush "doesn't just look healthy. He's got the resting heart rate of an athlete, at 47 to 52 beats per minute. His blood pressure is 110/64. His total cholesterol is 178. His doctors proclaimed him in excellent health and fit for duty, and he actually lost eight pounds last year."

Professor Questions Whether MBA Has Made Bush Better President. Charles R. Kesler, a professor of government at Claremont McKenna College, writes in the Los Angeles Times (7/3), "George W. Bush is the first president with an MBA (from Harvard Business School, no less), but it's not clear that being a master of business administration has made him a better chief executive. The disarray in Iraq, the debacle after Hurricane Katrina -- these aren't exactly the kinds of triumphs that the alumni office likes to boast about." Kesler adds, "It's hard to say what President Bush absorbed from his management studies. We can only draw inferences, though eventually historians may know more. … Bush's management style is long on decisions and short on explanations. … On ordinary rhetorical occasions, Bush and his text seem hardly acquainted. On great occasions, he tends to overshoot the mark, calling for impossibilities such as an "end to evil." He lacks a rhetorical mean, much less the rhetorical mien that served Ronald Reagan so well."

DOJ_NMG_0038247

Bush, McCain Rapprochement Seen As Based On Pragmatic Considerations. The New York Times (7/3, Rutenberg, Nagourney) reports that after "years of competitive and often contentious dealings, President Bush and Senator John McCain of Arizona are building a deepening if impersonal relationship that is serving the political needs of both men." Given their "history of intense rivalry and sometimes personally bitter combat, their newfound partnership is seen by some Republicans as born more of political calculation than personal evolution. Either way, it could prove valuable to Mr. McCain in his efforts to win the Republican presidential nomination in 2008 by sending a signal to Mr. Bush's conservative base and fund-raising network that, at a minimum, the White House will not stand in the Arizonan's way." Aides said "a thaw that began when Mr. McCain campaigned alongside Mr. Bush in the 2004 election has continued through the tougher days of Mr. Bush's second term." But for "all the talk of reconciliation, both sides describe the relationship between arguably the two highest-profile leaders of the Republican Party as almost entirely professional, a little stiff and the product of the pragmatic calculation by two politicians who see potential gain in striking a peace with a powerful rival." Bush "appears to have stronger ties to Mr. McCain than to the other likely presidential candidates." There has been "a steady stream of Bush advisers who have ended up in Mr. McCain's orbit. Most recently, Republicans close to both candidates said that Nicolle Wallace — who just stepped down as Mr. Bush's communications director and has long been close to the president — was likely to serve in some formal or informal role in a McCain campaign. Her husband, Mark D. Wallace, Mr. Bush's deputy campaign manager in 2004 and now an ambassador-level representative to the United Nations, is already lending advice." Wayne L. Berman, a "longtime supporter and fund-raiser for Mr. Bush, has signed on to help Mr. McCain." Karl Rove was "said by associates to have put aside his suspicion and dislike of Mr. McCain." White House press secretary Tony Snow said, "On a series of very tough issues, McCain's been there."

OTHER NEWS:

Emanuel, Dean At Odds Over Party Strategy. Roll Call (7/3, Kornacki) reports, "A letter to Democratic National Committee Chairman Howard Dean from Rep. Rahm Emanuel (Ill.), the head of the Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee, has set off a new round of sniping over party strategy and resources between allies of the two party leaders." Emanuel, who "reportedly stormed out of a May meeting with Dean, penned a letter, dated June 22, to the party chairman demanding $100,000 per targeted district from the DNC to defray the cost of the DCCC's proposed field operation, several individuals who have read the letter said." Attached to the letter was "a sample field plan for a district, itemizing various projected expenses, down to details such as $1,500 for T-shirts. The expense plan was dated June 26, although it was unclear when Dean actually received the missive." Dean "loyalists took the letter as hostile in nature, coming as it did after months of coy suggestions by Emanuel that Dean and the DNC were shirking their financial obligations to the DCCC's election year effort. … On top of that, Dean's backers contend he is not low-balling the DCCC on field operations as Emanuel suggests, and that the $20,000-per-district figure was simply a number being bandied about during negotiations, which were still proceeding when Emanuel wrote the letter."

GOP Sees Chance To Increase House Majority. The Washington Times (7/3, Pfeiffer) reports, "Congressional Republicans say they have a strategic advantage in their effort to increase their House majority, even as national polls show Democrats with a significant lead heading into this year's elections." The National Republican Congressional Committee says that "despite the polling edge for the Democrats, Republicans are targeting conservative districts that went for President Bush in 2004. 'We're competing for red turf held by Democrats,' NRCC spokesman Jonathan Collegio said."

Democrats May Need Only A Few States For "Wave." In his Roll Call column (7/3), Stuart Rothenberg says, "The last major national political wave, in 1994, didn't sweep over all areas of the country with equal force. In some states, Congressional Democrats suffered minimal losses, while in others Democratic House seats fell in bunches." For Democrats "to take the House this year, they may need one or two states to deliver a significant number of wins, not just an isolated victory. Which states give Democrats the best chance to score victories in bunches?" Democratic operatives "have been suggesting that at least a handful of states are ripe for a Democratic wave: New York, Ohio, Pennsylvania, Connecticut and Indiana."

DOJ_NMG_0038248

Voters Seen As Needing Solid Reason To Dump Incumbents. Roll Call (7/3, Duran) reports the "surprisingly easy victory that Rep. Chris Cannon (R-Utah) scored over his primary opponent last week has been heralded as a win for President Bush's immigration policy." But wealthy developer John Jacob's "defeat in the Beehive State's 3rd district holds other lessons for both Republicans trying to dislodge incumbents in primaries and Democrats hoping to flip Republican-held seats in November." Just as the "victories of newly elected Rep. Brian Bilbray (R-Calif.) and Reps. Bob Ney (R-Ohio), Bennie Thompson (D-Miss.) and now-ex Rep. Tom DeLay (R-Texas) demonstrated in recent primaries, voters still need a reason to dump incumbents or switch party control of a House seat."

GOP Pressing "Suburban Agenda." In his Roll Call column (7/3), executive editor Morton Kondracke notes Rep. Dave Reichert's effort to persuade GOP colleagues "to back a bill enabling school districts to tap into national criminal databases before they hire employees." The School Safely Acquiring Faculty Excellence Act "passed the House almost unanimously in June — the first legislative success for the GOP's 'Suburban Agenda,' a set of bills designed to appeal to the majority of American voters who live in the suburbs." The agenda "is the brainchild of Rep. Mark Kirk (R-Ill.), one of Congress' most effective moderates, who has sold it to a growing group of conservatives and the House GOP leadership." Kirk said, "Washington may think this is small-bore. It's not the war on terror. But this is an agenda that people care about in their everyday lives — their kids' safety, health care, their ability to send their kids to college." Kondracke adds that besides the "school safety measure, the agenda includes a national '401Kids' savings account for college, a screen to block predators from contacting children at online chat rooms and a bill setting standards for computerizing health records."

Conservative Republicans Now Opposing 527 Reform. The Wall Street Journal (7/3, Cummings) reports that in 2004, "Republicans were organizing against new, loosely regulated political groups that were raising money to attack President Bush." Now, "illustrating how roles often reverse in politics, some of the party's conservative activists are trying to stop legislation that would choke off those groups." The dispute "centers on a House bill that would curtail funding for organizations nicknamed 527s, for the section of the tax code that governs them." But the "rich liberals who spent heavily to oust Mr. Bush" in 2004 "aren't investing in 527s this election cycle, even though the stakes are high, with control of Congress in play." In the 2006 campaign so far, "it is right-leaning 527s that are most active. The Club for Growth, a conservative economic-issue group, is leading the charge to kill the Republican bill that would shut down 527s. The Club for Growth received $8 million in donations during the 2004 cycle; for this cycle, its donations as of May tally $5.1 million." The Club's "allies include social conservatives, gun-rights groups and college Republicans. Their campaign could stall congressional efforts to enact anticorruption legislation -- a response to a spate of ethics scandals -- because the House attached 527 language to its rewrite of lobbying laws."

Mormon, Muslim Presidential Candidates Face Voter Uneasiness. The Los Angeles Times (7/3, Mehren) reports that even as "anti-Semitism and anti-Catholicism are fading as voter taboos," a Los Angeles Times/Bloomberg poll found "uneasiness about some religions persists. Thirty-seven percent of those questioned said they would not vote for a Mormon presidential candidate -- and 54 percent said no to the prospect of a Muslim in the White House." In addition, "21 percent said they could not vote for an evangelical Christian. Only 15 percent replied that they would not vote for a Jewish presidential candidate. Just 10 percent of those polled were unwilling to cast ballots for a Catholic chief executive." The nationwide survey "of 1,321 adults was conducted June 24-27. The poll has a margin of sampling error of plus or minus 3 percentage points, poll director Susan Pinkus said." With "no likely Muslim candidate on the presidential horizon, the poll numbers present the greatest threat to a potential contender from the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints (as the Mormon Church is formally known)," Gov. Mitt Romney of Massachusetts. Emory University analyst Merle Black said, "It is something he will have to address. It will be a challenge. It doesn't necessarily kill him as a candidate, but he may have to talk in more detail than he ever has before about his faith."

DOJ_NMG_0038249

New Jersey Budget Impasse Could Shutter Casinos, Close Beaches. The CBS Evening News (7/2, story 8, 1:45, Mitchell) reported, "A budget impasse has forced the Garden State to start shutting down its government. The impact may soon be felt by out-of-state visitors like beachgoers and gamblers." CBS (Chen) added that as New Jersey's legislature failed to meet its budget deadline over the weekend, Gov. Jon Corzine shut down nonessential state function and "right away, no more lottery tickets sold, no more drivers license issued either, 45,000 state workers immediately furloughed, road crews suspended, a nice bonus on a holiday weekend, but right after the Fourth of July, state beaches and parks could close and the casinos will as well." Gov. Corzine "wants to increase the sales tax to bring in more revenue. Fellow Democratic lawmakers say that's unnecessary -- the upshot, no deal, and now, no budget."

The AP (7/3, Santi) reports Atlantic City's casinos "were ordered to close Wednesday, the latest casualty of a state government shutdown that entered its second day Sunday after the Legislature failed to adopt a budget by its July 1 deadline." The 12 casinos, "which require state monitoring, have waged a court battle to remain open, and an appeals court was weighing the matter Sunday." Gov. Corzine "said Sunday there was 'no immediate prospect of a budget.' State parks, beaches and historic sites also were expected to shut down Wednesday." If the casinos "shut down, the state would lose an estimated $2 million in tax revenue each day they stayed closed." The budget talks "became heated this year as Corzine, a Democrat, proposed increasing the state sales tax from 6 percent to 7 percent to help overcome a $4.5 billion budget deficit."

Virginia Gay Marriage Ban Spurs Fundraising Boom. The Washington Post (7/3, B2, Jenkins) reports the proposed state constitutional amendment "that would ban same-sex marriage in Virginia has sparked an aggressive fundraising effort, with each side of the debate hoping to secure hundreds of thousands of dollars for their cause." Virginia voters "will decide Nov. 7 whether the state constitution should be amended to define marriage solely as a union between a man and a woman. The amendment also would place a ban in the constitution on civil unions, which already are illegal in Virginia." To "help rally amendment opponents, the Commonwealth Coalition, a Richmond-based group, has set an ambitious goal of raising $3 million, organizers said. They want to fund a barrage of radio and television ads in the fall." Meanwhile, the Family Foundation Action, "which is organizing amendment supporters, has set a best-case-scenario fundraising goal of $900,000, although activists and volunteers said they expected to raise less than that." Both sides "have created Internet fundraising mechanisms and appealed to potential voters through churches and community events across the state. Activists said they plan a direct mailing campaign throughout the summer and fall."

Critics Say Petitions To FDA Delay Approval Of Generic Drugs. Lawmakers are taking a close look at an FDA procedure designed to alert the agency to scientific and safety issues, amid concerns that it may getting subverted by the brand-name drug industry. A front page story in the Washington Post (7/3, A1, Kaufman) reports that leaders in the generic drug industry and some at the FDA "complain that 'citizen petitions' -- requests for agency action that any individual, group or company can file -- are being misused by brand-name drugmakers to stave off generic competition." They say the filing of a petition "triggers another round of time-consuming and often redundant reviews of the generics by the FDA, which can take months or years. In the process, consumers continue to pay millions of dollars more for the brand-name drugs." The Post adds, "Statistics collected by the staff of Sen. Debbie Stabenow (D-Mich.), who has introduced legislation with Sen. Trent Lott (R-Miss.) that would rein in industry-filed citizen petitions, show that 20 of the 21 brand-name petitions settled by the FDA since 2003 were ultimately rejected."

Weather Delays Space Shuttle Launch For Second Day In A Row. For the second day in a row Sunday, the launch of the space shuttle Discovery was postponed due to stormy weather. The AP (7/3, Dunn) reports, "Launch officials said they would try again Tuesday, on the Fourth of July, after giving the work force some rest and a chance to replenish the shuttle's on-board fuel. The weather was expected to improve by Tuesday, although rain was still in the forecast."

ABC World News Tonight (7/2, story 2, 2:15, Stark) reported, "NASA will use the next 48 hours to replenish fuel cells on Discovery in the hopes of having enough energy on board for a third spacewalk. And they'll also need to replenish some of the experiments planned for orbit, including thousands of fruit flies which have a short lifespan. A scrub also means NASA once again has to drain 500,000 gallons of fuel out of the tank. But Tuesday's forecast is better -- a 60% chance of favorable weather."

DOJ_NMG_0038250

Astronauts May Have To Perform In-Flight Repairs To Shuttle Tiles. The CBS Evening News (7/2, story 5, 2:25, Cobiella) added, "Since the Columbia disaster when a piece of foam broke away and dealt a fatal blow to the shuttle's wing, astronauts have had to take on the job of in-space repairman. NASA has removed 35 pounds of foam from Discovery's external fuel tank, but it's still far from perfect. … NASA has said that minor damage is unavoidable and putting an astronaut so close to the delicate tiles on the shuttle's wings and underbelly carries its own risk, and all of NASA's in-flight fixes for these fragile tiles are still experimental. So if this Discovery crew were to perform another choreographed repair 230 miles above the Earth, it wouldn't know whether it was a success until they were safely back down."

Academic Bill Of Rights Taking Hold In Many States. The Washington Times (7/3, Richardson) reports that three years after conservative activist David Horowitz began promoting his Academic Bill of Rights in Colorado, the manifesto, which says students should be graded and faculty should be hired without regard to political or religious beliefs, has been introduced in 18 states. Meanwhile, "Students for Academic Freedom, the campus watchdog group founded by Mr. Horowitz, has established chapters on more than 150 campuses. Student governments at a dozen universities have approved resolutions supporting the Academic Bill of Rights. In April, Princeton University became the first institution of higher learning to pass a version of the Student Bill of Rights by a vote of the entire student body, surprising even Mr. Horowitz, who had no hand in the election." However the Times notes that for all Horowitz's success in raising the issue, "no state has actually approved an academic freedom bill, despite the flurry of hearings and committee votes."

Lawmakers Say Spot On Colbert Show Raised Profiles With Constituents. The Washington Times (7/3, Bellantoni) reports that members of Congress who appear on segment of Comedy Central's "The Colbert Report" known as "Better Know a District" usually "end up looking silly. But several lawmakers said doing the spoof spot…actually has raised their profiles back home, particularly among young folks." GOP Rep. Phil Gingrey "said there was an unexpected byproduct of doing the show -- attention from young constituents and House staffers. Rep. Earl Blumenauer of Oregon had a similar experience when his 3rd District was profiled in May. … But Rep. Barney Frank, Massachusetts Democrat, regrets his appearance and called Mr. Colbert a 'third-rate' comedian." Colbert "so far has targeted 25 members in the 435-member House, splicing and dicing sometimes two-hour-long camera sessions into five-minute clips."

Pelosi Recommends Lawmakers Not Participate In Colbert Spoof. Roll Call (7/3, Akers) reports in its "Heard on the Hill" column that House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi was asked about the segment during her press conference last Thursday. Pelosi said, "Well, it is humorous; I wouldn't recommend that anyone go on the show. I would think it would be okay to go on if you were live to tape, but don't subject yourself to a comic's edit unless you want to be made a fool of."

House, Senate Clash Over Proposal For Walkway On Capitol's East Front. The Washington Post (7/3, A19, Kamen) reports in its "In the Loop" column that the biggest fight between the House and Senate "may have occurred last week over a House proposal to build a fenced walkway that would run across the now-closed east front of the Capitol -- the area where the long-delayed Capitol Visitor Center is being built. … Senate detractors say this proposal is exceptionally stupid, even for Congress. … The Upper Chamber folks rather uncharitably say the mysterious fence dips to only four feet high so Hastert and House members can walk down the steps and have their pictures taken with constituents." A House aide "said these things are being overblown."

Former DHS Official Says FEMA Director Should Be Allowed To Focus On Disaster Response. Adm. James Loy, former commandant of the US Coast Guard and former deputy secretary of Homeland Security, in an op-ed in the Washington Times (7/3) writes that following "a time-honored pattern," Congress' "impulsive first response" following Hurricane Katrina may be "followed by years of 'perfecting' the original legislation." Loy continues that none of the pending bills that address FEMA's position within DHS "address the central problem: The Homeland Security Act of 2002 diluted the FEMA director's focus on the agency's core mission -- response and recovery -- by requiring him to wear an additional hat as the DHS undersecretary for emergency preparedness and response (later changed to the under-secretary for federal emergency management)." As adjustments are made to the original legislation to fix FEMA, Loy says "we should ensure that the FEMA director can focus all of his time, energy and talent on guiding the agency in responding effectively and efficiently to the American people in the event of a disaster. That is best accomplished by restoring FEMA's independent agency status, offloading the director's responsibilities of being double-hatted as an under secretary and keeping the agency and the director inside DHS with direct access to the secretary during a crisis."

DOJ_NMG_0038251

Carter Says FOIA Should Be Amended To Keep Pace With International Standards. Former President Jimmy Carter writes in the Washington Post (7/3, A21), "Our government leaders have become increasingly obsessed with secrecy. Obstructionist policies and deficient practices have ensured that many important public documents and official actions remain hidden from our view." Carter adds, "In the United States, we must seek amendments to FOIA to be more in line with emerging international standards, such as covering all branches of government; providing an oversight body to monitor compliance; including sanctions for failure to adhere to the law; and establishing an appeal mechanism that is easy to access, speedy and affordable. We cannot take freedom of information for granted. Our democracy depends on it."

Thornburgh Says Media Shield Law Must Be Carefully Crafted. Former Attorney General Richard Thornburgh writes in the Wall Street Journal (7/3), "Ever since then-New York Times reporter Judith Miller went to jail for 85 days last year rather than comply with a subpoena for her sources in the Valerie Plame case, the media has been pushing for a federal shield that would grant reporters unprecedented special protection from revealing sources during litigation. The Senate is now taking steps toward providing such a reporter-source privilege with the Free Flow of Information Act, which is likely to be sent to the floor for a vote over the next few weeks." Thornburgh notes that for the long term, "the bill has troubling implications. In its current form it contains a shield so broad -- and a definition of journalism so vague -- that it upends what up to now has been a reasonable balance between protecting reporters from disclosing sources and preserving the right to the fullest possible access to truth in the courtroom for plaintiffs and defendants." Thornburgh concludes by noting that "given the potential for abuse of that critical role, any media shield must, in the interests of justice, be carefully crafted."

Schwarzenegger's Conservative Former Aide Reverses Support For Term Limits. Rob Stutzman, former deputy chief of staff for communications for Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger, writes in the Los Angeles Times (7/3), "About 20 years ago, the notion of term limits for officeholders became dogma for the center-right. … Fourteen years have passed since California voters approved legislative term limits, restricting Assembly members to a trio of two-year terms and state senators to two four-year stints. I have always been a loyal conservative supporter of term limits…as a suitably blunt instrument to correct the arrogance of elected officials not mindful enough of those who elected them. … But after 16 years of working in California politics, I've changed my mind. We were wrong. Term limits haven't delivered what we hoped for. They have, in fact, harmed the public interest." It is "high time to admit that term limits haven't worked."

New Republic Says Baucus Should Be Dropped From Finance Panel. The New Republic (7/10) says in its lead editorial that Democratic Rep. Max Baucus uses "his influence as the top Democrat on the Finance Committee to systematically undercut his party and enable George W. Bush's most egregious domestic legislation. So why does his party entrust him with so much responsibility?" Indeed, the Democrats' "only real victory of the last five years -- stuffing the administration on Social Security -- came after Harry Reid cautioned Baucus against freelancing with the White House. Well, we'll do Reid one better and suggest he boot Baucus from the Finance Committee altogether."

Author Says US Is Better At Educating Girls. Author Christina Hoff Somers writes in the Wall Street Journal (7/3) that in a report from Education Sector, a new Washington think tank, policy analyst Sara Mead, "denies that American boys are in trouble academically." Mead "hopes that the nation can have a reasonable 'conversation' about gender issues 'without unfairly undermining the gains girls have made in recent decades.'" Somers adds, "One looks in vain in Ms. Mead's report for any indication that anyone is undermining girls. She seems to think that concern for boys means shortchanging girls. But it does not -- because education is not a zero sum game." Somers adds, "We are strikingly better at educating young women than young men. Boys need our attention. It is difficult to understand why an organization devoted to improving education should regard the current concern for boys as a threat to girls' progress."

DOJ_NMG_0038252

Author Says "Boy Crisis" Is "Little More Than A Myth." Author Judith Warner writes in the New York Times (7/3) that the Education Sector study confirms that the "near-ubiquitous belief that our nation's boys are being academically neglected and emotionally persecuted by teachers whose training, style and temperament favor girls" is "little more than a myth." Warner adds, "Talk of the boy crisis is a diversion. It draws attention from the real reasons so many white suburban parents sense that their sons are in trouble. Those reasons aren't academic; they're behavioral and emotional."

Mallaby Calls Concept Of Energy Independence "Pipe Dream." Sebastian Mallaby writes in the Washington Post (7/3, A21), "This month's Group of Eight summit in Russia takes statecraft to a whole new level. Global leaders have 'energy security' on the agenda. But judging by what they say and do, they don't always understand the subject. … As Daniel Yergin has written recently in Foreign Affairs, real energy security requires setting aside the pipe dream of energy independence and embracing interdependence." Mallaby adds, "If the G-8 summit can spread the word about this interdependence, it will do some good. But the nationalistic conception of energy security is worse than useless. By encouraging a competitive scramble for resources that could spiral into conflict, this sort of security talk only creates insecurity."

Herbert Makes Case For Minimum Wage Increase. Bob Herbert writes in the New York Times (7/3), "The federal minimum wage, currently $5.15 an hour, was last raised in 1997. Since then, its purchasing power has deteriorated by 20 percent. Analysts at the Economic Policy Institute and the Center on Budget and Policy Priorities jointly crunched the numbers and determined that, after adjusting for inflation, the value of the minimum wage is at its lowest level since 1955." Herbert adds, "Polls have shown that Americans overwhelmingly favor an increase in the minimum wage. But the low-income workers who would benefit from such an increase are not part of the natural G.O.P. constituency. Thus, the stonewall. … There is no justification — none — for condemning the nation's lowest-paid workers to this continuing slide into ever deeper economic distress."

Pastor Says Americans Need Formal Day Of Rest. Henry G. Brinton, pastor of Fairfax Presbyterian Church in Virginia, writes in USA Today (7/3) reports, "For all the attention paid this past year to public displays of the Ten Commandments, you'd think people would spend as much energy trying to follow them. When it comes to the Fourth Commandment -- 'Remember the Sabbath Day' -- that's not the case. … The problem with ignoring the Sabbath is that it hurts us as individuals, families and communities." Brinton adds, "We need a formal day of rest. A true Sabbath gives us time to refresh and renew ourselves, regain proper perspective and redirect our lives to what is good and true and worthwhile. … We can learn from men and women in the European Union, who work hard but still enjoy an average of five weeks of paid vacation per year. They often remark that they don't 'live to work,' as we do — instead, they 'work to live.'"

NYTimes Says Congress Should Intervene To Clarify Clean Water Act. The New York Times (7/3) editorializes, "Senator James Inhofe, a conservative Republican from Oklahoma, and Senator Lincoln Chaffee, a liberal Republican from Rhode Island, are at opposite ends of the earth on environmental issues. But both found themselves equally mystified by the recent Supreme Court decision on the Clean Water Act. The decision did nothing to clarify which waters were protected under the act and which were not. Both agreed that only Congress can end the confusion. Both are right. Without Congressional intervention, the certain outcome is endless litigation and a steady decline of the nation's streams and wetlands."

WPost Sees Promise In Ruling On Vermont Campaign Finance Laws. An editorial in the Washington Post (7/3, A20) says the Supreme Court's decision last week striking down Vermont's campaign finance laws "may prove more silver lining than cloud. The Vermont rules never stood much of a chance; they are so strict as to present genuine problems. The important feature of the case is not its specific result but the way the court -- and its two newest justices -- reached that result. On this point, the decision is promising." Despite "an opportunity to declare themselves hostile to campaign finance regulation in general, both signed on -- Justice Alito somewhat equivocally -- to the court's long-standing doctrine that appropriately crafted contribution limits can survive constitutional scrutiny. This is a far more significant development than the fate of Vermont's statute. It suggests that, notwithstanding the turnover in the court's personnel, a revolution in campaign finance law may not be in the offing."

DOJ_NMG_0038253

NYTimes Says US Must Improve Science Education. The New York Times (7/3) editorializes that the US must do something about the "horrendous state of science education at both the public school and university levels." The Howard Hughes Medical Institute has "awarded grants to 50 universities aimed at providing richer undergraduate science education as well as mentoring and early research experiences with working scientists. Many of the grants will be used partly to advertise the virtues of scientific study not just at universities but also in high schools and middle schools. These programs send a powerful message at a time when the country needs to be paying attention to remaking science education. Congress, which has been casting for ways to address this problem, would do well to emulate them."

WPost Says Maryland Governor's Race Should Be "Hard-Hitting, Substantive Campaign." An editorial in the Washington Post (7/3, A20) says Maryland Gov. Robert Ehrlich "has spent four years compiling a so-so record. He has diminished a handful of modest victories and sensible policies by displaying a tin ear for political ethics and a pointlessly petulant style of governance that has compounded the partisan venom in Annapolis." Those qualities "may help explain why Mr. Ehrlich… begins his campaign for reelection so far behind his Democratic rival, Baltimore Mayor Martin O'Malley." The Post adds, "Wouldn't it be nice if the campaign looked and sounded like a contest of ideas between two grown-ups, and not a locker-room smack-down. That will be the real test of both candidates -- whether they have the capacity to wage a hard-hitting, substantive, mature campaign that is about Maryland and Marylanders, not just about Bob Ehrlich and Martin O'Malley."

Personnel News. Roll Call (7/3, Ackley) reports in its "K Street Files" column, "Carolyn Doyle, a former aide to Sen. Arlen Specter (R-Pa.), has left her position as senior federal affairs representative at the MWW Group. … Karen Reidy, most recently with the former MCI, has joined the telecom trade association COMPTEL as its vice president for regulatory affairs. … Cable giant Comcast Corp. has picked up a new lobbyist. Peter Filon comes to the company as senior director, federal government affairs, from the House Energy and Commerce Committee, where he has served as minority counsel. PR power-shop Qorvis Communications has signed Jim McGann as managing director. … The US Tuna Foundation has a new president. Anne Forristall comes to the fishy lobby from MGN Inc., where she advised a range of clients on legislative strategy. Lisa McGreevey is joining the hedge fund industry's primary trade group, the Managed Funds Association, as executive vice president and chief operating officer. … The public policy and law group at Dickstein Shapiro has added Brian Finch as counsel. … Benjamin McKay has been promoted to senior vice president of federal government relations at the Property Casualty Insurers Association of America. Trading one heavy-hitting Wall Street CEO for another, the Financial Services Roundtable has named Citigroup chief Charles O. Prince to replace newly confirmed Treasury Secretary Henry Paulson as chairman of the group."

The Washington Post (7/3, C1, Kurtz) reports that Jonathan Wald, who was fired as executive producer of the Today show, and Josh Howard, who was forced to resign as executive producer of 60 Minutes II, have "landed at CNBC, where they are helping to retool programming on a business channel that has struggled in the ratings since the dot-com bust six years ago."

EDITORIAL WRAP-UP:

New York Times: "Crisis Postponed At The U.N." An editorial in the New York Times (7/3) says the UN "steered clear of a financial shipwreck last week, but it also steered clear of approving urgently needed management reforms. That is a standoff, not a solution. If the less-developed countries blocking those reforms continue to dig in, the United Nations will suffer in diminished public credibility and greater resistance to dues-paying by some of the largest contributor nations, including the United States." The UN "cannot function effectively in the 21st century under budget and management rules that were originally devised for a much smaller organization. Successive embarrassments like the oil-for-food scandal should have made that painfully clear."

DOJ_NMG_0038254

"Protecting All Waters." The New York Times (7/3) editorializes, "Senator James Inhofe, a conservative Republican from Oklahoma, and Senator Lincoln Chaffee, a liberal Republican from Rhode Island, are at opposite ends of the earth on environmental issues. But both found themselves equally mystified by the recent Supreme Court decision on the Clean Water Act. The decision did nothing to clarify which waters were protected under the act and which were not. Both agreed that only Congress can end the confusion. Both are right. Without Congressional intervention, the certain outcome is endless litigation and a steady decline of the nation's streams and wetlands."

"How To Educate Young Scientists." The New York Times (7/3) editorializes that the US must do something about the "horrendous state of science education at both the public school and university levels." The Howard Hughes Medical Institute has "awarded grants to 50 universities aimed at providing richer undergraduate science education as well as mentoring and early research experiences with working scientists. Many of the grants will be used partly to advertise the virtues of scientific study not just at universities but also in high schools and middle schools. These programs send a powerful message at a time when the country needs to be paying attention to remaking science education. Congress, which has been casting for ways to address this problem, would do well to emulate them."

Washington Post: "Campaign Finance Bellwether." An editorial in the Washington Post (7/3, A20) says the Supreme Court's decision last week striking down Vermont's campaign finance laws "may prove more silver lining than cloud. The Vermont rules never stood much of a chance; they are so strict as to present genuine problems. The important feature of the case is not its specific result but the way the court -- and its two newest justices -- reached that result. On this point, the decision is promising." Despite "an opportunity to declare themselves hostile to campaign finance regulation in general, both signed on -- Justice Alito somewhat equivocally -- to the court's long-standing doctrine that appropriately crafted contribution limits can survive constitutional scrutiny. This is a far more significant development than the fate of Vermont's statute. It suggests that, notwithstanding the turnover in the court's personnel, a revolution in campaign finance law may not be in the offing."

"Flagging Rhetoric." An editorial in the Washington Post (7/3, A20) says the recent Senate debate over a flag burning amendment "managed to bring out some of the worst in politicians of both parties. … If there is a hero in this episode, it is the man who would succeed Mr. Frist as leader, Majority Whip Mitch McConnell (R-Ky.). Mr. McConnell could have put the amendment over the top by abandoning his opposition. To his credit, he didn't, and he was joined by two other Republicans, Sens. Lincoln D. Chafee (R.I.) and Robert F. Bennett (Utah). As Mr. McConnell explained in a column posted on his Senate Web site, 'No act of speech is so obnoxious that it merits tampering with our First Amendment. Our Constitution, and our country, is stronger than that.'"

"Mr. Ehrlich In The Ring." An editorial in the Washington Post (7/3, A20) says Maryland Gov. Robert Ehrlich "has spent four years compiling a so-so record. He has diminished a handful of modest victories and sensible policies by displaying a tin ear for political ethics and a pointlessly petulant style of governance that has compounded the partisan venom in Annapolis." Those qualities "may help explain why Mr. Ehrlich… begins his campaign for reelection so far behind his Democratic rival, Baltimore Mayor Martin O'Malley." The Post adds, "Wouldn't it be nice if the campaign looked and sounded like a contest of ideas between two grown-ups, and not a locker-room smack-down. That will be the real test of both candidates -- whether they have the capacity to wage a hard-hitting, substantive, mature campaign that is about Maryland and Marylanders, not just about Bob Ehrlich and Martin O'Malley."

Wall Street Journal: "After Hamdan." The Wall Street Journal (7/3) editorializes, "The Court's opinion masks its own power grab by asserting that the executive must defer more to Congress in designing military commissions." But "the Court's own deference to Congress is selective in the extreme, as it simply chose to ignore the clear intent of the Detainee Treatment Act that Congress passed only last December." The Journal adds, "We…certainly hope the Administration presses its case for military commissions to the Congress, including just how much due process protection the Members think al Qaeda detainees really deserve. An election is coming in which the prosecution of the war on terror will again be a major issue. By all means let's debate the proper care and handling of Osama's bodyguard."

DOJ_NMG_0038255

"A Somali Taliban?" An editorial in the Wall Street Journal (7/3) says, "There's no appetite in the US for a large military intervention in Somalia, but that doesn't mean the new regime should think it is immune from outside attention. So here's a suggestion: Send an emissary to the new Islamist government and propose a deal: Hand over the 1998 embassy bombers, refuse safe harbor to al Qaeda operatives, do not invade Somaliland and Puntland. Agree to that, and we will be able to get along. Don't agree, and the US will do what it must to disrupt any terrorist camps or terrorist activity within its borders. … The Somali Islamists need to understand that if they attempt to turn their country into another refuge for terrorists, it will end as badly for them as it did for the Taliban."

Los Angeles Times: "House Of (Immigration) Blues." The Los Angeles Times (7/3) editorializes, "Last week saw the first narrowing of the chasm between the Senate's recent comprehensive immigration bill and the House of Representatives' punitive enforcement-only package from December. Trouble is, the overtures are all going in the House's direction. … Pro-reform senators are making two classic negotiating mistakes: confusing their opponents' line-in-the-sand intransigence with a negotiating ploy, and elevating the importance of making a deal above its actual content."

"United On Clean L.A. Ports."

"Taming The Tamil Tigers." The Los Angeles Times (7/3) editorializes, "Since April, Sri Lanka has experienced rising violence between the government and the Tamil Tigers rebel group, effectively gutting a 4-year-old cease-fire. But amid the carnage, leaders of both sides have been making unexpected conciliatory gestures, spurring hope that with the help of international monitors, full-scale war can be avoided. … A peaceful Sri Lanka is very much in India's interest; war could bring a stream of refugees and instability to India, particularly in the state of Tamil Nadu. India should start to take a more active role, while the EU must work for a return to the bargaining table. It isn't too late to head off a full-scale war."

THE BIG PICTURE:

Headlines From Today's Front Pages.

Los Angeles Times:

"Confusion Grips Mexico Election."
"Happy? Let's Sum It Up."
"Congress Faces Dilemma On Terror Trials."
"In First Year, L.A.'s Mayor Finds His Inner Pragmatist."
"With The Right Spin, Any Film Can Be No. 1."
"Iraqis Go To Great Lengths To Get Away."

USA Today:

"How Americans See Americans."
"U.S. Elite Forces Face Shortfall."
"Some Spots Too Dry For Fireworks."

New York Times:

"Israel Steps Up Gaza Raids In Bid To Free Soldier."
"Internet Calling Pressures Bells To Lower Prices."
"A Terror Strike, Choreographed On A Computer."
"A New Partnership Binds Old Republican Rivals."
"Once Again, The Boss Is In At The New York Office."
"Marijuana Fight Envelops Wharf In San Francisco."

Washington Post:

"Record Crowds Flock To Vote Across Mexico."
"Growers Reap Benefits Even In Good Years."
"Episcopal Protest Of Top Bishop Increases."
"Petitions To FDA Delay Generic Drugs, Critics Say."
"Mongolians Meld Old, New In Making Arlington Home."

Washington Times:

"Mexico Election Too Close To Call."
"Senators Promise Gitmo Statute."
"Academic Manifesto Takes Root."
"Iran Plans To Cut Gas Imports, Subsidies."
"A Penny Saved Is A Penny Spurned."
"Illegal Students Face Expulsion From France."
"Representatives Relish Being Made A Mockery."

Detroit Free Press:

"Zetsche Steps Out Front At DCX."
"Schools Ties Bonuses To Test Scores."
"Kalamazoo Is Drug-Testing Hub For Pfizer."

Atlanta Journal-Constitution:

"Fulton Jail Is Slow To Let Go."
"'Always Remember.'"
"Austin Pleads Guilty To 'Mistake.'"
"Turner Studios In Midtown Undo Shoestring Image."

Houston Chronicle:

"Too Close To Call In Mexico."
"Troubling Figures Put Focus On Sunnyside."

Story Lineup From Last Night's Network News:

ABC: Iraq's Most Wanted; Shuttle Launch Scrubbed; Israel-Gaza Offensive; Mexico-Presidential Election; FBI-West

DOJ_NMG_0038256

Virginia Congressman; Death Penalty Anniversary; Alzheimer's-Art Therapy; National Anthem-Singing Project.
CBS: Israel-Gaza Offensive; Iraq Violence; Iraq's Most Wanted; Conservatives-Press Concerns; Discovery-Repair Concerns; Mexican Scholarship Program; World Cup; New Jersey-Government Shutdown; Weekend Box Office; Bush's 60th Birthday.
NBC: Preempted By Golf.

Story Lineup From This Morning's Radio News Broadcasts:
ABC: Space Shuttle Launch Delayed; Mexico-Election; Israel-Kidnapped Soldier; IN-Car Accident.
NPR: Mexico-Election; Israel-Kidnapped Soldier; UN-Human Rights Reforms; Space Shuttle Launch Delayed; IN-Car Accident; Iraq-Most Wanted List; World Cup; Foreign Stock Markets.

WASHINGTON'S SCHEDULE:

Today's Events In Washington.

White House:

PRESIDENT BUSH — Signs H.R. 5403, the Safe and Timely Interstate Placement of Foster Children Act of 2006. Roosevelt Room, The White House. Photo Release.

VICE PRESIDENT CHENEY — No public schedule.

US Senate: No scheduled events.

US House: No scheduled events.

Other: ELECTIONS-LATINOS _ 9:30 a.m. The Latino Policy Coalition and Lake Research Partners hold a teleconference to release the results of a national survey of Latino voters and discuss the midterm elections. With Jim Gonzalez, chair, Latino Policy Coalition; Celinda Lake, president, Lake Research Partners; and Dr. Fernando Guerra, director, Leavey Center for the Study of Los Angeles. Contacts: Michael Bustamante, 916-425-0839. Notes: Dial-in: 1-866-216-6835. Passcode: 116692.

NY TIMES-PROTEST _ 12 p.m. The D.C. Chapter of FreeRepublic.com and Accuracy in Media hold a demonstration to call for the prosecution of New York Times publisher Arthur Sulzberger, Jr., Executive Editor Bill Keller and reporters James Risen and Eric Lichtblau for "giving aid and comfort to al Qaeda by publishing stories exposing national security intelligence programs." Location: In front of 1627 "Eye" St. NW.

GRANNY PEACE BRIGADE _ 2 p.m. The Granny Peace Brigade, 18 grandmothers protesting the war in Iraq, hold a rally and march to mark the end of their journey from New York City. Highlights: 2 p.m. Marchers will be joined by war protester Cindy Sheehan, at Dupont Circle. Sheehan will escort the marchers down Massachusetts Avenue to the Gandhi statue at Massachusetts Ave. and Q Sts, NW, in front of the Indian Embassy. Location: Gandhi Statue, corner of Q St NW and Massachusetts.

Copyright 2006 by the Bulletin News Network, Inc. Reproduction without permission prohibited. Editorial content is drawn from thousands of newspapers, national magazines, national and local television programs, and radio broadcasts. The Attorney General's News Briefing is published five days a week for the Office of Public Affairs by BulletinNews, which creates custom news briefings for government and corporate leaders and also publishes the White House Bulletin, Frontrunner and Washington Morning Update. We can be found on the Web at BulletinNews.com, or called at (703) 749-0040.

DOJ_NMG_0038257

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL'S NEWS BRIEFING

PREPARED FOR THE OFFICE OF PUBLIC AFFAIRS, U.S. DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE

TO: THE ATTORNEY GENERAL AND SENIOR STAFF

DATE: MONDAY, JULY 3, 2006 7:45 AM EDT

TODAY'S EDITION

Terrorism News:
Senators Predict Congress Will Establish Military Commissions For Detainees Soon ... 2
GOP Intensifies Criticism Of Media Over Anti-Terrorism Program Leaks ... 4
Document Outlines Bali Bombers' Final Hours ... 4
WSJournal Says Islamists Should Not Turn Somalia Into Refuge For Terrorists ... 5

Homeland Response:
L.A. Police Chief, Others, To Press Homeland Security For Greater Sharing Of Intelligence ... 5

War News:
Sunni Lawmakers Boycott Iraqi Parliament ... 5
Iraqi Government Publishes "Most Wanted List." ... 5
Violence Continues In Iraq ... 6
Further Details Of Alleged Iraq Rape Surface ... 6
Senate Intelligence Committee "Statements" Investigation Stalled ... 6
Bush Seen As Uninterested In Seeking Democratic Support For Iraq Policy ... 6
Raid Reveals Tensions Between US Forces, Afghan Government ... 6
US Military Faces Shortfall In Special Forces Troops ... 7
Pentagon Officers Said To Be Resisting Rumsfeld, Cheney On Iran Bombing Plans ... 7

DOJ:
Kennedy Emerges As Swing Vote On High Court ... 7
GOP To Focus On Judicial Confirmations ... 8

Corporate Scandals:
Impact Of US Abramoff Probe Into Ex-Guam Governor Remains Unclear ... 8
Tenet CEO Faces Challenge Of Moving On After Settlement With DOJ ... 9
Austin Banker Nearing Victory In S&L Case ... 9
BP Traders Lost $10 Million, Court Documents Show ... 9
Bermuda Unit Said To Be At Center Of Refco Collapse ... 9
SEC Sues To End German Bond Investment Scheme ... 9

Criminal Law:
DOJ Issues New Subpoena For Jefferson Emails ... 10
Indictment Seen As Wild Card In Ney's Electoral Chances ... 10
Government Corruption Cases Persist In Connecticut ... 10
Missouri Supreme Court Ruling Alters Rules For Sex Offenders 10
Irving, Texas, Police May Be Chastised Over Amber Alert ... 11
ABC News Poll Finds 65% Favor Death Penalty For Murder ... 11

Civil Rights:
Hollywood, Florida, May Seek More Time In Religious Discrimination Lawsuit ... 11
La Tuna Federal Prison Inmates Claim Rights Violations ... 11
Texas Redistricting Verdict Could Result In "Ripple Effect." ... 11
Hitchens Says Congress Should Not "Waste" More Time On Flag Amendment ... 11

Antitrust:
US Investigating Kosher Slaughterhouses For Possible Antitrust Violations ... 12
Second Quarter Merger Activity Was Prolific ... 12
Despite Consolidation, Growth Opportunities Elusive For Commercial Satellite Industry ... 12

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:
FBI Agent Came Close To Linking Cole, 9/11 Plots ... 12
Post-9/11 Criticism, Private Sector Pay Driving Senior Officials From FBI ... 12
Blagojevich Says He Acted To Identify, Punish Hiring Misconduct ... 13
Longtime Scarpa Girlfriend Emerges As Key Witness Against DeVecchio ... 13
FBI Investigating West Virginia's "Prince Of Pork." ... 13
Illinois Man Pleads Guilty To Hoax Terror Threat ... 14

Immigration:
Sensenbrenner Suggests Voters Would Punish GOP If Senate Bill Enacted ... 14

Congress-Administration:
Bush To Name Connaughton To Lead Maritime Administration ... 14
Coburn Plan Seeks To Inform Public On Government Spending 14
USDA Program Benefits Farmers Even In Good Years ... 15

Feingold, Obama Pushing Senate To Adopt Ethics Reforms As Rules Change ... 15
Bush's Fitness Seen As Remarkable As He Turns 60 ... 15
Professor Questions Whether MBA Has Made Bush Better President ... 15
Bush, McCain Rapprochement Seen As Based On Pragmatic Considerations ... 16

Other News:

Emanuel, Dean At Odds Over Party Strategy ... 16
GOP Sees Chance To Increase House Majority ... 16
GOP Pressing "Suburban Agenda." ... 17
Conservative Republicans Now Opposing 527 Reform ... 17
Mormon, Muslim Presidential Candidates Face Voter Uneasiness ... 17
New Jersey Budget Impasse Could Shutter Casinos, Close Beaches ... 17
Virginia Gay Marriage Ban Spurs Fundraising Boom ... 18
Critics Say Petitions To FDA Delay Approval Of Generic Drugs. 18
Weather Delays Space Shuttle Launch For Second Day In A Row ... 18
Academic Bill Of Rights Taking Hold In Many States ... 18
Lawmakers Say Spot On Colbert Show Raised Profiles With Constituents ... 18
House, Senate Clash Over Proposal For Walkway On Capitol's East Front ... 19
Former DHS Official Says FEMA Director Should Be Allowed To Focus On Disaster Response ... 19
Carter Says FOIA Should Be Amended To Keep Pace With International Standards ... 19
Thornburgh Says Media Shield Law Must Be Carefully Crafted . 19
Schwarzenegger's Conservative Former Aide Reverses Support For Term Limits ... 20
New Republic Says Baucus Should Be Dropped From Finance Panel ... 20
Author Says US Is Better At Educating Girls ... 20
Mallaby Calls Concept Of Energy Independence "Pipe Dream." 20
Herbert Makes Case For Minimum Wage Increase ... 20
Pastor Says Americans Need Formal Day Of Rest ... 20
NYTimes Says Congress Should Intervene To Clarify Clean Water Act ... 21
WPost Sees Promise In Ruling On Vermont Campaign Finance Laws ... 21
NYTimes Says US Must Improve Science Education ... 21
WPost Says Maryland Governor's Race Should Be "Hard-Hitting, Substantive Campaign." ... 21
Personnel News ... 21

Editorial Wrap-Up:

New York Times: ... 22
Washington Post: ... 22
Wall Street Journal: ... 22
Los Angeles Times: ... 23

The Big Picture:

Headlines From Today's Front Pages ... 23

Washington's Schedule:

Today's Events In Washington ... 24

TERRORISM NEWS:

Senators Predict Congress Will Establish Military Commissions For Detainees Soon. The Financial Times (7/3, Alden) reports, "The US Congress looks set to co-operate with President George W. Bush in devising rules for military commissions to try alleged terrorist detainees. This follows last week's historic Supreme Court decision that struck down the president's claim that he could set the rules on his own authority." US lawmakers' reaction to the ruling dominated the Sunday political shows. GOP Sen. Arlen Specter, appearing on CBS's Face the Nation (7/2, Schieffer), said, "The Judiciary Committee had hearings on Guantanamo last June. And I made a trip there, and it's been apparent to us for some time that the Supreme Court was going to impose some restrictions. And we had legislation ready to go. And I think that we should now have hearings in the Judiciary Committee, which we've scheduled for July 11th." M The Washington Times (7/3, Pfeiffer) notes Sen. Carl Levin, Michigan Democrat, "told CBS that his panel will 'have hearings in a couple of weeks.'"

Sen. Lindsey Graham, also a Republican, on Fox News Sunday (7/2, Wallace) said, "I think what we will do this month, I hope, is to get some input from the great legal minds of our time, particularly military lawyers, retired and active duty military judge advocates. … And I would hope Congress would have hearings about what to do in light of this decision and that we will sit down together…in August, write legislation and hopefully vote by September."

The New York Times (7/3, Toner) "both parties were treading carefully in a political and legislative terrain suddenly reconfigured by the Supreme Court. Most leaders on Sunday pledged bipartisan cooperation, but some fault lines were clear." Democratic Sen. Charles E. Schumer "said on 'Meet the Press' on NBC that 'this White House has felt it could just change things unilaterally.' Mr. Schumer added, 'Had they come to Congress a few years ago on this issue, my guess is they would have gotten most of what they wanted.'" But "in light of the court ruling, Mr. Schumer called on Attorney General Alberto R. Gonzales to create an independent commission to conduct 'a top-to-bottom legal review of all of the administration's ongoing antiterror measures.'" USA Today (7/3) reports "senior Democrats called for a broader review of whether Bush overstepped his war powers," and notes Schumer's comments.

DOJ_NMG_0038259

On ABC's This Week (7/2, Stephanopoulos), Democratic Sen. Dianne Feinstein said, "This is the time for the Congress to come together, both political parties, and we can do this, and the President, and work out the parameters of whether it is a special authorized commission, whether it is a military tribunal. But that gives the detainees the rights that the Constitution provides, and this is our strength. It is not our weakness." And Democratic Sen. Jack Reed, on Fox News Sunday (7/2, Wallace), said, "The President declared that he essentially was operating in his own capacity as commander in chief, and I think the court reined him back, and I think it's appropriate. … What it insists is that the President come to the Congress and in a deliberate fashion and a democratic fashion we give him the authority that he needs."

In an analysis piece, the Los Angeles Times (6/3, Schmitt) says the ruling "has apparently presented the Bush administration and its allies in Congress with two choices -- both fraught with risk. They can use the GOP majorities in the House and Senate to put a quick congressional seal of approval on something close to the existing system, but run the risk that it too will be struck down by the high court." Or "they can follow the path suggested by the court and devise a system embracing the procedural and other principles of the U.S. Uniform Code of Military Justice and the Geneva Convention, but risk the possibility that few, if any, of the alleged terrorists will be convicted." And "both choices, as well as attempts to chart a middle course, could set off the kind of protracted, internally divisive debate that the White House and GOP political strategists would not relish with the November elections approaching."

McCain Contends "All Of Us" Would Like To See Guantanamo Shut Down. Sen. John McCain, on ABC's This Week (7/2, Stephanopoulos), said, "All of us and the president has said he'd like to see Guantanamo shut down, but it's not Guantanamo itself, it's the status of these detainees. And I believe that if we use the Supreme Court decision correctly, we will move forward and adjudicate these cases."

Experts Offer Tips On Complying With Court Ruling On Guantanamo Tribunals. Time (7/10, Thornburgh) reports that the Supreme Court's ruling in Hamdan v. Rumsfeld says that if the Bush Administration wants to hold special military tribunals to try terrorism suspects at Guantnamo Bay, "it can't just declare them legal -- it needs to work with the other branches of government to make them so." Time notes that while the ruling was a "rebuke to the Administration's claim that it alone can decide how to defend Americans from terrorism," the High Court did not say "Guantnamo has to be closed. In fact, there are plenty of people who believe it's possible to comply with the court's ruling while protecting American citizens and extracting useful intelligence from detainees." Time lists several ways the Administration can fix Guantanamo, including working with Congress, repatriating the "small fish," who have been determined not to have committed any hostile act against Americans or their allies, processing the habeas corpus cases, living by the Geneva rules and lifting the "veil of secrecy" over the prison.

Bush, GOP Seen As Likely To Utilize Hamdan Decision As Campaign Issue. The Washington Post's Dana Milbank, on The Chris Matthews Show (7/2, Matthews) said, "Bush will be celebrating Hamdan the way the Muslims celebrate Ramadan. … Now he can campaign against the Supreme Court, they can put legislation before the congress that gives him exactly what he wants, force the democrats to vote against them and say 'those guys want to release all the terrorists.' It's going to be the 2002 and 2004 campaign all over again." Later in the program Milbank added, "It's Max Cleland all over again. You need one issue, one sort of wedge, and…this is exactly what the president wants."

The Weekly Standard's Bill Kristol, on Fox News Sunday (7/2, Wallace), said, "This is going to be a great debate for Republicans in Congress for the next few months. … Democrats are either going to have to basically acknowledge that the president has been right all along by authorizing what he wanted, and they're going to have to rebuke the Supreme Court's interpretation of the Geneva Conventions, or the Democrats are going to be in the position of saying that Al Qaida deserves protections like normal prisoners of war or like normal people in the American justice system."

WSJournal Says Case Should Be Election Issue. The Wall Street Journal (7/3) editorializes, "The Court's opinion masks its own power grab by asserting that the executive must defer more to Congress in designing military commissions." But "the Court's own deference to Congress is selective in the extreme, as it simply chose to ignore the clear intent of the Detainee Treatment Act that Congress passed only last December." The Journal adds, "We…certainly hope the Administration presses its case for military commissions to the Congress, including just how much due process protection the Members think al Qaeda detainees really deserve. An election is coming in which the prosecution of the war on terror will again be a major issue. By all means let's debate the proper care and handling of Osama's bodyguard."

GOP Lawmakers Blast Court's Interpretation Of Geneva Convention. The AP (7/3, Yost) reports, "Two Republican senators said Sunday that Congress must rein in the Supreme Court ruling that international law applies to the Bush administration's conduct in the war on terror." On Fox News Sunday (7/2, Wallace) Sen. Lindsey Graham criticized the "Geneva Convention aspects" of the Hamdan decision, calling them "breathtaking." Graham argued that the "question for this country is should Al Qaida members who do not sign up to the Geneva Convention, who show disdain for it, who butcher our troops, be given the protections of a treaty they're not part of. My opinion -- no. They should be humanely treated, but the Geneva Convention cannot be used in the war on terrorists to give the terrorists an opportunity to basically come at us hard without any restrictions on how we interrogate and prosecute."

DOJ_NMG_0038260

Sen. Mitch McConnell, on NBC's Meet The Press (7/2, Mitchell) said, "a very disturbing aspect of the decision was that the court held common Article 3 of the Geneva Conventions applicable to American servicemen. Now this means that American servicemen potentially could be accused of war crimes. I think Congress is going to want to deal with that as well when it enacts these military commissions, and I think we need to do it soon. And so we'll be dealing with that in the coming weeks. … I think we will have to act on this very soon, either in July or in September. Certainly in the next couple of months."

Rep. Peter King, on CNN's Late Edition (7/2, Roberts) noted that "the Geneva Conventions apply to soldiers of established armies, of established governments, not to terrorists who are on the run, who are basically rag-tag operations and do not swear allegiance to a particular country. … Because if we apply the Geneva Convention to them, that means all you ask them is their name, rank and serial number."

Kristol Says Court Committed "Act Of Judicial Imperialism." The Weekly Standard's Bill Kristol, on Fox News Sunday (7/2, Wallace), added, "What the court did find -- let's just be literal about this -- is that Common Article III of the Geneva Conventions applies to Al Qaida. That is a breathtaking finding. It is contrary to every understanding of what that article has meant for the last 50 years. It is a pure act of judicial imperialism. … And I think the Congress is going to have to repudiate the court."

Stevens Opinion Said To Reflect 1946 Ruling Penned By Rutledge. The Washington Post (7/3, A19, Lane) reports in its "Full Court Press" column, "Justice John Paul Stevens wrote last week's Supreme Court opinion striking down President Bush's plan to put suspected terrorists on trial before military commissions. But in a real sense, the opinion's author was Wiley B. Rutledge, the justice for whom Stevens clerked during the court's 1947-1948 term, and for whom he has expressed great admiration in the years since." Rutledge's "most famous dissenting opinion came in 1946, when he wrote that the majority of the court was wrong to deny a petition for habeas corpus by Tomoyuki Yamashita, the Japanese general sentenced to death by a U.S. military commission in the Philippines for atrocities committed by his troops. … It is hard to imagine anyone less popular in the United States than Yamashita. But the man whose case was before the court last week, Osama bin Laden's former aide, Salim Ahmed Hamdan, might qualify. Nevertheless, Stevens defended not Hamdan, but Hamdan's rights."

GOP Intensifies Criticism Of Media Over Anti-Terrorism Program Leaks. The CBS Evening News (7/2, story 4, 2:20, Mitchell) reported, "A battle between the press and the White House is heating up tonight." CBS (Calvi) added Rep. Peter King has "cosponsored a congressional resolution condemning press reports that revealed a secret government program. The program was designed to monitor millions of bank transactions to try to catch terrorists." President Bush (Wednesday): "There can be no excuse for anyone entrusted with vital intelligence to leak it and no excuse for any newspaper to print it." Calvi: "'The Wall Street Journal,' 'The New York Times' and the 'Los Angeles Times' all reported on the surveillance program on the same day, but it's been 'The New York Times' that's been the focus of criticism, including by the editorial page of the 'Wall Street Journal.'" Bill Keller, Executive Editor, "The New York Times": "The 'Times' is an easy target for conservatives partly because our opinion pages tend to be pretty tough on the Bush Administration." Calvi: "Now, the Administration is considering its options." Rep. King "tells CBS News he'll be asking the Attorney General to investigate how the information was obtained by the 'Times' and file criminal charges against any leakers and reporters who refuse to reveal those sources."

McCain Calls For Prosecution Of Terror Money Tracking Program Leakers. The New York Post (7/3, Orin) reports that Sen. John McCain has ""joined the chorus of critics who say The New York Times was wrong to out a top-secret terror money-tracking program, and he called for prosecuting the leakers." Speaking on ABC's This Week, McCain said, "Tracking the money is always a vital tool, and members of Congress were kept informed and agreed to this program," adding, "So, no, I don't think [the Times] should have published it." The Post adds, "McCain also challenged the Times' claim that it didn't reveal any real secrets, saying, 'If The New York Times thinks the story was inconsequential, the legitimate question is: Why was it on the front page?' Asked if the Times should be prosecuted, McCain replied, 'I think we should go after the leakers first.'"

Document Outlines Bali Bombers' Final Hours. The New York Times (7/3, Bonner) reports from Indonesia on "the playbook for a suicide bombing, including even a minute-by-minute choreography of the bombers' final hours. The Indonesian police uncovered the document from the computer of one of the planners of an attack last October in Bali, which killed 20 people when three men walked into separate restaurants and blew themselves up." The document "offers a rare glimpse into the minds of the most cunning terrorist plotters and of the kind of meticulous planning that lies behind their operations. It also shows what even a small, local group with few resources can do, and the difficulty of thwarting their plans." The 34-page document, titled "The Bali Project," was "found on the computer of Azhari Husin, a Malaysian-born engineer educated in Australia and Britain who became a master bomb maker and was one of the most dangerous terrorists in Southeast Asia until he was killed in a shootout with the police last November." The document "was given to The New York Times by a person who requested anonymity because it had not been officially released. It was first reported on by Tempo, an English-language weekly newsmagazine here."

DOJ_NMG_0038261

WSJournal Says Islamists Should Not Turn Somalia Into Refuge For Terrorists. An editorial in the Wall Street Journal (7/3) says, "There's no appetite in the US for a large military intervention in Somalia, but that doesn't mean the new regime should think it is immune from outside attention. So here's a suggestion: Send an emissary to the new Islamist government and propose a deal: Hand over the 1998 embassy bombers, refuse safe harbor to al Qaeda operatives, do not invade Somaliland and Puntland. Agree to that, and we will be able to get along. Don't agree, and the US will do what it must to disrupt any terrorist camps or terrorist activity within its borders. … The Somali Islamists need to understand that if they attempt to turn their country into another refuge for terrorists, it will end as badly for them as it did for the Taliban."

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

L.A. Police Chief, Others, To Press Homeland Security For Greater Sharing Of Intelligence. The Los Angeles Times (7/1, Winton, McGreevy) reported, "Los Angeles Police Chief William J. Bratton said Friday that he and other big-city police chiefs will meet this month with top Homeland Security officials amid complaints that the federal agency isn't doing enough to share information with local law enforcement nationwide." Bratton said it is not so much that DHS doesn't "share intelligence," but that "they don't have intelligence." DHS spokesman Russ Knocke described the upcoming meeting as "an opportunity for the secretary to sit down with the chiefs of police for major cities and talk about information sharing." Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff "wants to 'listen to the concerns of the police chiefs and personally work to address the concerns,'" said Knocke.

The AP (7/1) reported that Bratton said, "The good news is: We've seen some significant improvements in intelligence provided over the last year." The AP continued that Knocke "said that last year the federal agency provided more than 1,200 bulletins, notices and other dispatches to local law enforcement agencies." However, he added that DHS is "the first to say there is more work to be done."

WRC-TV Washington, DC (6/30) reported on its website that DC Police Chief Charles Ramsey is among those "complaining about a lack of information sharing during terror threats." Ramsey told NBC4 that he had sent a letter to Secretary Chertoff "and he has agreed to meet sometime in July along with out key staff people, and I'll have some of the police chiefs who are also concerned. Then we'll sit down and talk about it."

WAR NEWS:

Sunni Lawmakers Boycott Iraqi Parliament. The New York Times (7/3, Semple) reports, "The main Sunni Arab political bloc began a boycott of Parliament on Sunday to protest the kidnapping of a Sunni legislator and threatened to withdraw its members from the prime minister's cabinet unless the lawmaker was freed within the next 48 hours." The "walkout" was "the first serious disruption in Iraq's new government and reflected the fragility of the power-sharing arrangement in the face of the relentless sectarian violence overwhelming the nation." The legislator, Tayseer Najah al-Mashhadani, and eight of her guards "were kidnapped by people suspected of being Shiite militiamen on Saturday while driving into Baghdad from her home north of the capital."

The Washington Post (7/3, A15, Partlow) reports, "The decision by the Sunni Accord Front, which holds 44 seats in the 275-member parliament, threatens to pull the legislature apart." Sunni legislators "blamed the abduction on Shiite-led militias aligned with the majority political parties in Iraq. Some accused the Iraqi security forces, who were near the kidnapping site in the Shaab neighborhood, of standing by and allowing Mashhadani's convoy to be captured." The Los Angeles Times (7/3, Roug) also reports the story.

Iraqi Government Publishes "Most Wanted List." The Financial Times (7/3, Negus) reports, "The Iraqi government on Sunday published a "most wanted" list topped by family and former associates of deposed president Saddam Hussein who reportedly finance and direct the insurgency." The list, "planned in parallel with the government's national reconciliation plan – suggests that the government considers a reconstructed Ba'ath party to be its most dangerous foe."

DOJ_NMG_0038262

The AP (7/3, Juhi) notes Saddam's "wife and eldest daughter are among 41 people on the Iraqi government's most wanted list, along with the new leader of al-Qaida in Iraq, a top official announced Sunday." Saddam's wife, Sajida Khairallah Tulfah, "was No. 17, just behind the ousted leader's eldest daughter, Raghad. Sajida is believed to be in Qatar, and Raghad lives in Jordan, where she was given refuge by King Abdullah II."

ABC World News Tonight (7/2, lead story, 2:50, Brown) reported, "Remember the deck of cards the US military put out just after the war? Most of those have since been killed or captured, and the violence continued. The list of 41 names was released by the national security adviser here, who said they're all killers. And will be hunted down, one by one. He said the international police agency, Interpol, has been informed." Mouwafak Al-Rubaie, Iraqi National Security Adviser: "This list shows those who are trying to destroy our country." The CBS Evening News (7/2, story 3, 1:55, Cowan) said it was "the latest step in the government's security crackdown that has failed so far to stem the violence in Iraq."

Violence Continues In Iraq. The CBS Evening News (7/2, story 2, 0:10, Mitchell) reported, "Another bloody day in Iraq. South of Baghdad, four were killed and 22 wounded after a bomb went off. This one day after a car bomb in a Baghdad market killed more than 60."

Further Details Of Alleged Iraq Rape Surface. The Washington Post (7/3, Knickmeyer) reports the version of the alleged rape and murders by US GIs told by a neighbor, Omar Janabi. It gives the victim's age as 15 and contains his account of finding the family's bodies, as well as graphic descriptions of the bodies from death certificates. The Post writes, "The case is at least the fourth American military investigation announced since March of alleged atrocities by U.S. forces in Iraq. The rape allegation makes the Mahmudiyah case potentially incendiary in Iraq. Rape is seen as a crime smearing the honor of the family as well as the victim in conservative communities here."

Senate Intelligence Committee "Statements" Investigation Stalled. In the National Review (7/17), Byron York says the Senate Intelligence Committee "is engaged in a protracted investigation of the public statements of President Bush, Vice President Cheney, top administration officials, lawmakers in the House and Senate, and even officials of previous administrations to determine whether they exaggerated, cherry-picked, misrepresented, or otherwise manipulated intelligence in the run-up to the war." But it is "not going well. In fact, the 'statements investigation' is the main roadblock to completion of what is called 'Phase Two' of the committee's probe of pre-war intelligence." After Democrats "first proposed to investigate only Bush administration officials," Chairman Pat Roberts "pointed out that many members of Congress, as well as many members of the Clinton administration, had also made statements about Iraq's supposed WMD capabilities." But Roberts added when "senators evaluate each statement in light of the intelligence that was available at the time, he proposed, they should do so blindly — that is, not knowing the identity of the speaker, so they would not allow any biases to influence their judgment on the appropriateness or inappropriateness of the statement." It would "not be an exaggeration to say that Democrats — behind the scenes, of course — went bonkers over that suggestion." What had "started as a way to criticize the Bush administration threatened to backfire on Democrats."

Bush Seen As Uninterested In Seeking Democratic Support For Iraq Policy. In the New Republic's TRB column (7/10), Peter Beinart says, "Why doesn't George W. Bush want to win in Iraq? Seriously. The past several weeks have forced him to choose between two big goals: Demonizing Democrats to help the GOP retain control of Congress and fostering a domestic climate that gives the new Iraqi government the best chance to survive. And, again and again, he has chosen door number one." Swallowing the concessions needed from the US to secure the Iraqi government "will require a bipartisan bargain -- the kind of ceasefire required for difficult domestic changes like reforming Social Security or the tax code." But "over the past several weeks, President Bush has done exactly the opposite. Rove and company immediately wielded Zarqawi's death as a partisan club, saying that, if Democrats had their way, he'd still be loose."

Raid Reveals Tensions Between US Forces, Afghan Government. The New York Times (7/3, Gall) reports from Kabul, "A joint military raid by American and Afghan forces on an unobtrusive house here in the capital on March 20 has pointed up the tensions between the American military and the Afghan Defense Ministry over the conduct of counterinsurgency raids, particularly in Kabul, the Afghan defense minister says." The raid "was led by masked American special forces, and included eight members of a unit of the Afghan National Army. The involvement of Afghan soldiers prompted the defense minister, Gen. Abdur Rahim Wardak, who had no advance notice of the raid, to bar Afghan Army personnel from taking part in any raids on houses or compounds."

Two British Soldiers Killed. The Washington Post (7/3, A16, Tran) reports, "An insurgent attack on a British base killed two soldiers and an Afghan interpreter, military officials said Sunday, while at least 20 insurgents were killed in clashes and coalition airstrikes." An AH-64 Apache attack helicopter "crashed Saturday in an accident in southern Afghanistan, killing one crew member, the US military said."

DOJ_NMG_0038263

Pakistani Journalist Sees Dire Situation In Afghanistan. Ahmed Rashid, a Pakistani journalist, writes in the Washington Post (7/3, A21), "The current political and military meltdown in Afghanistan was entirely predictable and avoidable. For the past three years Afghans, their president, Hamid Karzai, and foreign experts have been warning that the failure of the United States and the international community to provide sufficient economic, military and reconstruction resources to the fledgling Afghan government would lead to a Taliban resurgence and disillusionment among the Afghan people. That is exactly what has happened." But "there is still a way out of the mess if the international community and the Afghans pull together, rather than being at odds with one another. Karzai set the ball rolling late last month by calling for a joint strategy in a critical meeting with the most important foreign players in Kabul." Rashid adds the UN Security Council "needs to give the UN officials in Kabul the responsibility for coordinating the international response to the crisis and economic and political strategies with the Afghan government."

US Military Faces Shortfall In Special Forces Troops. USA Today (7/3, Brook) reports, "The Army, Navy and Air Force face shortages of elite special operations forces that are playing a leading role in the war against terrorism, military records show." The shortfall of Army special operations, Navy SEALs and Air Force "combat controllers persists as the Pentagon seeks to expand the forces by 15% over the next four years to bolster the anti-terrorism campaign. One reason for the shortage is the intense training. The Navy says only 35 of 166 candidates will qualify as SEALs." USA Today adds, "Retention also is a problem. Some veterans can make $780 a day as civilian security contractors in Iraq, says Rep. Jim Saxton, R-N.J., chairman of a House Armed Services subcommittee that oversees special operations troops. Bonuses as high as $150,000 have helped stanch that loss, he says."

Pentagon Officers Said To Be Resisting Rumsfeld, Cheney On Iran Bombing Plans. In the New Yorker (7/10-17), Seymour Hersh writes that included with the Bush White House's offer to Iran to negotiate over its nuclear program if it suspended its uranium enrichment program included "an unspoken threat: The US Strategic Command, supported by the Air Force, has been drawing up plans, at the President's direction, for a major bombing campaign in Iraq. Inside the Pentagon, senior commanders have increasingly challenged the President's plans, according to active duty and retired officers and officials." Senior officers "have told the Administration that the bombing campaign will probably not succeed in destroying Iran's nuclear program. They have also warned that an attack could lead to serious economic, political, and military consequences for the US." A retired four star general, "who ran a major command, said, 'The system is starting to sense the end of the road, and they don't want to be condemned by history. They want to be able to say, 'We stood up.'" The New Yorker adds the "discord over Iran can, in part, be ascribed to Rumsfeld's testy relationship with the generals. They see him as high-handed and unwilling to accept responsibility for what has gone wrong in Iraq." But Rumsfeld is "not alone in the Administration where Iran is concerned; he is closely allied with Dick Cheney, and," a Pentagon consultant said, "'the President generally defers to the Vice President on all these issues,' such as dealing with the specifics of a bombing campaign if diplomacy fails."

Iran Rejects Western Deadline On Nuclear Proposal. The New York Times (7/3, Fathi) reports, "Iran on Sunday again rejected a deadline to respond to an international proposal to end the standoff over its nuclear program, saying it would respond a month. 'We do not consider such statements as constructive and invite them to wait for our answer until next month,' said Hamidreza Assefi, the Foreign Ministry spokesman, the ISNA news agency reported. The next month in the Iranian calendar begins July 23." Assefi "was responding to a statement made at a meeting of the Group of 8's foreign ministers on Thursday in Russia, during which they demanded Iran make a 'clear and substantive' response to the proposal in a week. P resident Mahmoud Ahmadinejad had previously said Iran would give its answer around Aug. 23."

Iran To Cut Refined Oil Imports, Ration Gasoline. The Washington Times (7/3, Mihailescu) reports, "Iran, which relies on imports for almost half its refined petroleum products, plans to halt those imports and introduce gasoline rationing later this year, the government announced." The decision "appears related to a plan to allow the nation's heavily subsidized gasoline to spike in price in order to reduce the smuggling of fuel to neighboring countries, a practice that aggravates shortages and costs the country billions of dollars every year."

DOJ:

Kennedy Emerges As Swing Vote On High Court. The Christian Science Monitor (7/3, Richey) notes that with the addition of President Bush's two nominees, Chief Justice John Roberts and Justice Samuel Alito, the supreme Court "has grown more conservative." The Monitor also notes that Justice Anthony Kennedy "will likely decide how far to the right the law moves under the new lineup of justices at the nation's highest court." According to the

DOJ_NMG_0038264

Monitor, "In years past, Kennedy shared the swing-vote designation with O'Connor. But with her departure he occupies the court's decisive center alone. That puts Kennedy in an even more powerful position than O'Connor, legal analysts say. … Kennedy's power was on full display last week when he joined the court's liberal wing to forcefully strike down President Bush's plan to put terror suspects on trial before military commissions at Guantánamo Bay, Cuba."

Roberts Court Seen As Less Contentious Than Rehnquist's. Time (7/10, Rosen) reports that that Supreme Court's first year under Chief Justice John Roberts "has not been ordinary. As evidenced last week when the court struck down the Bush Administration's use of military tribunals, the Justices are suddenly unafraid to talk to one another in personal terms." By the time the Court adjourned for the summer, "the usual decorous costume drama that is a Supreme Court term had morphed into something much closer -- in vitriol, tension and drama -- to a soap opera." Time notes, however, that despite "the impression left by its rush of final decisions, the Roberts court is, at least so far, less fractured than the court led for 19 years by William Rehnquist. Almost half its decisions this year had no dissents, compared with 38% in Rehnquist's final term, and the tally of 16 cases decided by a 5-to-4 vote is seven fewer than under Rehnquist."

GOP To Focus On Judicial Confirmations. The Washington Times (7/3, Hurt) reports, "In coming weeks, Republicans on Capitol Hill plan for the first major push on judges since Chief Justice John G. Roberts Jr. and Justice Samuel A. Alito Jr. were confirmed to the Supreme Court." In "the nearly six months since Justice Alito was confirmed, only 14 federal judges have been seated." That's "the slowest six-month period since early 2004, according to documents kept by the Department of Justice's Office of Legal Policy." The Times adds, "The plans for renewed emphasis on judges comes after a consortium of conservative leaders expressed deep displeasure with both the White House and Republican leaders on Capitol Hill in recent months over the slowed pace of confirmations." The conservatives wrote "a letter to Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist, Senate Majority Whip Mitch McConnell and other Republican leaders in the body." The "83 signers of the letter…include such conservative icons as Paul Weyrich, Alan Keyes, Richard Viguerie, Abigail Thernstrom, David A. Keene, L. Brent Bozell III and Bill Donohue."

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

Impact Of US Abramoff Probe Into Ex-Guam Governor Remains Unclear. The Guam Pacific Daily News (7/3, Kang) reports, "The fallout over the federal investigation of a possible link between disgraced lobbyist Jack Abramoff and former Democratic Gov. Carl Gutierrez remains unclear. The U.S. Department of Justice on Friday issued a report on the replacement of Frederick Black as the island's U.S. Attorney, in which lobbyist Jack Abramoff told investigators he was helping Gutierrez get rid of Black. Gutierrez on Saturday denied those allegations. Former Guam delegate and Democratic gubernatorial candidate Robert Underwood, in a phone interview from Seattle, said the case warrants further investigation. In particular, he said, inquiries should be made into whether Abramoff received monetary compensation of any kind and where that money might have come from. Gutierrez on Saturday said he nor his administration never paid Abramoff for any lobbying efforts." Underwood "went on to say that if any additional information of a conspiratorial nature is revealed in subsequent investigations, those responsible should be prosecuted. Accountable 'First of all, the voters should hold them accountable and secondly the law should hold them accountable,' he said."

The Guam Pacific Daily News (7/3, Daleno) reports Gutierrez "praised a recently released federal investigation into the removal of former acting U.S. Attorney Fred Black, saying Black's smear of his replacement, Leonardo Rapadas, is a 'prime example of his operations.' Gutierrez yesterday released a written statement responding to the report, accusing Black of blocking local attempts at self-government. During a Saturday interview with the Pacific Daily News, Gutierrez denied statements in the Department of Justice report that lobbyist Jack Abramoff was working on his behalf to get Black removed." Gutierrez "acknowledged meeting with Abramoff during a dinner in the nation's capital, where the topic of Black's nomination came up, but he did not elaborate on what happened after that, saying only that he found it 'interesting' that Abramoff wanted to meet him. A Justice Department Office of Inspector General report, released Friday in Washington, D.C., states that Abramoff told federal investigators he began working on behalf of Gutierrez, who was governor at the time, to lobby for the removal of Black when certain Gutierrez administration officials were under federal investigation."

The Guam Pacific Daily News (7/2, Limtiaco) reports, "Former Democratic Sen. Mark Charfauros yesterday acknowledged that he probably was lobbyist Jack Abramoff's closest friend on Guam, but he disputed a U.S. Department of Justice report released yesterday." Charfauros said he "did ask his friend Abramoff for help in securing a confirmed U.S. Attorney for Guam, but said he was not working with Gutierrez on the matter and did not send the e-mail stated in the report. 'No way. I'd like to see that e-mail. That didn't happen. I never filed any kind of e-mail, saying that nominations are gonna come out of Carl Gutierrez. Carl Gutierrez had nothing to do with this whole issue,' Charfauros said." The Guam Pacific Daily News (7/2, Daleno, Tamondong) reports Abramoff "has told federal investigators and said in e-mails that he worked on behalf" of Gutierrez to remove Black.

DOJ_NMG_0038265

Tenet CEO Faces Challenge Of Moving On After Settlement With DOJ. The Wall Street Journal (7/3, Rundle) reports Trevor Fetter "inherited a financial and legal morass in 2003, when he took the top job at Tenet Healthcare Corp., the big hospital operator. Now, with most of the company's legal woes behind him, Mr. Fetter is turning to his next task: moving on." Tenet last week "agreed to pay the Justice Department $725 million to settle a host of investigations, including allegations that it gamed the Medicare system to generate lucrative payments it didn't deserve." Fetter's "biggest challenge will be to persuade doctors to send more patients to Tenet hospitals, many of which languished as Tenet conserved cash in anticipation of the Justice Department settlement. Today, those hospitals lack the latest CT scanners and other high-tech equipment that doctors crave."

Austin Banker Nearing Victory In S&L Case. The Austin American-Statesman (7/3, Elder) reports, "Austin real estate developer Alfred Hughes was close to giddy when he acquired an El Paso savings and loan in 1988. 'We're sitting on top of the world,' he said after federal regulators approved the purchase. 'We're very comfortable working in a regulated environment.' Less than two years later, regulators shuttered El Paso Federal Savings and Loan. For the past 16 years, Hughes has been trying to collect the $46.5 million he says the government cost him by improperly closing and then liquidating the institution. Among the assets Hughes lost when the thrift closed was his ownership of 4,500 acres of Steiner Ranch in western Travis County, now a development of high-end homes." While the "legal battle may roll on, in a continuing echo of the massive savings and loan crisis of the 1980s and early 1990s, Hughes won a big victory last month. Senior Judge James Merow of the U.S. Court of Federal Claims awarded Hughes the full amount, ruling that a 1989 federal law had unfairly imposed new financial requirements on thrifts."

BP Traders Lost $10 Million, Court Documents Show. Bloomberg (7/3) reports, "The three BP Plc traders accused by regulators of attempting to corner the U.S. propane market lost $10 million when they failed to sell their inventory, court documents show. The traders in February 2004 sought to make more than $20 million by holding most of the propane on a pipeline that ships the heating fuel from a hub in Texas to the U.S. Midwest and Northeast, according to transcripts filed June 28 with the U.S. District Court in Illinois by the Commodity Futures Trading Commission. Instead, they were stuck with much of the fuel as the market plunged on March 1." BP, "which made $2.8 billion trading oil and gas in 2005, and other oil companies are facing increased scrutiny from U.S. regulators and lawmakers as near-record oil prices have boosted gasoline, heating oil and natural gas prices to records in the past year."

Levin, Coleman Want More Oversight Of Energy Markets. The Financial Times (7/3, Grant) reports United Kingdom energy firm BP, "has suspended three Houston-based traders at the centre of an alleged propane price manipulation scheme, as alarm rose in Washington over the need to police energy markets. Senior US senators have warned congress that 'too many trades' are occurring without regulatory oversight." Sen. Carl Levin said, "It's time to put the cop back on the beat in these markets to make sure ordinary Americans aren't ripped off." The Times adds Levin's "call, in a bipartisan report to congress last week by the Senate's Permanent Subcommittee on Investigations, is the clearest sign yet that lawmakers believe the US energy markets are still open to manipulation years after the collapse of Enron exposed the weakness of lightly regulated energy markets." Sens. Levin and Norm Coleman "urged congress to 'eliminate the Enron loophole' by extending the power of the Commodity Futures Trading Commission, the US futures industry regulator, to oversee over-the-counter (OTC) energy markets."

Bermuda Unit Said To Be At Center Of Refco Collapse. The Wall Street Journal (7/3, Mollenkamp, Mcdonald, Mckay) reports on the failure and bankruptcy filing of hedge fund manager Refco, "one of the largest and swiftest failures in recent Wall Street history. Refco, one of the world's largest commodities brokerages, was a global trading hub for corporations, government agencies, individual clients and hedge funds. And yet its spectacular collapse came out of nowhere." There are "thousands of big and small investors trying to recover about $1.8 billion of assets missing from client accounts." The "inside story of Refco's collapse" is now "emerging in federal bankruptcy-court proceedings in lower Manhattan and in related civil and criminal actions. At its center is Refco Capital Markets Ltd. of Hamilton, Bermuda. Court proceedings have uncovered a host of unusual practices by the Bermuda unit that appear to have contributed both to Refco's rapid growth and to its catastrophic fall."

SEC Sues To End German Bond Investment Scheme. USA Today (7/3, Smith) reports Las Vegas investor Jeffrey Weston "has been snapping up Germany Weimar Republic bonds from the 1920s on the premise that $1,000 in IOUs payable in gold then are today worth about $1 billion apiece," persuading "dozens of investors to give him

DOJ_NMG_0038266

$7.7 million to purchase the antique certificates, which lost much of their value after Adolf Hitler came to power in 1933." Last week, the Securities and Exchange Commission "said Weston had spun a fantastic tale while spending $2 million of investors' money on a house and cars and tucking away $454,000 more in Swiss bank accounts." The SEC "sued to halt Weston's promotions, freeze his funds and recover what authorities say might be only pennies on the dollar. The FBI and Texas authorities also are investigating, court records show."

CRIMINAL LAW:

DOJ Issues New Subpoena For Jefferson Emails. Roll Call (7/3, Bresnahan) reports, "The Justice Department has issued a new subpoena for e-mails from Rep. William Jefferson (D-La.), who is at the center of an ongoing bribery and corruption investigation." The subpoena, "approved by a federal grand jury in Alexandria, Va., was sent last week to James Eagan, Chief Administrative Officer of the House." The Jefferson probe "is being overseen by the US attorney's office in Alexandria." The subpoena "was read into the Congressional Record on Thursday evening, as required under House rules, but did not specify that Jefferson was the target of the request."

Indictment Seen As Wild Card In Ney's Electoral Chances. USA Today (7/3, Lawrence) reports, "There's often a caveat these days when Ohio Republicans talk about re-election prospects for their embattled congressman, Bob Ney. As state Rep. Clyde Evans put it at a recent GOP barbecue, 'Unless he's indicted, I think he'll do very well.'" Ney "hasn't been charged and says he has done nothing wrong. He also says he'll run even if he's indicted. … Some of Ney's past backers, however, say an indictment would change their votes. Some already are considering a switch to Democrat Zack Space, 45, an attorney and hotel developer from Dover."

Government Corruption Cases Persist In Connecticut. The Washington Post (7/3, A3, Fahrenthold) reports the "past few years have revealed so many tales of graft, malfeasance and all-purpose criminality by public servants in Connecticut that it's hard to choose the most brazen." A "tradition of bad behavior by officeholders persists here, despite numerous prosecutions and attempts at reform. If more proof were needed, it has come in the past few weeks, with three new scandals involving current or former big-city mayors." When Gov. John Rowland "resigned, pleaded guilty and was sentenced in March 2005 to a year and a day in jail, 'everybody thought that was going to be the end of it,' said John M. Orman, a professor of politics at Fairfield University in Fairfield, Conn. Instead, he said, the continuing parade of misdeeds has helped the state live up to a new nickname, 'Corrupticut.'" The Post adds the "recent scandals here include the tearful, nationally televised admission on June 20 by Bridgeport Mayor John M. Fabrizi (D) that he had used cocaine while in office." Other cases "include a former mayor and city council member from Middletown -- who pleaded guilty late last month to fraud for embezzling money from his law clients -- and a new charge against Joseph Santopietro, the former mayor of Waterbury."

Missouri Supreme Court Ruling Alters Rules For Sex Offenders. The St. Louis Post-Dispatch (7/2, Franck) reports, "Thousands of offenders would no longer be required to provide information for Missouri's sex offender registry after a ruling Friday by the Missouri Supreme Court, according to the lawyer behind the litigation. While the high court upheld the constitutionality of the state's sex offender registry law, it ruled that the statute should not apply to nearly all of those convicted of crimes prior to 1995, when the law took effect. One key exception is sexually violent predators, who will stay on the list regardless of when their crimes occurred. Just how many of Missouri's more than 11,000 registered sex offenders would be affected by the ruling was unclear Friday. Tim Hull, a spokesman for the Missouri Highway Patrol, which maintains the list, said officials must review the ruling in detail. But Arthur Benson II, the lawyer who brought the case, estimates that thousands would no longer have to be registered as sex offenders. Currently, the registry includes offenses from 1979 to the present. Crimes committed during more than half of those years would not be included in the registry." Benson said the ruling "addresses 'the height of unfairness' in the current law, which requires people to register even for crimes they committed years before the registry law was conceived."

Denver Post Urges Online Safety Precautions For Minors. The Denver Post (7/3) editorializes, "There has been a great deal of concern recently - among lawmakers, in the courts and in the media - about the dangers faced by children on the Internet. Indeed, the statistics about online predators are frightening. Just in the last three years, 7,600 offenders have been caught and arrested for sexual solicitations. According to a U.S. Department of Justice survey, 1 in 5 girls and 1 in 10 boys admitted to being sexually solicited on the Internet. The Internet has proven to be a riveting tool for children - it provides an incredible opportunity for students to gain a broader view of the world, collect research for school projects, and keep in contact with family and friends. … It doesn't make sense to deal with Internet risks by locking up your children's computer, but it's vital for parents and guardians to monitor their online use.

DOJ_NMG_0038267

Through awareness, parent-child communication and a few safety precautions, kids and teens can appreciate the benefits of the Internet while dodging most of the dangers."

Irving, Texas, Police May Be Chastised Over Amber Alert. The Dallas Morning News (7/2, Mosier) reports, "The Irving Police Department could face an informal reprimand for issuing an Amber Alert for 2-year-old Elian Majano, who disappeared from a park more than a week ago and is still missing. Evidence of abduction is a requirement for activating the regional alert system, but Police Chief Larry Boyd said there was no such evidence in this case. The task force that runs the local system reviews each alert to determine whether it was warranted. There were 'no signs of abduction, but we couldn't rule it out,' Chief Boyd said."

ABC News Poll Finds 65% Favor Death Penalty For Murder. ABC World News Tonight (7/2, story 6, 0:30, Harris) reported, "Today marks 30 years since the United States Supreme Court ruling that reinstated the death penalty. A new ABC News poll finds that support for capital punishment has fallen over the past decade, but when it comes to the worst crimes, most Americans remain in favor of it: 65% approve of executing people convicted of murder. Since July 2nd, 1976, 1,029 people have been put to death in this country, more than a third of them in Texas."

CIVIL RIGHTS:

Hollywood, Florida, May Seek More Time In Religious Discrimination Lawsuit. The Miami Herald (7/3, Wright) reports Hollywood, Florida, "is expected to ask a federal judge today for more time to settle a religious discrimination lawsuit brought against the city by an Orthodox synagogue. Jury selection is scheduled to start at 9 a.m. before Judge Joan Lenard in U.S. District Court in Miami. The city last week offered a last-minute deal to end the five-year dispute with the Hollywood Community Synagogue Chabad Lubavitch. Now, the congregation wants time to consider the offer. Even if the settlement is accepted, Hollywood leaders may face a fresh round of lawsuits -- this time from neighbors concerned that the deal would allow the synagogue to expand without their input or city approval."

La Tuna Federal Prison Inmates Claim Rights Violations. The El Paso Times (7/3, Roberts) reports, "Inmates held at the various La Tuna federal prison facilities are convinced they have been denied visits, thrown in 'the hole' for minor infractions and denied access to the prison law library because they went public with a lawsuit claiming the federal Bureau of Prisons isn't following its own procedures. Requests for interviews with two of the inmates have been denied twice by La Tuna officials who said it was for the safety of the prisoners. By mail, those inmates have said they want to be interviewed. In that correspondence, they have claimed they are experiencing retaliation for their lawful actions." But La Tuna spokesman Israel Jacquez said, "That's just simply not true. These guys went to the press. That's their right. ... If we believe a staff member is retaliating against an inmate, no matter how frivolous the allegation may be, it is referred to the office of internal affairs."

Texas Redistricting Verdict Could Result In "Ripple Effect." The Washington Times (7/3, Aynesworth) reports last week's Supreme Court ruling "on the constitutionality of the 2003 Tom DeLay-led Texas redistricting coup was a distinct victory for the Republican Party, but it could spawn some interesting fallout." In order to make the 23rd CD compliant "with the Voting Rights Act, some predict that several additional districts will have to be retooled." Rep. Henry Bonilla said, "Anyone who thinks there isn't going to be a ripple effect when countless counties are traded with other congressional districts is not seeing the big picture." The Times ads the "worst that could happen from the Republican viewpoint, several political analysts say, is that Mr. Bonilla might lose the reconstituted 23rd District."

Hitchens Says Congress Should Not "Waste" More Time On Flag Amendment. Christopher Hitchens writes in Wall Street Journal (7/3) that the "so-called 'flag-burning' amendment should never be allowed to waste any more congressional time. … It's easy enough to boast that 'these colors do not run.' However, those who mistake the symbol for the essence are manifesting not a show of spirit for the former but a pathetic lack of confidence in the latter."

WPost Praises McConnell Stance On Flag Burning Amendment. An editorial in the Washington Post (7/3, A20) says the recent Senate debate over a flag burning amendment "managed to bring out some of the worst in politicians of both parties. … If there is a hero in this episode, it is the man who would succeed Mr. Frist as leader, Majority Whip Mitch McConnell (R-Ky.). Mr. McConnell could have put the amendment over the top by abandoning his opposition. To his credit, he didn't, and he was joined by two other Republicans, Sens. Lincoln D. Chafee (R.I.) and Robert F. Bennett (Utah). As Mr. McConnell explained in a column posted on his Senate Web site, 'No act of speech is so obnoxious that it merits tampering with our First Amendment. Our Constitution, and our country, is stronger than that.'"

DOJ_NMG_0038268

ANTITRUST:

US Investigating Kosher Slaughterhouses For Possible Antitrust Violations. The Asbury Park Press/AP (7/3) reports, "The federal government is investigating kosher slaughterhouses and suppliers for possible antitrust practices, according to a lawyer for one of the firms. AgriProcessors Inc., the world's largest kosher slaughterhouse, received a grand jury subpoena requesting documents and was cooperating with the investigation, attorney Nathan Lewin said Friday." It was "not immediately clear exactly how many slaughterhouses and suppliers were involved in the probe. The U.S. Department of Justice did not immediately return a phone call for comment from The Associated Press late Friday."

Second Quarter Merger Activity Was Prolific. The Wall Street Journal (7/3, Berman) reports a "strong first quarter for mergers continued in the second quarter, as deals rolled in from seemingly every sector: Banks, stock exchanges, oil companies, real-estate firms and consumer-products companies. It was one of history's largest and most diverse corporate-buying sprees, with nearly $1 trillion in deals around the world." The "frenetic deal-making produced the third most-active quarter since Thomson Financial began keeping track in 1985. It amounted to more than $916 billion of announced transactions, according to Thomson, up about 35% from about $676 billion a year earlier."

Despite Consolidation, Growth Opportunities Elusive For Commercial Satellite Industry. The Wall Street Journal (7/3, Pasztor) reports that while "consolidation and cost cutting have swept across the commercial-satellite industry," the "surviving operators are finding growth opportunities as elusive as ever." Intelsat Ltd. and PanAmSat Holding Corp. "are set to complete a $3.2 billion merger today, creating a closely held company whose fleet of more than 50 orbiting spacecraft will make it the largest and most diversified global satellite-services operator." But in "an industry with huge capital-investment needs and average annual growth rates hovering around 3% or less, the combined company faces major integration, personnel and marketing challenges to break out of that historical slow-growth pattern."

The Washington Post (7/3, D1, Witte) reports Intelsat Ltd. of Washington will "become the world's largest commercial satellite operator today when it completes its purchase of the firm that had been its toughest domestic competitor." The combined company "will lose money. PanAmSat earned $72.7 million last year, but Intelsat lost far more, about $325 million. Already deep in debt, Intelsat is borrowing heavily to finance the purchase."

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

FBI Agent Came Close To Linking Cole, 9/11 Plots. The New Yorker (7/10-17, Wright) reports on the story Ali Soufan, who, at the time of the attack on the USS Cole in 2000, was "the only FBI agent in the city [New York] who spoke Arabic, and one of only eight in the country." Soufan's language skills, "his relentlessness, and his roots in the Middle East made him invaluable in helping the FBI understand al Qaeda, an organization that few Americans were even aware of before the embassy bombings." During the Cole investigation, an al Qaeda suspect told Soufan "that several months before the Cole attack he and one of the bombers had delivered thirty-six thousand dollars to Khallad, the one-legged al Qaeda lieutenant, in Bangkok. The money," the suspect added, "was meant only to buy Khallad a new prosthesis." But Soufan "was suspicious of this explanation," because "money always flowed toward an operation, not away from it. He wondered if al Qaeda had a bigger plot underway." In November, 2000, "a month after the Cole bombing, Soufan sent the agency the first of several official queries. On Soufan's behalf, the director of the FBI sent a letter to the director of the CIA, formally asking for information about Khallad, and whether there might have been an al Qaeda meeting somewhere in Southeast Asia before the bombing. The agency said that it had nothing." But if the agency "had responded candidly to Soufan's requests, it would have revealed its knowledge of an al Qaeda cell that was already forming inside the US," which eventually became the 9/11 conspiracy.

Post-9/11 Criticism, Private Sector Pay Driving Senior Officials From FBI. Under the headline "An Exodus of Agents," Time (7/10, Bennett, Zagorin) reports in its "Notebook" section, "Office birthday parties must make FBI Director Robert Mueller a little nervous these days." The rumors that Deputy Director John Pistole "was going to bolt for a lucrative job in the private sector" when he turns 50 this month "got so loud that Pistole took it upon himself to assure Mueller that he wasn't leaving," citing, in part, the departure of "so many other senior officials." Time adds, "Years of pummeling by the press and Congress, plus wrenching changes produced by the bureau's shift in focus to antiterrorism, have depressed morale, even in the highest ranks. That has coincided with lucrative employment offers to agents from firms desperate for experienced security chiefs in the wake of 9/11." Time notes, "Members of the Senate Judiciary Committee have been debating whether the brain drain at the FBI poses a threat to national security," and

DOJ_NMG_0038269

"Mueller seems to agree. When promoting agents to senior-executive levels, he 'is trying to extract some promise as to how long they are willing to stay,' says Michael Mason, who runs the administrative side of the FBI." Sen. Charles Grassley "suggested to TIME that 'the FBI needs to appeal to the patriotic spirit of its senior managers.' But beyond that, the bureau is offering few tangible perks to make working there more attractive. … Mason, however, is optimistic that the new generation of agents will make the sacrifices necessary for the job."

Blagojevich Says He Acted To Identify, Punish Hiring Misconduct. The AP (7/2, D'Alessio) reported, "Gov. Rod Blagojevich insisted Saturday that misconduct in his administration is limited to isolated events by people who are soon punished, even though his own inspector general found a top Blagojevich aide took part in a 'concerted effort' to subvert the law. 'As you police the system, every so often you're going find some people who violate the rules. The test of leadership is what do you do about it? Do you act and do you pursue it? Do you work with other law enforcement agencies to ferret more of it out?' he said. 'Those are the things we've been doing.'" The AP noted, "Blagojevich acknowledges he has been interviewed by the FBI. Prosecutors have issued subpoenas for hiring records and other information from state agencies, but Blagojevich won't say which agencies."

Former Illinois IG Alleged Hiring Fraud Connected To Blagojevich's Office. The Chicago Tribune (7/2, Long, Chase) reported, "Far-reaching allegations of state hiring abuses detailed by the governor's executive inspector general can be summarized in the report's account of one employee who still works at the Illinois Department of Employment Security. George Rada got his job when the agency violated state hiring practices, then he became a key conduit for Gov. Rod Blagojevich's patronage office to improperly influence hiring at the agency, according to the report obtained by the Tribune." The Tribune noted, "The September 2004 report by then-Inspector General Zaldwaynaka 'Z.' Scott said Rada and an associate, Surami 'Sudi' Garcia, effectively ran the human resources division in the agency instead of the personnel directors they served."

Chicago Tribune Hopes Fitzgerald Will Complete Probe Before Election. The Chicago Tribune (7/2) editorialized, "The FBI and the office of Illinois Atty. Gen. Lisa Madigan have been digging into reports of state hiring abuses since last year. But Friday's disclosure that the feds have 'implicated multiple state agencies and departments' in politically motivated hiring comes as Blagojevich must stand uneasily for re-election." The "voters deserve what they didn't get in 1998 before Ryan was elected governor: a sense of the nature and sweep of a federal investigation. … Our hope…is that to the extent possible, the federal investigation of the Blagojevich administration either culminates or collapses before voters must make their quadrennial choice." Playing on Blagojevich's prior election pledge, the Tribune added, "What Illinois does need is an end to business as usual."

Longtime Scarpa Girlfriend Emerges As Key Witness Against DeVecchio. In a widely-distributed story, the AP (7/3, Hays, McShane) reports Linda Schiro, longtime girlfriend of Colombo family associate Gregory Scarpa Sr., "has emerged as a key witness against an FBI agent accused in what a prosecutor has labeled one of the worst cases of law enforcement corruption in the nation's history." R. Lindley DeVecchio "allegedly fed Schiro's late boyfriend inside information that led to four mob slayings," but DeVecchio lawyers question her credibility, saying that "her story has changed drastically over time." However, "authorities insist that Schiro's initial reluctance to detail the relationship between the agent and the mob capo was motivated by fears for her life. Only recently was she persuaded to tell the truth, they say."

Judge Waiving DeVeccio House Arrest To Watch Holiday Fireworks. The Washington Post (7/2, A2, Whoriskey) reported Lindley DeVecchio "wants to see fireworks this Fourth of July. Trouble is, he has been charged with four counts of second-degree murder related to some mob slayings" and is "under nightly house arrest in Sarasota, Fla. But to the astonishment of prosecutors, a judge last week granted DeVecchio's request that he be allowed to see the Sarasota fireworks 'in light of the defendant's service to the U.S. government.' DeVecchio is a former FBI agent. 'We've been opposed to the whole bail thing from the beginning,' said Jerry Schmetterer, a spokesman for the district attorney's office in Brooklyn, N.Y."

FBI Investigating West Virginia's "Prince Of Pork." ABC World News Tonight (7/2, story 5, 2:45, Harris) reported in its "Your Money" segment that Rep. Alan Mollohan, dubbed the "Prince of Pork," is "very good at bringing home the bacon for his district. So good, in fact, that the FBI is now taking a hard look at whether this Democrat from West Virginia is breaking the law." ABC (Cochran) noted that Mollohan has earmarked "half a billion dollars over the past ten years" for organizations in his district, and "those dollars provided lucrative contracts and high salaries for his supporters. Investigators want to know whether in return those supporters helped Mollohan become a multimillionaire. … Mollohan says he inadvertently misstated some transactions but insists he did nothing illegal." Mollohan: "I'm proud of the efforts we've undertaken…and if being the 'Prince of Pork'…merits that designation, then I'm proud of that."

DOJ_NMG_0038270

Illinois Man Pleads Guilty To Hoax Terror Threat. The Chicago Tribune (7/2) reported, "A man accused in a terrorism hoax pleaded guilty in the case Friday and faces up to 41 months in prison." Gilbert Romero "in June 2005 told the FBI that a terrorist attack was to be carried out against the Chicago headquarters of a U.S. company. The claim came after Romero was detained in Lake County on state charges, according to his plea agreement."

IMMIGRATION:

Sensenbrenner Suggests Voters Would Punish GOP If Senate Bill Enacted. GOP Rep. F. James Sensenbrenner, in a letter to the editor of the Wall Street Journal (7/3), responds to the Journal editorial "The Tancredo Republicans." Writes the congressman, "House Republicans are committed to enacting border security and immigration legislation, but not if it makes the current situation worse. … In November, voters will judge members of Congress based upon whether they lead with an understanding of voters' concerns, as House Republicans are committed to doing, or whether they ignore voters by enacting legislation, such as the Senate amnesty bill, that the public doesn't support."

House GOP Believes Enforcement-Only Immigration Bill Is Political Winner. In the National Review (7/17), Kate O'Beirne says, "Rather than merely blocking action on a Senate bill they refuse to support, a unified House GOP caucus has decided to go on offense in order to wring the maximum political credit from being on the right side of their reading of public opinion." Because House Republicans "fear the appearance of compromising with a Senate bill they are convinced is wildly unpopular, they have -- according to a leadership aide -- no intention of taking part in a conference to hammer out differences between the House and Senate unless 'there is a sea change in either public or Senate opinion.'" Congressional Republicans "who will be facing the voters are firmly convinced that backing border security now will mean job security in November."

LATimes Criticizes Senate Negotiators. The Los Angeles Times (7/3) editorializes, "Last week saw the first narrowing of the chasm between the Senate's recent comprehensive immigration bill and the House of Representatives' punitive enforcement-only package from December. Trouble is, the overtures are all going in the House's direction. … Pro-reform senators are making two classic negotiating mistakes: confusing their opponents' line-in-the-sand intransigence with a negotiating ploy, and elevating the importance of making a deal above its actual content."

Border Arrests Rose In 2006. The Washington Times (7/3, Seper) reports, "US Border Patrol agents have detained 901,428 foreign nationals seeking to sneak into the United States in the past nine months -- more than 3,300 a day -- up from the 890,358 apprehended in the same period last year." Border Patrol spokesman Michael Friel "said the number of apprehensions, monitored since the Oct. 1 start of fiscal 2006, was a 1 percent increase over detention totals in the first nine months of fiscal 2005. H e also said that although arrests had edged up, the number of apprehended non-Mexicans, known as "other than Mexicans" or 'OTMs,' had declined by about 16 percent."

Mexican Program Uses Remittances To Assist College Students. The CBS Evening News (7/2, story 6, 3:35, Mitchell) reported, "Most Mexican immigrants do maintain strong ties with their homeland, sending nearly $20 billion home last year." CBS (Pinkston) added that in Indaparapeo, "many families here depend on money sent by relatives living abroad, but Indaparapeo does something no other community does. In addition to helping individual relatives, the residents of this town and those who have migrated to the US are transforming their entire community, one student at a time." 47 low-income students "are sponsored by an innovative scholarship program funded by Indaparapeans in the United States and operated by residents still living in Mexico." Thanks to "matching funds from the Mexican government, each student receives a monthly stipend of up to 1,500 pesos, about $150, enough to pay for tuition even at some private universities. In exchange, scholarship recipients are required to participate in community service projects such as lending a hand to children with special needs or tutoring high school students in nearby villages. The goal is to connect scholarship recipients more closely to their communities with the hope that they will use their skills in Mexico after graduation."

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

Bush To Name Connaughton To Lead Maritime Administration. The Washington Times (7/3) reports, "Last week, President Bush announced that he would nominate Sean T. Connaughton to lead the Maritime Administration at the Department of Transportation." Connaughton, a lawyer, "unsuccessfully sought the Republican nomination for lieutenant governor last year, losing in the primary to William T. Bolling. Mr. Bolling went on to win the seat." Connaughton "has served as a senior transportation associate for the American Petroleum Institute."

Coburn Plan Seeks To Inform Public On Government Spending. The New York Times (7/3, Deparle) reports, "Exasperated by his party's failure to cut government spending, Senator Tom Coburn, Republican of Oklahoma, is seeking cyberhelp." Coburn "wants to create a public database, searchable over the Internet, that would list most government contracts and grants -- exposing hundreds of billions in annual spending to instant desktop view. … While advocating for openness, Mr. Coburn is also placing a philosophical bet that the more the public learns about federal spending, the less it will want." Coburn's plan, "hailed by conservatives, is also sponsored by a Democrat, Senator Barack Obama of Illinois, and applauded by liberal groups that support activist government. The result is a showcase of clashing assumptions and the oddest of coalitions, uniting Phyllis Schlafly, a prominent critic of gay rights, with the National Gay and Lesbian Task Force." The House "unanimously passed a version of the proposal in late June, though in a form that had drawn outside criticism. The House bill creates a database that would omit contracts, which typically go to businesses, but would include about $300 billion in grants, which usually go to nonprofit groups." Liberal "critics see a revival of what they call old partisan efforts to 'de-fund the left,' by reducing grants to liberal groups or adding conditions that limit their activities."

DOJ_NMG_0038271

USDA Program Benefits Farmers Even In Good Years. A front page story in the Washington Post (7/3, Morgan, Cohen, Gaul) reports on the loan deficiency payment, a little-known USDA program that was "intended to boost farmers' incomes when prices are low. The farmers do not have to sell at distressed prices to collect the money. They can bank the government payments and sell when prices are higher. Since September, the program has cost taxpayers $4.8 billion. Most of that money -- $3.8 billion -- went to farmers…who sold at higher prices, according to a Washington Post analysis of USDA payment data." According to the Post, "The LDP has become so ingrained in farmland finances that farmers sometimes wish for market prices to drop so they can capture a larger subsidy."

Feingold, Obama Pushing Senate To Adopt Ethics Reforms As Rules Change. Roll Call (7/3, Newmyer) reports, "In a bid to salvage some progress from the fizzling drive to overhaul lobbying and ethics laws, Democratic Sens. Russ Feingold (Wis.) and Barack Obama (Ill.) are pushing their colleagues to adopt as a rules change a slate of reforms from a package the Senate passed months ago." A resolution the pair introduced late last week "would immediately ban gifts, meals and tickets from lobbyists, require pre-approval for privately funded trips and expand revolving-door prohibitions, among other items." While the Senate approved the changes, 90-8, "as part of a broader reform package in March, that bill has stalled awaiting House action." The House "approved its version of the measure in May but has yet to name conferees, and negotiations over the bills have run aground on disagreements about campaign finance and earmark provisions." Roll Call adds, "Obama and Feingold wrote to Senate leaders last week, asking their resolution be adopted as soon as Senators return from the July Fourth recess." Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist's office "did not respond to a request for comment." Senate Minority Leader Harry Reid, "who has sought to portray a GOP 'culture of corruption' as a central theme in his party's midterm messaging, stopped short of a full-throated endorsement of the approach."

Bush's Fitness Seen As Remarkable As He Turns 60. The CBS Evening News (7/2, story 10, 2:40, Mitchell) reported, "The first wave of baby boomers turns 60 this year, and the big day for President Bush comes on Thursday." Ten predecessors "have turned 60 in office, but it's a good bet none was as healthy as number 43." CBS (Axelrod) added, "As the Baby Boomer-in-Chief approaches his birthday this week, he's in top shape, even if he does seem to be dreading the big six-oh just a bit." President Bush (June 7): "I know I'm not supposed to talk about myself, but in a month I'm turning 60. For you youngsters, I want to tell you something, when I was your age, I thought 60 was really old. [laughter] It's all in your mind. It's not that old. Really isn't." Axelrod: Bush's fitness is "a remarkable feat considering that during his five years in office, this President has dealt with 9/11, wars in Afghanistan and Iraq, and a constant threat of terrorism." Bush "doesn't just look healthy. He's got the resting heart rate of an athlete, at 47 to 52 beats per minute. His blood pressure is 110/64. His total cholesterol is 178. His doctors proclaimed him in excellent health and fit for duty, and he actually lost eight pounds last year."

Professor Questions Whether MBA Has Made Bush Better President. Charles R. Kesler, a professor of government at Claremont McKenna College, writes in the Los Angeles Times (7/3), "George W. Bush is the first president with an MBA (from Harvard Business School, no less), but it's not clear that being a master of business administration has made him a better chief executive. The disarray in Iraq, the debacle after Hurricane Katrina -- these aren't exactly the kinds of triumphs that the alumni office likes to boast about." Kesler adds, "It's hard to say what President Bush absorbed from his management studies. We can only draw inferences, though eventually historians may know more. … Bush's management style is long on decisions and short on explanations. … On ordinary rhetorical occasions, Bush and his text seem hardly acquainted. On great occasions, he tends to overshoot the mark, calling for impossibilities such as an "end to evil." He lacks a rhetorical mean, much less the rhetorical mien that served Ronald Reagan so well."

DOJ_NMG_0038272

Bush, McCain Rapprochement Seen As Based On Pragmatic Considerations. The New York Times (7/3, Rutenberg, Nagourney) reports that after "years of competitive and often contentious dealings, President Bush and Senator John McCain of Arizona are building a deepening if impersonal relationship that is serving the political needs of both men." Given their "history of intense rivalry and sometimes personally bitter combat, their newfound partnership is seen by some Republicans as born more of political calculation than personal evolution. Either way, it could prove valuable to Mr. McCain in his efforts to win the Republican presidential nomination in 2008 by sending a signal to Mr. Bush's conservative base and fund-raising network that, at a minimum, the White House will not stand in the Arizonan's way." Aides said "a thaw that began when Mr. McCain campaigned alongside Mr. Bush in the 2004 election has continued through the tougher days of Mr. Bush's second term." But for "all the talk of reconciliation, both sides describe the relationship between arguably the two highest-profile leaders of the Republican Party as almost entirely professional, a little stiff and the product of the pragmatic calculation by two politicians who see potential gain in striking a peace with a powerful rival." Bush "appears to have stronger ties to Mr. McCain than to the other likely presidential candidates." There has been "a steady stream of Bush advisers who have ended up in Mr. McCain's orbit. Most recently, Republicans close to both candidates said that Nicolle Wallace — who just stepped down as Mr. Bush's communications director and has long been close to the president — was likely to serve in some formal or informal role in a McCain campaign. Her husband, Mark D. Wallace, Mr. Bush's deputy campaign manager in 2004 and now an ambassador-level representative to the United Nations, is already lending advice." Wayne L. Berman, a "longtime supporter and fund-raiser for Mr. Bush, has signed on to help Mr. McCain." Karl Rove was "said by associates to have put aside his suspicion and dislike of Mr. McCain." White House press secretary Tony Snow said, "On a series of very tough issues, McCain's been there."

OTHER NEWS:

Emanuel, Dean At Odds Over Party Strategy. Roll Call (7/3, Kornacki) reports, "A letter to Democratic National Committee Chairman Howard Dean from Rep. Rahm Emanuel (Ill.), the head of the Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee, has set off a new round of sniping over party strategy and resources between allies of the two party leaders." Emanuel, who "reportedly stormed out of a May meeting with Dean, penned a letter, dated June 22, to the party chairman demanding $100,000 per targeted district from the DNC to defray the cost of the DCCC's proposed field operation, several individuals who have read the letter said." Attached to the letter was "a sample field plan for a district, itemizing various projected expenses, down to details such as $1,500 for T-shirts. The expense plan was dated June 26, although it was unclear when Dean actually received the missive." Dean "loyalists took the letter as hostile in nature, coming as it did after months of coy suggestions by Emanuel that Dean and the DNC were shirking their financial obligations to the DCCC's election year effort. … On top of that, Dean's backers contend he is not low-balling the DCCC on field operations as Emanuel suggests, and that the $20,000-per-district figure was simply a number being bandied about during negotiations, which were still proceeding when Emanuel wrote the letter."

GOP Sees Chance To Increase House Majority. The Washington Times (7/3, Pfeiffer) reports, "Congressional Republicans say they have a strategic advantage in their effort to increase their House majority, even as national polls show Democrats with a significant lead heading into this year's elections." The National Republican Congressional Committee says that "despite the polling edge for the Democrats, Republicans are targeting conservative districts that went for President Bush in 2004. 'We're competing for red turf held by Democrats,' NRCC spokesman Jonathan Collegio said."

Democrats May Need Only A Few States For "Wave." In his Roll Call column (7/3), Stuart Rothenberg says, "The last major national political wave, in 1994, didn't sweep over all areas of the country with equal force. In some states, Congressional Democrats suffered minimal losses, while in others Democratic House seats fell in bunches." For Democrats "to take the House this year, they may need one or two states to deliver a significant number of wins, not just an isolated victory. Which states give Democrats the best chance to score victories in bunches?" Democratic operatives "have been suggesting that at least a handful of states are ripe for a Democratic wave: New York, Ohio, Pennsylvania, Connecticut and Indiana."

Voters Seen As Needing Solid Reason To Dump Incumbents. Roll Call (7/3, Duran) reports the "surprisingly easy victory that Rep. Chris Cannon (R-Utah) scored over his primary opponent last week has been heralded as a win for President Bush's immigration policy." But wealthy developer John Jacob's "defeat in the Beehive State's 3rd district holds other lessons for both Republicans trying to dislodge incumbents in primaries and Democrats hoping to flip Republican-held seats in November." Just as the "victories of newly elected Rep. Brian Bilbray (R-Calif.) and Reps. Bob Ney (R-Ohio), Bennie Thompson (D-Miss.) and now-ex Rep.

DOJ_NMG_0038273

Tom DeLay (R-Texas) demonstrated in recent primaries, voters still need a reason to dump incumbents or switch party control of a House seat."

GOP Pressing "Suburban Agenda." In his Roll Call column (7/3), executive editor Morton Kondracke notes Rep. Dave Reichert's effort to persuade GOP colleagues "to back a bill enabling school districts to tap into national criminal databases before they hire employees." The School Safely Acquiring Faculty Excellence Act "passed the House almost unanimously in June — the first legislative success for the GOP's 'Suburban Agenda,' a set of bills designed to appeal to the majority of American voters who live in the suburbs." The agenda "is the brainchild of Rep. Mark Kirk (R-Ill.), one of Congress' most effective moderates, who has sold it to a growing group of conservatives and the House GOP leadership." Kirk said, "Washington may think this is small-bore. It's not the war on terror. But this is an agenda that people care about in their everyday lives — their kids' safety, health care, their ability to send their kids to college." Kondracke adds that besides the "school safety measure, the agenda includes a national '401Kids' savings account for college, a screen to block predators from contacting children at online chat rooms and a bill setting standards for computerizing health records."

Conservative Republicans Now Opposing 527 Reform. The Wall Street Journal (7/3, Cummings) reports that in 2004, "Republicans were organizing against new, loosely regulated political groups that were raising money to attack President Bush." Now, "illustrating how roles often reverse in politics, some of the party's conservative activists are trying to stop legislation that would choke off those groups." The dispute "centers on a House bill that would curtail funding for organizations nicknamed 527s, for the section of the tax code that governs them." But the "rich liberals who spent heavily to oust Mr. Bush" in 2004 "aren't investing in 527s this election cycle, even though the stakes are high, with control of Congress in play." In the 2006 campaign so far, "it is right-leaning 527s that are most active. The Club for Growth, a conservative economic-issue group, is leading the charge to kill the Republican bill that would shut down 527s. The Club for Growth received $8 million in donations during the 2004 cycle; for this cycle, its donations as of May tally $5.1 million." The Club's "allies include social conservatives, gun-rights groups and college Republicans. Their campaign could stall congressional efforts to enact anticorruption legislation -- a response to a spate of ethics scandals -- because the House attached 527 language to its rewrite of lobbying laws."

Mormon, Muslim Presidential Candidates Face Voter Uneasiness. The Los Angeles Times (7/3, Mehren) reports that even as "anti-Semitism and anti-Catholicism are fading as voter taboos," a Los Angeles Times/Bloomberg poll found "uneasiness about some religions persists. Thirty-seven percent of those questioned said they would not vote for a Mormon presidential candidate -- and 54 percent said no to the prospect of a Muslim in the White House." In addition, "21 percent said they could not vote for an evangelical Christian. Only 15 percent replied that they would not vote for a Jewish presidential candidate. Just 10 percent of those polled were unwilling to cast ballots for a Catholic chief executive." The nationwide survey "of 1,321 adults was conducted June 24-27. The poll has a margin of sampling error of plus or minus 3 percentage points, poll director Susan Pinkus said." With "no likely Muslim candidate on the presidential horizon, the poll numbers present the greatest threat to a potential contender from the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints (as the Mormon Church is formally known)," Gov. Mitt Romney of Massachusetts. Emory University analyst Merle Black said, "It is something he will have to address. It will be a challenge. It doesn't necessarily kill him as a candidate, but he may have to talk in more detail than he ever has before about his faith."

New Jersey Budget Impasse Could Shutter Casinos, Close Beaches. The CBS Evening News (7/2, story 8, 1:45, Mitchell) reported, "A budget impasse has forced the Garden State to start shutting down its government. The impact may soon be felt by out-of-state visitors like beachgoers and gamblers." CBS (Chen) added that as New Jersey's legislature failed to meet its budget deadline over the weekend, Gov. Jon Corzine shut down nonessential state function and "right away, no more lottery tickets sold, no more drivers license issued either, 45,000 state workers immediately furloughed, road crews suspended, a nice bonus on a holiday weekend, but right after the Fourth of July, state beaches and parks could close and the casinos will as well." Gov. Corzine "wants to increase the sales tax to bring in more revenue. Fellow Democratic lawmakers say that's unnecessary -- the upshot, no deal, and now, no budget."

The AP (7/3, Santi) reports Atlantic City's casinos "were ordered to close Wednesday, the latest casualty of a state government shutdown that entered its second day Sunday after the Legislature failed to adopt a budget by its July 1 deadline." The 12 casinos, "which require state monitoring, have waged a court battle to remain open, and an appeals court was weighing the matter Sunday." Gov. Corzine "said Sunday there was 'no immediate prospect of a budget.' State parks, beaches and historic sites also were expected to shut down Wednesday." If the casinos "shut down, the state would lose an estimated $2 million in tax revenue each day they stayed closed." The budget talks "became heated this year as Corzine, a Democrat, proposed increasing the state sales tax from 6 percent to 7 percent to help overcome a $4.5 billion budget deficit."

DOJ_NMG_0038274

Virginia Gay Marriage Ban Spurs Fundraising Boom. The Washington Post (7/3, B2, Jenkins) reports the proposed state constitutional amendment "that would ban same-sex marriage in Virginia has sparked an aggressive fundraising effort, with each side of the debate hoping to secure hundreds of thousands of dollars for their cause." Virginia voters "will decide Nov. 7 whether the state constitution should be amended to define marriage solely as a union between a man and a woman. The amendment also would place a ban in the constitution on civil unions, which already are illegal in Virginia." To "help rally amendment opponents, the Commonwealth Coalition, a Richmond-based group, has set an ambitious goal of raising $3 million, organizers said. They want to fund a barrage of radio and television ads in the fall." Meanwhile, the Family Foundation Action, "which is organizing amendment supporters, has set a best-case-scenario fundraising goal of $900,000, although activists and volunteers said they expected to raise less than that." Both sides "have created Internet fundraising mechanisms and appealed to potential voters through churches and community events across the state. Activists said they plan a direct mailing campaign throughout the summer and fall."

Critics Say Petitions To FDA Delay Approval Of Generic Drugs. Lawmakers are taking a close look at an FDA procedure designed to alert the agency to scientific and safety issues, amid concerns that it may getting subverted by the brand-name drug industry. A front page story in the Washington Post (7/3, A1, Kaufman) reports that leaders in the generic drug industry and some at the FDA "complain that 'citizen petitions' -- requests for agency action that any individual, group or company can file -- are being misused by brand-name drugmakers to stave off generic competition." They say the filing of a petition "triggers another round of time-consuming and often redundant reviews of the generics by the FDA, which can take months or years. In the process, consumers continue to pay millions of dollars more for the brand-name drugs." The Post adds, "Statistics collected by the staff of Sen. Debbie Stabenow (D-Mich.), who has introduced legislation with Sen. Trent Lott (R-Miss.) that would rein in industry-filed citizen petitions, show that 20 of the 21 brand-name petitions settled by the FDA since 2003 were ultimately rejected."

Weather Delays Space Shuttle Launch For Second Day In A Row. For the second day in a row Sunday, the launch of the space shuttle Discovery was postponed due to stormy weather. The AP (7/3, Dunn) reports, "Launch officials said they would try again Tuesday, on the Fourth of July, after giving the work force some rest and a chance to replenish the shuttle's on-board fuel. The weather was expected to improve by Tuesday, although rain was still in the forecast."

ABC World News Tonight (7/2, story 2, 2:15, Stark) reported, "NASA will use the next 48 hours to replenish fuel cells on Discovery in the hopes of having enough energy on board for a third spacewalk. And they'll also need to replenish some of the experiments planned for orbit, including thousands of fruit flies which have a short lifespan. A scrub also means NASA once again has to drain 500,000 gallons of fuel out of the tank. But Tuesday's forecast is better -- a 60% chance of favorable weather."

Astronauts May Have To Perform In-Flight Repairs To Shuttle Tiles. The CBS Evening News (7/2, story 5, 2:25, Cobiella) added, "Since the Columbia disaster when a piece of foam broke away and dealt a fatal blow to the shuttle's wing, astronauts have had to take on the job of in-space repairman. NASA has removed 35 pounds of foam from Discovery's external fuel tank, but it's still far from perfect. … NASA has said that minor damage is unavoidable and putting an astronaut so close to the delicate tiles on the shuttle's wings and underbelly carries its own risk, and all of NASA's in-flight fixes for these fragile tiles are still experimental. So if this Discovery crew were to perform another choreographed repair 230 miles above the Earth, it wouldn't know whether it was a success until they were safely back down."

Academic Bill Of Rights Taking Hold In Many States. The Washington Times (7/3, Richardson) reports that three years after conservative activist David Horowitz began promoting his Academic Bill of Rights in Colorado, the manifesto, which says students should be graded and faculty should be hired without regard to political or religious beliefs, has been introduced in 18 states. Meanwhile, "Students for Academic Freedom, the campus watchdog group founded by Mr. Horowitz, has established chapters on more than 150 campuses. Student governments at a dozen universities have approved resolutions supporting the Academic Bill of Rights. In April, Princeton University became the first institution of higher learning to pass a version of the Student Bill of Rights by a vote of the entire student body, surprising even Mr. Horowitz, who had no hand in the election." However the Times notes that for all Horowitz's success in raising the issue, "no state has actually approved an academic freedom bill, despite the flurry of hearings and committee votes."

Lawmakers Say Spot On Colbert Show Raised Profiles With Constituents. The Washington Times (7/3, Bellantoni) reports that members of Congress who

DOJ_NMG_0038275

appear on segment of Comedy Central's "The Colbert Report" known as "Better Know a District" usually "end up looking silly. But several lawmakers said doing the spoof spot…actually has raised their profiles back home, particularly among young folks." GOP Rep. Phil Gingrey "said there was an unexpected byproduct of doing the show -- attention from young constituents and House staffers. Rep. Earl Blumenauer of Oregon had a similar experience when his 3rd District was profiled in May. … But Rep. Barney Frank, Massachusetts Democrat, regrets his appearance and called Mr. Colbert a 'third-rate' comedian." Colbert "so far has targeted 25 members in the 435-member House, splicing and dicing sometimes two-hour-long camera sessions into five-minute clips."

Pelosi Recommends Lawmakers Not Participate In Colbert Spoof. Roll Call (7/3, Akers) reports in its "Heard on the Hill" column that House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi was asked about the segment during her press conference last Thursday. Pelosi said, "Well, it is humorous; I wouldn't recommend that anyone go on the show. I would think it would be okay to go on if you were live to tape, but don't subject yourself to a comic's edit unless you want to be made a fool of."

House, Senate Clash Over Proposal For Walkway On Capitol's East Front. The Washington Post (7/3, A19, Kamen) reports in its "In the Loop" column that the biggest fight between the House and Senate "may have occurred last week over a House proposal to build a fenced walkway that would run across the now-closed east front of the Capitol -- the area where the long-delayed Capitol Visitor Center is being built. … Senate detractors say this proposal is exceptionally stupid, even for Congress. … The Upper Chamber folks rather uncharitably say the mysterious fence dips to only four feet high so Hastert and House members can walk down the steps and have their pictures taken with constituents." A House aide "said these things are being overblown."

Former DHS Official Says FEMA Director Should Be Allowed To Focus On Disaster Response. Adm. James Loy, former commandant of the US Coast Guard and former deputy secretary of Homeland Security, in an op-ed in the Washington Times (7/3) writes that following "a time-honored pattern," Congress' "impulsive first response" following Hurricane Katrina may be "followed by years of 'perfecting' the original legislation." Loy continues that none of the pending bills that address FEMA's position within DHS "address the central problem: The Homeland Security Act of 2002 diluted the FEMA director's focus on the agency's core mission -- response and recovery -- by requiring him to wear an additional hat as the DHS under-secretary for emergency preparedness and response (later changed to the under-secretary for federal emergency management)." As adjustments are made to the original legislation to fix FEMA, Loy says "we should ensure that the FEMA director can focus all of his time, energy and talent on guiding the agency in responding effectively and efficiently to the American people in the event of a disaster. That is best accomplished by restoring FEMA's independent agency status, offloading the director's responsibilities of being double-hatted as an under secretary and keeping the agency and the director inside DHS with direct access to the secretary during a crisis."

Carter Says FOIA Should Be Amended To Keep Pace With International Standards. Former President Jimmy Carter writes in the Washington Post (7/3, A21), "Our government leaders have become increasingly obsessed with secrecy. Obstructionist policies and deficient practices have ensured that many important public documents and official actions remain hidden from our view." Carter adds, "In the United States, we must seek amendments to FOIA to be more in line with emerging international standards, such as covering all branches of government; providing an oversight body to monitor compliance; including sanctions for failure to adhere to the law; and establishing an appeal mechanism that is easy to access, speedy and affordable. We cannot take freedom of information for granted. Our democracy depends on it."

Thornburgh Says Media Shield Law Must Be Carefully Crafted. Former Attorney General Richard Thornburgh writes in the Wall Street Journal (7/3), "Ever since then-New York Times reporter Judith Miller went to jail for 85 days last year rather than comply with a subpoena for her sources in the Valerie Plame case, the media has been pushing for a federal shield that would grant reporters unprecedented special protection from revealing sources during litigation. The Senate is now taking steps toward providing such a reporter-source privilege with the Free Flow of Information Act, which is likely to be sent to the floor for a vote over the next few weeks." Thornburgh notes that for the long term, "the bill has troubling implications. In its current form it contains a shield so broad -- and a definition of journalism so vague -- that it upends what up to now has been a reasonable balance between protecting reporters from disclosing sources and preserving the right to the fullest possible access to truth in the courtroom for plaintiffs and defendants." Thornburgh concludes by noting that "given the potential for abuse of that critical role, any media shield must, in the interests of justice, be carefully crafted."

DOJ_NMG_0038276

Schwarzenegger's Conservative Former Aide Reverses Support For Term Limits. Rob Stutzman, former deputy chief of staff for communications for Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger, writes in the Los Angeles Times (7/3), "About 20 years ago, the notion of term limits for officeholders became dogma for the center-right. … Fourteen years have passed since California voters approved legislative term limits, restricting Assembly members to a trio of two-year terms and state senators to two four-year stints. I have always been a loyal conservative supporter of term limits…as a suitably blunt instrument to correct the arrogance of elected officials not mindful enough of those who elected them. … But after 16 years of working in California politics, I've changed my mind. We were wrong. Term limits haven't delivered what we hoped for. They have, in fact, harmed the public interest." It is "high time to admit that term limits haven't worked."

New Republic Says Baucus Should Be Dropped From Finance Panel. The New Republic (7/10) says in its lead editorial that Democratic Rep. Max Baucus uses "his influence as the top Democrat on the Finance Committee to systematically undercut his party and enable George W. Bush's most egregious domestic legislation. So why does his party entrust him with so much responsibility?" Indeed, the Democrats' "only real victory of the last five years -- stuffing the administration on Social Security -- came after Harry Reid cautioned Baucus against freelancing with the White House. Well, we'll do Reid one better and suggest he boot Baucus from the Finance Committee altogether."

Author Says US Is Better At Educating Girls. Author Christina Hoff Somers writes in the Wall Street Journal (7/3) that in a report from Education Sector, a new Washington think tank, policy analyst Sara Mead, "denies that American boys are in trouble academically." Mead "hopes that the nation can have a reasonable 'conversation' about gender issues 'without unfairly undermining the gains girls have made in recent decades.'" Somers adds, "One looks in vain in Ms. Mead's report for any indication that anyone is undermining girls. She seems to think that concern for boys means shortchanging girls. But it does not -- because education is not a zero sum game." Somers adds, "We are strikingly better at educating young women than young men. Boys need our attention. It is difficult to understand why an organization devoted to improving education should regard the current concern for boys as a threat to girls' progress."

Author Says "Boy Crisis" Is "Little More Than A Myth." Author Judith Warner writes in the New York Times (7/3) that the Education Sector study confirms that the "near-ubiquitous belief that our nation's boys are being academically neglected and emotionally persecuted by teachers whose training, style and temperament favor girls" is "little more than a myth." Warner adds, "Talk of the boy crisis is a diversion. It draws attention from the real reasons so many white suburban parents sense that their sons are in trouble. Those reasons aren't academic; they're behavioral and emotional."

Mallaby Calls Concept Of Energy Independence "Pipe Dream." Sebastian Mallaby writes in the Washington Post (7/3, A21), "This month's Group of Eight summit in Russia takes statecraft to a whole new level. Global leaders have 'energy security' on the agenda. But judging by what they say and do, they don't always understand the subject. … As Daniel Yergin has written recently in Foreign Affairs, real energy security requires setting aside the pipe dream of energy independence and embracing interdependence." Mallaby adds, "If the G-8 summit can spread the word about this interdependence, it will do some good. But the nationalistic conception of energy security is worse than useless. By encouraging a competitive scramble for resources that could spiral into conflict, this sort of security talk only creates insecurity."

Herbert Makes Case For Minimum Wage Increase. Bob Herbert writes in the New York Times (7/3), "The federal minimum wage, currently $5.15 an hour, was last raised in 1997. Since then, its purchasing power has deteriorated by 20 percent. Analysts at the Economic Policy Institute and the Center on Budget and Policy Priorities jointly crunched the numbers and determined that, after adjusting for inflation, the value of the minimum wage is at its lowest level since 1955." Herbert adds, "Polls have shown that Americans overwhelmingly favor an increase in the minimum wage. But the low-income workers who would benefit from such an increase are not part of the natural G.O.P. constituency. Thus, the stonewall. … There is no justification — none — for condemning the nation's lowest-paid workers to this continuing slide into ever deeper economic distress."

Pastor Says Americans Need Formal Day Of Rest. Henry G. Brinton, pastor of Fairfax Presbyterian Church in Virginia, writes in USA Today (7/3) reports, "For all the attention paid this past year to public displays of the Ten Commandments, you'd think people would spend as much energy trying to follow them. When it comes to the Fourth Commandment -- 'Remember the Sabbath Day' -- that's not the case. … The problem with ignoring the Sabbath is that it hurts us as individuals, families and communities." Brinton adds, "We need a formal day of rest. A true Sabbath gives us time to refresh and renew ourselves, regain proper perspective and redirect our lives to what is good and true and worthwhile. … We can learn from men and women in the European Union, who work hard but still enjoy an average of five weeks of paid vacation per year. They often remark that they don't 'live to work,' as we do — instead, they 'work to live.'"

DOJ_NMG_0038277

NYTimes Says Congress Should Intervene To Clarify Clean Water Act. The New York Times (7/3) editorializes, "Senator James Inhofe, a conservative Republican from Oklahoma, and Senator Lincoln Chaffee, a liberal Republican from Rhode Island, are at opposite ends of the earth on environmental issues. But both found themselves equally mystified by the recent Supreme Court decision on the Clean Water Act. The decision did nothing to clarify which waters were protected under the act and which were not. Both agreed that only Congress can end the confusion. Both are right. Without Congressional intervention, the certain outcome is endless litigation and a steady decline of the nation's streams and wetlands."

WPost Sees Promise In Ruling On Vermont Campaign Finance Laws. An editorial in the Washington Post (7/3, A20) says the Supreme Court's decision last week striking down Vermont's campaign finance laws "may prove more silver lining than cloud. The Vermont rules never stood much of a chance; they are so strict as to present genuine problems. The important feature of the case is not its specific result but the way the court -- and its two newest justices -- reached that result. On this point, the decision is promising." Despite "an opportunity to declare themselves hostile to campaign finance regulation in general, both signed on -- Justice Alito somewhat equivocally -- to the court's long-standing doctrine that appropriately crafted contribution limits can survive constitutional scrutiny. This is a far more significant development than the fate of Vermont's statute. It suggests that, notwithstanding the turnover in the court's personnel, a revolution in campaign finance law may not be in the offing."

NYTimes Says US Must Improve Science Education. The New York Times (7/3) editorializes that the US must do something about the "horrendous state of science education at both the public school and university levels." The Howard Hughes Medical Institute has "awarded grants to 50 universities aimed at providing richer undergraduate science education as well as mentoring and early research experiences with working scientists. Many of the grants will be used partly to advertise the virtues of scientific study not just at universities but also in high schools and middle schools. These programs send a powerful message at a time when the country needs to be paying attention to remaking science education. Congress, which has been casting for ways to address this problem, would do well to emulate them."

WPost Says Maryland Governor's Race Should Be "Hard-Hitting, Substantive Campaign." An editorial in the Washington Post (7/3, A20) says Maryland Gov. Robert Ehrlich "has spent four years compiling a so-so record. He has diminished a handful of modest victories and sensible policies by displaying a tin ear for political ethics and a pointlessly petulant style of governance that has compounded the partisan venom in Annapolis." Those qualities "may help explain why Mr. Ehrlich… begins his campaign for reelection so far behind his Democratic rival, Baltimore Mayor Martin O'Malley." The Post adds, "Wouldn't it be nice if the campaign looked and sounded like a contest of ideas between two grown-ups, and not a locker-room smack-down. That will be the real test of both candidates -- whether they have the capacity to wage a hard-hitting, substantive, mature campaign that is about Maryland and Marylanders, not just about Bob Ehrlich and Martin O'Malley."

Personnel News. Roll Call (7/3, Ackley) reports in its "K Street Files" column, "Carolyn Doyle, a former aide to Sen. Arlen Specter (R-Pa.), has left her position as senior federal affairs representative at the MWW Group. … Karen Reidy, most recently with the former MCI, has joined the telecom trade association COMPTEL as its vice president for regulatory affairs. … Cable giant Comcast Corp. has picked up a new lobbyist. Peter Filon comes to the company as senior director, federal government affairs, from the House Energy and Commerce Committee, where he has served as minority counsel. PR power-shop Qorvis Communications has signed Jim McGann as managing director. … The US Tuna Foundation has a new president. Anne Forristall comes to the fishy lobby from MGN Inc., where she advised a range of clients on legislative strategy. Lisa McGreevey is joining the hedge fund industry's primary trade group, the Managed Funds Association, as executive vice president and chief operating officer. … The public policy and law group at Dickstein Shapiro has added Brian Finch as counsel. … Benjamin McKay has been promoted to senior vice president of federal government relations at the Property Casualty Insurers Association of America. Trading one heavy-hitting Wall Street CEO for another, the Financial Services Roundtable has named Citigroup chief Charles O. Prince to replace newly confirmed Treasury Secretary Henry Paulson as chairman of the group."

The Washington Post (7/3, C1, Kurtz) reports that Jonathan Wald, who was fired as executive producer of the Today show, and Josh Howard, who was forced to resign as executive producer of 60 Minutes II, have "landed at CNBC, where they are helping to retool programming on a business channel that has struggled in the ratings since the dot-com bust six years ago."

DOJ_NMG_0038278

EDITORIAL WRAP-UP:

New York Times: "Crisis Postponed At The U.N." An editorial in the New York Times (7/3) says the UN "steered clear of a financial shipwreck last week, but it also steered clear of approving urgently needed management reforms. That is a standoff, not a solution. If the less-developed countries blocking those reforms continue to dig in, the United Nations will suffer in diminished public credibility and greater resistance to dues-paying by some of the largest contributor nations, including the United States." The UN "cannot function effectively in the 21st century under budget and management rules that were originally devised for a much smaller organization. Successive embarrassments like the oil-for-food scandal should have made that painfully clear."

"Protecting All Waters." The New York Times (7/3) editorializes, "Senator James Inhofe, a conservative Republican from Oklahoma, and Senator Lincoln Chaffee, a liberal Republican from Rhode Island, are at opposite ends of the earth on environmental issues. But both found themselves equally mystified by the recent Supreme Court decision on the Clean Water Act. The decision did nothing to clarify which waters were protected under the act and which were not. Both agreed that only Congress can end the confusion. Both are right. Without Congressional intervention, the certain outcome is endless litigation and a steady decline of the nation's streams and wetlands."

"How To Educate Young Scientists." The New York Times (7/3) editorializes that the US must do something about the "horrendous state of science education at both the public school and university levels." The Howard Hughes Medical Institute has "awarded grants to 50 universities aimed at providing richer undergraduate science education as well as mentoring and early research experiences with working scientists. Many of the grants will be used partly to advertise the virtues of scientific study not just at universities but also in high schools and middle schools. These programs send a powerful message at a time when the country needs to be paying attention to remaking science education. Congress, which has been casting for ways to address this problem, would do well to emulate them."

Washington Post: "Campaign Finance Bellwether." An editorial in the Washington Post (7/3, A20) says the Supreme Court's decision last week striking down Vermont's campaign finance laws "may prove more silver lining than cloud. The Vermont rules never stood much of a chance; they are so strict as to present genuine problems. The important feature of the case is not its specific result but the way the court -- and its two newest justices -- reached that result. On this point, the decision is promising." Despite "an opportunity to declare themselves hostile to campaign finance regulation in general, both signed on -- Justice Alito somewhat equivocally -- to the court's long-standing doctrine that appropriately crafted contribution limits can survive constitutional scrutiny. This is a far more significant development than the fate of Vermont's statute. It suggests that, notwithstanding the turnover in the court's personnel, a revolution in campaign finance law may not be in the offing."

"Flagging Rhetoric." An editorial in the Washington Post (7/3, A20) says the recent Senate debate over a flag burning amendment "managed to bring out some of the worst in politicians of both parties. … If there is a hero in this episode, it is the man who would succeed Mr. Frist as leader, Majority Whip Mitch McConnell (R-Ky.). Mr. McConnell could have put the amendment over the top by abandoning his opposition. To his credit, he didn't, and he was joined by two other Republicans, Sens. Lincoln D. Chafee (R.I.) and Robert F. Bennett (Utah). As Mr. McConnell explained in a column posted on his Senate Web site, 'No act of speech is so obnoxious that it merits tampering with our First Amendment. Our Constitution, and our country, is stronger than that.'"

"Mr. Ehrlich In The Ring." An editorial in the Washington Post (7/3, A20) says Maryland Gov. Robert Ehrlich "has spent four years compiling a so-so record. He has diminished a handful of modest victories and sensible policies by displaying a tin ear for political ethics and a pointlessly petulant style of governance that has compounded the partisan venom in Annapolis." Those qualities "may help explain why Mr. Ehrlich… begins his campaign for reelection so far behind his Democratic rival, Baltimore Mayor Martin O'Malley." The Post adds, "Wouldn't it be nice if the campaign looked and sounded like a contest of ideas between two grown-ups, and not a locker-room smack-down. That will be the real test of both candidates -- whether they have the capacity to wage a hard-hitting, substantive, mature campaign that is about Maryland and Marylanders, not just about Bob Ehrlich and Martin O'Malley."

Wall Street Journal: "After Hamdan." The Wall Street Journal (7/3) editorializes, "The Court's opinion masks its own power grab by asserting that the executive must defer more to Congress in designing military commissions." But "the Court's own deference to Congress is selective in the extreme, as it simply chose to ignore the clear intent of the Detainee Treatment Act that Congress passed only last December." The Journal adds, "We…certainly hope the Administration presses its case for military commissions to the Congress, including just how much due process protection the Members think al Qaeda detainees really deserve. An election is coming in which the prosecution of the war on terror will again be a major issue. By all means let's debate the proper care and handling of Osama's bodyguard."

DOJ_NMG_0038279

"A Somali Taliban?" An editorial in the Wall Street Journal (7/3) says, "There's no appetite in the US for a large military intervention in Somalia, but that doesn't mean the new regime should think it is immune from outside attention. So here's a suggestion: Send an emissary to the new Islamist government and propose a deal: Hand over the 1998 embassy bombers, refuse safe harbor to al Qaeda operatives, do not invade Somaliland and Puntland. Agree to that, and we will be able to get along. Don't agree, and the US will do what it must to disrupt any terrorist camps or terrorist activity within its borders. … The Somali Islamists need to understand that if they attempt to turn their country into another refuge for terrorists, it will end as badly for them as it did for the Taliban."

Los Angeles Times: "House Of (Immigration) Blues." The Los Angeles Times (7/3) editorializes, "Last week saw the first narrowing of the chasm between the Senate's recent comprehensive immigration bill and the House of Representatives' punitive enforcement-only package from December. Trouble is, the overtures are all going in the House's direction. … Pro-reform senators are making two classic negotiating mistakes: confusing their opponents' line-in-the-sand intransigence with a negotiating ploy, and elevating the importance of making a deal above its actual content."

"United On Clean L.A. Ports."

"Taming The Tamil Tigers." The Los Angeles Times (7/3) editorializes, "Since April, Sri Lanka has experienced rising violence between the government and the Tamil Tigers rebel group, effectively gutting a 4-year-old cease-fire. But amid the carnage, leaders of both sides have been making unexpected conciliatory gestures, spurring hope that with the help of international monitors, full-scale war can be avoided. … A peaceful Sri Lanka is very much in India's interest; war could bring a stream of refugees and instability to India, particularly in the state of Tamil Nadu. India should start to take a more active role, while the EU must work for a return to the bargaining table. It isn't too late to head off a full-scale war."

THE BIG PICTURE:

Headlines From Today's Front Pages.

Los Angeles Times:
"Confusion Grips Mexico Election."
"Happy? Let's Sum It Up."
"Congress Faces Dilemma On Terror Trials."
"In First Year, L.A.'s Mayor Finds His Inner Pragmatist."
"With The Right Spin, Any Film Can Be No. 1."
"Iraqis Go To Great Lengths To Get Away."

USA Today:
"How Americans See Americans."
"U.S. Elite Forces Face Shortfall."
"Some Spots Too Dry For Fireworks."

New York Times:
"Israel Steps Up Gaza Raids In Bid To Free Soldier."
"Internet Calling Pressures Bells To Lower Prices."
"A Terror Strike, Choreographed On A Computer."
"A New Partnership Binds Old Republican Rivals."
"Once Again, The Boss Is In At The New York Office."
"Marijuana Fight Envelops Wharf In San Francisco."

Washington Post:
"Record Crowds Flock To Vote Across Mexico."
"Growers Reap Benefits Even In Good Years."
"Episcopal Protest Of Top Bishop Increases."
"Petitions To FDA Delay Generic Drugs, Critics Say."
"Mongolians Meld Old, New In Making Arlington Home."

Washington Times:
"Mexico Election Too Close To Call."
"Senators Promise Gitmo Statute."
"Academic Manifesto Takes Root."
"Iran Plans To Cut Gas Imports, Subsidies."
"A Penny Saved Is A Penny Spurned."
"Illegal Students Face Expulsion From France."
"Representatives Relish Being Made A Mockery."

Detroit Free Press:
"Zetsche Steps Out Front At DCX."
"Schools Ties Bonuses To Test Scores."
"Kalamazoo Is Drug-Testing Hub For Pfizer."

Atlanta Journal-Constitution:
"Fulton Jail Is Slow To Let Go."
"'Always Remember.'"
"Austin Pleads Guilty To 'Mistake.'"
"Turner Studios In Midtown Undo Shoestring Image."

Houston Chronicle:
"Too Close To Call In Mexico."
"Troubling Figures Put Focus On Sunnyside."

Story Lineup From Last Night's Network News:
ABC: Iraq's Most Wanted; Shuttle Launch Scrubbed; Israel-Gaza Offensive; Mexico-Presidential Election; FBI-West Virginia Congressman; Death Penalty Anniversary; Alzheimer's-Art Therapy; National Anthem-Singing Project.
CBS: Israel-Gaza Offensive; Iraq Violence; Iraq's Most Wanted; Conservatives-Press Concerns; Discovery-Repair Concerns; Mexican Scholarship Program; World Cup; New Jersey-Government Shutdown; Weekend Box Office; Bush's 60th Birthday.
NBC: Preempted By Golf.

DOJ_NMG_0038280

Story Lineup From This Morning's Radio News Broadcasts:

ABC: Space Shuttle Launch Delayed; Mexico-Election; Israel-Kidnapped Soldier; IN-Car Accident.

NPR: Mexico-Election; Israel-Kidnapped Soldier; UN-Human Rights Reforms; Space Shuttle Launch Delayed; IN-Car Accident; Iraq-Most Wanted List; World Cup; Foreign Stock Markets.

WASHINGTON'S SCHEDULE:

Today's Events In Washington.

White House:

PRESIDENT BUSH — Signs H.R. 5403, the Safe and Timely Interstate Placement of Foster Children Act of 2006. Roosevelt Room, The White House. Photo Release.

VICE PRESIDENT CHENEY — No public schedule.

US Senate: No scheduled events.

US House: No scheduled events.

Other: ELECTIONS-LATINOS _ 9:30 a.m. The Latino Policy Coalition and Lake Research Partners hold a teleconference to release the results of a national survey of Latino voters and discuss the midterm elections. With Jim Gonzalez, chair, Latino Policy Coalition; Celinda Lake, president, Lake Research Partners; and Dr. Fernando Guerra, director, Leavey Center for the Study of Los Angeles. Contacts: Michael Bustamante, 916-425-0839. Notes: Dial-in: 1-866-216-6835. Passcode: 116692.

NY TIMES-PROTEST _ 12 p.m. The D.C. Chapter of FreeRepublic.com and Accuracy in Media hold a demonstration to call for the prosecution of New York Times publisher Arthur Sulzberger, Jr., Executive Editor Bill Keller and reporters James Risen and Eric Lichtblau for "giving aid and comfort to al Qaeda by publishing stories exposing national security intelligence programs." Location: In front of 1627 "Eye" St. NW.

GRANNY PEACE BRIGADE _ 2 p.m. The Granny Peace Brigade, 18 grandmothers protesting the war in Iraq, hold a rally and march to mark the end of their journey from New York City. Highlights: 2 p.m. Marchers will be joined by war protester Cindy Sheehan, at Dupont Circle. Sheehan will escort the marchers down Massachusetts Avenue to the Gandhi statue at Massachusetts Ave. and Q Sts, NW, in front of the Indian Embassy. Location: Gandhi Statue, corner of Q St NW and Massachusetts.

Copyright 2006 by the Bulletin News Network, Inc. Reproduction without permission prohibited. Editorial content is drawn from thousands of newspapers, national magazines, national and local television programs, and radio broadcasts. The Attorney General's News Briefing is published five days a week for the Office of Public Affairs by BulletinNews, which creates custom news briefings for government and corporate leaders and also publishes the White House Bulletin, Frontrunner and Washington Morning Update. We can be found on the Web at BulletinNews.com, or called at (703) 749-0040.

DOJ_NMG_0038281

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL'S NEWS BRIEFING

PREPARED FOR THE OFFICE OF PUBLIC AFFAIRS, U.S. DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE

TO: THE ATTORNEY GENERAL AND SENIOR STAFF

DATE: MONDAY, JULY 3, 2006 7:45 AM EDT

TODAY'S EDITION

Terrorism News:

Senators Predict Congress Will Establish Military Commissions For Detainees Soon 2
GOP Intensifies Criticism Of Media Over Anti-Terrorism Program Leaks 5
Document Outlines Bali Bombers' Final Hours....5
WSJournal Says Islamists Should Not Turn Somalia Into Refuge For Terrorists....5

Homeland Response:

L.A. Police Chief, Others, To Press Homeland Security For Greater Sharing Of Intelligence 6

War News:

Sunni Lawmakers Boycott Iraqi Parliament....6
Iraqi Government Publishes "Most Wanted List."....6
Violence Continues In Iraq 7
Further Details Of Alleged Iraq Rape Surface 7
Senate Intelligence Committee "Statements" Investigation Stalled....7
Bush Seen As Uninterested In Seeking Democratic Support For Iraq Policy....7
Raid Reveals Tensions Between US Forces, Afghan Government....7
US Military Faces Shortfall In Special Forces Troops 8
Pentagon Officers Said To Be Resisting Rumsfeld, Cheney On Iran Bombing Plans....8

DOJ:

Kennedy Emerges As Swing Vote On High Court....8
GOP To Focus On Judicial Confirmations 9

Corporate Scandals:

Impact Of US Abramoff Probe Into Ex-Guam Governor Remains Unclear....9
Tenet CEO Faces Challenge Of Moving On After Settlement With DOJ 10
Austin Banker Nearing Victory In S&L Case 10
BP Traders Lost $10 Million, Court Documents Show 10
Bermuda Unit Said To Be At Center Of Refco Collapse 11
SEC Sues To End German Bond Investment Scheme....11

Criminal Law:

DOJ Issues New Subpoena For Jefferson Emails....11
Indictment Seen As Wild Card In Ney's Electoral Chances 11
Government Corruption Cases Persist In Connecticut....11
Missouri Supreme Court Ruling Alters Rules For Sex Offenders....12
Irving, Texas, Police May Be Chastised Over Amber Alert....12
ABC News Poll Finds 65% Favor Death Penalty For Murder .12

Civil Rights:

Hollywood, Florida, May Seek More Time In Religious Discrimination Lawsuit....12
La Tuna Federal Prison Inmates Claim Rights Violations....12
Texas Redistricting Verdict Could Result In "Ripple Effect." ..13
Hitchens Says Congress Should Not "Waste" More Time On Flag Amendment....13

Antitrust:

US Investigating Kosher Slaughterhouses For Possible Antitrust Violations....13
Second Quarter Merger Activity Was Prolific 13
Despite Consolidation, Growth Opportunities Elusive For Commercial Satellite Industry....13

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

FBI Agent Came Close To Linking Cole, 9/11 Plots....14
Post-9/11 Criticism, Private Sector Pay Driving Senior Officials From FBI 14

Blagojevich Says He Acted To Identify, Punish Hiring Misconduct 14
Longtime Scarpa Girlfriend Emerges As Key Witness Against DeVecchio 15
FBI Investigating West Virginia's "Prince Of Pork." 15
Illinois Man Pleads Guilty To Hoax Terror Threat 15

Immigration:

Sensenbrenner Suggests Voters Would Punish GOP If Senate Bill Enacted 15

Congress-Administration:

Bush To Name Connaughton To Lead Maritime Administration 16
Coburn Plan Seeks To Inform Public On Government Spending 16
USDA Program Benefits Farmers Even In Good Years 17
Feingold, Obama Pushing Senate To Adopt Ethics Reforms As Rules Change 17
Bush's Fitness Seen As Remarkable As He Turns 60 17
Professor Questions Whether MBA Has Made Bush Better President 17
Bush, McCain Rapprochement Seen As Based On Pragmatic Considerations 18

Other News:

Emanuel, Dean At Odds Over Party Strategy 18
GOP Sees Chance To Increase House Majority 18
GOP Pressing "Suburban Agenda." 19
Conservative Republicans Now Opposing 527 Reform 19
Mormon, Muslim Presidential Candidates Face Voter Uneasiness 19
New Jersey Budget Impasse Could Shutter Casinos, Close Beaches 20
Virginia Gay Marriage Ban Spurs Fundraising Boom 20
Critics Say Petitions To FDA Delay Approval Of Generic Drugs 20
Weather Delays Space Shuttle Launch For Second Day In A Row 20
Academic Bill Of Rights Taking Hold In Many States 21
Lawmakers Say Spot On Colbert Show Raised Profiles With Constituents 21
House, Senate Clash Over Proposal For Walkway On Capitol's East Front 21
Former DHS Official Says FEMA Director Should Be Allowed To Focus On Disaster Response 21
Carter Says FOIA Should Be Amended To Keep Pace With International Standards 22
Thornburgh Says Media Shield Law Must Be Carefully Crafted 22
Schwarzenegger's Conservative Former Aide Reverses Support For Term Limits 22
New Republic Says Baucus Should Be Dropped From Finance Panel 22
Author Says US Is Better At Educating Girls 22
Mallaby Calls Concept Of Energy Independence "Pipe Dream." 23
Herbert Makes Case For Minimum Wage Increase 23
Pastor Says Americans Need Formal Day Of Rest 23
NYTimes Says Congress Should Intervene To Clarify Clean Water Act 23
WPost Sees Promise In Ruling On Vermont Campaign Finance Laws 23
NYTimes Says US Must Improve Science Education 24
WPost Says Maryland Governor's Race Should Be "Hard-Hitting, Substantive Campaign." 24
Personnel News 24

Editorial Wrap-Up:

New York Times: 24
Washington Post: 25
Wall Street Journal: 25
Los Angeles Times: 26

The Big Picture:

Headlines From Today's Front Pages 26

Washington's Schedule:

Today's Events In Washington 27

TERRORISM NEWS:

Senators Predict Congress Will Establish Military Commissions For Detainees Soon.

The Financial Times (7/3, Alden) reports, "The US Congress looks set to co-operate with President George W. Bush in devising rules for military commissions to try alleged terrorist detainees. This follows last week's historic Supreme Court decision that struck down the president's claim that he could set the rules on his own authority." US lawmakers' reaction to the ruling dominated the Sunday political shows. GOP Sen. Arlen Specter, appearing on CBS's Face the Nation (7/2, Schieffer), said, "The Judiciary Committee had hearings on Guantanamo last June. And I made a trip there, and it's been apparent to us for some time that the Supreme Court was going to impose some restrictions. And we had legislation ready to go. And I think that we should now have hearings in the Judiciary Committee, which we've scheduled for July 11th." M The Washington Times (7/3, Pfeiffer) notes Sen. Carl Levin, Michigan Democrat, "told CBS that his panel will 'have hearings in a couple of weeks.'"

DOJ_NMG_0038283

Sen. Lindsey Graham, also a Republican, on Fox News Sunday (7/2, Wallace) said, "I think what we will do this month, I hope, is to get some input from the great legal minds of our time, particularly military lawyers, retired and active duty military judge advocates. … And I would hope Congress would have hearings about what to do in light of this decision and that we will sit down together…in August, write legislation and hopefully vote by September."

The New York Times (7/3, Toner) "both parties were treading carefully in a political and legislative terrain suddenly reconfigured by the Supreme Court. Most leaders on Sunday pledged bipartisan cooperation, but some fault lines were clear." Democratic Sen. Charles E. Schumer "said on 'Meet the Press' on NBC that 'this White House has felt it could just change things unilaterally.' Mr. Schumer added, 'Had they come to Congress a few years ago on this issue, my guess is they would have gotten most of what they wanted.'" But "in light of the court ruling, Mr. Schumer called on Attorney General Alberto R. Gonzales to create an independent commission to conduct 'a top-to-bottom legal review of all of the administration's ongoing antiterror measures.'" USA Today (7/3) reports "senior Democrats called for a broader review of whether Bush overstepped his war powers," and notes Schumer's comments.

On ABC's This Week (7/2, Stephanopoulos), Democratic Sen. Dianne Feinstein said, "This is the time for the Congress to come together, both political parties, and we can do this, and the President, and work out the parameters of whether it is a special authorized commission, whether it is a military tribunal. But that gives the detainees the rights that the Constitution provides, and this is our strength. It is not our weakness." And Democratic Sen. Jack Reed, on Fox News Sunday (7/2, Wallace), said, "The President declared that he essentially was operating in his own capacity as commander in chief, and I think the court reined him back, and I think it's appropriate. … What it insists is that the President come to the Congress and in a deliberate fashion and a democratic fashion we give him the authority that he needs."

In an analysis piece, the Los Angeles Times (6/3, Schmitt) says the ruling "has apparently presented the Bush administration and its allies in Congress with two choices -- both fraught with risk. They can use the GOP majorities in the House and Senate to put a quick congressional seal of approval on something close to the existing system, but run the risk that it too will be struck down by the high court." Or "they can follow the path suggested by the court and devise a system embracing the procedural and other principles of the U.S. Uniform Code of Military Justice and the Geneva Convention, but risk the possibility that few, if any, of the alleged terrorists will be convicted." And "both choices, as well as attempts to chart a middle course, could set off the kind of protracted, internally divisive debate that the White House and GOP political strategists would not relish with the November elections approaching."

McCain Contends "All Of Us" Would Like To See Guantanamo Shut Down. Sen. John McCain, on ABC's This Week (7/2, Stephanopoulos), said, "All of us and the president has said he'd like to see Guantanamo shut down, but it's not Guantanamo itself, it's the status of these detainees. And I believe that if we use the Supreme Court decision correctly, we will move forward and adjudicate these cases."

Experts Offer Tips On Complying With Court Ruling On Guantanamo Tribunals. Time (7/10, Thornburgh) reports that the Supreme Court's ruling in Hamdan v. Rumsfeld says that if the Bush Administration wants to hold special military tribunals to try terrorism suspects at Guantnamo Bay, "it can't just declare them legal -- it needs to work with the other branches of government to make them so." Time notes that while the ruling was a "rebuke to the Administration's claim that it alone can decide how to defend Americans from terrorism," the High Court did not say "Guantnamo has to be closed. In fact, there are plenty of people who believe it's possible to comply with the court's ruling while protecting American citizens and extracting useful intelligence from detainees." Time lists several ways the Administration can fix Guantanamo, including working with Congress, repatriating the "small fish," who have been determined not to have committed any hostile act against Americans or their allies, processing the habeas corpus cases, living by the Geneva rules and lifting the "veil of secrecy" over the prison.

DOJ_NMG_0038284

Bush, GOP Seen As Likely To Utilize Hamdan Decision As Campaign Issue. The Washington Post's Dana Milbank, on The Chris Matthews Show (7/2, Matthews) said, "Bush will be celebrating Hamdan the way the Muslims celebrate Ramadan. … Now he can campaign against the Supreme Court, they can put legislation before the congress that gives him exactly what he wants, force the democrats to vote against them and say 'those guys want to release all the terrorists.' It's going to be the 2002 and 2004 campaign all over again." Later in the program Milbank added, "It's Max Cleland all over again. You need one issue, one sort of wedge, and…this is exactly what the president wants."

The Weekly Standard's Bill Kristol, on Fox News Sunday (7/2, Wallace), said, "This is going to be a great debate for Republicans in Congress for the next few months. … Democrats are either going to have to basically acknowledge that the president has been right all along by authorizing what he wanted, and they're going to have to rebuke the Supreme Court's interpretation of the Geneva Conventions, or the Democrats are going to be in the position of saying that Al Qaida deserves protections like normal prisoners of war or like normal people in the American justice system."

WSJournal Says Case Should Be Election Issue. The Wall Street Journal (7/3) editorializes, "The Court's opinion masks its own power grab by asserting that the executive must defer more to Congress in designing military commissions." But "the Court's own deference to Congress is selective in the extreme, as it simply chose to ignore the clear intent of the Detainee Treatment Act that Congress passed only last December." The Journal adds, "We…certainly hope the Administration presses its case for military commissions to the Congress, including just how much due process protection the Members think al Qaeda detainees really deserve. An election is coming in which the prosecution of the war on terror will again be a major issue. By all means let's debate the proper care and handling of Osama's bodyguard."

GOP Lawmakers Blast Court's Interpretation Of Geneva Convention. The AP (7/3, Yost) reports, "Two Republican senators said Sunday that Congress must rein in the Supreme Court ruling that international law applies to the Bush administration's conduct in the war on terror." On Fox News Sunday (7/2, Wallace) Sen. Lindsey Graham criticized the "Geneva Convention aspects" of the Hamdan decision, calling them "breathtaking." Graham argued that the "question for this country is should Al Qaida members who do not sign up to the Geneva Convention, who show disdain for it, who butcher our troops, be given the protections of a treaty they're not part of. My opinion -- no. They should be humanely treated, but the Geneva Convention cannot be used in the war on terrorists to give the terrorists an opportunity to basically come at us hard without any restrictions on how we interrogate and prosecute."

Sen. Mitch McConnell, on NBC's Meet The Press (7/2, Mitchell) said, "a very disturbing aspect of the decision was that the court held common Article 3 of the Geneva Conventions applicable to American servicemen. Now this means that American servicemen potentially could be accused of war crimes. I think Congress is going to want to deal with that as well when it enacts these military commissions, and I think we need to do it soon. And so we'll be dealing with that in the coming weeks. … I think we will have to act on this very soon, either in July or in September. Certainly in the next couple of months."

Rep. Peter King, on CNN's Late Edition (7/2, Roberts) noted that "the Geneva Conventions apply to soldiers of established armies, of established governments, not to terrorists who are on the run, who are basically rag-tag operations and do not swear allegiance to a particular country. … Because if we apply the Geneva Convention to them, that means all you ask them is their name, rank and serial number."

Kristol Says Court Committed "Act Of Judicial Imperialism." The Weekly Standard's Bill Kristol, on Fox News Sunday (7/2, Wallace), added, "What the court did find -- let's just be literal about this -- is that Common Article III of the Geneva Conventions applies to Al Qaida. That is a breathtaking finding. It is contrary to every understanding of what that article has meant for the last 50 years. It is a pure act of judicial imperialism. … And I think the Congress is going to have to repudiate the court."

Stevens Opinion Said To Reflect 1946 Ruling Penned By Rutledge. The Washington Post (7/3, A19, Lane) reports in its "Full Court Press" column, "Justice John Paul Stevens wrote last week's Supreme Court opinion striking down President Bush's plan to put suspected terrorists on trial before military commissions. But in a real sense, the opinion's author was Wiley B. Rutledge, the justice for whom Stevens clerked during the court's 1947-1948 term, and for whom he has expressed great admiration in the years since." Rutledge's "most famous dissenting opinion came in 1946, when he wrote that the majority of the court was wrong to deny a petition for habeas corpus by Tomoyuki Yamashita, the Japanese general sentenced to death by a U.S. military commission in the Philippines for atrocities committed by his troops. … It is hard to imagine anyone less popular in the United States than Yamashita. But the man whose case was before the court last week, Osama bin Laden's former aide, Salim Ahmed Hamdan, might qualify. Nevertheless, Stevens defended not Hamdan, but Hamdan's rights."

DOJ_NMG_0038285

GOP Intensifies Criticism Of Media Over Anti-Terrorism Program Leaks. The CBS Evening News (7/2, story 4, 2:20, Mitchell) reported, "A battle between the press and the White House is heating up tonight." CBS (Calvi) added Rep. Peter King has "cosponsored a congressional resolution condemning press reports that revealed a secret government program. The program was designed to monitor millions of bank transactions to try to catch terrorists." President Bush (Wednesday): "There can be no excuse for anyone entrusted with vital intelligence to leak it and no excuse for any newspaper to print it." Calvi: "'The Wall Street Journal,' 'The New York Times' and the 'Los Angeles Times' all reported on the surveillance program on the same day, but it's been 'The New York Times' that's been the focus of criticism, including by the editorial page of the 'Wall Street Journal.'" Bill Keller, Executive Editor, "The New York Times": "The 'Times' is an easy target for conservatives partly because our opinion pages tend to be pretty tough on the Bush Administration." Calvi: "Now, the Administration is considering its options." Rep. King "tells CBS News he'll be asking the Attorney General to investigate how the information was obtained by the 'Times' and file criminal charges against any leakers and reporters who refuse to reveal those sources."

McCain Calls For Prosecution Of Terror Money Tracking Program Leakers. The New York Post (7/3, Orin) reports that Sen. John McCain has ""joined the chorus of critics who say The New York Times was wrong to out a top-secret terror money-tracking program, and he called for prosecuting the leakers." Speaking on ABC's This Week, McCain said, "Tracking the money is always a vital tool, and members of Congress were kept informed and agreed to this program," adding, "So, no, I don't think [the Times] should have published it." The Post adds, "McCain also challenged the Times' claim that it didn't reveal any real secrets, saying, 'If The New York Times thinks the story was inconsequential, the legitimate question is: Why was it on the front page?' Asked if the Times should be prosecuted, McCain replied, 'I think we should go after the leakers first.'"

Document Outlines Bali Bombers' Final Hours. The New York Times (7/3, Bonner) reports from Indonesia on "the playbook for a suicide bombing, including even a minute-by-minute choreography of the bombers' final hours. The Indonesian police uncovered the document from the computer of one of the planners of an attack last October in Bali, which killed 20 people when three men walked into separate restaurants and blew themselves up." The document "offers a rare glimpse into the minds of the most cunning terrorist plotters and of the kind of meticulous planning that lies behind their operations. It also shows what even a small, local group with few resources can do, and the difficulty of thwarting their plans." The 34-page document, titled "The Bali Project," was "found on the computer of Azhari Husin, a Malaysian-born engineer educated in Australia and Britain who became a master bomb maker and was one of the most dangerous terrorists in Southeast Asia until he was killed in a shootout with the police last November." The document "was given to The New York Times by a person who requested anonymity because it had not been officially released. It was first reported on by Tempo, an English-language weekly newsmagazine here."

WSJournal Says Islamists Should Not Turn Somalia Into Refuge For Terrorists. An editorial in the Wall Street Journal (7/3) says, "There's no appetite in the US for a large military intervention in Somalia, but that doesn't mean the new regime should think it is immune from outside attention. So here's a suggestion: Send an emissary to the new Islamist government and propose a deal: Hand over the 1998 embassy bombers, refuse safe harbor to al Qaeda operatives, do not invade Somaliland and Puntland. Agree to that, and we will be able to get along. Don't agree, and the US will do what it must to disrupt any terrorist camps or terrorist activity within its borders. … The Somali Islamists need to understand that if they attempt to turn their country into another refuge for terrorists, it will end as badly for them as it did for the Taliban."

DOJ_NMG_0038286

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

L.A. Police Chief, Others, To Press Homeland Security For Greater Sharing Of Intelligence. The Los Angeles Times (7/1, Winton, McGreevy) reported, "Los Angeles Police Chief William J. Bratton said Friday that he and other big-city police chiefs will meet this month with top Homeland Security officials amid complaints that the federal agency isn't doing enough to share information with local law enforcement nationwide." Bratton said it is not so much that DHS doesn't "share intelligence," but that "they don't have intelligence." DHS spokesman Russ Knocke described the upcoming meeting as "an opportunity for the secretary to sit down with the chiefs of police for major cities and talk about information sharing." Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff "wants to 'listen to the concerns of the police chiefs and personally work to address the concerns,'" said Knocke.

The AP (7/1) reported that Bratton said, "The good news is: We've seen some significant improvements in intelligence provided over the last year." The AP continued that Knocke "said that last year the federal agency provided more than 1,200 bulletins, notices and other dispatches to local law enforcement agencies." However, he added that DHS is "the first to say there is more work to be done."

WRC-TV Washington, DC (6/30) reported on its website that DC Police Chief Charles Ramsey is among those "complaining about a lack of information sharing during terror threats." Ramsey told NBC4 that he had sent a letter to Secretary Chertoff "and he has agreed to meet sometime in July along with out key staff people, and I'll have some of the police chiefs who are also concerned. Then we'll sit down and talk about it."

WAR NEWS:

Sunni Lawmakers Boycott Iraqi Parliament. The New York Times (7/3, Semple) reports, "The main Sunni Arab political bloc began a boycott of Parliament on Sunday to protest the kidnapping of a Sunni legislator and threatened to withdraw its members from the prime minister's cabinet unless the lawmaker was freed within the next 48 hours." The "walkout" was "the first serious disruption in Iraq's new government and reflected the fragility of the power-sharing arrangement in the face of the relentless sectarian violence overwhelming the nation." The legislator, Tayseer Najah al-Mashhadani, and eight of her guards "were kidnapped by people suspected of being Shiite militiamen on Saturday while driving into Baghdad from her home north of the capital."

The Washington Post (7/3, A15, Partlow) reports, "The decision by the Sunni Accord Front, which holds 44 seats in the 275-member parliament, threatens to pull the legislature apart." Sunni legislators "blamed the abduction on Shiite-led militias aligned with the majority political parties in Iraq. Some accused the Iraqi security forces, who were near the kidnapping site in the Shaab neighborhood, of standing by and allowing Mashhadani's convoy to be captured." The Los Angeles Times (7/3, Roug) also reports the story.

Iraqi Government Publishes "Most Wanted List." The Financial Times (7/3, Negus) reports, "The Iraqi government on Sunday published a "most wanted" list topped by family and former associates of deposed president Saddam Hussein who reportedly finance and direct the insurgency." The list, "planned in parallel with the government's national reconciliation plan – suggests that the government considers a reconstructed Ba'ath party to be its most dangerous foe."

The AP (7/3, Juhi) notes Saddam's "wife and eldest daughter are among 41 people on the Iraqi government's most wanted list, along with the new leader of al-Qaida in Iraq, a top official announced Sunday." Saddam's wife, Sajida Khairallah Tulfah, "was No. 17, just behind the ousted leader's eldest daughter, Raghad. Sajida is believed to be in Qatar, and Raghad lives in Jordan, where she was given refuge by King Abdullah II."

ABC World News Tonight (7/2, lead story, 2:50, Brown) reported, "Remember the deck of cards the US military put out just after the war? Most of those have since been killed or captured, and the violence continued. The list of 41 names was released by the national security adviser here, who said they're all killers. And will be hunted down, one by one. He said the international police agency, Interpol, has been informed." Mouwafak Al-Rubaie, Iraqi National Security Adviser: "This list shows those who are trying to destroy our country." The CBS Evening News (7/2, story 3, 1:55, Cowan) said it was "the latest step in the government's security crackdown that has failed so far to stem the violence in Iraq."

DOJ_NMG_0038287

Violence Continues In Iraq. The CBS Evening News (7/2, story 2, 0:10, Mitchell) reported, "Another bloody day in Iraq. South of Baghdad, four were killed and 22 wounded after a bomb went off. This one day after a car bomb in a Baghdad market killed more than 60."

Further Details Of Alleged Iraq Rape Surface. The Washington Post (7/3, Knickmeyer) reports the version of the alleged rape and murders by US GIs told by a neighbor, Omar Janabi. It gives the victim's age as 15 and contains his account of finding the family's bodies, as well as graphic descriptions of the bodies from death certificates. The Post writes, "The case is at least the fourth American military investigation announced since March of alleged atrocities by U.S. forces in Iraq. The rape allegation makes the Mahmudiyah case potentially incendiary in Iraq. Rape is seen as a crime smearing the honor of the family as well as the victim in conservative communities here."

Senate Intelligence Committee "Statements" Investigation Stalled. In the National Review (7/17), Byron York says the Senate Intelligence Committee "is engaged in a protracted investigation of the public statements of President Bush, Vice President Cheney, top administration officials, lawmakers in the House and Senate, and even officials of previous administrations to determine whether they exaggerated, cherry-picked, misrepresented, or otherwise manipulated intelligence in the run-up to the war." But it is "not going well. In fact, the 'statements investigation' is the main roadblock to completion of what is called 'Phase Two' of the committee's probe of pre-war intelligence." After Democrats "first proposed to investigate only Bush administration officials," Chairman Pat Roberts "pointed out that many members of Congress, as well as many members of the Clinton administration, had also made statements about Iraq's supposed WMD capabilities." But Roberts added when "senators evaluate each statement in light of the intelligence that was available at the time, he proposed, they should do so blindly — that is, not knowing the identity of the speaker, so they would not allow any biases to influence their judgment on the appropriateness or inappropriateness of the statement." It would "not be an exaggeration to say that Democrats — behind the scenes, of course — went bonkers over that suggestion." What had "started as a way to criticize the Bush administration threatened to backfire on Democrats."

Bush Seen As Uninterested In Seeking Democratic Support For Iraq Policy. In the New Republic's TRB column (7/10), Peter Beinart says, "Why doesn't George W. Bush want to win in Iraq? Seriously. The past several weeks have forced him to choose between two big goals: Demonizing Democrats to help the GOP retain control of Congress and fostering a domestic climate that gives the new Iraqi government the best chance to survive. And, again and again, he has chosen door number one." Swallowing the concessions needed from the US to secure the Iraqi government "will require a bipartisan bargain -- the kind of ceasefire required for difficult domestic changes like reforming Social Security or the tax code." But "over the past several weeks, President Bush has done exactly the opposite. Rove and company immediately wielded Zarqawi's death as a partisan club, saying that, if Democrats had their way, he'd still be loose."

Raid Reveals Tensions Between US Forces, Afghan Government. The New York Times (7/3, Gall) reports from Kabul, "A joint military raid by American and Afghan forces on an unobtrusive house here in the capital on March 20 has pointed up the tensions between the American military and the Afghan Defense Ministry over the conduct of counterinsurgency raids, particularly in Kabul, the Afghan defense minister says." The raid "was led by masked American special forces, and included eight members of a unit of the Afghan National Army. The involvement of Afghan soldiers prompted the defense minister, Gen. Abdur Rahim Wardak, who had no advance notice of the raid, to bar Afghan Army personnel from taking part in any raids on houses or compounds."

Two British Soldiers Killed. The Washington Post (7/3, A16, Tran) reports, "An insurgent attack on a British base killed two soldiers and an Afghan interpreter, military officials said Sunday, while at least 20 insurgents were killed in clashes and coalition airstrikes." An AH-64 Apache attack helicopter "crashed Saturday in an accident in southern Afghanistan, killing one crew member, the US military said."

Pakistani Journalist Sees Dire Situation In Afghanistan. Ahmed Rashid, a Pakistani journalist, writes in the Washington Post (7/3, A21), "The current political and military meltdown in Afghanistan was entirely predictable and avoidable. For the past three years Afghans, their president, Hamid Karzai, and foreign experts have been warning that the failure of the United States and the international community to provide sufficient economic, military and reconstruction resources to the fledgling Afghan government would lead to a Taliban resurgence and disillusionment among the Afghan people. That is exactly what has happened." But "there is still a way out of the mess if the international community and the Afghans pull together, rather than being at odds with one another. Karzai set the ball rolling late last month by calling for a joint strategy in a critical meeting with the most important foreign players in Kabul." Rashid adds the UN Security Council "needs to give the UN officials in Kabul the responsibility for coordinating the international response to the crisis and economic and political strategies with the Afghan government."

DOJ_NMG_0038288

US Military Faces Shortfall In Special Forces Troops. USA Today (7/3, Brook) reports, "The Army, Navy and Air Force face shortages of elite special operations forces that are playing a leading role in the war against terrorism, military records show." The shortfall of Army special operations, Navy SEALs and Air Force "combat controllers persists as the Pentagon seeks to expand the forces by 15% over the next four years to bolster the anti-terrorism campaign. One reason for the shortage is the intense training. The Navy says only 35 of 166 candidates will qualify as SEALs." USA Today adds, "Retention also is a problem. Some veterans can make $780 a day as civilian security contractors in Iraq, says Rep. Jim Saxton, R-N.J., chairman of a House Armed Services subcommittee that oversees special operations troops. Bonuses as high as $150,000 have helped stanch that loss, he says."

Pentagon Officers Said To Be Resisting Rumsfeld, Cheney On Iran Bombing Plans. In the New Yorker (7/10-17), Seymour Hersh writes that included with the Bush White House's offer to Iran to negotiate over its nuclear program if it suspended its uranium enrichment program included "an unspoken threat: The US Strategic Command, supported by the Air Force, has been drawing up plans, at the President's direction, for a major bombing campaign in Iraq. Inside the Pentagon, senior commanders have increasingly challenged the President's plans, according to active duty and retired officers and officials." Senior officers "have told the Administration that the bombing campaign will probably not succeed in destroying Iran's nuclear program. They have also warned that an attack could lead to serious economic, political, and military consequences for the US." A retired four star general, "who ran a major command, said, 'The system is starting to sense the end of the road, and they don't want to be condemned by history. They want to be able to say, 'We stood up.'" The New Yorker adds the "discord over Iran can, in part, be ascribed to Rumsfeld's testy relationship with the generals. They see him as high-handed and unwilling to accept responsibility for what has gone wrong in Iraq." But Rumsfeld is "not alone in the Administration where Iran is concerned; he is closely allied with Dick Cheney, and," a Pentagon consultant said, "'the President generally defers to the Vice President on all these issues,' such as dealing with the specifics of a bombing campaign if diplomacy fails."

Iran Rejects Western Deadline On Nuclear Proposal. The New York Times (7/3, Fathi) reports, "Iran on Sunday again rejected a deadline to respond to an international proposal to end the standoff over its nuclear program, saying it would respond a month. 'We do not consider such statements as constructive and invite them to wait for our answer until next month,' said Hamidreza Assefi, the Foreign Ministry spokesman, the ISNA news agency reported. The next month in the Iranian calendar begins July 23." Assefi "was responding to a statement made at a meeting of the Group of 8's foreign ministers on Thursday in Russia, during which they demanded Iran make a 'clear and substantive' response to the proposal in a week. P resident Mahmoud Ahmadinejad had previously said Iran would give its answer around Aug. 23."

Iran To Cut Refined Oil Imports, Ration Gasoline. The Washington Times (7/3, Mihailescu) reports, "Iran, which relies on imports for almost half its refined petroleum products, plans to halt those imports and introduce gasoline rationing later this year, the government announced." The decision "appears related to a plan to allow the nation's heavily subsidized gasoline to spike in price in order to reduce the smuggling of fuel to neighboring countries, a practice that aggravates shortages and costs the country billions of dollars every year."

DOJ:

Kennedy Emerges As Swing Vote On High Court. The Christian Science Monitor (7/3, Richey) notes that with the addition of President Bush's two nominees, Chief Justice John Roberts and Justice Samuel Alito, the supreme Court "has grown more conservative." The Monitor also notes that Justice Anthony Kennedy "will likely decide how far to the right the law moves under the new lineup of justices at the nation's highest court." According to the Monitor, "In years past, Kennedy shared the swing-vote designation with O'Connor. But with her departure he occupies the court's decisive center alone. That puts Kennedy in an even more powerful position than O'Connor, legal analysts say. … Kennedy's power was on full display last week when he joined the court's liberal wing to forcefully strike down President Bush's plan to put terror suspects on trial before military commissions at Guantánamo Bay, Cuba."

DOJ_NMG_0038289

Roberts Court Seen As Less Contentious Than Rehnquist's. Time (7/10, Rosen) reports that that Supreme Court's first year under Chief Justice John Roberts "has not been ordinary. As evidenced last week when the court struck down the Bush Administration's use of military tribunals, the Justices are suddenly unafraid to talk to one another in personal terms." By the time the Court adjourned for the summer, "the usual decorous costume drama that is a Supreme Court term had morphed into something much closer -- in vitriol, tension and drama -- to a soap opera." Time notes, however, that despite "the impression left by its rush of final decisions, the Roberts court is, at least so far, less fractured than the court led for 19 years by William Rehnquist. Almost half its decisions this year had no dissents, compared with 38% in Rehnquist's final term, and the tally of 16 cases decided by a 5-to-4 vote is seven fewer than under Rehnquist."

GOP To Focus On Judicial Confirmations. The Washington Times (7/3, Hurt) reports, "In coming weeks, Republicans on Capitol Hill plan for the first major push on judges since Chief Justice John G. Roberts Jr. and Justice Samuel A. Alito Jr. were confirmed to the Supreme Court." In "the nearly six months since Justice Alito was confirmed, only 14 federal judges have been seated." That's "the slowest six-month period since early 2004, according to documents kept by the Department of Justice's Office of Legal Policy." The Times adds, "The plans for renewed emphasis on judges comes after a consortium of conservative leaders expressed deep displeasure with both the White House and Republican leaders on Capitol Hill in recent months over the slowed pace of confirmations." The conservatives wrote "a letter to Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist, Senate Majority Whip Mitch McConnell and other Republican leaders in the body." The "83 signers of the letter…include such conservative icons as Paul Weyrich, Alan Keyes, Richard Viguerie, Abigail Thernstrom, David A. Keene, L. Brent Bozell III and Bill Donohue."

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

Impact Of US Abramoff Probe Into Ex-Guam Governor Remains Unclear. The Guam Pacific Daily News (7/3, Kang) reports, "The fallout over the federal investigation of a possible link between disgraced lobbyist Jack Abramoff and former Democratic Gov. Carl Gutierrez remains unclear. The U.S. Department of Justice on Friday issued a report on the replacement of Frederick Black as the island's U.S. Attorney, in which lobbyist Jack Abramoff told investigators he was helping Gutierrez get rid of Black. Gutierrez on Saturday denied those allegations. Former Guam delegate and Democratic gubernatorial candidate Robert Underwood, in a phone interview from Seattle, said the case warrants further investigation. In particular, he said, inquiries should be made into whether Abramoff received monetary compensation of any kind and where that money might have come from. Gutierrez on Saturday said he nor his administration never paid Abramoff for any lobbying efforts." Underwood "went on to say that if any additional information of a conspiratorial nature is revealed in subsequent investigations, those responsible should be prosecuted. Accountable 'First of all, the voters should hold them accountable and secondly the law should hold them accountable,' he said."

The Guam Pacific Daily News (7/3, Daleno) reports Gutierrez "praised a recently released federal investigation into the removal of former acting U.S. Attorney Fred Black, saying Black's smear of his replacement, Leonardo Rapadas, is a 'prime example of his operations.' Gutierrez yesterday released a written statement responding to the report, accusing Black of blocking local attempts at self-government. During a Saturday interview with the Pacific Daily News, Gutierrez denied statements in the Department of Justice report that lobbyist Jack Abramoff was working on his behalf to get Black removed." Gutierrez "acknowledged meeting with Abramoff during a dinner in the nation's capital, where the topic of Black's nomination came up, but he did not elaborate on what happened after that, saying only that he found it 'interesting' that Abramoff wanted to meet him. A Justice Department Office of Inspector General report, released Friday in Washington, D.C., states that Abramoff told federal investigators he began working on behalf of Gutierrez, who was governor at the time, to lobby for the removal of Black when certain Gutierrez administration officials were under federal investigation."

DOJ_NMG_0038290

The Guam Pacific Daily News (7/2, Limtiaco) reports, "Former Democratic Sen. Mark Charfauros yesterday acknowledged that he probably was lobbyist Jack Abramoff's closest friend on Guam, but he disputed a U.S. Department of Justice report released yesterday." Charfauros said he "did ask his friend Abramoff for help in securing a confirmed U.S. Attorney for Guam, but said he was not working with Gutierrez on the matter and did not send the e-mail stated in the report. 'No way. I'd like to see that e-mail. That didn't happen. I never filed any kind of e-mail, saying that nominations are gonna come out of Carl Gutierrez. Carl Gutierrez had nothing to do with this whole issue,' Charfauros said." The Guam Pacific Daily News (7/2, Daleno, Tamondong) reports Abramoff "has told federal investigators and said in e-mails that he worked on behalf" of Gutierrez to remove Black.

Tenet CEO Faces Challenge Of Moving On After Settlement With DOJ. The Wall Street Journal (7/3, Rundle) reports Trevor Fetter "inherited a financial and legal morass in 2003, when he took the top job at Tenet Healthcare Corp., the big hospital operator. Now, with most of the company's legal woes behind him, Mr. Fetter is turning to his next task: moving on." Tenet last week "agreed to pay the Justice Department $725 million to settle a host of investigations, including allegations that it gamed the Medicare system to generate lucrative payments it didn't deserve." Fetter's "biggest challenge will be to persuade doctors to send more patients to Tenet hospitals, many of which languished as Tenet conserved cash in anticipation of the Justice Department settlement. Today, those hospitals lack the latest CT scanners and other high-tech equipment that doctors crave."

Austin Banker Nearing Victory In S&L Case. The Austin American-Statesman (7/3, Elder) reports, "Austin real estate developer Alfred Hughes was close to giddy when he acquired an El Paso savings and loan in 1988. 'We're sitting on top of the world,' he said after federal regulators approved the purchase. 'We're very comfortable working in a regulated environment.' Less than two years later, regulators shuttered El Paso Federal Savings and Loan. For the past 16 years, Hughes has been trying to collect the $46.5 million he says the government cost him by improperly closing and then liquidating the institution. Among the assets Hughes lost when the thrift closed was his ownership of 4,500 acres of Steiner Ranch in western Travis County, now a development of high-end homes." While the "legal battle may roll on, in a continuing echo of the massive savings and loan crisis of the 1980s and early 1990s, Hughes won a big victory last month. Senior Judge James Merow of the U.S. Court of Federal Claims awarded Hughes the full amount, ruling that a 1989 federal law had unfairly imposed new financial requirements on thrifts."

BP Traders Lost $10 Million, Court Documents Show. Bloomberg (7/3) reports, "The three BP Plc traders accused by regulators of attempting to corner the U.S. propane market lost $10 million when they failed to sell their inventory, court documents show. The traders in February 2004 sought to make more than $20 million by holding most of the propane on a pipeline that ships the heating fuel from a hub in Texas to the U.S. Midwest and Northeast, according to transcripts filed June 28 with the U.S. District Court in Illinois by the Commodity Futures Trading Commission. Instead, they were stuck with much of the fuel as the market plunged on March 1." BP, "which made $2.8 billion trading oil and gas in 2005, and other oil companies are facing increased scrutiny from U.S. regulators and lawmakers as near-record oil prices have boosted gasoline, heating oil and natural gas prices to records in the past year."

Levin, Coleman Want More Oversight Of Energy Markets. The Financial Times (7/3, Grant) reports United Kingdom energy firm BP, "has suspended three Houston-based traders at the centre of an alleged propane price manipulation scheme, as alarm rose in Washington over the need to police energy markets. Senior US senators have warned congress that 'too many trades' are occurring without regulatory oversight." Sen. Carl Levin said, "It's time to put the cop back on the beat in these markets to make sure ordinary Americans aren't ripped off." The Times adds Levin's "call, in a bipartisan report to congress last week by the Senate's Permanent Subcommittee on Investigations, is the clearest sign yet that lawmakers believe the US energy markets are still open to manipulation years after the collapse of Enron exposed the weakness of lightly regulated energy markets." Sens. Levin and Norm Coleman "urged congress to 'eliminate the Enron loophole' by extending the power of the Commodity Futures Trading Commission, the US futures industry regulator, to oversee over-the-counter (OTC) energy markets."

DOJ_NMG_0038291

Bermuda Unit Said To Be At Center Of Refco Collapse. The Wall Street Journal (7/3, Mollenkamp, Mcdonald, Mckay) reports on the failure and bankruptcy filing of hedge fund manager Refco, "one of the largest and swiftest failures in recent Wall Street history. Refco, one of the world's largest commodities brokerages, was a global trading hub for corporations, government agencies, individual clients and hedge funds. And yet its spectacular collapse came out of nowhere." There are "thousands of big and small investors trying to recover about $1.8 billion of assets missing from client accounts." The "inside story of Refco's collapse" is now "emerging in federal bankruptcy-court proceedings in lower Manhattan and in related civil and criminal actions. At its center is Refco Capital Markets Ltd. of Hamilton, Bermuda. Court proceedings have uncovered a host of unusual practices by the Bermuda unit that appear to have contributed both to Refco's rapid growth and to its catastrophic fall."

SEC Sues To End German Bond Investment Scheme. USA Today (7/3, Smith) reports Las Vegas investor Jeffrey Weston "has been snapping up Germany Weimar Republic bonds from the 1920s on the premise that $1,000 in IOUs payable in gold then are today worth about $1 billion apiece," persuading "dozens of investors to give him $7.7 million to purchase the antique certificates, which lost much of their value after Adolf Hitler came to power in 1933." Last week, the Securities and Exchange Commission "said Weston had spun a fantastic tale while spending $2 million of investors' money on a house and cars and tucking away $454,000 more in Swiss bank accounts." The SEC "sued to halt Weston's promotions, freeze his funds and recover what authorities say might be only pennies on the dollar. The FBI and Texas authorities also are investigating, court records show."

CRIMINAL LAW:

DOJ Issues New Subpoena For Jefferson Emails. Roll Call (7/3, Bresnahan) reports, "The Justice Department has issued a new subpoena for e-mails from Rep. William Jefferson (D-La.), who is at the center of an ongoing bribery and corruption investigation." The subpoena, "approved by a federal grand jury in Alexandria, Va., was sent last week to James Eagan, Chief Administrative Officer of the House." The Jefferson probe "is being overseen by the US attorney's office in Alexandria." The subpoena "was read into the Congressional Record on Thursday evening, as required under House rules, but did not specify that Jefferson was the target of the request."

Indictment Seen As Wild Card In Ney's Electoral Chances. USA Today (7/3, Lawrence) reports, "There's often a caveat these days when Ohio Republicans talk about re-election prospects for their embattled congressman, Bob Ney. As state Rep. Clyde Evans put it at a recent GOP barbecue, 'Unless he's indicted, I think he'll do very well.'" Ney "hasn't been charged and says he has done nothing wrong. He also says he'll run even if he's indicted. … Some of Ney's past backers, however, say an indictment would change their votes. Some already are considering a switch to Democrat Zack Space, 45, an attorney and hotel developer from Dover."

Government Corruption Cases Persist In Connecticut. The Washington Post (7/3, A3, Fahrenthold) reports the "past few years have revealed so many tales of graft, malfeasance and all-purpose criminality by public servants in Connecticut that it's hard to choose the most brazen." A "tradition of bad behavior by officeholders persists here, despite numerous prosecutions and attempts at reform. If more proof were needed, it has come in the past few weeks, with three new scandals involving current or former big-city mayors." When Gov. John Rowland "resigned, pleaded guilty and was sentenced in March 2005 to a year and a day in jail, 'everybody thought that was going to be the end of it,' said John M. Orman, a professor of politics at Fairfield University in Fairfield, Conn. Instead, he said, the continuing parade of misdeeds has helped the state live up to a new nickname, 'Corrupticut.'" The Post adds the "recent scandals here include the tearful, nationally televised admission on June 20 by Bridgeport Mayor John M. Fabrizi (D) that he had used cocaine while in office." Other cases "include a former mayor and city council member from Middletown -- who pleaded guilty late last month to fraud for embezzling money from his law clients -- and a new charge against Joseph Santopietro, the former mayor of Waterbury."

DOJ_NMG_0038292

Missouri Supreme Court Ruling Alters Rules For Sex Offenders. The St. Louis Post-Dispatch (7/2, Franck) reports, "Thousands of offenders would no longer be required to provide information for Missouri's sex offender registry after a ruling Friday by the Missouri Supreme Court, according to the lawyer behind the litigation. While the high court upheld the constitutionality of the state's sex offender registry law, it ruled that the statute should not apply to nearly all of those convicted of crimes prior to 1995, when the law took effect. One key exception is sexually violent predators, who will stay on the list regardless of when their crimes occurred. Just how many of Missouri's more than 11,000 registered sex offenders would be affected by the ruling was unclear Friday. Tim Hull, a spokesman for the Missouri Highway Patrol, which maintains the list, said officials must review the ruling in detail. But Arthur Benson II, the lawyer who brought the case, estimates that thousands would no longer have to be registered as sex offenders. Currently, the registry includes offenses from 1979 to the present. Crimes committed during more than half of those years would not be included in the registry." Benson said the ruling "addresses 'the height of unfairness' in the current law, which requires people to register even for crimes they committed years before the registry law was conceived."

Denver Post Urges Online Safety Precautions For Minors. The Denver Post (7/3) editorializes, "There has been a great deal of concern recently - among lawmakers, in the courts and in the media - about the dangers faced by children on the Internet. Indeed, the statistics about online predators are frightening. Just in the last three years, 7,600 offenders have been caught and arrested for sexual solicitations. According to a U.S. Department of Justice survey, 1 in 5 girls and 1 in 10 boys admitted to being sexually solicited on the Internet. The Internet has proven to be a riveting tool for children - it provides an incredible opportunity for students to gain a broader view of the world, collect research for school projects, and keep in contact with family and friends. … It doesn't make sense to deal with Internet risks by locking up your children's computer, but it's vital for parents and guardians to monitor their online use. Through awareness, parent-child communication and a few safety precautions, kids and teens can appreciate the benefits of the Internet while dodging most of the dangers."

Irving, Texas, Police May Be Chastised Over Amber Alert. The Dallas Morning News (7/2, Mosier) reports, "The Irving Police Department could face an informal reprimand for issuing an Amber Alert for 2-year-old Elian Majano, who disappeared from a park more than a week ago and is still missing. Evidence of abduction is a requirement for activating the regional alert system, but Police Chief Larry Boyd said there was no such evidence in this case. The task force that runs the local system reviews each alert to determine whether it was warranted. There were 'no signs of abduction, but we couldn't rule it out,' Chief Boyd said."

ABC News Poll Finds 65% Favor Death Penalty For Murder. ABC World News Tonight (7/2, story 6, 0:30, Harris) reported, "Today marks 30 years since the United States Supreme Court ruling that reinstated the death penalty. A new ABC News poll finds that support for capital punishment has fallen over the past decade, but when it comes to the worst crimes, most Americans remain in favor of it: 65% approve of executing people convicted of murder. Since July 2nd, 1976, 1,029 people have been put to death in this country, more than a third of them in Texas."

CIVIL RIGHTS:

Hollywood, Florida, May Seek More Time In Religious Discrimination Lawsuit. The Miami Herald (7/3, Wright) reports Hollywood, Florida, "is expected to ask a federal judge today for more time to settle a religious discrimination lawsuit brought against the city by an Orthodox synagogue. Jury selection is scheduled to start at 9 a.m. before Judge Joan Lenard in U.S. District Court in Miami. The city last week offered a last-minute deal to end the five-year dispute with the Hollywood Community Synagogue Chabad Lubavitch. Now, the congregation wants time to consider the offer. Even if the settlement is accepted, Hollywood leaders may face a fresh round of lawsuits -- this time from neighbors concerned that the deal would allow the synagogue to expand without their input or city approval."

La Tuna Federal Prison Inmates Claim Rights Violations. The El Paso Times (7/3, Roberts) reports, "Inmates held at the various La Tuna federal prison facilities are convinced they have been denied visits, thrown in 'the hole' for minor infractions and denied access to the prison law library because they went public with a lawsuit claiming the federal Bureau of Prisons isn't following its own procedures. Requests for interviews with two of the inmates have been denied twice by La Tuna officials who said it was for the safety of the prisoners. By mail, those inmates have said they want to be interviewed. In that correspondence, they have claimed they are experiencing retaliation for their lawful actions." But La Tuna spokesman Israel Jacquez said, "That's just simply not true. These guys went to the press. That's their right. ... If we believe a staff member is retaliating against an inmate, no matter how frivolous the allegation may be, it is referred to the office of internal affairs."

DOJ_NMG_0038293

Texas Redistricting Verdict Could Result In "Ripple Effect." The Washington Times (7/3, Aynesworth) reports last week's Supreme Court ruling "on the constitutionality of the 2003 Tom DeLay-led Texas redistricting coup was a distinct victory for the Republican Party, but it could spawn some interesting fallout." In order to make the 23rd CD compliant "with the Voting Rights Act, some predict that several additional districts will have to be retooled." Rep. Henry Bonilla said, "Anyone who thinks there isn't going to be a ripple effect when countless counties are traded with other congressional districts is not seeing the big picture." The Times ads the "worst that could happen from the Republican viewpoint, several political analysts say, is that Mr. Bonilla might lose the reconstituted 23rd District."

Hitchens Says Congress Should Not "Waste" More Time On Flag Amendment. Christopher Hitchens writes in Wall Street Journal (7/3) that the "so-called 'flag-burning' amendment should never be allowed to waste any more congressional time. … It's easy enough to boast that 'these colors do not run.' However, those who mistake the symbol for the essence are manifesting not a show of spirit for the former but a pathetic lack of confidence in the latter."

WPost Praises McConnell Stance On Flag Burning Amendment. An editorial in the Washington Post (7/3, A20) says the recent Senate debate over a flag burning amendment "managed to bring out some of the worst in politicians of both parties. … If there is a hero in this episode, it is the man who would succeed Mr. Frist as leader, Majority Whip Mitch McConnell (R-Ky.). Mr. McConnell could have put the amendment over the top by abandoning his opposition. To his credit, he didn't, and he was joined by two other Republicans, Sens. Lincoln D. Chafee (R.I.) and Robert F. Bennett (Utah). As Mr. McConnell explained in a column posted on his Senate Web site, 'No act of speech is so obnoxious that it merits tampering with our First Amendment. Our Constitution, and our country, is stronger than that.'"

ANTITRUST:

US Investigating Kosher Slaughterhouses For Possible Antitrust Violations. The Asbury Park Press/AP (7/3) reports, "The federal government is investigating kosher slaughterhouses and suppliers for possible antitrust practices, according to a lawyer for one of the firms. AgriProcessors Inc., the world's largest kosher slaughterhouse, received a grand jury subpoena requesting documents and was cooperating with the investigation, attorney Nathan Lewin said Friday." It was "not immediately clear exactly how many slaughterhouses and suppliers were involved in the probe. The U.S. Department of Justice did not immediately return a phone call for comment from The Associated Press late Friday."

Second Quarter Merger Activity Was Prolific. The Wall Street Journal (7/3, Berman) reports a "strong first quarter for mergers continued in the second quarter, as deals rolled in from seemingly every sector: Banks, stock exchanges, oil companies, real-estate firms and consumer-products companies. It was one of history's largest and most diverse corporate-buying sprees, with nearly $1 trillion in deals around the world." The "frenetic deal-making produced the third most-active quarter since Thomson Financial began keeping track in 1985. It amounted to more than $916 billion of announced transactions, according to Thomson, up about 35% from about $676 billion a year earlier."

Despite Consolidation, Growth Opportunities Elusive For Commercial Satellite Industry. The Wall Street Journal (7/3, Pasztor) reports that while "consolidation and cost cutting have swept across the commercial-satellite industry," the "surviving operators are finding growth opportunities as elusive as ever." Intelsat Ltd. and PanAmSat Holding Corp. "are set to complete a $3.2 billion merger today, creating a closely held company whose fleet of more than 50 orbiting spacecraft will make it the largest and most diversified global satellite-services operator." But in "an industry with huge capital-investment needs and average annual growth rates hovering around 3% or less, the combined company faces major integration, personnel and marketing challenges to break out of that historical slow-growth pattern."

DOJ_NMG_0038294

The Washington Post (7/3, D1, Witte) reports Intelsat Ltd. of Washington will "become the world's largest commercial satellite operator today when it completes its purchase of the firm that had been its toughest domestic competitor." The combined company "will lose money. PanAmSat earned $72.7 million last year, but Intelsat lost far more, about $325 million. Already deep in debt, Intelsat is borrowing heavily to finance the purchase."

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

FBI Agent Came Close To Linking Cole, 9/11 Plots. The New Yorker (7/10-17, Wright) reports on the story Ali Soufan, who, at the time of the attack on the USS Cole in 2000, was "the only FBI agent in the city [New York] who spoke Arabic, and one of only eight in the country." Soufan's language skills, "his relentlessness, and his roots in the Middle East made him invaluable in helping the FBI understand al Qaeda, an organization that few Americans were even aware of before the embassy bombings." During the Cole investigation, an al Qaeda suspect told Soufan "that several months before the Cole attack he and one of the bombers had delivered thirty-six thousand dollars to Khallad, the one-legged al Qaeda lieutenant, in Bangkok. The money," the suspect added, "was meant only to buy Khallad a new prosthesis." But Soufan "was suspicious of this explanation," because "money always flowed toward an operation, not away from it. He wondered if al Qaeda had a bigger plot underway." In November, 2000, "a month after the Cole bombing, Soufan sent the agency the first of several official queries. On Soufan's behalf, the director of the FBI sent a letter to the director of the CIA, formally asking for information about Khallad, and whether there might have been an al Qaeda meeting somewhere in Southeast Asia before the bombing. The agency said that it had nothing." But if the agency "had responded candidly to Soufan's requests, it would have revealed its knowledge of an al Qaeda cell that was already forming inside the US," which eventually became the 9/11 conspiracy.

Post-9/11 Criticism, Private Sector Pay Driving Senior Officials From FBI. Under the headline "An Exodus of Agents," Time (7/10, Bennett, Zagorin) reports in its "Notebook" section, "Office birthday parties must make FBI Director Robert Mueller a little nervous these days." The rumors that Deputy Director John Pistole "was going to bolt for a lucrative job in the private sector" when he turns 50 this month "got so loud that Pistole took it upon himself to assure Mueller that he wasn't leaving," citing, in part, the departure of "so many other senior officials." Time adds, "Years of pummeling by the press and Congress, plus wrenching changes produced by the bureau's shift in focus to antiterrorism, have depressed morale, even in the highest ranks. That has coincided with lucrative employment offers to agents from firms desperate for experienced security chiefs in the wake of 9/11." Time notes, "Members of the Senate Judiciary Committee have been debating whether the brain drain at the FBI poses a threat to national security," and "Mueller seems to agree. When promoting agents to senior-executive levels, he 'is trying to extract some promise as to how long they are willing to stay,' says Michael Mason, who runs the administrative side of the FBI." Sen. Charles Grassley "suggested to TIME that 'the FBI needs to appeal to the patriotic spirit of its senior managers.' But beyond that, the bureau is offering few tangible perks to make working there more attractive. … Mason, however, is optimistic that the new generation of agents will make the sacrifices necessary for the job."

Blagojevich Says He Acted To Identify, Punish Hiring Misconduct. The AP (7/2, D'Alessio) reported, "Gov. Rod Blagojevich insisted Saturday that misconduct in his administration is limited to isolated events by people who are soon punished, even though his own inspector general found a top Blagojevich aide took part in a 'concerted effort' to subvert the law. 'As you police the system, every so often you're going find some people who violate the rules. The test of leadership is what do you do about it? Do you act and do you pursue it? Do you work with other law enforcement agencies to ferret more of it out?' he said. 'Those are the things we've been doing.'" The AP noted, "Blagojevich acknowledges he has been interviewed by the FBI. Prosecutors have issued subpoenas for hiring records and other information from state agencies, but Blagojevich won't say which agencies."

Former Illinois IG Alleged Hiring Fraud Connected To Blagojevich's Office. The Chicago Tribune (7/2, Long, Chase) reported, "Far-reaching allegations of state hiring abuses detailed by the governor's executive inspector general can be summarized in the report's account of one employee who still works at the Illinois Department of Employment Security. George Rada got his job when the agency violated state hiring practices, then he became a key conduit for Gov. Rod Blagojevich's patronage office to improperly influence hiring at the agency, according to the report obtained by the Tribune." The Tribune noted, "The September 2004 report by then-Inspector General Zaldwaynaka 'Z.' Scott said Rada and an associate, Surami 'Sudi' Garcia, effectively ran the human resources division in the agency instead of the personnel directors they served."

DOJ_NMG_0038295

Chicago Tribune Hopes Fitzgerald Will Complete Probe Before Election. The Chicago Tribune (7/2) editorialized, "The FBI and the office of Illinois Atty. Gen. Lisa Madigan have been digging into reports of state hiring abuses since last year. But Friday's disclosure that the feds have 'implicated multiple state agencies and departments' in politically motivated hiring comes as Blagojevich must stand uneasily for re-election." The "voters deserve what they didn't get in 1998 before Ryan was elected governor: a sense of the nature and sweep of a federal investigation. … Our hope…is that to the extent possible, the federal investigation of the Blagojevich administration either culminates or collapses before voters must make their quadrennial choice." Playing on Blagojevich's prior election pledge, the Tribune added, "What Illinois does need is an end to business as usual."

Longtime Scarpa Girlfriend Emerges As Key Witness Against DeVecchio. In a widely-distributed story, the AP (7/3, Hays, McShane) reports Linda Schiro, longtime girlfriend of Colombo family associate Gregory Scarpa Sr., "has emerged as a key witness against an FBI agent accused in what a prosecutor has labeled one of the worst cases of law enforcement corruption in the nation's history." R. Lindley DeVecchio "allegedly fed Schiro's late boyfriend inside information that led to four mob slayings," but DeVecchio lawyers question her credibility, saying that "her story has changed drastically over time." However, "authorities insist that Schiro's initial reluctance to detail the relationship between the agent and the mob capo was motivated by fears for her life. Only recently was she persuaded to tell the truth, they say."

Judge Waiving DeVeccio House Arrest To Watch Holiday Fireworks. The Washington Post (7/2, A2, Whoriskey) reported Lindley DeVecchio "wants to see fireworks this Fourth of July. Trouble is, he has been charged with four counts of second-degree murder related to some mob slayings" and is "under nightly house arrest in Sarasota, Fla. But to the astonishment of prosecutors, a judge last week granted DeVecchio's request that he be allowed to see the Sarasota fireworks 'in light of the defendant's service to the U.S. government.' DeVecchio is a former FBI agent. 'We've been opposed to the whole bail thing from the beginning,' said Jerry Schmetterer, a spokesman for the district attorney's office in Brooklyn, N.Y."

FBI Investigating West Virginia's "Prince Of Pork." ABC World News Tonight (7/2, story 5, 2:45, Harris) reported in its "Your Money" segment that Rep. Alan Mollohan, dubbed the "Prince of Pork," is "very good at bringing home the bacon for his district. So good, in fact, that the FBI is now taking a hard look at whether this Democrat from West Virginia is breaking the law." ABC (Cochran) noted that Mollohan has earmarked "half a billion dollars over the past ten years" for organizations in his district, and "those dollars provided lucrative contracts and high salaries for his supporters. Investigators want to know whether in return those supporters helped Mollohan become a multimillionaire. … Mollohan says he inadvertently misstated some transactions but insists he did nothing illegal." Mollohan: "I'm proud of the efforts we've undertaken…and if being the 'Prince of Pork'…merits that designation, then I'm proud of that."

Illinois Man Pleads Guilty To Hoax Terror Threat. The Chicago Tribune (7/2) reported, "A man accused in a terrorism hoax pleaded guilty in the case Friday and faces up to 41 months in prison." Gilbert Romero "in June 2005 told the FBI that a terrorist attack was to be carried out against the Chicago headquarters of a U.S. company. The claim came after Romero was detained in Lake County on state charges, according to his plea agreement."

IMMIGRATION:

Sensenbrenner Suggests Voters Would Punish GOP If Senate Bill Enacted. GOP Rep. F. James Sensenbrenner, in a letter to the editor of the Wall Street Journal (7/3), responds to the Journal editorial "The Tancredo Republicans." Writes the congressman, "House Republicans are committed to enacting border security and immigration legislation, but not if it makes the current situation worse. … In November, voters will judge members of Congress based upon whether they lead with an understanding of voters' concerns, as House Republicans are committed to doing, or whether they ignore voters by enacting legislation, such as the Senate amnesty bill, that the public doesn't support."

DOJ_NMG_0038296

House GOP Believes Enforcement-Only Immigration Bill Is Political Winner. In the National Review (7/17), Kate O'Beirne says, "Rather than merely blocking action on a Senate bill they refuse to support, a unified House GOP caucus has decided to go on offense in order to wring the maximum political credit from being on the right side of their reading of public opinion." Because House Republicans "fear the appearance of compromising with a Senate bill they are convinced is wildly unpopular, they have -- according to a leadership aide -- no intention of taking part in a conference to hammer out differences between the House and Senate unless 'there is a sea change in either public or Senate opinion.'" Congressional Republicans "who will be facing the voters are firmly convinced that backing border security now will mean job security in November."

LATimes Criticizes Senate Negotiators. The Los Angeles Times (7/3) editorializes, "Last week saw the first narrowing of the chasm between the Senate's recent comprehensive immigration bill and the House of Representatives' punitive enforcement-only package from December. Trouble is, the overtures are all going in the House's direction. … Pro-reform senators are making two classic negotiating mistakes: confusing their opponents' line-in-the-sand intransigence with a negotiating ploy, and elevating the importance of making a deal above its actual content."

Border Arrests Rose In 2006. The Washington Times (7/3, Seper) reports, "US Border Patrol agents have detained 901,428 foreign nationals seeking to sneak into the United States in the past nine months -- more than 3,300 a day -- up from the 890,358 apprehended in the same period last year." Border Patrol spokesman Michael Friel "said the number of apprehensions, monitored since the Oct. 1 start of fiscal 2006, was a 1 percent increase over detention totals in the first nine months of fiscal 2005. H e also said that although arrests had edged up, the number of apprehended non-Mexicans, known as "other than Mexicans" or 'OTMs,' had declined by about 16 percent."

Mexican Program Uses Remittances To Assist College Students. The CBS Evening News (7/2, story 6, 3:35, Mitchell) reported, "Most Mexican immigrants do maintain strong ties with their homeland, sending nearly $20 billion home last year." CBS (Pinkston) added that in Indaparapeo, "many families here depend on money sent by relatives living abroad, but Indaparapeo does something no other community does. In addition to helping individual relatives, the residents of this town and those who have migrated to the US are transforming their entire community, one student at a time." 47 low-income students "are sponsored by an innovative scholarship program funded by Indaparapeans in the United States and operated by residents still living in Mexico." Thanks to "matching funds from the Mexican government, each student receives a monthly stipend of up to 1,500 pesos, about $150, enough to pay for tuition even at some private universities. In exchange, scholarship recipients are required to participate in community service projects such as lending a hand to children with special needs or tutoring high school students in nearby villages. The goal is to connect scholarship recipients more closely to their communities with the hope that they will use their skills in Mexico after graduation."

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

Bush To Name Connaughton To Lead Maritime Administration. The Washington Times (7/3) reports, "Last week, President Bush announced that he would nominate Sean T. Connaughton to lead the Maritime Administration at the Department of Transportation." Connaughton, a lawyer, "unsuccessfully sought the Republican nomination for lieutenant governor last year, losing in the primary to William T. Bolling. Mr. Bolling went on to win the seat." Connaughton "has served as a senior transportation associate for the American Petroleum Institute."

Coburn Plan Seeks To Inform Public On Government Spending. The New York Times (7/3, Deparle) reports, "Exasperated by his party's failure to cut government spending, Senator Tom Coburn, Republican of Oklahoma, is seeking cyberhelp." Coburn "wants to create a public database, searchable over the Internet, that would list most government contracts and grants -- exposing hundreds of billions in annual spending to instant desktop view. … While advocating for openness, Mr. Coburn is also placing a philosophical bet that the more the public learns about federal spending, the less it will want." Coburn's plan, "hailed by conservatives, is also sponsored by a Democrat, Senator

DOJ_NMG_0038297

Barack Obama of Illinois, and applauded by liberal groups that support activist government. The result is a showcase of clashing assumptions and the oddest of coalitions, uniting Phyllis Schlafly, a prominent critic of gay rights, with the National Gay and Lesbian Task Force." The House "unanimously passed a version of the proposal in late June, though in a form that had drawn outside criticism. The House bill creates a database that would omit contracts, which typically go to businesses, but would include about $300 billion in grants, which usually go to nonprofit groups." Liberal "critics see a revival of what they call old partisan efforts to 'de-fund the left,' by reducing grants to liberal groups or adding conditions that limit their activities."

USDA Program Benefits Farmers Even In Good Years. A front page story in the Washington Post (7/3, Morgan, Cohen, Gaul) reports on the loan deficiency payment, a little-known USDA program that was "intended to boost farmers' incomes when prices are low. The farmers do not have to sell at distressed prices to collect the money. They can bank the government payments and sell when prices are higher. Since September, the program has cost taxpayers $4.8 billion. Most of that money -- $3.8 billion -- went to farmers…who sold at higher prices, according to a Washington Post analysis of USDA payment data." According to the Post, "The LDP has become so ingrained in farmland finances that farmers sometimes wish for market prices to drop so they can capture a larger subsidy."

Feingold, Obama Pushing Senate To Adopt Ethics Reforms As Rules Change. Roll Call (7/3, Newmyer) reports, "In a bid to salvage some progress from the fizzling drive to overhaul lobbying and ethics laws, Democratic Sens. Russ Feingold (Wis.) and Barack Obama (Ill.) are pushing their colleagues to adopt as a rules change a slate of reforms from a package the Senate passed months ago." A resolution the pair introduced late last week "would immediately ban gifts, meals and tickets from lobbyists, require pre-approval for privately funded trips and expand revolving-door prohibitions, among other items." While the Senate approved the changes, 90-8, "as part of a broader reform package in March, that bill has stalled awaiting House action." The House "approved its version of the measure in May but has yet to name conferees, and negotiations over the bills have run aground on disagreements about campaign finance and earmark provisions." Roll Call adds, "Obama and Feingold wrote to Senate leaders last week, asking their resolution be adopted as soon as Senators return from the July Fourth recess." Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist's office "did not respond to a request for comment." Senate Minority Leader Harry Reid, "who has sought to portray a GOP 'culture of corruption' as a central theme in his party's midterm messaging, stopped short of a full-throated endorsement of the approach."

Bush's Fitness Seen As Remarkable As He Turns 60. The CBS Evening News (7/2, story 10, 2:40, Mitchell) reported, "The first wave of baby boomers turns 60 this year, and the big day for President Bush comes on Thursday." Ten predecessors "have turned 60 in office, but it's a good bet none was as healthy as number 43." CBS (Axelrod) added, "As the Baby Boomer-in-Chief approaches his birthday this week, he's in top shape, even if he does seem to be dreading the big six-oh just a bit." President Bush (June 7): "I know I'm not supposed to talk about myself, but in a month I'm turning 60. For you youngsters, I want to tell you something, when I was your age, I thought 60 was really old. [laughter] It's all in your mind. It's not that old. Really isn't." Axelrod: Bush's fitness is "a remarkable feat considering that during his five years in office, this President has dealt with 9/11, wars in Afghanistan and Iraq, and a constant threat of terrorism." Bush "doesn't just look healthy. He's got the resting heart rate of an athlete, at 47 to 52 beats per minute. His blood pressure is 110/64. His total cholesterol is 178. His doctors proclaimed him in excellent health and fit for duty, and he actually lost eight pounds last year."

Professor Questions Whether MBA Has Made Bush Better President. Charles R. Kesler, a professor of government at Claremont McKenna College, writes in the Los Angeles Times (7/3), "George W. Bush is the first president with an MBA (from Harvard Business School, no less), but it's not clear that being a master of business administration has made him a better chief executive. The disarray in Iraq, the debacle after Hurricane Katrina -- these aren't exactly the kinds of triumphs that the alumni office likes to boast about." Kesler adds, "It's hard to say what President Bush absorbed from his management studies. We can only draw inferences, though eventually historians may know more. … Bush's management style is long on decisions and short on explanations. … On ordinary rhetorical occasions, Bush and his text seem hardly acquainted. On great occasions, he tends to overshoot the mark, calling for impossibilities such as an "end to evil." He lacks a rhetorical mean, much less the rhetorical mien that served Ronald Reagan so well."

DOJ_NMG_0038298

Bush, McCain Rapprochement Seen As Based On Pragmatic Considerations. The New York Times (7/3, Rutenberg, Nagourney) reports that after "years of competitive and often contentious dealings, President Bush and Senator John McCain of Arizona are building a deepening if impersonal relationship that is serving the political needs of both men." Given their "history of intense rivalry and sometimes personally bitter combat, their newfound partnership is seen by some Republicans as born more of political calculation than personal evolution. Either way, it could prove valuable to Mr. McCain in his efforts to win the Republican presidential nomination in 2008 by sending a signal to Mr. Bush's conservative base and fund-raising network that, at a minimum, the White House will not stand in the Arizonan's way." Aides said "a thaw that began when Mr. McCain campaigned alongside Mr. Bush in the 2004 election has continued through the tougher days of Mr. Bush's second term." But for "all the talk of reconciliation, both sides describe the relationship between arguably the two highest-profile leaders of the Republican Party as almost entirely professional, a little stiff and the product of the pragmatic calculation by two politicians who see potential gain in striking a peace with a powerful rival." Bush "appears to have stronger ties to Mr. McCain than to the other likely presidential candidates." There has been "a steady stream of Bush advisers who have ended up in Mr. McCain's orbit. Most recently, Republicans close to both candidates said that Nicolle Wallace — who just stepped down as Mr. Bush's communications director and has long been close to the president — was likely to serve in some formal or informal role in a McCain campaign. Her husband, Mark D. Wallace, Mr. Bush's deputy campaign manager in 2004 and now an ambassador-level representative to the United Nations, is already lending advice." Wayne L. Berman, a "longtime supporter and fund-raiser for Mr. Bush, has signed on to help Mr. McCain." Karl Rove was "said by associates to have put aside his suspicion and dislike of Mr. McCain." White House press secretary Tony Snow said, "On a series of very tough issues, McCain's been there."

OTHER NEWS:

Emanuel, Dean At Odds Over Party Strategy. Roll Call (7/3, Kornacki) reports, "A letter to Democratic National Committee Chairman Howard Dean from Rep. Rahm Emanuel (Ill.), the head of the Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee, has set off a new round of sniping over party strategy and resources between allies of the two party leaders." Emanuel, who "reportedly stormed out of a May meeting with Dean, penned a letter, dated June 22, to the party chairman demanding $100,000 per targeted district from the DNC to defray the cost of the DCCC's proposed field operation, several individuals who have read the letter said." Attached to the letter was "a sample field plan for a district, itemizing various projected expenses, down to details such as $1,500 for T-shirts. The expense plan was dated June 26, although it was unclear when Dean actually received the missive." Dean "loyalists took the letter as hostile in nature, coming as it did after months of coy suggestions by Emanuel that Dean and the DNC were shirking their financial obligations to the DCCC's election year effort. … On top of that, Dean's backers contend he is not low-balling the DCCC on field operations as Emanuel suggests, and that the $20,000-per-district figure was simply a number being bandied about during negotiations, which were still proceeding when Emanuel wrote the letter."

GOP Sees Chance To Increase House Majority. The Washington Times (7/3, Pfeiffer) reports, "Congressional Republicans say they have a strategic advantage in their effort to increase their House majority, even as national polls show Democrats with a significant lead heading into this year's elections." The National Republican Congressional Committee says that "despite the polling edge for the Democrats, Republicans are targeting conservative districts that went for President Bush in 2004. 'We're competing for red turf held by Democrats,' NRCC spokesman Jonathan Collegio said."

Democrats May Need Only A Few States For "Wave." In his Roll Call column (7/3), Stuart Rothenberg says, "The last major national political wave, in 1994, didn't sweep over all areas of the country with equal force. In some states, Congressional Democrats suffered minimal losses, while in others Democratic House seats fell in bunches." For Democrats "to take the House this year, they may need one or two states to deliver a significant number of wins, not just an isolated victory. Which states give Democrats the best chance to score victories in bunches?" Democratic operatives "have been suggesting that at least a handful of states are ripe for a Democratic wave: New York, Ohio, Pennsylvania, Connecticut and Indiana."

DOJ_NMG_0038299

Voters Seen As Needing Solid Reason To Dump Incumbents. Roll Call (7/3, Duran) reports the "surprisingly easy victory that Rep. Chris Cannon (R-Utah) scored over his primary opponent last week has been heralded as a win for President Bush's immigration policy." But wealthy developer John Jacob's "defeat in the Beehive State's 3rd district holds other lessons for both Republicans trying to dislodge incumbents in primaries and Democrats hoping to flip Republican-held seats in November." Just as the "victories of newly elected Rep. Brian Bilbray (R-Calif.) and Reps. Bob Ney (R-Ohio), Bennie Thompson (D-Miss.) and now-ex Rep. Tom DeLay (R-Texas) demonstrated in recent primaries, voters still need a reason to dump incumbents or switch party control of a House seat."

GOP Pressing "Suburban Agenda." In his Roll Call column (7/3), executive editor Morton Kondracke notes Rep. Dave Reichert's effort to persuade GOP colleagues "to back a bill enabling school districts to tap into national criminal databases before they hire employees." The School Safely Acquiring Faculty Excellence Act "passed the House almost unanimously in June — the first legislative success for the GOP's 'Suburban Agenda,' a set of bills designed to appeal to the majority of American voters who live in the suburbs." The agenda "is the brainchild of Rep. Mark Kirk (R-Ill.), one of Congress' most effective moderates, who has sold it to a growing group of conservatives and the House GOP leadership." Kirk said, "Washington may think this is small-bore. It's not the war on terror. But this is an agenda that people care about in their everyday lives — their kids' safety, health care, their ability to send their kids to college." Kondracke adds that besides the "school safety measure, the agenda includes a national '401Kids' savings account for college, a screen to block predators from contacting children at online chat rooms and a bill setting standards for computerizing health records."

Conservative Republicans Now Opposing 527 Reform. The Wall Street Journal (7/3, Cummings) reports that in 2004, "Republicans were organizing against new, loosely regulated political groups that were raising money to attack President Bush." Now, "illustrating how roles often reverse in politics, some of the party's conservative activists are trying to stop legislation that would choke off those groups." The dispute "centers on a House bill that would curtail funding for organizations nicknamed 527s, for the section of the tax code that governs them." But the "rich liberals who spent heavily to oust Mr. Bush" in 2004 "aren't investing in 527s this election cycle, even though the stakes are high, with control of Congress in play." In the 2006 campaign so far, "it is right-leaning 527s that are most active. The Club for Growth, a conservative economic-issue group, is leading the charge to kill the Republican bill that would shut down 527s. The Club for Growth received $8 million in donations during the 2004 cycle; for this cycle, its donations as of May tally $5.1 million." The Club's "allies include social conservatives, gun-rights groups and college Republicans. Their campaign could stall congressional efforts to enact anticorruption legislation -- a response to a spate of ethics scandals -- because the House attached 527 language to its rewrite of lobbying laws."

Mormon, Muslim Presidential Candidates Face Voter Uneasiness. The Los Angeles Times (7/3, Mehren) reports that even as "anti-Semitism and anti-Catholicism are fading as voter taboos," a Los Angeles Times/Bloomberg poll found "uneasiness about some religions persists. Thirty-seven percent of those questioned said they would not vote for a Mormon presidential candidate -- and 54 percent said no to the prospect of a Muslim in the White House." In addition, "21 percent said they could not vote for an evangelical Christian. Only 15 percent replied that they would not vote for a Jewish presidential candidate. Just 10 percent of those polled were unwilling to cast ballots for a Catholic chief executive." The nationwide survey "of 1,321 adults was conducted June 24-27. The poll has a margin of sampling error of plus or minus 3 percentage points, poll director Susan Pinkus said." With "no likely Muslim candidate on the presidential horizon, the poll numbers present the greatest threat to a potential contender from the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints (as the Mormon Church is formally known)," Gov. Mitt Romney of Massachusetts. Emory University analyst Merle Black said, "It is something he will have to address. It will be a challenge. It doesn't necessarily kill him as a candidate, but he may have to talk in more detail than he ever has before about his faith."

DOJ_NMG_0038300

New Jersey Budget Impasse Could Shutter Casinos, Close Beaches. The CBS Evening News (7/2, story 8, 1:45, Mitchell) reported, "A budget impasse has forced the Garden State to start shutting down its government. The impact may soon be felt by out-of-state visitors like beachgoers and gamblers." CBS (Chen) added that as New Jersey's legislature failed to meet its budget deadline over the weekend, Gov. Jon Corzine shut down nonessential state function and "right away, no more lottery tickets sold, no more drivers license issued either, 45,000 state workers immediately furloughed, road crews suspended, a nice bonus on a holiday weekend, but right after the Fourth of July, state beaches and parks could close and the casinos will as well." Gov. Corzine "wants to increase the sales tax to bring in more revenue. Fellow Democratic lawmakers say that's unnecessary -- the upshot, no deal, and now, no budget."

The AP (7/3, Santi) reports Atlantic City's casinos "were ordered to close Wednesday, the latest casualty of a state government shutdown that entered its second day Sunday after the Legislature failed to adopt a budget by its July 1 deadline." The 12 casinos, "which require state monitoring, have waged a court battle to remain open, and an appeals court was weighing the matter Sunday." Gov. Corzine "said Sunday there was 'no immediate prospect of a budget.' State parks, beaches and historic sites also were expected to shut down Wednesday." If the casinos "shut down, the state would lose an estimated $2 million in tax revenue each day they stayed closed." The budget talks "became heated this year as Corzine, a Democrat, proposed increasing the state sales tax from 6 percent to 7 percent to help overcome a $4.5 billion budget deficit."

Virginia Gay Marriage Ban Spurs Fundraising Boom. The Washington Post (7/3, B2, Jenkins) reports the proposed state constitutional amendment "that would ban same-sex marriage in Virginia has sparked an aggressive fundraising effort, with each side of the debate hoping to secure hundreds of thousands of dollars for their cause." Virginia voters "will decide Nov. 7 whether the state constitution should be amended to define marriage solely as a union between a man and a woman. The amendment also would place a ban in the constitution on civil unions, which already are illegal in Virginia." To "help rally amendment opponents, the Commonwealth Coalition, a Richmond-based group, has set an ambitious goal of raising $3 million, organizers said. They want to fund a barrage of radio and television ads in the fall." Meanwhile, the Family Foundation Action, "which is organizing amendment supporters, has set a best-case-scenario fundraising goal of $900,000, although activists and volunteers said they expected to raise less than that." Both sides "have created Internet fundraising mechanisms and appealed to potential voters through churches and community events across the state. Activists said they plan a direct mailing campaign throughout the summer and fall."

Critics Say Petitions To FDA Delay Approval Of Generic Drugs. Lawmakers are taking a close look at an FDA procedure designed to alert the agency to scientific and safety issues, amid concerns that it may getting subverted by the brand-name drug industry. A front page story in the Washington Post (7/3, A1, Kaufman) reports that leaders in the generic drug industry and some at the FDA "complain that 'citizen petitions' -- requests for agency action that any individual, group or company can file -- are being misused by brand-name drugmakers to stave off generic competition." They say the filing of a petition "triggers another round of time-consuming and often redundant reviews of the generics by the FDA, which can take months or years. In the process, consumers continue to pay millions of dollars more for the brand-name drugs." The Post adds, "Statistics collected by the staff of Sen. Debbie Stabenow (D-Mich.), who has introduced legislation with Sen. Trent Lott (R-Miss.) that would rein in industry-filed citizen petitions, show that 20 of the 21 brand-name petitions settled by the FDA since 2003 were ultimately rejected."

Weather Delays Space Shuttle Launch For Second Day In A Row. For the second day in a row Sunday, the launch of the space shuttle Discovery was postponed due to stormy weather. The AP (7/3, Dunn) reports, "Launch officials said they would try again Tuesday, on the Fourth of July, after giving the work force some rest and a chance to replenish the shuttle's on-board fuel. The weather was expected to improve by Tuesday, although rain was still in the forecast."

ABC World News Tonight (7/2, story 2, 2:15, Stark) reported, "NASA will use the next 48 hours to replenish fuel cells on Discovery in the hopes of having enough energy on board for a third spacewalk. And they'll also need to replenish some of the experiments planned for orbit, including thousands of fruit flies which have a short lifespan. A scrub also means NASA once again has to drain 500,000 gallons of fuel out of the tank. But Tuesday's forecast is better -- a 60% chance of favorable weather."

DOJ_NMG_0038301

Astronauts May Have To Perform In-Flight Repairs To Shuttle Tiles. The CBS Evening News (7/2, story 5, 2:25, Cobiella) added, "Since the Columbia disaster when a piece of foam broke away and dealt a fatal blow to the shuttle's wing, astronauts have had to take on the job of in-space repairman. NASA has removed 35 pounds of foam from Discovery's external fuel tank, but it's still far from perfect. … NASA has said that minor damage is unavoidable and putting an astronaut so close to the delicate tiles on the shuttle's wings and underbelly carries its own risk, and all of NASA's in-flight fixes for these fragile tiles are still experimental. So if this Discovery crew were to perform another choreographed repair 230 miles above the Earth, it wouldn't know whether it was a success until they were safely back down."

Academic Bill Of Rights Taking Hold In Many States. The Washington Times (7/3, Richardson) reports that three years after conservative activist David Horowitz began promoting his Academic Bill of Rights in Colorado, the manifesto, which says students should be graded and faculty should be hired without regard to political or religious beliefs, has been introduced in 18 states. Meanwhile, "Students for Academic Freedom, the campus watchdog group founded by Mr. Horowitz, has established chapters on more than 150 campuses. Student governments at a dozen universities have approved resolutions supporting the Academic Bill of Rights. In April, Princeton University became the first institution of higher learning to pass a version of the Student Bill of Rights by a vote of the entire student body, surprising even Mr. Horowitz, who had no hand in the election." However the Times notes that for all Horowitz's success in raising the issue, "no state has actually approved an academic freedom bill, despite the flurry of hearings and committee votes."

Lawmakers Say Spot On Colbert Show Raised Profiles With Constituents. The Washington Times (7/3, Bellantoni) reports that members of Congress who appear on segment of Comedy Central's "The Colbert Report" known as "Better Know a District" usually "end up looking silly. But several lawmakers said doing the spoof spot…actually has raised their profiles back home, particularly among young folks." GOP Rep. Phil Gingrey "said there was an unexpected byproduct of doing the show -- attention from young constituents and House staffers. Rep. Earl Blumenauer of Oregon had a similar experience when his 3rd District was profiled in May. … But Rep. Barney Frank, Massachusetts Democrat, regrets his appearance and called Mr. Colbert a 'third-rate' comedian." Colbert "so far has targeted 25 members in the 435-member House, splicing and dicing sometimes two-hour-long camera sessions into five-minute clips."

Pelosi Recommends Lawmakers Not Participate In Colbert Spoof. Roll Call (7/3, Akers) reports in its "Heard on the Hill" column that House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi was asked about the segment during her press conference last Thursday. Pelosi said, "Well, it is humorous; I wouldn't recommend that anyone go on the show. I would think it would be okay to go on if you were live to tape, but don't subject yourself to a comic's edit unless you want to be made a fool of."

House, Senate Clash Over Proposal For Walkway On Capitol's East Front. The Washington Post (7/3, A19, Kamen) reports in its "In the Loop" column that the biggest fight between the House and Senate "may have occurred last week over a House proposal to build a fenced walkway that would run across the now-closed east front of the Capitol -- the area where the long-delayed Capitol Visitor Center is being built. … Senate detractors say this proposal is exceptionally stupid, even for Congress. … The Upper Chamber folks rather uncharitably say the mysterious fence dips to only four feet high so Hastert and House members can walk down the steps and have their pictures taken with constituents." A House aide "said these things are being overblown."

Former DHS Official Says FEMA Director Should Be Allowed To Focus On Disaster Response. Adm. James Loy, former commandant of the US Coast Guard and former deputy secretary of Homeland Security, in an op-ed in the Washington Times (7/3) writes that following "a time-honored pattern," Congress' "impulsive first response" following Hurricane Katrina may be "followed by years of 'perfecting' the original legislation." Loy continues that none of the pending bills that address FEMA's position within DHS "address the central problem: The Homeland Security Act of 2002 diluted the FEMA director's focus on the agency's core mission -- response and recovery -- by requiring him to wear an additional hat as the DHS undersecretary for emergency preparedness and response (later changed to the under-secretary for federal emergency management)." As adjustments are made to the original legislation to fix FEMA, Loy says "we should ensure that the FEMA director can focus all of his time, energy and talent on guiding the agency in responding effectively and efficiently to the American people in the event of a disaster. That is best accomplished by restoring FEMA's independent agency status, offloading the director's responsibilities of being double-hatted as an under secretary and keeping the agency and the director inside DHS with direct access to the secretary during a crisis."

DOJ_NMG_0038302

Carter Says FOIA Should Be Amended To Keep Pace With International Standards. Former President Jimmy Carter writes in the Washington Post (7/3, A21), "Our government leaders have become increasingly obsessed with secrecy. Obstructionist policies and deficient practices have ensured that many important public documents and official actions remain hidden from our view." Carter adds, "In the United States, we must seek amendments to FOIA to be more in line with emerging international standards, such as covering all branches of government; providing an oversight body to monitor compliance; including sanctions for failure to adhere to the law; and establishing an appeal mechanism that is easy to access, speedy and affordable. We cannot take freedom of information for granted. Our democracy depends on it."

Thornburgh Says Media Shield Law Must Be Carefully Crafted. Former Attorney General Richard Thornburgh writes in the Wall Street Journal (7/3), "Ever since then-New York Times reporter Judith Miller went to jail for 85 days last year rather than comply with a subpoena for her sources in the Valerie Plame case, the media has been pushing for a federal shield that would grant reporters unprecedented special protection from revealing sources during litigation. The Senate is now taking steps toward providing such a reporter-source privilege with the Free Flow of Information Act, which is likely to be sent to the floor for a vote over the next few weeks." Thornburgh notes that for the long term, "the bill has troubling implications. In its current form it contains a shield so broad -- and a definition of journalism so vague -- that it upends what up to now has been a reasonable balance between protecting reporters from disclosing sources and preserving the right to the fullest possible access to truth in the courtroom for plaintiffs and defendants." Thornburgh concludes by noting that "given the potential for abuse of that critical role, any media shield must, in the interests of justice, be carefully crafted."

Schwarzenegger's Conservative Former Aide Reverses Support For Term Limits. Rob Stutzman, former deputy chief of staff for communications for Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger, writes in the Los Angeles Times (7/3), "About 20 years ago, the notion of term limits for officeholders became dogma for the center-right. … Fourteen years have passed since California voters approved legislative term limits, restricting Assembly members to a trio of two-year terms and state senators to two four-year stints. I have always been a loyal conservative supporter of term limits…as a suitably blunt instrument to correct the arrogance of elected officials not mindful enough of those who elected them. … But after 16 years of working in California politics, I've changed my mind. We were wrong. Term limits haven't delivered what we hoped for. They have, in fact, harmed the public interest." It is "high time to admit that term limits haven't worked."

New Republic Says Baucus Should Be Dropped From Finance Panel. The New Republic (7/10) says in its lead editorial that Democratic Rep. Max Baucus uses "his influence as the top Democrat on the Finance Committee to systematically undercut his party and enable George W. Bush's most egregious domestic legislation. So why does his party entrust him with so much responsibility?" Indeed, the Democrats' "only real victory of the last five years -- stuffing the administration on Social Security -- came after Harry Reid cautioned Baucus against freelancing with the White House. Well, we'll do Reid one better and suggest he boot Baucus from the Finance Committee altogether."

Author Says US Is Better At Educating Girls. Author Christina Hoff Somers writes in the Wall Street Journal (7/3) that in a report from Education Sector, a new Washington think tank, policy analyst Sara Mead, "denies that American boys are in trouble academically." Mead "hopes that the nation can have a reasonable 'conversation' about gender issues 'without unfairly undermining the gains girls have made in recent decades.'" Somers adds, "One looks in vain in Ms. Mead's report for any indication that anyone is undermining girls. She seems to think that concern for boys means shortchanging girls. But it does not -- because education is not a zero sum game." Somers adds, "We are strikingly better at educating young women than young men. Boys need our attention. It is difficult to understand why an organization devoted to improving education should regard the current concern for boys as a threat to girls' progress."

DOJ_NMG_0038303

Author Says "Boy Crisis" Is "Little More Than A Myth." Author Judith Warner writes in the New York Times (7/3) that the Education Sector study confirms that the "near-ubiquitous belief that our nation's boys are being academically neglected and emotionally persecuted by teachers whose training, style and temperament favor girls" is "little more than a myth." Warner adds, "Talk of the boy crisis is a diversion. It draws attention from the real reasons so many white suburban parents sense that their sons are in trouble. Those reasons aren't academic; they're behavioral and emotional."

Mallaby Calls Concept Of Energy Independence "Pipe Dream." Sebastian Mallaby writes in the Washington Post (7/3, A21), "This month's Group of Eight summit in Russia takes statecraft to a whole new level. Global leaders have 'energy security' on the agenda. But judging by what they say and do, they don't always understand the subject. … As Daniel Yergin has written recently in Foreign Affairs, real energy security requires setting aside the pipe dream of energy independence and embracing interdependence." Mallaby adds, "If the G-8 summit can spread the word about this interdependence, it will do some good. But the nationalistic conception of energy security is worse than useless. By encouraging a competitive scramble for resources that could spiral into conflict, this sort of security talk only creates insecurity."

Herbert Makes Case For Minimum Wage Increase. Bob Herbert writes in the New York Times (7/3), "The federal minimum wage, currently $5.15 an hour, was last raised in 1997. Since then, its purchasing power has deteriorated by 20 percent. Analysts at the Economic Policy Institute and the Center on Budget and Policy Priorities jointly crunched the numbers and determined that, after adjusting for inflation, the value of the minimum wage is at its lowest level since 1955." Herbert adds, "Polls have shown that Americans overwhelmingly favor an increase in the minimum wage. But the low-income workers who would benefit from such an increase are not part of the natural G.O.P. constituency. Thus, the stonewall. … There is no justification — none — for condemning the nation's lowest-paid workers to this continuing slide into ever deeper economic distress."

Pastor Says Americans Need Formal Day Of Rest. Henry G. Brinton, pastor of Fairfax Presbyterian Church in Virginia, writes in USA Today (7/3) reports, "For all the attention paid this past year to public displays of the Ten Commandments, you'd think people would spend as much energy trying to follow them. When it comes to the Fourth Commandment -- 'Remember the Sabbath Day' -- that's not the case. … The problem with ignoring the Sabbath is that it hurts us as individuals, families and communities." Brinton adds, "We need a formal day of rest. A true Sabbath gives us time to refresh and renew ourselves, regain proper perspective and redirect our lives to what is good and true and worthwhile. … We can learn from men and women in the European Union, who work hard but still enjoy an average of five weeks of paid vacation per year. They often remark that they don't 'live to work,' as we do — instead, they 'work to live.'"

NYTimes Says Congress Should Intervene To Clarify Clean Water Act. The New York Times (7/3) editorializes, "Senator James Inhofe, a conservative Republican from Oklahoma, and Senator Lincoln Chaffee, a liberal Republican from Rhode Island, are at opposite ends of the earth on environmental issues. But both found themselves equally mystified by the recent Supreme Court decision on the Clean Water Act. The decision did nothing to clarify which waters were protected under the act and which were not. Both agreed that only Congress can end the confusion. Both are right. Without Congressional intervention, the certain outcome is endless litigation and a steady decline of the nation's streams and wetlands."

WPost Sees Promise In Ruling On Vermont Campaign Finance Laws. An editorial in the Washington Post (7/3, A20) says the Supreme Court's decision last week striking down Vermont's campaign finance laws "may prove more silver lining than cloud. The Vermont rules never stood much of a chance; they are so strict as to present genuine problems. The important feature of the case is not its specific result but the way the court -- and its two newest justices -- reached that result. On this point, the decision is promising." Despite "an opportunity to declare themselves hostile to campaign finance regulation in general, both signed on -- Justice Alito somewhat equivocally -- to the court's long-standing doctrine that appropriately crafted contribution limits can survive constitutional scrutiny. This is a far more significant development than the fate of Vermont's statute. It suggests that, notwithstanding the turnover in the court's personnel, a revolution in campaign finance law may not be in the offing."

DOJ_NMG_0038304

NYTimes Says US Must Improve Science Education. The New York Times (7/3) editorializes that the US must do something about the "horrendous state of science education at both the public school and university levels." The Howard Hughes Medical Institute has "awarded grants to 50 universities aimed at providing richer undergraduate science education as well as mentoring and early research experiences with working scientists. Many of the grants will be used partly to advertise the virtues of scientific study not just at universities but also in high schools and middle schools. These programs send a powerful message at a time when the country needs to be paying attention to remaking science education. Congress, which has been casting for ways to address this problem, would do well to emulate them."

WPost Says Maryland Governor's Race Should Be "Hard-Hitting, Substantive Campaign." An editorial in the Washington Post (7/3, A20) says Maryland Gov. Robert Ehrlich "has spent four years compiling a so-so record. He has diminished a handful of modest victories and sensible policies by displaying a tin ear for political ethics and a pointlessly petulant style of governance that has compounded the partisan venom in Annapolis." Those qualities "may help explain why Mr. Ehrlich… begins his campaign for reelection so far behind his Democratic rival, Baltimore Mayor Martin O'Malley." The Post adds, "Wouldn't it be nice if the campaign looked and sounded like a contest of ideas between two grown-ups, and not a locker-room smack-down. That will be the real test of both candidates -- whether they have the capacity to wage a hard-hitting, substantive, mature campaign that is about Maryland and Marylanders, not just about Bob Ehrlich and Martin O'Malley."

Personnel News. Roll Call (7/3, Ackley) reports in its "K Street Files" column, "Carolyn Doyle, a former aide to Sen. Arlen Specter (R-Pa.), has left her position as senior federal affairs representative at the MWW Group. … Karen Reidy, most recently with the former MCI, has joined the telecom trade association COMPTEL as its vice president for regulatory affairs. … Cable giant Comcast Corp. has picked up a new lobbyist. Peter Filon comes to the company as senior director, federal government affairs, from the House Energy and Commerce Committee, where he has served as minority counsel. PR power-shop Qorvis Communications has signed Jim McGann as managing director. … The US Tuna Foundation has a new president. Anne Forristall comes to the fishy lobby from MGN Inc., where she advised a range of clients on legislative strategy. Lisa McGreevey is joining the hedge fund industry's primary trade group, the Managed Funds Association, as executive vice president and chief operating officer. … The public policy and law group at Dickstein Shapiro has added Brian Finch as counsel. … Benjamin McKay has been promoted to senior vice president of federal government relations at the Property Casualty Insurers Association of America. Trading one heavy-hitting Wall Street CEO for another, the Financial Services Roundtable has named Citigroup chief Charles O. Prince to replace newly confirmed Treasury Secretary Henry Paulson as chairman of the group."

The Washington Post (7/3, C1, Kurtz) reports that Jonathan Wald, who was fired as executive producer of the Today show, and Josh Howard, who was forced to resign as executive producer of 60 Minutes II, have "landed at CNBC, where they are helping to retool programming on a business channel that has struggled in the ratings since the dot-com bust six years ago."

EDITORIAL WRAP-UP:

New York Times: "Crisis Postponed At The U.N." An editorial in the New York Times (7/3) says the UN "steered clear of a financial shipwreck last week, but it also steered clear of approving urgently needed management reforms. That is a standoff, not a solution. If the less-developed countries blocking those reforms continue to dig in, the United Nations will suffer in diminished public credibility and greater resistance to dues-paying by some of the largest contributor nations, including the United States." The UN "cannot function effectively in the 21st century under budget and management rules that were originally devised for a much smaller organization. Successive embarrassments like the oil-for-food scandal should have made that painfully clear."

DOJ_NMG_0038305

"Protecting All Waters." The New York Times (7/3) editorializes, "Senator James Inhofe, a conservative Republican from Oklahoma, and Senator Lincoln Chaffee, a liberal Republican from Rhode Island, are at opposite ends of the earth on environmental issues. But both found themselves equally mystified by the recent Supreme Court decision on the Clean Water Act. The decision did nothing to clarify which waters were protected under the act and which were not. Both agreed that only Congress can end the confusion. Both are right. Without Congressional intervention, the certain outcome is endless litigation and a steady decline of the nation's streams and wetlands."

"How To Educate Young Scientists." The New York Times (7/3) editorializes that the US must do something about the "horrendous state of science education at both the public school and university levels." The Howard Hughes Medical Institute has "awarded grants to 50 universities aimed at providing richer undergraduate science education as well as mentoring and early research experiences with working scientists. Many of the grants will be used partly to advertise the virtues of scientific study not just at universities but also in high schools and middle schools. These programs send a powerful message at a time when the country needs to be paying attention to remaking science education. Congress, which has been casting for ways to address this problem, would do well to emulate them."

Washington Post: "Campaign Finance Bellwether." An editorial in the Washington Post (7/3, A20) says the Supreme Court's decision last week striking down Vermont's campaign finance laws "may prove more silver lining than cloud. The Vermont rules never stood much of a chance; they are so strict as to present genuine problems. The important feature of the case is not its specific result but the way the court -- and its two newest justices -- reached that result. On this point, the decision is promising." Despite "an opportunity to declare themselves hostile to campaign finance regulation in general, both signed on -- Justice Alito somewhat equivocally -- to the court's long-standing doctrine that appropriately crafted contribution limits can survive constitutional scrutiny. This is a far more significant development than the fate of Vermont's statute. It suggests that, notwithstanding the turnover in the court's personnel, a revolution in campaign finance law may not be in the offing."

"Flagging Rhetoric." An editorial in the Washington Post (7/3, A20) says the recent Senate debate over a flag burning amendment "managed to bring out some of the worst in politicians of both parties. … If there is a hero in this episode, it is the man who would succeed Mr. Frist as leader, Majority Whip Mitch McConnell (R-Ky.). Mr. McConnell could have put the amendment over the top by abandoning his opposition. To his credit, he didn't, and he was joined by two other Republicans, Sens. Lincoln D. Chafee (R.I.) and Robert F. Bennett (Utah). As Mr. McConnell explained in a column posted on his Senate Web site, 'No act of speech is so obnoxious that it merits tampering with our First Amendment. Our Constitution, and our country, is stronger than that.'"

"Mr. Ehrlich In The Ring." An editorial in the Washington Post (7/3, A20) says Maryland Gov. Robert Ehrlich "has spent four years compiling a so-so record. He has diminished a handful of modest victories and sensible policies by displaying a tin ear for political ethics and a pointlessly petulant style of governance that has compounded the partisan venom in Annapolis." Those qualities "may help explain why Mr. Ehrlich… begins his campaign for reelection so far behind his Democratic rival, Baltimore Mayor Martin O'Malley." The Post adds, "Wouldn't it be nice if the campaign looked and sounded like a contest of ideas between two grown-ups, and not a locker-room smack-down. That will be the real test of both candidates -- whether they have the capacity to wage a hard-hitting, substantive, mature campaign that is about Maryland and Marylanders, not just about Bob Ehrlich and Martin O'Malley."

Wall Street Journal: "After Hamdan." The Wall Street Journal (7/3) editorializes, "The Court's opinion masks its own power grab by asserting that the executive must defer more to Congress in designing military commissions." But "the Court's own deference to Congress is selective in the extreme, as it simply chose to ignore the clear intent of the Detainee Treatment Act that Congress passed only last December." The Journal adds, "We…certainly hope the Administration presses its case for military commissions to the Congress, including just how much due process protection the Members think al Qaeda detainees really deserve. An election is coming in which the prosecution of the war on terror will again be a major issue. By all means let's debate the proper care and handling of Osama's bodyguard."

DOJ_NMG_0038306

"A Somali Taliban?" An editorial in the Wall Street Journal (7/3) says, "There's no appetite in the US for a large military intervention in Somalia, but that doesn't mean the new regime should think it is immune from outside attention. So here's a suggestion: Send an emissary to the new Islamist government and propose a deal: Hand over the 1998 embassy bombers, refuse safe harbor to al Qaeda operatives, do not invade Somaliland and Puntland. Agree to that, and we will be able to get along. Don't agree, and the US will do what it must to disrupt any terrorist camps or terrorist activity within its borders. … The Somali Islamists need to understand that if they attempt to turn their country into another refuge for terrorists, it will end as badly for them as it did for the Taliban."

Los Angeles Times: "House Of (Immigration) Blues." The Los Angeles Times (7/3) editorializes, "Last week saw the first narrowing of the chasm between the Senate's recent comprehensive immigration bill and the House of Representatives' punitive enforcement-only package from December. Trouble is, the overtures are all going in the House's direction. … Pro-reform senators are making two classic negotiating mistakes: confusing their opponents' line-in-the-sand intransigence with a negotiating ploy, and elevating the importance of making a deal above its actual content."

"United On Clean L.A. Ports."

"Taming The Tamil Tigers." The Los Angeles Times (7/3) editorializes, "Since April, Sri Lanka has experienced rising violence between the government and the Tamil Tigers rebel group, effectively gutting a 4-year-old cease-fire. But amid the carnage, leaders of both sides have been making unexpected conciliatory gestures, spurring hope that with the help of international monitors, full-scale war can be avoided. … A peaceful Sri Lanka is very much in India's interest; war could bring a stream of refugees and instability to India, particularly in the state of Tamil Nadu. India should start to take a more active role, while the EU must work for a return to the bargaining table. It isn't too late to head off a full-scale war."

THE BIG PICTURE:

Headlines From Today's Front Pages.

Los Angeles Times:

"Confusion Grips Mexico Election."
"Happy? Let's Sum It Up."
"Congress Faces Dilemma On Terror Trials."
"In First Year, L.A.'s Mayor Finds His Inner Pragmatist."
"With The Right Spin, Any Film Can Be No. 1."
"Iraqis Go To Great Lengths To Get Away."

USA Today:

"How Americans See Americans."
"U.S. Elite Forces Face Shortfall."
"Some Spots Too Dry For Fireworks."

New York Times:

"Israel Steps Up Gaza Raids In Bid To Free Soldier."
"Internet Calling Pressures Bells To Lower Prices."
"A Terror Strike, Choreographed On A Computer."
"A New Partnership Binds Old Republican Rivals."
"Once Again, The Boss Is In At The New York Office."
"Marijuana Fight Envelops Wharf In San Francisco."

Washington Post:

"Record Crowds Flock To Vote Across Mexico."
"Growers Reap Benefits Even In Good Years."
"Episcopal Protest Of Top Bishop Increases."
"Petitions To FDA Delay Generic Drugs, Critics Say."
"Mongolians Meld Old, New In Making Arlington Home."

Washington Times:

"Mexico Election Too Close To Call."
"Senators Promise Gitmo Statute."
"Academic Manifesto Takes Root."
"Iran Plans To Cut Gas Imports, Subsidies."
"A Penny Saved Is A Penny Spurned."
"Illegal Students Face Expulsion From France."
"Representatives Relish Being Made A Mockery."

Detroit Free Press:

"Zetsche Steps Out Front At DCX."
"Schools Ties Bonuses To Test Scores."
"Kalamazoo Is Drug-Testing Hub For Pfizer."

Atlanta Journal-Constitution:

"Fulton Jail Is Slow To Let Go."
"'Always Remember.'"
"Austin Pleads Guilty To 'Mistake.'"
"Turner Studios In Midtown Undo Shoestring Image."

Houston Chronicle:

"Too Close To Call In Mexico."
"Troubling Figures Put Focus On Sunnyside."

Story Lineup From Last Night's Network News:

ABC: Iraq's Most Wanted; Shuttle Launch Scrubbed; Israel-Gaza Offensive; Mexico-Presidential Election; FBI-West

DOJ_NMG_0038307

Virginia Congressman; Death Penalty Anniversary; Alzheimer's-Art Therapy; National Anthem-Singing Project.
CBS: Israel-Gaza Offensive; Iraq Violence; Iraq's Most Wanted; Conservatives-Press Concerns; Discovery-Repair Concerns; Mexican Scholarship Program; World Cup; New Jersey-Government Shutdown; Weekend Box Office; Bush's 60th Birthday.
NBC: Preempted By Golf.

Story Lineup From This Morning's Radio News Broadcasts:
ABC: Space Shuttle Launch Delayed; Mexico-Election; Israel-Kidnapped Soldier; IN-Car Accident.
NPR: Mexico-Election; Israel-Kidnapped Soldier; UN-Human Rights Reforms; Space Shuttle Launch Delayed; IN-Car Accident; Iraq-Most Wanted List; World Cup; Foreign Stock Markets.

WASHINGTON'S SCHEDULE:

Today's Events In Washington.

White House:

PRESIDENT BUSH — Signs H.R. 5403, the Safe and Timely Interstate Placement of Foster Children Act of 2006. Roosevelt Room, The White House. Photo Release.

VICE PRESIDENT CHENEY — No public schedule.

US Senate: No scheduled events.

US House: No scheduled events.

Other: ELECTIONS-LATINOS _ 9:30 a.m. The Latino Policy Coalition and Lake Research Partners hold a teleconference to release the results of a national survey of Latino voters and discuss the midterm elections. With Jim Gonzalez, chair, Latino Policy Coalition; Celinda Lake, president, Lake Research Partners; and Dr. Fernando Guerra, director, Leavey Center for the Study of Los Angeles. Contacts: Michael Bustamante, 916-425-0839. Notes: Dial-in: 1-866-216-6835. Passcode: 116692.

NY TIMES-PROTEST _ 12 p.m. The D.C. Chapter of FreeRepublic.com and Accuracy in Media hold a demonstration to call for the prosecution of New York Times publisher Arthur Sulzberger, Jr., Executive Editor Bill Keller and reporters James Risen and Eric Lichtblau for "giving aid and comfort to al Qaeda by publishing stories exposing national security intelligence programs." Location: In front of 1627 "Eye" St. NW.

GRANNY PEACE BRIGADE _ 2 p.m. The Granny Peace Brigade, 18 grandmothers protesting the war in Iraq, hold a rally and march to mark the end of their journey from New York City. Highlights: 2 p.m. Marchers will be joined by war protester Cindy Sheehan, at Dupont Circle. Sheehan will escort the marchers down Massachusetts Avenue to the Gandhi statue at Massachusetts Ave. and Q Sts, NW, in front of the Indian Embassy. Location: Gandhi Statue, corner of Q St NW and Massachusetts.

Copyright 2006 by the Bulletin News Network, Inc. Reproduction without permission prohibited. Editorial content is drawn from thousands of newspapers, national magazines, national and local television programs, and radio broadcasts. The Attorney General's News Briefing is published five days a week for the Office of Public Affairs by BulletinNews, which creates custom news briefings for government and corporate leaders and also publishes the White House Bulletin, Frontrunner and Washington Morning Update. We can be found on the Web at BulletinNews.com, or called at (703) 749-0040.

DOJ_NMG_0038308

USDOJ- Office of Public Affairs

From:	USDOJ- Office of Public Affairs
Sent:	Monday, July 03, 2006 8:29 AM
To:	USDOJ- Office of Public Affairs
Subject:	Department of Justice News Clips for Monday, July 03, 2006
Attachments:	dojclips060703.pdf; dojclips060703.doc

DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE NEWS CLIPS

PREPARED FOR THE OFFICE OF PUBLIC AFFAIRS, US DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE

TO: THE ATTORNEY GENERAL AND SENIOR STAFF

DATE: MONDAY, JULY 3, 2006 7:45 AM EDT

TODAY'S EDITION

Terrorism News:

Congress To Work With Bush On Tribunals (FT) 2
Senators Promise Gitmo Statute (WT) 3
Lawmakers Seek Action After Ruling On Detainees (NYT) 4
Lawmakers Discuss Ruling On Tribunals (USAT) 5
Congress Faces Dilemma On Terror Trials (LAT) 6
Gitmo. How To Fix It (TIME) 8
After Hamdan (WSJ) 10
War On Terror Ruling Worries GOP Lawmakers (AP-Y2) 11
Former Justice's Influence Felt In 2006 (WP) 12
McCain Is Latest To Rip Times (NYPOST) 13
A Terror Strike, Choreographed On A Computer (NYT) 14
A Somali Taliban? (WSJ) 16

Homeland Response:

Bratton To Join Police Chiefs In Pressing Homeland Security For Intelligence (LAT) 17
Police Chiefs And Homeland Security Officials To Meet (AP) 18
Ramsey Wants More Information Sharing During Terror Threats (WRC-TV) 19

War News:

Sunnis Boycott Parliament After Colleague's Kidnapping (NYT) 20
Sunnis Boycott Iraqi Parliament Over Kidnapping Of Legislator (WP) 21
Kidnapping In Iraq Leads To Sunni Political Boycott (LAT) 22
Former Saddam Associates Top 'most Wanted' List (FT) 23
Saddam's Wife, Daughter On Wanted List (AP) 24
Details Emerge In Alleged Army Rape, Killings (WP) 26
Investigations To Nowhere (NATLREVIEW) 27
Political Strategy (NEWREP) 29
U.S.-Afghan Foray Reveals Friction On Antirebel Raids (NYT) 30
Two British Soldiers Die In Attack In Afghanistan (WP) 32
How To Help Afghanistan (WP) 33
U.S. Elite Forces Face Shortfall (USAT) 34
Iran Again Rejects Deadline On Nuclear Plan (NYT) 35
Iran Plans To Cut Gas Imports, Subsidies (WT) 35

DOJ:

Supreme Court's New Man In The Middle (CSM) 36
Disorder In The Court (TIME) 38
Hill GOP To Put Heat On Bush For More Judges (WT) 40

Corporate Scandals:

Unclear What Impact DOJ Report May Have (GUAMPDN) 41
Gutierrez Praises Report (GUAMPDN) 42
"Carl Gutierrez Had Nothing To Do With This" (GUAMPDN) .44
Abramoff: Gutierrez Wanted Black Out (GUAMPDN) 45
Tenet CEO Tries To Erase Effects Of Scandals (WSJ) 47
Austin Banker Near Victory In S&L Suit (AAS) 48
BP Traders, Attempting To `Corner' Propane Market, Lost $10 Mln (BLOOM) 50
BP Suspends Three Traders Amid Calls To Police Markets (FT) 52
Offshore Disturbance Behind Big Wall Street Failure: An Unregulated Bermuda Unit (WSJ) 52
SEC Dubious Of German Bond Deal (USAT) 56

Criminal Law:

Justice Dept. Subpoenas Jefferson's E-mails (RC) 57
Ohio's Rep. Ney Stuck In Wait-and-see Game (USAT) 57
Political Scandals Refuse To Go Away In 'Corrupticut' (WP) .59
Missouri Court Ruling Limits Names On Sex Offender Registry (SLPD) 60
Guiding Kids From Net Danger (DENP) 61
Toddler Didn't Meet Amber Alert Criteria (DMN) 62

Civil Rights:

Chabad Fight Goes To Court (MH) 63

La Tuna Inmates Say Prison Doesn't Follow Procedures (EPTIMES) 64
Fallout Felt From Texas Redistricting Ruling (WT) 67
The Flag Fetish (WSJ) 67
Flagging Rhetoric (WP) 69

Antitrust:

Kosher Slaughterhouses Investigated By Feds (APP/AP) 69
Merger Machine Keeps Churning Out Deals (WSJ) 70
Street Sleuth Countdown Starts For Satellite Giant (WSJ) 71
Intelsat To Get Much Bigger, But Not Yet Profitable (WP) 73

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

An Exodus Of Agents (TIME) 74
Despite New Allegations, Blagojevich Says Misconduct Is Limited (CHIT/AP) 74
Watchdog Rips State Hiring (CHIT) 75
Governor, It's Mr. Fitzgerald (CHIT) 78
Late Mobster's Ex-girlfriend A Key Witness (KCS) 78
Suspect Pleads Guilty To Terrorism Hoax (CHIT) 79

Immigration:

Immigration Bill: GOP Firmly Against Amnesty (WSJ) 79
Winning On Immigration (NATLREVIEW) 80
House Of (immigration) Blues (LAT) 81
Border Apprehensions Increase In 2006 (WT) 82

Congress-Administration:

Bush To Name Virginian To Lead Maritime Agency (WT) 83
Push For Government Openness On Right And Left (NYT) ... 85
Growers Reap Benefits Even In Good Years (WP) 86
Democrats Seek To Enact Lobby Reforms By Rule (RC) 89
President Wanted, MBA Not Required (LAT) 91
A New Partnership Binds Old Republican Rivals (NYT) 92

Other News:

Emanuel, Dean Still Sparring (RC) 94
GOP Claims Edge In House Races (WT) 95
In Political Waves, Tide Doesn't Rise To Same Level In Every State (RC) 96
On July 4, Where's The Voter Outrage? (RC) 97
GOP 'Suburban Agenda' Gains Traction On Hill (RC) 99
An About-Face On '527' Groups (WSJ) 100
Are Americans Ready For A Mormon President? (LAT) 101
Atlantic City Casinos Ordered To Close (AP-Y2) 103
Same-Sex Marriage Debate Drives Intense Fundraising Efforts (WP) 104
Petitions To FDA Sometimes Delay Generic Drugs (WP) 105
Weather Nixes Shuttle Launch - Again (AP) 107
Academic Manifesto Takes Root (WT) 108
Representatives Relish Being Made A Mockery (WT) 111
Glass Houses (RC) 112
If They Build It, Will Jesus Come? (WP) 113
Lessons Learned (WT) 114
We Need Fewer Secrets (WP) 115
Doctors, Lawyers, Priests -- And Journalists? (WSJ) 116
We Were Wrong About Term Limits (LAT) 117
Rank Disloyalty (NEWREP) 119
Where The Boys Aren't (WSJ) 120
What Boy Crisis? (NYT) 121
What 'Energy Security' Really Means (WP) 122
Working For A Pittance (NYT) 123
A Call To Honor The Sabbath (USAT) 124
Protecting All Waters (NYT) 125
Campaign Finance Bellwether (WP) 126
How To Educate Young Scientists (NYT) 126
Mr. Ehrlich In The Ring (WP) 127
LaRocco Engaging In Hand-to-Hand Combat (RC) 127
Broad Experience For A Tall Job: A Hipper CNBC (WP) 128

Editorial Wrap-Up:

Crisis Postponed At The U.N. (NYT) 130
Taming The Tamil Tigers (LAT) 131

TERRORISM NEWS:

Congress To Work With Bush On Tribunals (FT)

By Edward Alden
Financial Times, July 3, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0038311

The US Congress looks set to co-operate with President George W. Bush in devising rules for military commissions to try alleged terrorist detainees. This follows last week's historic Supreme Court decision that struck down the president's claim that he could set the rules on his own authority.

"He's created a real mess that now has to be cleaned up," said Senator Carl Levin, a Michigan Democrat who has been a harsh administration critic, but pledged on Sunday to work with Republicans to establish new procedures.

Senator Arlen Specter, Republican chairman of the Senate judiciary committee, said on CBS News on Sunday that he had scheduled a hearing for next week to begin the effort.

"We ought to work with the administration to try to structure rules that will comport with the Supreme Court decision but still protect national security interests," he said.

The court, in a 5-3 decision, ruled that the commissions established by the administration to try detainees currently held at Guantánamo Bay were illegal, violating both congressional rules for military trials and provisions of the Geneva conventions.

Mr Bush has insisted for more than four years that special rules were needed for terrorist detainees, rejecting the use of established military or civilian courts.

That put him into conflict with military lawyers, human rights groups and allies such as the UK and Australia.

Nine UK detainees at Guantánamo were released after the UK government led by Tony Blair, the prime minister, refused to agree to have them tried before the military commissions, insisting the procedures were illegal.

The definitive decision by the Supreme Court means that the administration could be forced to release more detainees if it cannot find a legal way to bring them to trial. While the court invited Congress to devise rules for the commissions, the task will not be simple.

The court said that the rules of evidence should be similar to those for military trials, and should meet minimum standards set out under the Geneva conventions. But Mr Specter acknowledged that the US continued to hold many detainees against whom "there is not much evidence".

Lindsey Graham, a Republican senator and former military lawyer who is an acknowledged expert on detainee issues, said on Fox News Sunday that the court's ruling on the applicability of the Geneva conventions to al-Qaeda suspects was "breathtaking".

He insisted that Congress had the power – even though the court ruled the president on his own does not – to limit the applicability of the Geneva conventions to terrorist detainees held by the US, and to devise special rules of evidence for the military commissions.

Senator Dianne Feinstein, a California Democrat, said, however, that the rules for trial must meet "the parameters" of existing military law, which offers detainees far more rights to challenge the evidence against them than the US has so far offered.

Senators Promise Gitmo Statute (WT)

By Eric Pfeiffer

The Washington Times, July 3, 2006

Senators of both parties yesterday said Congress would provide President Bush with legislation to deal with the terror suspects detained at the U.S. Naval Base Guantanamo Bay, Cuba, following a Supreme Court decision that limited the White House's authority in dealing with the detainees.

Some Republicans said they hoped to have legislation in place by September, with influential liberal Democrats saying they expected to give Mr. Bush the necessary tools for handling the issue and not obstruct the bills.

"I would hope Congress would have hearings about what to do in light of this decision," said Sen. Lindsey Graham, South Carolina Republican, during an appearance on "Fox News Sunday." "And that we will sit down together ... in August, write legislation and hopefully vote by September."

"There's nothing more important than the war on terror," Sen. Mitch McConnell, Kentucky Republican, told NBC's "Meet the Press." "I think we will have to act on this very soon, either in July or in September. Certainly, in the next couple of months."

DOJ_NMG_0038312

Sen. Jack Reed, Rhode Island Democrat, promised that his party would work with Republicans and the White House on a compromise.

"I believe we will cooperate, and I think cooperation will be required by all parties, including the president," Mr. Reed told Fox. "I think that's something that will come together in a bipartisan basis, I hope, in a deliberate and quick fashion."

Rep. Barney Frank of Massachusetts, one of the most liberal Democrats in Congress, was asked on CNN's "Late Edition" by host John Roberts whether "you believe that Congress needs to give the president the power, the latitude ... to prosecute these prisoners who were being held at Guantanamo Bay?"

"Of course. And, in fact, again, I want to stress, many in Congress have wanted to do that," Mr. Frank said.

Sen. Charles E. Schumer, New York Democrat, expressed many strong differences with Republicans and the White House, but also promised to compromise in finding a solution.

"On giving the president what he needs and giving our country what we need to fight the war on terror, there's going to be agreement," Mr. Schumer said during his appearance on "Meet the Press."

Sen. Arlen Specter, Pennsylvania Republican, told CBS' "Face the Nation" that the Judiciary Committee has already scheduled hearings on the issue, to begin next week.

"I think that we should now have hearings in the Judiciary Committee, which we've scheduled for July 11," Mr. Specter said.

Sen. Carl Levin, Michigan Democrat and Armed Services Committee member, told CBS that his panel will "have hearings in a couple of weeks."

Despite the talk of compromise, there are sharp differences between Democrats and Republicans regarding how far the Supreme Court's decision goes.

"[Thursday's] Supreme Court decision reaffirms the American ideal that all are entitled to the basic guarantees of our justice system," House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi said in a press release issued after the court's decision.

Fellow California Democrat Sen. Dianne Feinstein agreed with Mrs. Pelosi, telling ABC's "This Week," that any decision by Congress should give "detainees the rights that the Constitution provides." Mrs. Feinstein disagreed that offering enemy combatants the same legal protections as Americans would make Democrats appear weak on national security. "This is our strength. It is not our weakness."

Mrs. Feinstein also said she believes the court's decision applies to the administration's terrorist-surveillance program.

Mr. Schumer seemed to agree, telling NBC that the court's decision may have deeper implications. "We're going to have to not only look at this issue, we're going to have to go back to the other issues, as well," he said, "because this ruling undercuts some of the other things the president has done."

Lawmakers Seek Action After Ruling On Detainees (NYT)

By Robin Toner

The New York Times, July 3, 2006

WASHINGTON, July 2 — Democratic leaders argued on Sunday that the Supreme Court's rebuke of the Bush administration last week underscored the costs of President Bush's "unilateral" approach to the fight against terrorism.

They called for closer consultation with Congress and a broad review of the administration's use of executive power to combat terrorism.

Republican leaders, also making the rounds of the Sunday talk shows, called for a more limited response. They said Congress should pass legislation in a matter of months to comply with the court and give the president explicit authority to put detainees at the military prison in Guantánamo Bay, Cuba, on trial before military commissions.

The Supreme Court ruled Thursday that the military commissions the administration had planned were unauthorized by federal statute and violated international law.

Republican leaders also expressed alarm on Sunday over the court's application of a provision of the Geneva Conventions to the detainees, which they said they would seek to counter legislatively.

Both parties were treading carefully in a political and legislative terrain suddenly reconfigured by the Supreme Court. Most leaders on Sunday pledged bipartisan cooperation, but some fault lines were clear.

Senator Charles E. Schumer, Democrat of New York, said on "Meet the Press" on NBC that "this White House has felt it could just change things unilaterally." Mr. Schumer added, "Had they come to Congress a few years ago on this issue, my guess is they would have gotten most of what they wanted."

But in light of the court ruling, Mr. Schumer called on Attorney General Alberto R. Gonzales to create an independent commission to conduct "a top-to-bottom legal review of all of the administration's ongoing antiterror measures."

Mr. Schumer added, "The administration has not only largely ignored the Congress, but has also badly miscalculated how its efforts would be evaluated by the Supreme Court." Efforts to "marginalize the other two branches of government threaten to undermine, rather than promote, counterterrorism efforts," he said.

Republicans focused much of their fire on the court's ruling that a provision of the Geneva Conventions dealing with the treatment and trials of captured combatants applied to the Guantánamo detainees. Senator Mitch McConnell, the No. 2 Republican in the Senate, called it a "very disturbing aspect" of the decision that meant "that American servicemen potentially could be accused of war crimes."

Mr. McConnell, appearing on "Meet the Press," said Congress must quickly address that issue, along with creating military commissions. "There's nothing more important than the war on terror," he said, "and I think we will have to act on this very soon."

Senator Lindsey Graham, Republican of South Carolina, said on "Fox News Sunday" that he was also deeply troubled by the court's application of the Geneva Conventions.

Mr. Graham said that terrorists should be "humanely treated" but that the question was whether "Al Qaeda members who do not sign up to the Geneva Convention, who show disdain for it, who butcher our troops, be given the protections of a treaty they're not part of." He added, "My opinion — no." Mr. Graham said Congress had the ability to restrict the conventions' application to terrorism, "and I think we should."

Senator Jack Reed of Rhode Island, one of the Democratic Party's point men on national security, suggested that the court ruling was a broad rebuke to the Bush administration's expansive use of executive power in the fight against terrorism. The "most significant aspect of the case," Mr. Reed said, was "the declaration by the court that the president has to seek Congressional authority."

He added, "The president declared that he was operating in his own capacity as commander in chief, and I think the court reined him back, and I think it's appropriate."

Senator John McCain, the Arizona Republican and former prisoner of war, said on "This Week" on ABC that he was confident that "using the guidelines laid down by the Supreme Court, we can make sure that bad guys — and there are bad guys — are not released, and that those who deserve to be released will be."

Senator Arlen Specter, Republican of Pennsylvania, also called for a measured response. "It can't be handled on a sound bite on Sunday morning," Mr. Specter, the chairman of the Judiciary Committee, said on "Face the Nation" on CBS. "We have to get the details as to what the administration thinks they can do. We've got to look at the Supreme Court decision. And we have to reconcile it. But it has to be Congress because it's our constitutional responsibility."

He added, "It's not up to the president alone."

Lawmakers Discuss Ruling On Tribunals (USAT)

USA Today, July 3, 2006

Republican senators said Sunday that Congress will have to address the Supreme Court finding last week that international law applies to the Bush administration's conduct of the war on terrorism.

Sen. Mitch McConnell of Kentucky, the No. 2 GOP leader in the Senate, said the ruling that embraced part of the Geneva Conventions on the rules of war is “very disturbing” and “Congress is going to want to deal with that.” Sen. John McCain, R-Ariz., said it was “somewhat of a departure” for the court to say the international treaty applies to “stateless terrorists.”

McConnell wants Congress to deal with the Geneva Conventions issue while it addresses another aspect of the court's ruling overturning President Bush's military commissions, which were created to try a limited number of detainees from Guantanamo Bay. The justices said the commissions violate the Uniform Code of Military Justice and the Geneva Conventions, which deal with prisoners of war.

DOJ_NMG_0038314

Senior Democrats called for a broader review of whether Bush overstepped his war powers. “We're going to have to go back to other issues as well because this ruling undercuts some of the other things the president has done,” Sen. Charles Schumer of New York said.

McConnell and Schumer spoke on NBC's Meet the Press. McCain was on ABC's This Week.

Vice President Cheney's heart condition remains stable, and there have been no irregular heartbeats to activate an implanted pacemaker, according to doctors after his annual physical Saturday.

Cheney, 65, is scheduled to have a stress test on a treadmill in the fall to determine whether the blood flow to his heart is adequate, said his spokeswoman, Lea Anne McBride.

Cheney has had four heart attacks since 1978. He has had quadruple bypass surgery, two artery-clearing angioplasties and received an implanted cardioverter defibrillator in June 2001.

Congress Faces Dilemma On Terror Trials (LAT)

By Richard B. Schmitt

The Los Angeles Times, July 3, 2006

WASHINGTON — The Supreme Court decision striking down the military tribunal system for trying accused enemy combatants at Guantanamo Bay has apparently presented the Bush administration and its allies in Congress with two choices — both fraught with risk.

They can use the GOP majorities in the House and Senate to put a quick congressional seal of approval on something close to the existing system, but run the risk that it too will be struck down by the high court.

Or they can follow the path suggested by the court and devise a system embracing the procedural and other principles of the U.S. Uniform Code of Military Justice and the Geneva Convention, but risk the possibility that few, if any, of the alleged terrorists will be convicted.

And both choices, as well as attempts to chart a middle course, could set off the kind of protracted, internally divisive debate that the White House and GOP political strategists would not relish with the November elections approaching.

Indeed, Sen. Dianne Feinstein (D-Calif.) issued a warning Sunday: "Republicans will rue the day if they politicize this," she told ABC's "This Week."

Two Republican senators — prospective GOP presidential candidate John McCain of Arizona and Judiciary Committee Chairman Arlen Specter of Pennsylvania — have made clear their desire to dig into the problem.

"We're going to have to dot all the i's and cross all the t's on this legislation to make sure it passes muster," Specter said Friday.

The high court's decision has set up what may be the biggest test so far of the government's ability to reconcile maximum anti-terrorism effort with traditional American standards of legal fairness and decency. And the test has been almost five years in the making.

Since the Sept. 11 terrorist attacks, the Bush administration and its supporters have argued that extreme measures are necessary and justified against a foe that employs extreme tactics and rejects accepted moral standards. Civil libertarians, many Democrats and now the Supreme Court have argued that the war on terrorism must be waged in a manner compatible with established legal and ethical principles.

In the case of the alleged terrorists in the U.S. prison at Guantanamo Bay in Cuba, the challenge is to devise a system that will survive later judicial review yet permit successful prosecution.

Many legal experts say that will be hard to do.

"Can you set up a tribunal that will pass what we now know to be the judicial standards the Supreme Court is going to impose? The answer is unequivocally 'yes,' " said retired Rear Adm. John Hutson, a former Navy judge advocate general and the dean of Franklin Pierce Law Center.

"Is the prosecution going to be able to get convictions? I think there is a chance you won't see any," he said.

That's because a trial system capable of withstanding judicial review would probably exclude much of the evidence the government has gathered on battlefields and in prison interrogation rooms.

DOJ_NMG_0038315

The military code to which the court pointed as a roadmap is "a good framework for setting up tribunals," McCain said Sunday on "This Week" — and these legal experts agree. The Uniform Code of Military Justice mirrors many of the procedural rules of U.S. civilian courts and the bedrock principles that the court mandated last week, including the right of the defendant to be present during trial and to hear the evidence against him.

Yet experts acknowledge that one result of embracing such a system could be that few, if any, of the Guantanamo detainees whom the government has identified for trial could end up being convicted — or even tried.

The rules created for the Pentagon's military commissions, or tribunals, permit the introduction of secret evidence that defendants are not allowed to see, testimony obtained by coercion, and other material that would not be accepted in traditional legal systems.

Such evidence would probably be excluded under more traditional legal rules.

Moreover, such rules could compel the government to reveal now-secret information or give up prosecutions.

That prospect rankled Rep. Peter T. King (R-N.Y.), chairman of the House Homeland Security Committee.

"We can't be turning over evidence and discovery and giving the benefit of the doubt to terrorists in these cases," he said Sunday on CNN's "Late Edition." "This is different from other wars. This is not like capturing uniformed soldiers in World War II or the Korean War or even Vietnam."

The Bush administration contends that it is important to have trials for detainees accused of war crimes and atrocities.

With the legislative wars over the tribunals just heating up again, however, it is far from clear what path Congress will choose. Some members are believed to be pushing for a narrow fix that some experts said would skirt the intent of the high court and avoid extending broader legal protections to the detainees.

But legal experts said lawmakers and the White House were also under pressure to come up with a legally and morally defensible system to show the world that the U.S. was serious about dispensing justice to people who had been imprisoned for nearly five years at the U.S. base in Cuba.

"It is a watershed event for Congress and the president alike. They really need to decide if they want to bite the bullet and set up a system that is fundamentally fair or if they want to play the game of setting up something that is substandard and waiting another five years for the court to decide its validity," said Diane M. Amann, an international law expert at the UC Davis law school.

"I don't think they are going to have a lot of leeway to depart" from the military code, she said.

The court ruled that the tribunals failed to meet the most basic of standards for fairness under U.S. and international law. Among the flaws: denying prisoners the right to attend their own trials and thus to hear the evidence against them. Under the tribunal rules, attorneys could be present, but they would not always be allowed to convey what they learned to their clients.

Another contentious point was that detainees had no right to appeal convictions to civilian courts. Some justices also said they were concerned that the crime involved in the case before the high court — conspiracy — was not recognized under international law.

Legal experts said some of those problems would be more easily solved than others.

Congress could amend the military code to include the crime of conspiracy. Prosecutors could also use alternative, better-established theories roughly analogous to conspiracy, such as crimes associated with "aiding and abetting" offenses.

However, extending other benchmark rights — such as defendants' right to be present at their trials and to hear the evidence against them — could undercut the prosecution of detainees.

Much evidence accumulated against many detainees is based on intelligence from secret sources around the world. Officials may not want to risk a trial in which a judge might order that information be made available to the defense.

"The government's biggest problem is that the thing they want most — to protect the sources of their evidence and to avoid disclosing information to the defendants — is the thing that is most important to the Supreme Court," said Ronald W. Meister, a New York lawyer and former Navy judge advocate.

Some lawyers said there was wiggle room for defenders of the status quo.

A central part of the justices' ruling was that the administration, in designing new procedures, was bound by a section in the military code requiring that President Bush use rules for tribunals that were close to those used in criminal courts and courts-martial.

DOJ_NMG_0038316

One solution might be to eliminate that section of the law and free up Bush to impose less-demanding procedures. Such a step would probably resonate with some Republicans in Congress who have said the court has given terrorists more due process than they deserve.

But most experts said the move would defy the spirit, if not the letter, of the ruling.

"The signal that the court was giving was that the requirement of a court-martial-type proceeding is embedded both in American law and international law," Amann said. "If Congress wants to depart from that, it is going to have to make a showing of a necessity for doing so."

The court-martial model affords some strong rights for defendants. The rules of evidence are comparable to those in civilian courts. There is also a strong presumption of a public trial. Even the pretrial investigative stage of a court-martial is generally open.

The main point of departure with normal criminal courts is that the military gets to choose the jury.

Although there are procedures for closing trials when national security is involved, "there is a strong right that the accused be present and confront the person who is testifying against him," said Beth Hillman, a former Air Force officer who is a professor at Rutgers University law school in Camden, N.J.

She added that the law was clear that "the only exception for denying the defendant's presence is if he is disruptive."

With military lawyers expressing serious national security concerns about letting defendants hear certain evidence, "I can foresee the government saying, 'We just cannot go there. The court has signaled these people have to be present. We simply cannot allow them to be present,' " Hillman said.

An even bigger problem could be the handling of confessions and statements by defendants and the handling of statements that other detainees have made about defendants — crucial evidence from the government's viewpoint.

The military code forbids the use of statements that are obtained through "coercion" or "unlawful influence."

Lawyers for many detainees have said that the statements their clients gave authorities were the product of abusive techniques and torture, which would make them inadmissible.

"In order to be lawful, they would have to create a process that excluded the only evidence they have against these guys," said Joseph Margulies, a Chicago attorney who is co-counsel for one of the few Guantanamo detainees who have been formally charged. "You might be able to create a process, but there would be no evidence you could present."

Margulies' client is an Ethiopian picked up in Pakistan who, before being sent to Cuba, was interrogated in Morocco and allegedly confessed under torture to being a member of Al Qaeda. Razor blades were allegedly used against the man's genitals. Margulies said such a confession could not be used as part of a legal trial.

Some experts said that if the adoption of such standards meant some detainees were not brought to justice at a formal trial, it would be a small price to pay.

"I think we gain more than we lose by adopting courtsmartial," said Scott L. Silliman, a military law expert at Duke University law school. "If we were to adopt them, we would send a clear statement to the international community that we are still a nation under the rule of law."

Gitmo. How To Fix It (TIME)

By Nathan Thornburgh

Time, July 3, 2006

The Supreme Court's ruling in Hamdan v. Rumsfeld totals 185 pages and can be summarized in two words: Start over. If the Bush Administration wants to try terrorism suspects at Guantánamo Bay in special military tribunals, it can't just declare them legal--it needs to work with the other branches of government to make them so. That in itself was a rebuke to the Administration's claim that it alone can decide how to defend Americans from terrorism. What the court did not say--despite the exultation of civil libertarians and the outrage of advocates of executive power--is that Guantánamo has to be closed. In fact, there are plenty of people who believe it's possible to comply with the court's ruling while protecting American citizens and extracting useful intelligence from detainees. In other words, there are ways to fix Guantánamo.

1. The White House must work with Congress

DOJ_NMG_0038317

The White House finds itself in its current Guantánamo predicament because it didn't play well with the other branches of government--or even play with them at all. Republican Senator Lindsey Graham of South Carolina, a military lawyer (JAG), says he tried as recently as 18 months ago to interest the Administration in an amendment that would give tribunals congressional authorization. "I could not get agreement with the White House," Graham says. "They believed it wasn't necessary."

Now that it's beyond necessary, but legally mandated, the White House will find it has a far less compliant Congress than it would have had immediately after 9/11. Complicating matters further is that Congress is exhibiting its usual election-year pathologies. Democrats, wary of being lumped in with al-Qaeda should they introduce a bill that protects the rights of terrorism suspects, are calling on the White House to make the first move. Republican lawmakers are already divided between those eager to impress security-minded voters back home with a tough new tribunal and others, like Virginia's John Warner, who warn that moving too quickly or too carelessly might lead to another embarrassing showdown with the Supreme Court. It may take months to achieve the harmonic balance between good policy and good campaign agitprop, but any Guantánamo policy that eventually emerges could have greater certainty and legitimacy for having been forged through the chaos of democracy. "The message is that Congress has a role in the war on terror and the courts have a role in the war on terror," says Graham. "When we collaborate, all three branches, we're stronger as a nation."

2. Repatriate the small fish

"The worst of the worst" was the Bush Administration's description of the type of combatant who ends up at Gitmo. But a Seton Hall University study culled from the government's own data found that only 8% of the camp's prisoners were actually fighters for al-Qaeda. More than half were not determined to have committed any hostile act against Americans or their allies. Even Salim Ahmed Hamdan, the detainee at the center of the Supreme Court case, was Osama bin Laden's chauffeur and bodyguard--hardly the criminal mastermind that requires a country to create a maximum security prison. To its credit, the government has been trying to repatriate the less dangerous detainees as well as those who probably should never have been there. "We want to get out of the Guantánamo business if we can," State Department legal adviser John Bellinger III said in a conference call last week, "while continuing to protect ourselves and protect others."

But repatriation is tricky. Many of the detainees' home countries either refuse to take them or haven't guaranteed that they won't be tortured upon their return. Take the case of the Uighurs--five ethnic Muslims from western China--who recently left Gitmo. The State Department didn't want to send the men back to China, where they are wanted by the authorities, but after contacting scores of countries the only willing host was Albania, where no one speaks Uighur.

Regardless of the challenges, the Administration needs to continue to support the State Department's aggressive efforts to make sure that the small fish at Guantánamo move on. The logic that gave rise to the Administration's broad powers of detention, interrogation and surveillance is the logic of the worst-case scenario, of terrorist masterminds and ticking time bombs. It's consistent with that logic that a place like Guantánamo be reserved for only the most dangerous terrorists.

3. Process the habeas cases

More than 400 habeas corpus cases, in which Guantánamo petitioners are challenging the legality of their detention, are percolating around the country. Lawyers who filed some of those petitions tell TIME that they anticipate that the Supreme Court ruling will open a path for those cases to head up the chain of appeals. The Administration argues that the courts have no jurisdiction, and Congress barred judges from ruling on almost all future habeas appeals from Gitmo by passing the Detainee Treatment Act last December.

Terrorism trials in civilian courts have been a mixed bag--the prosecution of the Lackawanna and Portland cells ran smoothly, while al-Qaeda operative Zacarias Moussaoui took a federal court on a wild grandstanding ride worthy of Slobodan Milosevic or Saddam Hussein. The judges who hear the appeals may affirm that civilian courts are the wrong venue for Gitmo detainees, but the debate is too important--and too complex--to cut the judiciary out.

4. Live by the Geneva rules

The Supreme Court made it clear that the Geneva conventions afford Gitmo detainees certain trial rights. Less certain is whether Geneva rights should now extend to cover interrogations at the camp. The White House has held that unlawful combatants are to be treated humanely but are not covered by Geneva, which prohibits "humiliating and degrading treatment." Some techniques, like shackling prisoners for 24 hours and leaving them in their own excrement, are known to have been used at Gitmo and would certainly fall under that definition. Regardless of what the prevailing interpretations of the Hamdan decision are, the government would do well to read the tea leaves and begin envisioning a world in which officials will be forced by a future ruling similar to Hamdan to gather crucial intelligence while conforming to Geneva. Gitmo has always been a laboratory for the Bush Administration's edgiest ideas about how to fight the war on terrorism. Why not make it a testing ground for an interrogation policy that is both humane and clearly legal under the Geneva conventions?

DOJ_NMG_0038318

The era of Guantánamo as a fount of intelligence may already be ending, however. There is only so much intel you can glean from a man who has been interrogated for four years. The base commander, Navy Rear Admiral Harry Harris Jr., told TIME shortly before the Hamdan decision that 75% of detainees held at Gitmo no longer face regular questioning, and some haven't faced it in six months or longer. So, as with many of the other issues raised by the Hamdan case, perhaps the interrogation debate should move away from Gitmo and focus on other places around the world where the U.S. is holding enemy combatants.

5. Lift the veil of secrecy

Guantánamo has long since ceased being just a detention center for terrorism suspects. It's a symbol, and it shapes how the world views America and how Americans view themselves. While all three branches of government need to work in concert to balance the strategic and legal imperatives involved in fighting terrorism, the White House can take a huge step toward removing the discomfort about Gitmo by opening the operation to the outside world. A few journalists have been granted access to the facility following the coordinated suicides of three inmates last month, but camera crews and reporters are often hemmed in by minders and shepherded past buildings that have been the site of Guantánamo's harsher realities--the force-fed hunger strikers, the suicide attempts. If Guantánamo is legal and effective, now is the time for the government to prove it.

After Hamdan (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, July 3, 2006

America's political elites certainly have come a long way since September 11. In the wake of that bloody attack on U.S. soil, everyone clamored for the executive branch to act with energy and dispatch against our enemies. Yet last week, not five years later, many of those same voices celebrated a Supreme Court ruling that rebuked the executive in order to guarantee more rights to Osama bin Laden's former driver and bodyguard.

That is the larger context in which to read the Supreme Court's verdict in Hamdan v. Rumsfeld, which has liberal journalists waxing lyrical even in their news accounts. Only a country that feels safe once again would dare to rejoice in a ruling that could give enemy combatants the same due process rights that U.S. servicemen get in a court martial. We'll now see if Congress feels as complacent as it seeks to rewrite the rules on military commissions. * * *

As David Rivkin and Lee Casey argued on these pages Friday, the Court's ruling is not as sweeping as many commentators claim. But it is nonetheless a major Court intrusion into executive war powers and thus a setback not just for this Presidency, but, more important, for future ones.

The Court's opinion masks its own power grab by asserting that the executive must defer more to Congress in designing military commissions. But the Court's own deference to Congress is selective in the extreme, as it simply chose to ignore the clear intent of the Detainee Treatment Act that Congress passed only last December. That Act expressly denied judicial review of any habeas corpus petition "by or on behalf of an alien detained by" the Pentagon at Guantanamo.

But this would have meant the Court should not have heard Mr. Hamdan's case. So the Court's narrow five-Justice majority simply declared that the Detainee Act applied only to habeas corpus petitions filed after December 2005. Justice Antonin Scalia's dissent is withering in showing that the Act provides for no such distinction and was written by Congress partly with the Hamdan case in mind. The Court's interpretation also violates its own precedents in reading Congressional intent. The only way to read the Court's logic is that five Justices were simply determined to find a way to slap the Bush Administration, by whatever means necessary.

And we mean only five Justices. Hamdan was decided by a vote of 5-3, with Chief Justice John Roberts recusing himself because he'd previously ruled for the Administration when he was on the D.C. Circuit Court of Appeals. So in effect this was a 5-4 decision, with Justice Anthony Kennedy providing the swing vote, albeit also parting company with his liberal brethren on their most sweeping legal claims. A single liberal retirement from the Court would thus put Hamdan's reasoning in jeopardy.

DOJ_NMG_0038319

Amid all of the antiwar cheering, we should also point out what Hamdan does not do. It does not shut down the detention center at Guantanamo Bay, or question the President's right to hold unlawful combatants for the duration of hostilities. It also does not apply to most of the prisoners there -- only 10 of the roughly 450 Guantanamo detainees are immediately affected by the ruling. And it does not reclassify enemy combatants as ordinary prisoners of war, as many in the European left and ACLU would prefer.

Moreover, Hamdan affirms that military commissions are Constitutional and an appropriate part of American law. This would have been hard even for the liberal Justices to deny, given that commissions have been used in some form by strong Presidents in the past, including Washington, Lincoln and FDR.

So instead the Court declared that the Pentagon's current version of military commissions violates Article 36 of the Uniform Code of Military Justice, which provides guidelines for the rules to be followed by both military commissions and courts martial. The language of Article 36 happens to be broad and deferential to Presidential prerogatives. (Its very title is, "President May Prescribe Rules.") Yet the Justices found that the Pentagon's current rules allowed too much hearsay evidence and denied a combatant-defendant's appearance at some moments at trial.

Justice Kennedy in particular claimed to see no "practical need" for these deviations from the UCMJ. But in fact the very practical reason is to limit the access that accused al Qaeda operatives have to classified sources and methods. This is the core of the Administration's case for military commissions, which is that they are a military necessity.

As for the rules of evidence, the Court's decision could make it much harder to convict these defendants because the Pentagon often won't want to risk exposing military secrets. Thus one irony of Hamdan is that many of these combatants may end up being returned to their home countries where they may get far worse legal treatment. In any case, the Court's intrusion here is a breathtaking assertion that it knows better than an elected President how to treat enemies captured on the battlefield. Legal scholars tell us they can't recall this happening in any previous American conflict. * * *

As a practical political matter, Hamdan tosses the debate over military commissions back to Congress. Our liberal friends keep assuring us that this is the key to restoring the "rule of law." But there's a reason the Founders gave Presidents the bulk of the Constitutional power to wage war, leaving to Congress mainly the power to declare war and then finance it. The executive branch can act with speed and decisiveness that a committee of 535 simply cannot. Presidents can also be held directly accountable by voters in a way that a diffuse Congress (and especially the Supreme Court) cannot.

That's why the clamor after 9/11 was for the White House to act, and that is the period in which it established military commissions and set up Guantanamo. Now that we haven't been hit again in nearly five years, liberals want us to believe that such executive authority is more dangerous than our enemies.

We thus certainly hope the Administration presses its case for military commissions to the Congress, including just how much due process protection the Members think al Qaeda detainees really deserve. An election is coming in which the prosecution of the war on terror will again be a major issue. By all means let's debate the proper care and handling of Osama's bodyguard.

War On Terror Ruling Worries GOP Lawmakers (AP-Y2)

By Pete Yost

AP2, July 2, 2006

Two Republican senators said Sunday that Congress must rein in the Supreme Court ruling that international law applies to the Bush administration's conduct in the war on terror.

Thursday's Supreme Court decision embracing Article 3 of the Geneva Accords in the military commission case of Osama bin Laden's former driver strikes at the heart of the White House's legal position in the war on al-Qaida.

Sen. Mitch McConnell (news, bio, voting record), R-Ky., the second-ranking GOP leader in the Senate, said the 5-3 court decision "means that American servicemen potentially could be accused of war crimes.

"I think Congress is going to want to deal with that," McConnell said on NBC's "Meet the Press." He called the ruling "very disturbing."

DOJ_NMG_0038320

The Geneva Convention's Article 3 is "far beyond our domestic law when it comes to terrorism, and Congress can rein it in, and I think we should," said Sen. Lindsay Graham, R-S.C., assigned as a Reserve Judge to the Air Force Court of Criminal Appeals. Graham spoke on "Fox News Sunday."

Sen. John McCain (news, bio, voting record), R-Ariz., also expressed concern about the decision, saying it "is somewhat of a departure, in my view, of people who are stateless terrorists."

Article 3 mandates standards of treatment in cases of armed conflicts not of an international character in the territory of a contracting party, which Afghanistan is.

Article 3 prohibits outrages upon personal dignity, "in particular humiliating and degrading treatment," and bars violence, including murder, mutilation and torture.

McConnell wants Congress to deal with the Geneva Accords issue at the same time it addresses another aspect of the court's ruling overturning President Bush's military commissions created to try a limited number of detainees from Guantanamo Bay.

"I don't think we're going to pass something that's going to have our military servicemen subject to some kind of international rules," said McConnell.

Addressing the commission issue, McCain and Senate Judiciary Committee chairman Arlen Specter, R-Pa., said Congress might pose broader changes than the White House wants in trials of detainees at Guantanamo Bay.

As a starting point for debate, McCain said Congress should embrace the Uniform Code of Military Justice, the bedrock of military law protecting the rights of accused soldiers. The Bush administration has sidestepped the code for nearly five years in dealing with Guantanamo Bay prisoners it has classified as enemy combatants.

Specter said that "we have to reconcile" what the Bush administration thinks it can do and what the Supreme Court decision says.

Specter spoke on CBS's "Face the Nation" and McCain appeared on ABC's "This Week."

Many Republicans in Congress say detainees in the war on terror should not have the same legal protections as those in the military and that Congress should give its imprimatur with little or no change to the Pentagon's military commissions.

McCain agreed that justice afforded to enemy combatants "shouldn't be exactly the same as applied to a member of the military." He added, however, that the Uniform Code of Military Justice is "a good framework.

"Using the guidelines laid down by the Supreme Court, we can make sure that bad guys — and there are bad guys — are not released and those who deserve to be released will be," said McCain, a prisoner of war during the Vietnam conflict.

McCain and Specter added their voices to that of Senate Armed Services Committee chairman John Warner, R-Va., who says he is uncertain Congress should pass legislation to create new military tribunals.

"Everybody says, 'Pass legislation, pass legislation,' but we've got to make certain it's needed, and then do it with careful analysis, to get it right," Warner told The New York Times on Friday.

The Supreme Court said Bush's military commissions violate the Uniform Code of Military Justice and the four Geneva Conventions signed in 1949. Under military commission rules, the court noted, such panels may block an accused and his civilian lawyer from ever learning of evidence the prosecution presents that is classified. In addition, commissions can permit the admission of any evidence it deems to have probative value to a reasonable person.

Former Justice's Influence Felt In 2006 (WP)

By Charles Lane

The Washington Post, July 3, 2006

Justice John Paul Stevens wrote last week's Supreme Court opinion striking down President Bush's plan to put suspected terrorists on trial before military commissions.

But in a real sense, the opinion's author was Wiley B. Rutledge, the justice for whom Stevens clerked during the court's 1947-1948 term, and for whom he has expressed great admiration in the years since.

Appointed by President Franklin D. Roosevelt in 1943, Rutledge served only six years before his death in 1949. But in that time, he made a mark by arguing that the United States must respect the rights of its foreign enemies.

DOJ_NMG_0038321

His most famous dissenting opinion came in 1946, when he wrote that the majority of the court was wrong to deny a petition for habeas corpus by Tomoyuki Yamashita, the Japanese general sentenced to death by a U.S. military commission in the Philippines for atrocities committed by his troops. "I cannot believe in the face of this record that the petitioner has had the fair trial our Constitution and laws command," Rutledge wrote.

So soon after the bitter war that had begun at Pearl Harbor, it took courage for Rutledge to stand up for the rights of a Japanese commander, and he received an avalanche of hate mail, as Diane Marie Amann, a law professor and former Stevens clerk, points out in a recent Fordham Law Review article on the Stevens-Rutledge relationship.

It is hard to imagine anyone less popular in the United States than Yamashita. But the man whose case was before the court last week, Osama bin Laden's former aide, Salim Ahmed Hamdan, might qualify. Nevertheless, Stevens defended not Hamdan, but Hamdan's rights.

His opinion last week cited Rutledge's opinion and quoted from a passage in which Rutledge summarized the unfairness of Yamashita's trial, calling it "outside our basic scheme." Some of the procedures Rutledge criticized were similar to those in Hamdan's military commission trial at Guantanamo Bay, Stevens implied, especially limitations on the defendant's access to all the evidence against him.

Stevens went on to argue that the concerns of Rutledge's dissent were reflected in later changes to U.S. military law, and in the 1949 Geneva Conventions. As a result, Stevens argued, the Supreme Court's decision upholding Yamashita's conviction, "the most notorious exception" to the rule that military trials of U.S. enemies should usually give them the same rights as their American counterparts, "has been stripped of its precedential value." The origins of Stevens's opinion in the post-World War II debate underscore how thoroughly it rejected the Bush administration's military commissions and the political and military concepts upon which they were based.

Administration officials have characterized the conflict with al-Qaeda as a new kind of war in which the United States cannot afford to be constrained by the existing domestic and international legal framework.

But Stevens, 86, who served in World War II as a Naval signals intelligence officer, took the view that nothing about the current situation is so novel as to justify departing from laws that bear traces of Rutledge's Yamashita dissent. The danger posed by international terrorism, Stevens wrote, is not by itself enough to warrant "any variance from the rules that govern courts martial." Therefore, he continued, Bush's denial of Hamdan's "basic" right to see all the evidence against him and to be present at his trial "cannot be lightly excused."

In this regard, too, Stevens echoed Rutledge, whose dissent in Yamashita's case acknowledged that "we are on strange ground," but added: "If, as may be hoped, we are now to enter upon a new era of law in the world, it becomes more important than ever before for the nations creating that system to observe their greatest traditions of administering justice, including this one, both in their own judging and in their new creation. The proceedings in this case veer so far from some of our time-tested road signs that I cannot take the large strides validating them would demand."Cert Denied

The court granted review in fewer cases this term than in either of the two previous terms, according to official Supreme Court statistics released June 30. The court granted certiorari in 78 cases in the 2005-2006 term, not significantly fewer than the 80 cases it agreed to hear in the 2004-2005 term, but down about 10 percent from 2003-2004, when it agreed to hear 87 cases.

However, since the court often consolidates two or more similar cases in a single argument hour, the best measure of the court's activity is argument hours. By that standard, the drop is greater. The court agreed to hear 70.33 hours of argument in the 2005-2006 term, down 3.17 hours from 2004-2005, and down 5.17 hours from 2003-2004.

Even this term's low number was inflated, because the court extended argument by 2.33 hours in major cases on Texas's redistricting plan, the Clean Water Act, military commissions and the Vienna Convention. If it had stuck to the one-hour schedule for each, the hours would have been 68 -- a drop of 10 percent from 2003. As a result of the court's slowdown in accepting cases, the justices have scheduled 29 hours of argument for the coming term, three fewer than it needed to complete its schedule through December. Last year at this time, the court had 37 hours of argument for the coming term.

McCain Is Latest To Rip Times (NYPOST)

By Deborah Orin

DOJ_NMG_0038322

The New York Post, July 3, 2006

Sen. John McCain yesterday joined the chorus of critics who say The New York Times was wrong to out a top-secret terror money-tracking program, and he called for prosecuting the leakers.

"Tracking the money is always a vital tool, and members of Congress were kept informed and agreed to this program," McCain (R-Ariz.) told ABC's "This Week."

"So, no, I don't think [the Times] should have published it."

McCain also challenged the Times' claim that it didn't reveal any real secrets, saying, "If The New York Times thinks the story was inconsequential, the legitimate question is: Why was it on the front page?"

Asked if the Times should be prosecuted, McCain replied, "I think we should go after the leakers first."

Times executive editor Bill Keller acknowledged on CBS that "there didn't seem to be any obvious illegality" about the program.

"I don't think the threshold test is whether they've done something that's blatantly illegal or outrageous. I think you probably would like to know what they're doing that's successful as well," Keller told "Face the Nation."

A Terror Strike, Choreographed On A Computer (NYT)

By Raymond Bonner

The New York Times, July 3, 2006

JAKARTA, Indonesia, July 2 — The bombs should be small and placed in day packs, making them harder to detect. The bombers should dress like tourists. They should not bother targeting hotels because security is too tight. Instead they should consider restaurants, discos and theaters.

A thorough survey should be done in advance by the bombers themselves. That way, they are more familiar with the sites, and no one is left behind to be hunted later by the police.

"There is no escape plan because the perpetrators will become martyrs," the planning document states. "They will go to the targets and not return."

That is part of the playbook for a suicide bombing, including even a minute-by-minute choreography of the bombers' final hours. The Indonesian police uncovered the document from the computer of one of the planners of an attack last October in Bali, which killed 20 people when three men walked into separate restaurants and blew themselves up.

The document offers a rare glimpse into the minds of the most cunning terrorist plotters and of the kind of meticulous planning that lies behind their operations. It also shows what even a small, local group with few resources can do, and the difficulty of thwarting their plans.

"It tells us that these guys tried to think of every contingency," said Sidney Jones, project director of the International Crisis Group's office in Jakarta, and one of the foremost authorities on terrorism in Southeast Asia. "Even when they're being hunted, they had the capacity to think through what had to be done right down to the second."

The 34-page document, titled "The Bali Project," was found on the computer of Azhari Husin, a Malaysian-born engineer educated in Australia and Britain who became a master bomb maker and was one of the most dangerous terrorists in Southeast Asia until he was killed in a shootout with the police last November.

The document was given to The New York Times by a person who requested anonymity because it had not been officially released. It was first reported on by Tempo, an English-language weekly newsmagazine here.

Mr. Azhari's co-planner was Mohammad Noordin Top, who has narrowly escaped capture several times and remains on the run, one of the most wanted men in Southeast Asia.

The Indonesian police have said they found no evidence of any link to Al Qaeda in the Bali bombings. Members of Jemaah Islamiyah, the fundamentalist Islamic movement here, were involved, but the operation was not directed from the top of that organization, the police have said.

The document, written in six sections, sheds little new light on those links but corrects some initial speculation about the attack — that the bombs were assembled in the Philippines, for instance, and that the attack was aimed at the Indonesian government, or the Balinese economy.

DOJ_NMG_0038323

The author, who the police say they believe was Mr. Azhari himself, begins by asking, "Why Bali?" Because it will have a "global impact," he answers. "Bali is known around the world, better than Indonesia itself," the author writes. "An attack in Bali will be covered by the international media."

In Section 2, "Method of Attack," he notes that the plan must differ from the first attack in Bali, in October 2002, when a minivan loaded with explosives was detonated in front of two nightclubs, killing 202 people.

Now, "security is tighter," the author writes, noting that the police chief in Bali had increased the number of intelligence officers to 256 from 70.

The author concludes that it is too risky to bring in a truck or a similarly large amount of explosives and that it would be more difficult to rent a house with a garage to assemble a bomb. "The bomb must be smaller, and brought in ready to use," the document says.

The targets, the author writes, are "foreign tourists from America and its allies," which included all NATO countries, as well as Australia, New Zealand, South Korea, Japan, Thailand and the Philippines.

The author knew that the bombers would have trouble determining the native country of many tourists. "So, we will consider all white people the enemy," the document says.

A few weeks before the attacks, the three men who would carry out the operation were sent to Bali to do a "survey" of possible targets for themselves.

Beforehand, they were told to learn what they could about Bali, a popular tourist island, on the Internet, and to get tourist brochures from travel agents and a tourist map.

The possible targets surveyed included McDonald's, Pizza Hut, Burger King and KFC restaurants, theaters, a golf course, tattoo parlors, art galleries and souvenir stalls.

As part of their surveillance, the men were told to "pay attention to clothes worn by local tourists" and what kind of day packs or shoulder bags they carried and whether they carried more than one.

The men did their reconnaissance, then reported back.

The next section includes a question-and-answer exchange between the men and their "field commander," presumably Mr. Azhari.

The men had concluded that the bombers should not use taxis to reach their targets because a taxi driver might help with the backpacks and be suspicious of their weight.

Rather, they should take a motorcycle taxi, which offers no opportunity for the driver to talk to the passenger. As for how to dress, they decided on black shirts, below the knee shorts or jeans and exercise shoes or sandals.

They decided that discos and nightclubs offered potential targets because most of the patrons were foreigners, and there was "no security to speak of, easy to enter."

But those sites were ultimately rejected, because backpacks would be suspicious at the time of night when the clubs got crowded, after 9 p.m.

That led the men to consider restaurants in Kuta, one of the most popular tourist districts, as well as the seafood restaurants on the beach at Jimbaran. "Of all the places," the document says, "this may be the easiest, God willing."

The team explained how the tables at Jimbaran were arranged in the sand, about a yard apart with three to seven diners at each. "Almost 80 percent of the patrons are white," they said. Others were Chinese or Japanese, they noted, using a derogatory term.

The best time would be around 7:30 p.m., when the restaurants were the most crowded and a backpack would not be suspicious.

The survey team came up with four options. Mr. Azhari and Mr. Noordin, it is presumed, chose the fourth: one restaurant at Kuta Square and two restaurants at Jimbaran.

Simultaneous attacks in two locations "will have greater effect than simultaneous attacks in one location," the document states.

There was a further reason for choosing the restaurants at Jimbaran: many of the patrons were businessmen. "The death of foreign businessmen will have a greater impact than of young people," the document says.

DOJ_NMG_0038324

The backpack bombs were to be assembled by Mr. Azhari at his base in Java, and there was a serious concern about whether they could be taken on a bus to Bali without being detected. At the Bali port of Gilimanuk, where the vehicle ferry lands, passengers are required to get off and their identification cards are checked.

The backpacks with the bombs could be left on the bus — the police did not inspect baggage left on the bus, the team reported.

The team determined that the backpacks should not be mountaineering backpacks, but student day packs, to avoid suspicion. For that reason, Mr. Azhari constructed relatively light bombs weighing 10 to 12 kilograms, or 22 to 26 pounds.

He devised two elaborate detonating systems, which Section 4 of the report explains in detail, including schematic diagrams of the wiring system and drawings of a man with the wired backpack.

The first was "direct" and connected to the explosives in the backpack. The other was on "delay," for explosives in a fanny pack worn by the bombers.

The delay time was 30 seconds; the bomber would flip the switches for that one as he approached the restaurant. That way, if he were stopped by a guard and could not set off the main bomb, the fanny pack would still explode.

Mr. Azhari worried that the bombs might explode during the bus ride from the base to Bali, if the bus hit a bump or the backpack was jostled, or on the motorcycle from the boardinghouse to the targets. For that reason, he decided to use four switches as a precaution.

"It's important to make the bomb systems as simple as possible so the perpetrators don't get confused," the author wrote.

There was a green light, placed on the chest side of the left backpack strap so that it was visible only to the bomber, which would go on when the delay system had been an activated. A red light, similarly hidden on the right strap, would indicate that the main bomb was ready, and the bomber only had to flip the last switches. The order in which the switches were flipped did not matter.

In Section 5, "The Attack," the final movements of the suicide bombers are planned, in some cases to the second.

5:25 p.m. — Pack, check out of the boardinghouse and synchronize watches.

5:30 — Look for a motorcycle taxi to Legian Beach, in Kuta.

6:15 — Arrive near the Hard Rock Cafe and look for a place to pray.

6:35 — End evening prayers. Then the two groups split up.

7:21 — The man who is going to detonate his explosives in Kuta begins moving toward the restaurant, making sure the red and green lights are on.

7:33:04 — Arrive at the restaurant.

7:33:25 — Make sure the delay switches are all ready, and enter restaurant.

Meanwhile, the other two suicide bombers reach Jimbaran Beach at 6:50, loiter at a food stall until 7:30, then synchronize their watches again, and begin walking to the outdoor tables on the beach, one 45 yards behind the other. The first man walked into the table area, and the second did the same. Then, the document concludes its choreography.

7:34 — "ALLAH-U AKBAR!!!"

"We tried to minimize the impact on Muslims," the author explains in the final section, which was written after the attack. "Nevertheless, there were still Muslim victims killed and wounded."

The death toll was a relatively low number compared with the first Bali attack. Five of the 20 killed were foreigners: 4 Australians and a Japanese. Fifteen were Indonesians.

A Somali Taliban? (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, July 3, 2006

Events are going from bad to worse in the Somali capital of Mogadishu. The Islamists now running the country have also seized control in much of southern Somalia, made public their intention to declare Shariah law, and named as their leader a cleric on the U.S. watchlist for suspected links to al Qaeda.

DOJ_NMG_0038325

So it goes in the failed state in northern Africa that is beginning to look like Afghanistan under the Taliban. The world can't afford another radical Islamic state that shelters terrorists. And while it would be nice to think that Somalia's neighbors or the United Nations or NATO might do something about all this, the reality is the task will be left to the U.S.

Somalia has been without a functioning government since dictator Mohammed Siad Barre was overthrown in 1991. Warlords have since fought for political power -- most notably, to Americans, in 1993, the year of "Black Hawk Down." Eighteen American special forces were killed in a failed attempt to capture the warlord Mohammad Farrah Aidid and restore order after failed efforts by U.N. peacekeepers. Since 2004, the U.S. and U.N. have backed a transitional government whose members have bickered and accomplished nothing.

Enter the Somali Supreme Islamic Courts Council, the alliance of 12 Muslim militias that seized Mogadishu on June 5. They range from moderate to extremist, and until recently neither wing had the upper hand. So long as that was the case, U.S. officials say, it was difficult for al Qaeda to operate from Somalia without being caught in the internecine crossfire.

The U.S. says a dozen or so terrorists are hiding in Somalia, including one or two the U.S. believes were responsible for the 1998 bombings of our embassies in Kenya and Tanzania. Half of the terrorists in Somalia have been linked directly to al Qaeda. The ink had scarcely dried on last month's cease-fire agreement between the Islamists and the transitional government when the Council demoted its relatively moderate leader, Sharif Sheikh Ahmed, in favor of a former associate of Osama bin Laden, Sheikh Hassan Dahir Aweys.

One danger is that Islamist militias may next move on the northern half of Somalia. This relatively calm area is divided into semi-autonomous regions called Somaliland and Puntland and home to strategic ports. Ensuring that Somaliland and Puntland remain safe zones -- like Kurdistan in prewar Iraq -- would be a useful goal of U.S. policy, enforced if necessary with U.S. special forces. The U.S. has a joint task force in nearby Djibouti that trains African troops and helps African countries to track down terrorists.

Neighboring Ethiopia is also watching the Islamists' rise, warning against any movement into the border town of Beledweyne or into Baidoa, where the transitional government is based. Ethiopian officials say they've moved troops near the border to guard against an incursion. They also want to discourage cooperation between the Somali Islamists and Ethiopia's own hostile domestic groups.

There's no appetite in the U.S. for a large military intervention in Somalia, but that doesn't mean the new regime should think it is immune from outside attention. So here's a suggestion: Send an emissary to the new Islamist government and propose a deal: Hand over the 1998 embassy bombers, refuse safe harbor to al Qaeda operatives, do not invade Somaliland and Puntland. Agree to that, and we will be able to get along. Don't agree, and the U.S. will do what it must to disrupt any terrorist camps or terrorist activity within its borders.

Al Qaeda interpreted the U.S. retreat from Somalia in 1993 as a sign of weakness that only encouraged further attacks. The Somali Islamists need to understand that if they attempt to turn their country into another refuge for terrorists, it will end as badly for them as it did for the Taliban.

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

Bratton To Join Police Chiefs In Pressing Homeland Security For Intelligence (LAT)

By Richard Winton And Patrick Mcgreevy, Times Staff Writers

The Los Angeles Times, July 1, 2006

Chief will take part in Homeland Security meeting focusing on sharing information.

Los Angeles Police Chief William J. Bratton said Friday that he and other big-city police chiefs will meet this month with top Homeland Security officials amid complaints that the federal agency isn't doing enough to share information with local law enforcement nationwide.

The meeting was planned after big-city police chiefs expressed frustration with what they considered a lack of communication by the federal security agency about possible terror-related intelligence.

DOJ_NMG_0038326

Bratton said some chiefs raised concerns about a year ago because there have been "issues from time to time." He did not cite specifics.

This year, Mayor Antonio Villaraigosa publicly complained that federal officials didn't give him an in-depth briefing before President Bush detailed a terrorist threat on the U.S. Bank Tower in downtown Los Angeles.

"This is a critical issue for us," the chief said. "The good news is: We've seen some significant improvements in intelligence provided over the last year."

Federal officials have long hailed what they have described as the seamless relationship between the Department of Homeland Security and local police.

But, in addition to a lack of sharing, some chiefs have said they were concerned about the quality of the federal intelligence.

Bratton said is it is not so much "they don't share intelligence as they don't have intelligence."

Washington, D.C., Police Chief Charles Ramsey requested the meeting with Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff to address issues of sharing information, said Officer Kenneth Bryson, a Metropolitan Police Department spokesman.

"The chief just wants to make sure information flows accurately," Bryson said.

The meeting was first reported in the Wall Street Journal.

"It's going to be an opportunity for the secretary to sit down with the chiefs of police for major cities and talk about information sharing," said Russ Knocke, Homeland Security Department spokesman.

Chertoff, he said, wants to "listen to the concerns of the police chiefs and personally work to address the concerns."

Knocke said that last year, the federal agency provided more than 1,200 bulletins, notices and other dispatches to local law enforcement agencies.

He said the department was reviewing ways to improve the sharing of information and the quality of analysis in the shared information.

"We are the first to say there is more work to be done," Knocke said. "Information sharing is one of the most important priorities."

Bratton said changes have already been made to bolster communication between federal and local agencies.

Bratton said the 14 chiefs of the nation's largest cities have cellular phones that allow conference calls with one another and federal anti-terrorism experts at a moment's notice.

In addition, he said, more of the money to protect the nation's vital assets is being directed to Los Angeles.

The Los Angeles-Long Beach area recently received $80.6 million for antiterrorism efforts — a 14% increase over last year.

Some of that money will go toward what Bratton sees as part of the longer-term solution to disseminating counterterrorism information.

Bratton said a Joint Regional Intelligence Center is scheduled to open in Norwalk in the next month. It will be staffed by intelligence analysts from the FBI, the Department of Homeland Security, the Los Angeles Police Department, the Sheriff's Department and other agencies.

"The fusion center will become a national model. The best intelligence will be analyzed and shared from across Southern California," he said.

Bratton said he hoped that with better communication, local and federal officials could develop better information about possible terrorist risks.

The chief said any differences between local and federal officials can be ironed out.

"In Los Angeles and California, the LAPD has some of the best relationships in the country with the FBI and Homeland Security," he said.

Police Chiefs And Homeland Security Officials To Meet (AP)

The AP, June 30, 2006

LOS ANGELES - Los Angeles Police Chief William Bratton and other big-city police chiefs will meet later this month with top Homeland Security officials amid complaints that the federal agency doesn't share enough information with local authorities.

DOJ_NMG_0038327

The meeting was planned after various police chiefs expressed frustration with a lack of communication by the federal security agency about possible terror-related intelligence.

"This is a critical issue for us," Bratton said. "The good news is: We've seen some significant improvements in intelligence provided over the last year."

Earlier this year, Mayor Antonio Villaraigosa publicly complained that federal officials didn't give him an in-depth briefing before President Bush detailed a terrorist threat on the U.S. Bank Tower in downtown Los Angeles.

Beyond a lack of sharing, some chiefs have said they were concerned about the quality of the federal intelligence.

Bratton said is it is not so much "they don't share intelligence as they don't have intelligence."

Washington, D.C., Police Chief Charles Ramsey requested the meeting with Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff to address issues of sharing information, said Officer Kenneth Bryson, a Metropolitan Police Department spokesman.

"The chief just wants to make sure information flows accurately," Bryson said.

Homeland Security Department spokesman Russ Knocke said that last year the federal agency provided more than 1,200 bulletins, notices and other dispatches to local law enforcement agencies.

He said the department was reviewing ways to improve the sharing of information and the quality of analysis in the shared information.

"We are the first to say there is more work to be done," Knocke said.

Bratton said changes have been made to improve communication between federal and local agencies. He said the 14 chiefs of the nation's largest cities have cellular phones that allow conference calls with one another and federal anti-terrorism experts.

Ramsey Wants More Information Sharing During Terror Threats (WRC-TV)

WRC-TV Washington, DC, June 30, 2006

Ramsey: Information Flow Not Uniform

WASHINGTON -- D.C. Police Chief Charles Ramsey and other big city chiefs said Friday that they are not getting what they need from the Department of Homeland Security. The chiefs were complaining about a lack of information sharing during terror threats.

"We get a lot of information in. Nothing has changed in, I mean nothing has changed as far as threats and all that sort of thing. Fortunately nothing has happened -- but all it takes is one time, and then you've got yourself a big problem," Ramsey said.

Ramsey, in an interview with News4, confirmed a Wall Street Journal report Friday that Ramsey and other big city chiefs feel left out of the homeland security intelligence effort.

Ramsey confirmed the journal's report that he had written Homeland Secretary Michael Chertoff.

"I did send a letter to the secretary and he has agreed to meet sometime in July along with out key staff people, and I'll have some of the police chiefs who are also concerned. Then we'll sit down and talk about it," Ramsey said.

Ramsey said the information flow from federal officials is not uniform.

"It's kind of uneven. Sometimes it comes very quickly, sometimes it doesn't. Again, nothing major has happened, but these are kinds of issues that have to be worked out. If we sit down and work through them, it could lead to something far more serious," Ramsey said.

Ramsey's criticism comes within weeks of the city's complaint before congress that D.C. and New York were downgraded as potential terrorism targets. He said big city police need to be in step with federal security.

"I think it's time that we sit down and really explain clearly what our needs our, and then Homeland Security can sit down and really decide what it is they can provide. And if there's a gap -- how we can fix those gaps," Ramsey said.

Homeland Security told News4 Friday that it takes the concerns of the chiefs seriously and is trying to improve information sharing.

WAR NEWS:

DOJ_NMG_0038328

Sunnis Boycott Parliament After Colleague's Kidnapping (NYT)

By Kirk Semple

The New York Times, July 3, 2006

BAGHDAD, Iraq, July 2 — The main Sunni Arab political bloc began a boycott of Parliament on Sunday to protest the kidnapping of a Sunni legislator and threatened to withdraw its members from the prime minister's cabinet unless the lawmaker was freed within the next 48 hours.

The walkout was the first serious disruption in Iraq's new government and reflected the fragility of the power-sharing arrangement in the face of the relentless sectarian violence overwhelming the nation.

The legislator, Tayseer Najah al-Mashhadani, and eight of her guards were kidnapped by people suspected of being Shiite militiamen on Saturday while driving into Baghdad from her home north of the capital. Ms. Mashhadani's party, the Iraqi Islamic Party, belongs to the Iraqi Consensus Front, the umbrella Sunni bloc that holds 44 of the Parliament's 275 seats and has often criticized the Shiite-led government security forces.

In a similar attack on Sunday, officials said, gunmen ambushed a convoy carrying a Shiite legislator as it drove through a region south of Baghdad where the Sunni-led insurgency has fought regularly with government forces. The legislator, Laqa al-Yaseen, escaped unharmed, though eight of her guards were abducted and two were wounded in a shootout, said Shatha al-Musawi, another Shiite member of Parliament.

No one has claimed responsibility for either attack.

The Sunni bloc said it would continue the boycott until Ms. Mashhadani was released. Sunni politicians have occasionally used walkouts as a form of political protest, most notably during negotiations over the constitution last year, and during a wave of attacks on Sunni mosques after the bombing of a prominent Shiite shrine in February.

Representatives of Shiite and Kurdish political factions, perhaps in an effort to avert a crisis, expressed guarded support on Sunday for the Sunni bloc's concerns over security and its demand that Ms. Mashhadani be released.

Mahdi al-Hafidh, a Shiite legislator, said in a speech to Parliament that he "heartily" backed the Sunni bloc's condemnation of the kidnapping, but he suggested that a walkout was not the best solution to the problem. "When I talk to the brothers in the Iraqi Consensus Front and they want to pull out, against whom are you doing that?" Mr. Hafidh asked. "We have to work together."

Also on Sunday, the national security adviser issued the country's first most wanted list, which included 41 criminal suspects and was topped by Izzat Ibrahim al-Douri, a deputy of Saddam Hussein and one of the Iraqis whose faces were printed on a deck of cards issued by the American military three years ago. Mr. Douri is the highest ranking former Iraqi official still believed to be on the run.

The list included Mr. Hussein's eldest daughter, Raghad, who lives in Jordan, where she was granted asylum; Mr. Hussein's first wife, Sajida Khairalla Tulfa; other senior members of Mr. Hussein's now-outlawed Baath Party; and militants linked to Al Qaeda.

"These are the culprits of most of the explosions and random killings intended to cause harm to the Iraqi people and spark sectarian war between Sunnis and Shiites," Mowaffak al-Rubaie, the national security adviser, said at a news conference. "You will see that they belong to all sects in Iraq, all ethnic minorities."

Mr. Douri became the country's most-wanted man after the death of Abu Musab al-Zarqawi, the former leader of the insurgent group Al Qaeda in Mesopotamia who was killed in an American airstrike last month. Mr. Zarqawi's replacement, Abu Ayyub al-Masri, known sometimes as Sheik Abu Hamza al-Muhajer, also appeared on the list.

Iraqi and American authorities announced on Sunday that Mr. Zarqawi's body had been buried in a secret grave after the American military handed it over to the Iraqi government. An American military spokesman said via an e-mail message that the remains had been buried "in accordance with Muslim customs and traditions."

Among the acts of violence that rattled the country on Sunday, a bomb exploded just before sundown at the main market in Mahmudiya, a violent, predominantly Sunni town south of Baghdad, killing at least 5 people and wounding at least 22, the police there reported.

DOJ_NMG_0038329

The blast occurred came a day after a suicide car bomb tore through a bustling street market in a Shiite slum in Baghdad, killing at least 62 people and wounding nearly 120, in the deadliest insurgent assault since the new Shiite-led government was installed in May.

In the northern oil town of Kirkuk, a bomb planted in a road exploded near an American military patrol on Sunday, wounding three American soldiers, said Capt. Mahmoud Abdullah of the Iraqi Police.

Sunnis Boycott Iraqi Parliament Over Kidnapping Of Legislator (WP)

By Joshua Partlow

The Washington Post, July 3, 2006

BAGHDAD, July 2 -- The largest Sunni Arab bloc in the Iraqi parliament said on Sunday it would boycott the fledgling legislature to protest the kidnapping of a colleague, at a time when the prime minister is pushing a reconciliation plan aimed at bringing religious sects together and lessening the daily violence.

The decision by the Sunni Accord Front, which holds 44 seats in the 275-member parliament, threatens to pull the legislature apart. The announcement came a day after legislator Tayseer Mashhadani and seven of her bodyguards were abducted in broad daylight on a busy street in a predominantly Shiite Muslim neighborhood of Baghdad. One of the leaders of the Accord Front, Adnan Dulaimi, said the Sunni parliament members would not participate in the legislature until Mashhadani was released.

"This is outrageous and should be remedied by the government with the participation of American forces," said Dulaimi. "That she and her bodyguards would be kidnapped by criminal gangs is something that should shake Iraq."

Sunni legislators blamed the abduction on Shiite-led militias aligned with the majority political parties in Iraq. Some accused the Iraqi security forces, who were near the kidnapping site in the Shaab neighborhood, of standing by and allowing Mashhadani's convoy to be captured.

"The militias kidnapped Mashhadani, definitely," said Alaa Makky, a senior leader of the Iraqi Islamic Party. "Also, there were certain official checkpoints near this place. It raises many questions."

The decision to boycott parliament came on a day when Iraq's national security adviser issued a "most wanted" list of 41 insurgents including the wife and daughter of former president Saddam Hussein, along with many members of his Baath Party government. Mowaffak al-Rubaie said it took the Iraqi security forces nine months to compile the list, and he said they had "serious evidence on every single one of the people."

"They have killed our innocent people in their attempt to bring back Iraq to the era of dictatorship and sectarianism," he said.

Rubaie offered rewards of up to $10 million for information leading to the capture of those listed. The largest bounty was for Hussein's former deputy, Izzat Ibrahim al-Douri.

At numbers 16 and 17 on the list were Hussein's eldest daughter, Raghad Saddam Hussein, and his first wife, Sajida Khairallah Telfah, who are accused of funding insurgents. Hussein's daughter lives in Jordan, and Rubaie demanded that all neighboring countries harboring those on the list to turn them over to Iraqi authorities. But Jordanian Prime Minister Marouf al-Bakhit told the country's official news agency on Sunday that Hussein's daughter was under the protection of the royal family as an asylum seeker.

Rubaie also announced that insurgent leader Abu Musab al-Zarqawi, killed in a U.S. airstrike last month, had been buried in a secret location in Baghdad, the Associated Press reported. U.S. military officials said they had turned over the remains of Zarqawi and Sheikh Abd al-Rahman, also killed in the attack, to the Iraqi government and declined to comment further.

The Bush administration said on Sunday that it had verified that the online audio message urging insurgents to keep fighting indeed came from al-Qaeda leader Osama bin Laden. In the message, bin Laden expresses support for Abu Ayyub al-Masri, the successor to Zarqawi as leader of the group al-Qaeda in Iraq, and tells insurgents not to participate in negotiations with the government.

DOJ_NMG_0038330

Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki last month called for Sunni Arab insurgent groups to lay down their arms and asked them to return to the political fold. On Saturday, a truck bomb killed at least 66 people in a busy market in the heart of a Shiite neighborhood in Baghdad, the deadliest attack since the government took power in May.

"The major factions have refused this initiative and are not interested in it," said Hussein Falluji, a Sunni lawmaker. "This reconciliation plan is only in the prime minister's mind. It was born dead."

The violence continued on Sunday. A mortar attack hit the Muhammad Bakir al-Hakeem Hospital in the Shula neighborhood of northern Baghdad, killing eight people and wounding 16 others, said Col. Sami Hassan of the Interior Ministry.

Also, Iraqi patrols discovered 11 unidentified corpses floating in the Euphrates River between Hilla and Ramadi in western Iraq. The bodies, of men believed to be in their 20s and 30s, showed signs of torture and had gunshot wounds to the heads, Hassan said.

A car bomb targeting police exploded in the central Baghdad district of Karrada, killing two policemen and one civilian and wounding eight other people. Another car bomb near a Baghdad bus station killed three more people, police said.

A Shiite lawmaker survived an assassination attempt in the Mahmudiyah area south of Baghdad. The motorcade of parliament member Liqa al-Yaseen was attacked by gunmen, who abducted eight of her bodyguards, but she managed to escape, said Maj. Gen. Salim Khaiyon of the Interior Ministry.

Kidnapping In Iraq Leads To Sunni Political Boycott (LAT)

By Louise Roug

The Los Angeles Times, July 3, 2006

BAGHDAD — Following the abduction a day earlier of a female legislator, the largest Sunni Arab coalition announced a political boycott Sunday, as another lawmaker dodged a kidnapping attempt and a third politician survived an assassination try.

Shiite Muslim lawmaker Liqa Yaseen and her driver managed to escape kidnappers who tried to abduct her south of Baghdad, though eight of her bodyguards were taken captive, authorities said.

In the capital, Iyad Jamaluddin, a legislator from the secular Iraqiya slate, was driving to parliament when a car bomb hit his convoy. Jamaluddin escaped unharmed, but some of his bodyguards were injured in the blast, he told Al Arabiya satellite channel.

The boycott and the apparent targeting of both Sunni and Shiite politicians come at a sensitive time for Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri Maliki, whose government has sought to end sectarian bloodshed through increased security measures in Baghdad and diplomacy around the region.

However, ubiquitous checkpoints and additional security forces on the streets of the capital have failed to prevent assassinations and kidnappings that are nearly everyday occurrences in and around Baghdad. Maliki, a Shiite, was criticized for beginning a tour of the Mideast to shore up support among Sunni Arabs on Saturday — the same day a car bombing killed at least 77 people in a poor Shiite neighborhood in Baghdad.

On Saturday, kidnappers abducted Sunni lawmaker Taiseer Mashhadani and several bodyguards at a checkpoint in a Shiite neighborhood of Baghdad.

"We have decided, after careful consideration, to suspend participation" in parliamentary sessions "until her release," said Adnan Dulaimi, head of the Iraqi Accordance Front, the largest Sunni Arab bloc. Dulaimi charged that the Iraqi government and U.S. troops were allowing criminal gangs to freely roam the streets of Baghdad "as if they are the government itself," adding that Mashhadani and her bodyguards were abducted in an area rife with police.

"We demand that the government and the American forces spare no efforts to find her," he said. "She is a woman. We have the responsibility to protect her."

The Muslim Scholars Assn., another influential Sunni group, meanwhile, condemned a group of American soldiers accused of raping an Iraqi woman and then killing her, along with her mother, father and younger sister. "The rape, mutilation and killing committed by the occupation forces are crimes that shame humanity and disgrace the … American forces," the group said in a statement.

DOJ_NMG_0038331

The U.S. military recently began an investigation after two American soldiers came forward with information about the deaths March 12 in Mahmoudiya, a village about 20 miles south of Baghdad. A U.S. military official said investigators believed that the assault was premeditated and that soldiers watched the family for a week before committing the crimes, which are punishable by death.

Muayed Fadil, mayor of the area around Mahmoudiya, on Sunday said a medical examination of the victims showed that bullets had crushed the head of the father, Kasim Hamza Rasheed. His wife, Fakhriya Taha Muhsen, had been shot several times, as had Hadel Kasim, the younger daughter. Abeer Kasim Hamza, the older daughter, had been shot in the head and had burn marks on her body, according to medical records, Fadil said. Military investigators are trying to determine whether the attackers tried to burn the body to conceal the crime.

Iraqi doctors had examined the bodies in March so they could issue death certificates in accordance with Iraqi law.

Mahmoudiya is in an insurgent stronghold known as the "Triangle of Death." Last month, two U.S. Army soldiers were abducted, tortured and killed nearby. The four soldiers under investigation were from the same unit: the 502nd Infantry Regiment, which is attached to the 4th Infantry Division.

On Sunday night, eight Iraqis were killed and 22 others injured in the village when a car bomb exploded in a market. Shortly after, the market was shelled with mortar rounds, authorities said.

Three other bombs killed four people and injured 18 in separate attacks in Baghdad. In several neighborhoods, rebels clashed with soldiers and police, authorities said.

In the mixed Jihad neighborhood in western Baghdad, gunmen fought into the night in the streets near a Sunni mosque. In the last few weeks, problems have brewed in the area, which is also home to a Shiite mosque. One resident said the violence began with sectarian killings and abductions.

Police entered the Noor Sunni mosque at 1:30 a.m. Sunday, and people inside fought back, destroying several police vehicles with rocket-propelled grenades, according to authorities. A suicide bomber, apparently sent to blow himself up among the officers, failed to detonate explosives strapped to his waist. However, he managed to detonate a hand grenade, injuring himself and eight officers, police said. The bomber and his victims were brought to the same hospital, Iraqi officials said.

Near the northern city of Kirkuk, a suicide car bomber attacked police on the highway to Tikrit, killing one officer and injuring two, authorities said.

In a news conference in Baghdad, meanwhile, Iraqi national security advisor Mowaffak Rubaie released a list of the 40 most-wanted people in Iraq, including Saddam Hussein's wife Sajida Khairallah Telfah, believed to be living in Qatar, and his eldest daughter, Raghad, believed to be living in Jordan. Izzat Ibrahim, a high-ranking officer during Hussein's reign, was at the top of the list.

Rubaie also told the Associated Press that Al Qaeda in Iraq leader Abu Musab Zarqawi had been buried in a secret grave in Baghdad. He was killed last month by an American airstrike.

Former Saddam Associates Top 'most Wanted' List (FT)

By Steve Negus

Financial Times, July 3, 2006

The Iraqi government on Sunday published a "most wanted" list topped by family and former associates of deposed president Saddam Hussein who reportedly finance and direct the insurgency.

The list – planned in parallel with the government's national reconciliation plan – suggests that the government considers a reconstructed Ba'ath party to be its most dangerous foe.

"We are releasing this list so that our people can know their enemies," national security adviser Muwaffak al-Rubaie said, announcing a list that included Mr Hussein's wife Sajida Tulfah Khairallah, believed to be in Qatar, and daughter Raghad, believed to be in Jordan.

The list declared Raghad "a significant financial supporter of insurgents in Iraq, while Mrs Khairallah had "access to substantial financial assets stolen by Saddam" and was "a major source of guidance, logistical support, and funding for the insurgent leadership".

DOJ_NMG_0038332

However, at the head of the list was former vice-president Izzat Ibrahim al-Duri, the highest-ranking former regime member still thought to be at large, for whom the Iraqis offered a $10m reward. Number two and three on the list are Muhammad Yunis al-Ahmad al-Moali – said to be organising the New Ba'ath party – and Tahir Jalal Habbush al-Tikriti, former director of the intelligence services, who was said to be financing the party. A $1m reward has been offered for them and four other former regime officials.

Islamist radicals were listed substantially further down: Abu Abdullah al-Shafi and Mullah Halgurd Ahmadi of the al-Qaeda-linked Ansar al-Sunna, number 14 and 15, while the alleged new leader of al-Qaeda in Iraq, Abu Ayub al-Masri, is at number 30.

Each attracts a $50,000 bounty.

"Those people are responsible for most of the bombings and indiscriminate killings aimed at hurting the Iraqi people and starting a sectarian war between Sunnis and Shia," Mr Rubaie said, calling on neighbouring countries to co-operate in tracking them down.

Mr Rubaie announced the list on the second day of a regional trip by prime minister Nuri al-Maliki which took him to Saudi Arabia over the weekend and is also scheduled to see him visit the United Arab Emirates and Kuwait, but there is no indication that obtaining co-operation in tracking the fugitives has been on the Iraqi leader's agenda. Rather, Mr Maliki is reported to be seeking Gulf support in winning over the confidence of Sunni leaders to his reconciliation plan aimed at isolating the more radical insurgent groups from the Sunni population.

Reconciliation efforts, however, were overshadowed by violence at the weekend.

Mortar and gunfire were reported in a Sunni district in Baghdad on Sunday night, a day after a car bomb in the Shia area of Sadr city killed more than 60 people in the bloodiest attack in three months. Police said 10-15 mortar rounds hit Adhamiya, a Sunni neighbourhood in western Baghdad that has seen considerable insurgency activity.

Meanwhile, the largest Sunni political coalition – the Iraqi Accordance Front – on Sunday declared a boycott of parliament to protest at the abduction of one of their colleagues, female lawmaker Taysir al-Mashhadani.

Saddam's Wife, Daughter On Wanted List (AP)

By Bushra Juhi

AP, July 2, 2006

Saddam Hussein's wife and eldest daughter are among 41 people on the Iraqi government's most wanted list, along with the new leader of al-Qaida in Iraq, a top official announced Sunday.

National security adviser Mouwafak al-Rubaie also said the former al-Qaida boss, Abu Musab al-Zarqawi, had been buried secretly in Baghdad despite his family's demand that the body be returned to Jordan. Al-Zarqawi died June 7 from a U.S. airstrike northeast of Baghdad.

Al-Rubaie told reporters the government was releasing the most wanted list "so that our people can know their enemies."

Saddam's wife, Sajida Khairallah Tulfah, was No. 17, just behind the ousted leader's eldest daughter, Raghad. Sajida is believed to be in Qatar, and Raghad lives in Jordan, where she was given refuge by King Abdullah II.

"We have contacted all the neighboring countries and they know what we want. Some of these countries are cooperating with us," al-Rubaie said. "We will chase them inside and outside Iraq. We will chase them one after the other."

Iraqi officials have long alleged that Saddam's relatives who fled the country have been financing insurgent groups linked to the former ruling Baath party. Raghad has played a leading role in organizing her father's legal defense against charges stemming from his 23-year rule.

Jordanian Prime Minister Marouf Al-Bakhit said Sunday Raghad was not engaging in any political or media activities in Jordan.

"Raghad Saddam Hussein and her children are in Jordan for purely humanitarian reasons, hosted and protected by the Hashemite (Jordanian Royal Family) as foreigners," al-Bakhit said in remarks carried by Jordan's official Petra news agency.

Al-Bakhit said Jordan had not received any official request from Iraq with regard to Raghad's wanted status.

DOJ_NMG_0038333

The No. 1 spot on the list went to Izzat Ibrahim al-Douri, formerly Saddam's top lieutenant and the highest-ranking regime figure to elude capture. The U.S. has offered $10 million for al-Douri, who is alleged to be among the key organizers of the insurgency.

Although U.S. and Iraqi officials often draw attention to religious extremists in the insurgency, such as the members of al-Qaida in Iraq, most of those on the list had close links to Saddam's regime. They include Baath party leaders, intelligence officials and Republican Guard officers.

No. 30 on the list is Abu Ayyub al-Masri, also known as Abu Hamza al-Muhajer, who was endorsed by Osama bin Laden as leader of al-Qaida's operations in Iraq in an audiotape posted Saturday on the Internet.

The government offered a $50,000 reward for al-Masri. Last week, the U.S. administration approved a reward up to $5 million for al-Masri, who is believed to be Egyptian.

"Those people are carrying out bombings and random killings as they aim to inflict damage on the Iraqi people and ignite a sectarian war between Shiites and Sunnis," al-Rubaie said.

Al-Zarqawi was blamed for many of Iraq's worst terror bombings before he was killed.

Confirming his burial, the U.S. military said only that he had been interred "in accordance with Muslim customs and traditions." It gave no more details, saying the issue was in the hands of the Iraqi government.

Al-Rubaie told The Associated Press that al-Zarqawi's body was in a secret grave in the capital but would give no other information.

In neighboring Jordan, al-Zarqawi's older brother demanded the body be sent to his homeland and accused President Bush's administration of lying about the burial.

"Bush took his body to the United States," Sayel al-Khalayleh told AP from his home in Zarqa. "Even if he is buried in Iraq, we will continue to ask for the body to be transferred and buried in Jordan. He should be buried in his own country."

Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki, a member of Iraq's Shiite majority, was touring neighboring countries to bolster support for his new government and assure Sunni Arab leaders of his commitment to reconciliation among Shiites, Sunnis and Kurds. He met Saturday night with Saudi King Abdullah and Crown Prince Sultan, who expressed their support for his government, according to the official Saudi news agency.

Iraq's Arab neighbors fear sectarian tensions could spill over into their countries, which are dominated by Sunnis but have Shiite communities.

The Iraqi leader told the independent Kuwaiti newspaper Al-Qabas that if his government falters in the battle against terrorism, "there will be no Iraq left."

Al-Maliki's reconciliation initiative includes an offer of amnesty to many of the fighters the insurgency, which is dominated by the disgruntled Sunni Arab minority.

Spokesmen for two insurgent groups — the Islamic Army in Iraq and the 1920 Revolution Brigade — told Al-Jazeera television on Sunday that they would reject the initiative unless it included a timetable for the withdrawal of U.S.-led forces.

The spokesman for the Islamic Army, Ibrahim al-Shammari, also called for direct talks between insurgents and the United States.

Al-Maliki's government, which took office in May, has so far made little progress in healing the rift between Shiites and Sunnis, which widened dramatically after the Feb. 22 bombing of a Shiite shrine in Samarra.

The largest Sunni Arab bloc in parliament announced Sunday it was suspending participation in the legislature until a Sunni female lawmaker was freed by kidnappers who seized her and seven bodyguards in a Shiite part of Baghdad on Saturday.

Sunni politician Adnan al-Dulaimi called on other lawmakers to join the boycott, saying security officials bore responsibility for the abduction of Tayseer al-Mashhadani.

She was seized when her convoy was stopped by gunmen in a Shiite area of eastern Baghdad, just a few miles from where a car bomb blew up at an outdoor market another Shiite district, killing at least 66 people and wounding about 100.

That was the deadliest attack since al-Maliki's national unity government took office.

On Sunday, moderate Shiite legislator Iyad Jamal al-Din survived an assassination attempt when a roadside bomb missed his convoy in Baghdad.

DOJ_NMG_0038334

Details Emerge In Alleged Army Rape, Killings (WP)

By Ellen Knickmeyer

The Washington Post, July 3, 2006

BAGHDAD, July 2 -- Fifteen-year-old Abeer Qasim Hamza was afraid, her mother confided in a neighbor.

As pretty as she was young, the girl had attracted the unwelcome attention of U.S. soldiers manning a checkpoint that the girl had to pass through almost daily in their village in the south-central city of Mahmudiyah, her mother told the neighbor.

Abeer told her mother again and again in her last days that the soldiers had made advances toward her, a neighbor, Omar Janabi, said this weekend, recounting a conversation he said he had with the girl's mother, Fakhriyah, on March 10.

Fakhriyah feared that the Americans might come for her daughter at night, at their home. She asked her neighbor if Abeer might sleep at his house, with the women there.

Janabi said he agreed.

Then, "I tried to reassure her, remove some of her fear," Janabi said. "I told her, the Americans would not do such a thing."

Abeer did not live to take up the offer of shelter.

Instead, attackers came to the girl's house the next day, apparently separating Abeer from her mother, father and young sister.

Janabi and others knowledgeable about the incident said they believed that the attackers raped Abeer in another room. Medical officials who handled the bodies also said the girl had been raped, but they did not elaborate.

Before leaving, the attackers fatally shot the four family members -- two of Abeer's brothers had been away at school -- and attempted to set Abeer's body on fire, according to Janabi, another neighbor who spoke on condition of anonymity, the mayor of Mahmudiyah and a hospital administrator with knowledge of the case.

The U.S. military said last week that authorities were investigating allegations of a rape and killings in Mahmudiyah by soldiers of the 502nd Infantry Regiment, part of the 4th Infantry Division.

The mayor of Mahmudiyah, Mouyad Fadhil Saif, said Sunday that the case was being investigated by the U.S. military as an alleged atrocity.

Janabi was one of the first people to arrive at the house after the attack, he said Saturday, speaking to a Washington Post special correspondent at the home of local tribal leaders. He said he found Abeer sprawled dead in a corner, her hair and a pillow next to her consumed by fire, and her dress pushed up to her neck.

"I was sure from the first glance that she had been raped," he said.

Despite the reassurances he had given the girl's mother earlier, Janabi said, "I wasn't surprised what had happened, when I found that the suspicion of the mother was correct."

The U.S. military has not identified the victims. U.S. military officials contacted this weekend said they did not know the names of the people involved or most other details of the case, although one military official confirmed that according to preliminary information gathered by investigators, the family lived near a U.S. checkpoint and the killings happened about March 12.

The military official pointed to one discrepancy in the accounts, however. Preliminary information in the military investigation put the age of the alleged rape victim at 20, rather than 15, as reported by her neighbors, officials and hospital records and officials in Mahmudiyah.

U.S. soldiers at the scene initially ascribed the killings to Sunni Arab insurgents active in the area, the U.S. military and local residents said. That puzzled villagers, who knew that the family was Sunni, Janabi said. Other residents assumed the killings were sectarian, with Shiite Muslim militiamen as the likely culprit.

But on June 23, three months after the incident, two soldiers of the 502nd came forward to say that soldiers of the unit were responsible, a U.S. military official said last week. The U.S. military began an investigation the next day, the official said.

Officials said last week that none of the four soldiers under investigation had been detained, although one had been discharged for unrelated reasons.

Family members have given permission for exhumation of Abeer's body, Janabi and the mayor said.

DOJ_NMG_0038335

The case is at least the fourth American military investigation announced since March of alleged atrocities by U.S. forces in Iraq.

The rape allegation makes the Mahmudiyah case potentially incendiary in Iraq. Rape is seen as a crime smearing the honor of the family as well as the victim in conservative communities here.

Death certificates viewed Sunday at the Mahmudiyah hospital identified the victims as Fakhriyah Taha Muhsin, 34, killed by gunshots to her head; Qasim Hamza Raheem, 45, whose head was "smashed" by bullets; Hadeel Qasim Hamza, 7, Abeer's sister, shot; and Abeer, shot in the head. Abeer's body also showed burns, the death certificate noted.

Janabi said U.S. soldiers controlled the scene of the killings for several hours on March 11, telling neighbors that insurgents were responsible. The bodies of the victims were taken to Mahmudiyah hospital by March 12, according to Janabi and an official at the hospital, who spoke on condition of anonymity.

On March 13, a man identifying himself as a relative claimed the bodies for burial, the hospital official said. An hour after the man left with the bodies, U.S. soldiers came to the hospital and asked about the bodies, the hospital official said.

The next day, the hospital official said, soldiers scoured the area, trying to find the funeral for the family.

"But they did not find it, simply because the relatives did not do it, because the death includes the rape of one of the family members, which is something shameful in our tradition," the hospital official said.

"The family kept the news a secret, fearing the disgrace," he said. "They thought it was done by militias, not U.S. forces."

Reached by telephone Saturday at his home in Iskandariyah, south of Mahmudiyah, a member of the extended family would not discuss the incident.

"What is the benefit of publishing this story?" said Abeer's uncle, Bassem. "People will read about this crime. And they will forget about it the next day."

Investigations To Nowhere (NATLREVIEW)

By Byron York

National Review, July 3, 2006

It's probably safe to say that in October 2002, when she declared on the Senate floor that "intelligence reports show that Saddam Hussein has worked to rebuild his chemical- and biological-weapons stock, his missile-delivery capability, and his nuclear program," Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton had no idea that statements like hers would one day be the subject of a full-scale Senate investigation. Nor could she have known that when she added a statement on terrorist connections — "[Saddam] has also given aid, comfort, and sanctuary to terrorists, including al-Qaeda members" — she made it even more likely that someday her fellow senators would be poring over intelligence documents, trying to determine whether her declaration was justified on the basis of the intelligence available at the time of the Iraq War Senate debate.

And yet that is precisely what has happened. At this moment, the Senate Intelligence Committee is engaged in a protracted investigation of the public statements of President Bush, Vice President Cheney, top administration officials, lawmakers in the House and Senate, and even officials of previous administrations to determine whether they exaggerated, cherry-picked, misrepresented, or otherwise manipulated intelligence in the run-up to the war.

It's not going well. In fact, the "statements investigation" is the main roadblock to completion of what is called "Phase Two" of the committee's probe of pre-war intelligence. A look at its history is a case study in how the rationale for the war in Iraq has retroactively become hopelessly politicized — and why that is unlikely to change anytime soon.

As originally conceived in 2003, the committee's investigation was to focus on what went wrong with intelligence about Iraq's purported weapons of mass destruction. But from the beginning Democrats also wanted to investigate the Bush administration's use of the intelligence as it made the case for war. Most Republicans had no desire to go in that direction — they could see the whole thing turning into a political argument without end. Ultimately, a deal was struck. The committee would go ahead immediately with the basic intelligence investigation — dubbed Phase One — before examining the use of that intelligence in Phase Two.

Phase One was finished and the committee's report released in July 2004. To no one's surprise, it concluded that key intelligence judgments in the pre-war National Intelligence Estimate about Iraq "either overstated, or were not supported by, the underlying intelligence reporting." But it found "no evidence" that any of those mistakes were the result of political pressure from President Bush or members of his administration.

DOJ_NMG_0038336

That left Democrats with a problem: The report did nothing to further the "Bush lied" theme that they hoped might help the party in the 2004 election. So Democrats pressed on for Phase Two. "I think people want their leaders to give them straight, unvarnished statements without exaggeration," Sen. Carl Levin, the number-two Democrat on the committee, told Roll Call in July 2004. "So if people believe that the administration or the president exaggerated or embellished intelligence, I think that there will be some people [who] would say that is a factor in their vote."

But, owing to the volume of the material involved, Phase Two couldn't be done quickly, and Republicans weren't keen to make it a priority. After the election, it progressed so slowly that Democrats shut down the Senate in November 2005 to protest the lack of progress. After that, things got moving.

As agreed to by Intelligence Committee chairman Pat Roberts and ranking Democrat Jay Rockefeller, Phase Two is actually five separate investigations. The first is a reexamination of pre-war intelligence; the second is an investigation of how the intelligence community used information provided by the Iraqi National Congress; the third is a look at the administration's pre-war assessments of post-war Iraq; the fourth considers Levin's allegations that former Pentagon official Douglas Feith distorted intelligence about the connections between Iraq and al-Qaeda; and the fifth is the public-statements probe.

Today, most of those investigations are nearing completion, with the notable exception of the public-statements matter. When it comes to that, the two parties have found it hard to agree on anything. After Democrats first proposed to investigate only Bush administration officials, Roberts pointed out that many members of Congress, as well as many members of the Clinton administration, had also made statements about Iraq's supposed WMD capabilities. Just look at what Senator Clinton said. And look at Ted Kennedy, who said, "We have known for many years that Saddam Hussein is seeking and developing weapons of mass destruction." And look at Levin himself, who said, "[Saddam Hussein] has ignored the mandates of the United Nations [and] is building weapons of mass destruction and the means of delivering them." Those statements should be investigated, too, Roberts suggested.

Then the chairman really surprised the opposition. When senators evaluate each statement in light of the intelligence that was available at the time, he proposed, they should do so blindly — that is, not knowing the identity of the speaker, so they would not allow any biases to influence their judgment on the appropriateness or inappropriateness of the statement. Only after making a ruling on a particular statement would a senator learn who had uttered it.

It would not be an exaggeration to say that Democrats — behind the scenes, of course — went bonkers over that suggestion. What if they condemned a statement made by one of their own? That's not what the investigation was supposed to be about — remember "Bush lied, people died"? What had started as a way to criticize the Bush administration threatened to backfire on Democrats.

So far, the problem hasn't been resolved, and no senator has examined any statement by anybody. The Republican committee staff originally prepared a chart of 300–400 statements, consisting of the statement alongside the intelligence purportedly justifying it. At the request of Democrats, that chart has now been turned into a narrative running more than 800 pages. But it's not clear whether any senator will actually read it. Critics point out that many lawmakers never read the 90-page National Intelligence Estimate that underlay the administration's case for war. Will they plow through 800 pages now?

And what, precisely, is in the narrative? Sources won't say which specific statements are at issue. (One amusing thing about all this is that the committee is conducting a secret investigation of public statements.) But it seems clear from conversations with several sources that investigators are focusing on a predictable set of high-profile administration statements made in the months before the war.

One object of Democratic interest is President Bush's October 7, 2002, speech in Cincinnati, in which he made several specific references to Iraqi weapons programs. Democrats are also said to be focused on a speech by Vice President Cheney in Nashville in August 2002 in which he declared that "many of us are convinced that Saddam Hussein will acquire nuclear weapons fairly soon." And then there is the famous presentation by then–secretary of state Colin Powell before the United Nations, as well as then–national security adviser Condoleezza Rice's statement that "we don't want the smoking gun to be a mushroom cloud."

DOJ_NMG_0038337

So far no senator, Republican or Democrat, has made any final judgment about anything. And it seems unlikely they will agree on much. How could they? They are approaching the war from strikingly different points of view, and it seems guaranteed that they will reach different conclusions from the same set of facts — something Pat Roberts seems to have known from the very beginning. "Early on in the debate," says one source familiar with the situation, "Roberts's position [toward Democrats] was, 'We are going to end up in this room at some point in the future arguing over highly subjective judgments over whether something is substantiated, and your politics are going to drive your judgment, and our politics are going to drive ours. And we're never going to finish.'"

Political Strategy (NEWREP)

By Peter Beinart

New Republic, July 3, 2006

Why doesn't George W. Bush want to win in Iraq? Seriously. The past several weeks have forced him to choose between two big goals: demonizing Democrats to help the GOP retain control of Congress and fostering a domestic climate that gives the new Iraqi government the best chance to survive. And, again and again, he has chosen door number one. This is what ex-Bush officials like Paul O'Neill and John Dilulio warned us about--and what Hurricane Katrina reaffirmed: that what matters in this administration is not policy, but politics. For all his talk about America's historical mission to defeat tyranny and spread freedom, there is only one mission to which George W. Bush has shown consistent devotion: winning elections. He acts less like the president than like the head of the Republican National Committee.

The situation in Iraq today is desperate but not hopeless. And, in the months to come, avoiding the abyss will require brutal compromises, not only in Baghdad, but in Washington--the kind that require support on both sides of the aisle. The good news is that the basic outlines of a deal to undermine the insurgency, break up the militias, and facilitate U.S. withdrawal are becoming clear. Sunni nationalist (as opposed to jihadist) insurgents seem increasingly willing to lay down their arms--if they are granted amnesty, the constitution is rewritten to accommodate their concerns, and U.S. troops leave. And, if Sunni insurgents stop massacring the Shia, then Shia militias may begin to disband.

That's the good news. The bad news is that envisioning the outlines of a final deal is a lot easier than achieving one. Ending the Iraq war will require agonizing concessions, not only from Shia, Sunnis, and Kurds--but from Americans as well. For starters, the United States will have to resist imposing a timetable for withdrawal, even though many Americans want one and many Democratic activists are demanding one. Such a plan must come from the Iraqi government, as part of a broader agreement with the Sunni insurgents and Shia militias. If the Iraqi government tells us to leave, it strengthens them--especially among the Sunnis who want us gone the most. But if we tell them we are leaving, it looks like a vote of no confidence in their ability to survive--which might embolden the Sunni insurgents to think they can win on the battlefield and, in turn, make the Shia militias dig in their heels.

For Americans, however, resisting a public withdrawal date is only the beginning. The truly gut-wrenching part will be looking the other way if Iraq's government allows insurgents who murdered heroic young Americans to go free. In blood-soaked societies, some kind of amnesty is crucial. Amnesties helped overcome the Islamist insurgency that ravaged Algeria in the 1990s, and they helped peacefully transfer power in South Africa, through the Truth and Reconciliation Commission. Like black South Africans who saw their families slaughtered under apartheid, some Iraqi Shia and Kurds who saw their families slaughtered by Saddam Hussein will have to accept a public acknowledgement of the truth but no full justice. And some grieving American families will have to as well. The United States can get Iraqi leaders to fudge this on paper. But, on the ground, an amnesty for some violent anti-U.S. insurgents may prove crucial to persuading Sunni nationalists to break with the foreign jihadists, lay down their arms, and give Iraq's new government a chance at life.

Swallowing these concessions will require a bipartisan bargain--the kind of ceasefire required for difficult domestic changes like reforming Social Security or the tax code. Were he interested in such a deal, Bush would have invited top Democrats into his office after the formation of Iraq's new government and the death of Abu Musab Al Zarqawi and said something like this. "If you resist a withdrawal plan so the Iraqis can announce their own, I'll bring you in on the negotiations. In fact, I'll replace Donald Rumsfeld with a secretary of defense that you trust--why don't you suggest a few names. And, if you don't demagogue this amnesty stuff, I'll tell Karl Rove and his henchmen to stop calling you cowardly defeatists. That might hurt me this November, since slandering Democrats is my best chance of luring Republicans to the polls. But I'm more interested in winning Iraq than winning Ohio. And, to do that, I need your help."

DOJ_NMG_0038338

Of course, over the past several weeks, President Bush has done exactly the opposite. Rove and company immediately wielded Zarqawi's death as a partisan club, saying that, if Democrats had their way, he'd still be loose. Then the White House and congressional Republicans rigged a phony, vicious Iraq debate in Congress, which saw Republicans call the main Democratic Senate plan (which didn't include a strict withdrawal timetable) "cut and jog"--only to announce days later that the Bush administration was considering something similar itself. All of which made Democrats trying to decide what was best for the country--as opposed to merely their party--look like chumps. Partisan acrimony, already stratospheric before the Iraq debate, is now even worse. And, among Democrats, the likely result will be greater demands for a public timetable for withdrawal and louder denunciations of amnesty for insurgents. (In Tennessee, Democratic Senate hopeful Harold Ford is already running ads on the subject.) It's hard to serve the national interest when the president of the United States does not.

This has been the Democrats' dilemma all along. From the beginning, Bush has preferred the war on terrorism as a wedge issue to the war on terrorism as a unifying national cause. In 2002, he staged a fight on the Department of Homeland Security, when a bipartisan compromise could easily have been had. That fall, he told Congress he needed its support to disarm Iraq peacefully--when he was already intent on war. He has refused to seek congressional authorization for government surveillance, even though Congress would have given him most of what he wanted. In short, he has done everything in his power to alienate Democrats from an anti-jihadist struggle that, without their support, he cannot win. If Michael Moore did not exist, Bush would invent him.

Politics, of course, does not--and should not--end in times of war. But mendacious, blood-sport politics should. Instead, it has emanated from the highest office in the land. And, if we lose in Iraq, it will be a major reason why.

Peter Beinart is editor-at-large at The New Republic and the author of The Good Fight: Why Liberals--and Only Liberals--Can Win the War on Terror and Make America Great Again (HarperCollins).

U.S.-Afghan Foray Reveals Friction On Antirebel Raids (NYT)

By Carlotta Gall

The New York Times, July 3, 2006

KABUL, Afghanistan, July 2 — A joint military raid by American and Afghan forces on an unobtrusive house here in the capital on March 20 has pointed up the tensions between the American military and the Afghan Defense Ministry over the conduct of counterinsurgency raids, particularly in Kabul, the Afghan defense minister says.

The raid, in which six men were detained, was led by masked American special forces, and included eight members of a unit of the Afghan National Army. The involvement of Afghan soldiers prompted the defense minister, Gen. Abdur Rahim Wardak, who had no advance notice of the raid, to bar Afghan Army personnel from taking part in any raids on houses or compounds.

"We really are trying not to get involved in these policing jobs at all, because that would ruin" the army, General Wardak said last week. "We want to just be in support of police, but not doing a policing job."

The American military, which has in the past resisted Afghan pressure for greater control of counterinsurgency operations, defended the use of Afghan soldiers in the raid. "Depending on the intelligence received and how time-sensitive an operation is, combined forces must often act quickly, using available resources and expertise for the particular mission required," Lt. Col. John Paradis, an American military spokesman in Kabul, wrote via e-mail.

"The team was operating on very credible, detailed information, a tip, that certain individuals were linked to several anti-Afghan activities, including the use of I.E.D.'s," Colonel Paradis wrote, referring to improvised explosive devices, or roadside bombs.

Five of the men detained are sons of the head of the household, Hajji Aminullah. The brothers are well-known athletes — one a boxing champion and trainer, another a member of the national volleyball team — and never took part in fighting or politics, let alone insurgent activities, their father said. "My sons are not those type of people, to be involved in drugs or terrorism," he said. A neighbor who is a friend of the youngest son was detained but released two days later.

DOJ_NMG_0038339

The Afghan Independent Human Rights Commission has taken up the brothers' case with the American military. "The issue we are bothered with is to get a response for the father and family, who are desperately waiting for news," said Ahmed Nader Nadery, the deputy commissioner.

The men are being held in the American detention center at Bagram Air Base, near here. Like most of the 500 men held there, they have no right to know the charges against them and no access to court proceedings, a lawyer or their families, except through short notes passed by the Red Cross, which told the family the men were there.

Getting rid of the black hole that detention at Bagram represents and ending raids and other American military activities that cause resentment among Afghan civilians are aims of the government, General Wardak said.

Afghanistan is fighting the most serious insurgent activity in four years, and, with the American-led coalition, has mounted a broad offensive across five provinces.

On Sunday, two British soldiers and their Afghan interpreter were killed in fighting with insurgents in Helmand Province in the south, military officials said, and a military helicopter crashed near Kandahar Air Base. No information on casualties was available.

Despite the continuing violence, the Afghan government says that raids, detentions and attacks on civilians are causing it to lose the public trust. "We have now an understanding that we should be very careful first to rely on very correct intelligence, because there have been cases where the wrong intelligence has resulted into wrong arrests," General Wardak said, speaking in English. "We think first it is a police job to search a place, and still we would not like the foreign forces to do the searching." The Afghan authorities have to be told of any raid and before any arrest is made, he added.

"We have been talking about this for quite a while," he said. "It has been gradually improving."

Next year the Defense Ministry is to take charge of a secure wing of Pul-i-Charkhi prison, on the eastern edge of Kabul, to guard nearly 100 Afghan detainees set to return from Guantánamo Bay, he said. They will be afforded full judicial rights, he said.

Afghan Army personnel are permitted to search houses only when pursuing militants on the battlefield and when no police unit is with them to do the search, General Wardak said.

The commander of the Afghan soldiers who took part in the raid, Lt. Col. Sher Ahmed, 51, confirmed that Afghan soldiers had been ordered not to take part in future raids. "We got an order that this should be the first and last operation raiding a house," said Colonel Ahmed, commander of the Third Company, First Brigade of the Afghan Army's Central Corps.

Captain Muhammad Nabi, 46, of the Third Company, which is based here, took part in the raid. His unit had gone out that day with American forces on a patrol to Logar Province, south of here, and on their return to Kabul went to Khair Khana, a district of Kabul, and surrounded a house, he said.

The raid was uneventful. He said that as far as he knew nothing incriminating was found. Mr. Aminullah, the owner of the house, said that he went to the neighborhood mosque for evening prayers around 7:30 p.m. and that soldiers prevented worshipers from leaving the mosque until 11 p.m.

He was allowed back into his house as his five sons, Muhammad Yousuf, 35, Muhammad Mohsin, 33, Muhammad Rahim, 31, Muhammad Nassar, 28, and Muhammad Saber, 20 — were being led away. "One did not have any shoes on, so I gave him mine," he said. The soldiers had discovered a large amount of cash in the house, and Mr. Aminullah said he snatched it back, explaining that it was his own money.

Hamidullah, 21, a neighbor and close friend of Mr. Saber, who had been sitting with the brothers, was also detained. "They started kicking the gate, and we thought it was thieves," he said. "They ordered us to lie face down." Then he was stood up and questioned, he said. "They started saying: 'You have narcotics. Where is the heroin?' I said, 'If you find any heroin in my house, you can shoot me,' " he said.

"We have been neighbors for 15 years, and I told them there were never any political problems going on here or in any house around," he said.

The American soldiers confiscated the brothers' cellphones and $4,900 that a business partner had given Mr. Rahim, more than 30 videotapes, mostly Western movies and sports events, and a big bag of sports equipment, Mr. Hamidullah said. The six were taken to the army base at Darulaman, where they were held in a wood hut, furnished with Army cots and guarded by three American soldiers, Mr. Hamidullah said. They were blindfolded when taken out individually for questioning by Americans or to visit a plastic portable toilet, he said. They did not see any Afghan soldiers while there, he said.

DOJ_NMG_0038340

The next day Mr. Hamidullah was questioned about the brothers. The American interrogator told him that nothing had been found and that they would be released. he said. But after two nights at the base, he was driven out blindfolded by an Afghan translator and dropped on the main road, while the five brothers were transferred to Bagram, he said. The Defense Ministry has confirmed that the five men are there.

Mr. Aminullah said he suspected that his sons' former partner in the business deal, Abdullah Shekib Satari, had planted false information to avoid paying money he still owed them after they withdrew from a joint investment in a sports shop.

Mr. Satari, who is general secretary of Afghanistan's boxing federation and ran unsuccessfully for Parliament last year, denied in an interview in his sports shop that he had anything to do with the arrests. "They are my best friends, and I want to help them," he said. "They did not have enemies."

Two British Soldiers Die In Attack In Afghanistan (WP)

By Tini Tran

The Washington Post, July 3, 2006

KABUL, Afghanistan, July 2 -- An insurgent attack on a British base killed two soldiers and an Afghan interpreter, military officials said Sunday, while at least 20 insurgents were killed in clashes and coalition airstrikes.

An AH-64 Apache attack helicopter crashed Saturday in an accident in southern Afghanistan, killing one crew member, the U.S. military said.

The deaths came during a massive anti-Taliban campaign in southern Afghanistan involving more than 10,000 Afghan and international soldiers. It is the largest military offensive since the Taliban government was ousted in a U.S.-led invasion in late 2001.

The two British soldiers died after their base was hit by small-arms fire and rocket-propelled grenades Saturday night in southern Helmand province, said Capt. Drew Gibson, a British military spokesman.

An Afghan interpreter was also killed, according to Canadian Maj. Quentin Innis. Four other British soldiers were wounded but are in stable condition, Innis said.

Two British soldiers were killed last week in an attack in the same district of Helmand province. A total of five British soldiers have been killed since the anti-Taliban offensive, dubbed Operation Mountain Thrust, began on June 15.

Violence has spiked in recent weeks as the NATO-led International Security Assistance Force prepares to take over responsibility for security in southern Afghanistan from U.S.-led troops.

Coalition aircraft bombed a suspected Taliban hideout in southern Helmand province Sunday, killing at least nine fighters, including a Taliban area commander, Tur Jan, said Ghulam Nabi Malakhail, the provincial police chief.

Innis confirmed the attacks and estimated that 12 to 15 insurgents were killed.

In a separate incident in the same district, 11 insurgents were killed by Afghan forces Saturday night during search operations, Malakhail said. Afghan forces came under fire from suspected militants and fired back, killing the 11 fighters, he said.

The U.S. helicopter plunged to the ground shortly after taking off from the Kandahar airfield while responding to a reported rocket attack against the air base, the military said in a statement.

One crew member was killed, and the other was injured and evacuated for treatment.

"The cause of the crash will be investigated, but we have ruled out enemy fire as a cause for the loss of the aircraft," the statement said.

There were no injuries reported from the rocket attack, the military said.

The continued violence has stirred fears among British lawmakers that security is rapidly deteriorating in Afghanistan. Britain has 3,300 troops involved in the current military offensive.

The insurgents are following the lead of fighters in Iraq and carrying out suicide attacks and roadside bombings that once were rare in Afghanistan.

DOJ_NMG_0038341

"There are signs that the tactics that have brought such devastation to Iraq are being replicated in Afghanistan," the Foreign Affairs Committee of Britain's House of Commons said in a report Sunday on the foreign policy aspects of the fight against terrorism.

How To Help Afghanistan (WP)

By Ahmed Rashid

The Washington Post, July 3, 2006

KABUL, Afghanistan -- The current political and military meltdown in Afghanistan was entirely predictable and avoidable. For the past three years Afghans, their president, Hamid Karzai, and foreign experts have been warning that the failure of the United States and the international community to provide sufficient economic, military and reconstruction resources to the fledgling Afghan government would lead to a Taliban resurgence and disillusionment among the Afghan people. That is exactly what has happened.

But there is still a way out of the mess if the international community and the Afghans pull together, rather than being at odds with one another. Karzai set the ball rolling late last month by calling for a joint strategy in a critical meeting with the most important foreign players in Kabul.

The situation is dire. The Taliban offensive in the south and the counteroffensive by British, Canadian and U.S. troops under NATO has escalated into a full-scale war, with a dozen attacks every day and 700 lives lost since mid-May. Most Afghans are angry with the United States and the West for ignoring the alleged sanctuary provided to the Taliban by Pakistan, and with Pakistani President Pervez Musharraf for apparently supporting Karzai and the Taliban at the same time.

Papering over the cracks between Pakistan and Afghanistan, as Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice tried to do in her recent visit to the region, is clearly not enough. The charges and suspicions on both sides have to be addressed. Ordinary Afghans say the Taliban virus is spreading. The Taliban have been reported just 25 miles from Kabul, and they have attacked in the north and the west -- hundreds of miles from their main bases in the south. According to the United Nations, every single day somewhere in Afghanistan a girls' school is burned down or a female teacher killed by the Taliban.

The riots in Kabul in late May that left 20 people dead were also indicative of how angry Afghans are at their own government. While Karzai has lashed out at the West for not providing adequate resources, Afghans and foreigners have been scathing in their criticism of his inability to govern effectively or to punish those in his administration who are corrupt or dealing in drugs.

Karzai has failed to put together an effective administrative team. The cabinet is dysfunctional, and his growing dependence on former warlords, whose militias have only recently been disarmed, is seen by many as a betrayal of the reform agenda set out in the Bonn agreement of 2001.

Karzai is right when he says that Afghanistan has received less aid than has been dispensed in any recent conflict including nation building, whether in the former Yugoslavia or East Timor. Building a new security apparatus run by Afghans is going too slowly. According to American officials, the U.S.-sponsored police training program is three years behind schedule, although Washington will provide $1.2 billion this year to equip 60,000 police officers nationwide.

A U.S. commitment to build a new Afghan army has been stymied by the irresponsible decision of Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld mandating an Afghan army that will be smaller than originally planned, with fewer weapons and with the cash-strapped Afghan government, rather than the Americans, having to pay the troops' salaries. (What a great morale booster for Afghan army recruits facing a full-blown insurgency!)

But saving Afghanistan from itself is the world's responsibility, not just that of the United States. The Europeans and the Americans differ on military and economic priorities and on the advice being given to Karzai. As NATO, with its large European troop contingents, replaces U.S. troops in the south and the east, the United States has to learn to share decision-making responsibilities in Afghanistan with NATO, the European Union and the United Nations, rather than cut its own secret deals in Kabul.

The United Nations has had the unenviable task of fulfilling the political mandate chalked out at Bonn, but today Afghanistan does have an elected president, parliament and provincial councils, and a constitution. Now the Security Council needs to give the U.N. officials in Kabul the responsibility for coordinating the international response to the crisis and economic and political strategies with the Afghan government.

DOJ_NMG_0038342

Karzai addressed some of these issues in a recent meeting with the major players -- the United States, United Nations, European Union, NATO, Britain and Canada. He is determined that his government and the international community will coordinate better to devise a joint strategy looking at both the insurgency and at how reconstruction can be speeded up. He also needs to think long and hard about what constitutes good governance and set an example that his countrymen can admire rather than protest.

Despite all the dire predictions made in 2001, the Afghans have given the international community, its aid workers and soldiers a large window of opportunity to repair the damage done by 25 years of war. That window, which has stayed open for nearly five years, with amazing good will from the Afghans, is threatening to close unless the world wakes up and deals with the crisis.

Ahmed Rashid, a Pakistani journalist, is the author of "Taliban" and "Jihad: The Rise of Militant Islam in Central Asia."

U.S. Elite Forces Face Shortfall (USAT)

By Tom Vanden Brook

USA Today, July 3, 2006

WASHINGTON — The Army, Navy and Air Force face shortages of elite special operations forces that are playing a leading role in the war against terrorism, military records show.

The shortfall of Army special operations, Navy SEALs and Air Force combat controllers persists as the Pentagon seeks to expand the forces by 15% over the next four years to bolster the anti-terrorism campaign.

One reason for the shortage is the intense training. The Navy says only 35 of 166 candidates will qualify as SEALs.

Retention also is a problem. Some veterans can make $780 a day as civilian security contractors in Iraq, says Rep. Jim Saxton, R-N.J., chairman of a House Armed Services subcommittee that oversees special operations troops. Bonuses as high as $150,000 have helped stanch that loss, he says.

The shortfalls affect:

•The Navy. It has 2,352 SEALs but is authorized for 2,684, says the Naval Special Warfare Command. Another unit of special warfare combatants has 563 people; it is authorized to have 653.

•The Air Force. It has filled 504 of 616 jobs for combat controllers who direct airstrikes; rescuers of wounded troops behind enemy lines; and combat weather forecasters.

•The Army. It has acknowledged a shortage of troops but won't give a precise number. The Army Special Operations Command said this year that it would take a few years to return “Army special forces units to full strength.” The Government Accountability Office, the investigative arm of Congress, reported in 2005 that the Army had filled only 2,922 of 3,834 spots for sergeants in four Special Forces categories: intelligence, communications, engineering and medical.

The U.S. Special Operations Command says it has about 17,000 troops.

Pentagon officials say they can overcome the current shortfall and achieve the planned additions, the largest expansion of elite forces since the Vietnam War, with more trainers and more recruits.

“These are specialized skills and units that will be grown over time and in such a fashion that ensures they retain the highest quality and capability,” said Bryan Whitman, a Defense Department spokesman.

Michael Vickers, a former Army special operations officer, agreed. “There's always a risk of diluting quality,” but elaborate selection and training processes help prevent that, Vickers said.

Lt. Taylor Clark, a spokesman for the Naval Special Warfare Command, said it won't be easy to find more SEALs. The lures include a $40,000 bonus for graduates — and adventure.

“Instead of an office job where they might have a cubicle and do the same job day in and day out, you … will be a part of an elite team that travels the world looking for the bad guys,” Clark said.

There have been some early signs of success. The Army's Green Berets had hoped to have 750 graduates per year by 2006. It exceeded that goal by 40 soldiers in 2005.

DOJ_NMG_0038343

In 2005, the military began offering bonuses up to $150,000 to 19-year veterans with special operations experience who sign up for six more years. The Army gave the bonus to 118 soldiers last year and 99 this year, the Pentagon said.

Iran Again Rejects Deadline On Nuclear Plan (NYT)

By Nazila Fathi

The New York Times, July 3, 2006

TEHRAN, July 2 — Iran on Sunday again rejected a deadline to respond to an international proposal to end the standoff over its nuclear program, saying it would respond a month.

"We do not consider such statements as constructive and invite them to wait for our answer until next month," said Hamidreza Assefi, the Foreign Ministry spokesman, the ISNA news agency reported.

The next month in the Iranian calendar begins July 23. Mr. Assefi was responding to a statement made at a meeting of the Group of 8's foreign ministers on Thursday in Russia, during which they demanded Iran make a "clear and substantive" response to the proposal in a week. President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad had previously said Iran would give its answer around Aug. 23.

"We will take into account our country's rights and interests and will also try to alleviate the other side's concerns," Mr. Assefi said.

In June, Javier Solana, the European Union's foreign policy chief, offered Iran a package of proposals from Germany and the five permanent members of the United Nations Security Council: China, Russia, Britain, France and the United States. Diplomats have said it includes political and economic incentives and a promise to help develop Iran's nuclear program in return for its suspending nuclear enrichment.

Mr. Assefi said Sunday that Iran's chief nuclear negotiator would meet with Mr. Solana on Wednesday to discuss the package.

In their statement, foreign ministers from the Group of 8 nations — United States, Russia, France, Germany, Italy, Canada, Britain and Japan — demanded a response from Iran to the proposals by Wednesday. The ministers said they expected that response to come when the Iranian negotiator, Ali Larijani, and Mr. Solana meet. Mr. Assefi said the offer had ambiguities that needed to be discussed. He said Europe should be thankful that Iran was "examining the proposal with such a positive attitude and precision."

In a separate news conference on Sunday, the minister of intelligence, Gholamhossein Mohseni-Ejei, linked the arrest of an Iranian-Canadian philosopher, Ramin Jahanbegloo, to what he said were efforts by the United States to start a "soft revolution" in Iran. Mr. Jahanbegloo has been jailed since late April, when he was arrested at the Tehran airport.

"The United States is pursuing efforts to start soft revolution in Iran and in many other countries and Mr. Jahanbegloo's arrest can be defined as part of that," ISNA quoted Mr. Mohseni-Ejei as saying.

"Mr. Jahanbegloo had an assignment and the intelligence apparatus became suspicious at the scale of his activities and resources" at his disposal, he said.

Mr. Jahanbegloo has not been allowed to see a lawyer. Independent human rights groups have said his arrest was politically motivated.

Iran Plans To Cut Gas Imports, Subsidies (WT)

By Andrea R. Mihailescu

The Washington Times, July 3, 2006

Iran, which relies on imports for almost half its refined petroleum products, plans to halt those imports and introduce gasoline rationing later this year, the government announced.

The decision appears related to a plan to allow the nation's heavily subsidized gasoline to spike in price in order to reduce the smuggling of fuel to neighboring countries, a practice that aggravates shortages and costs the country billions of dollars every year.

Analysts think Tehran may be acting to reduce its vulnerability to any international sanctions on its gasoline imports over its nuclear program. But similar attempts to lift subsidies on key commodities in other countries have sparked widespread unrest, and one Iranian member of parliament has said the government will not dare to go ahead with its plan.

DOJ_NMG_0038344

Iran is the world's second-largest producer and exporter of crude oil, but its antiquated refineries are able to meet barely 60 percent of the domestic demand, according to government figures. Production stands at 10.5 million gallons a day, compared with daily demand standing at 18.5 million gallons.

Heavy subsidies -- which keep gasoline prices as low as 9 cents to 45 cents a gallon, depending on the quality and location -- meanwhile allow for huge profits on gasoline smuggled into neighboring countries, such as Afghanistan, Iraq, Pakistan and Turkey.

Iranian Oil Minister Kazem Vaziri Hamaneh announced June 23 on state television that the government planned to stop importing gasoline as of Sept. 23.

"As there is nothing provided for petrol imports in the second half of this [fiscal] year's budget ... the imports will naturally stop and petrol will be rationed," Mr. Hamaneh said.

Iran had been expected to spend $5 billion importing refined oil products in 2006. But the parliament budgeted only $4 billion for the purpose and, then in February, slashed that to $2.5 billion.

At the same time, the parliament backed a government initiative to limit the number of people permitted to purchase gasoline at subsidized prices, an initiative that has not been implemented.

In any event, prices generally will be permitted to rise in hopes of reducing the pressure on existing supplies by slowing the smuggling of Iranian gas into neighboring countries.

Iranian press last month quoted Gen. Ali Soltani, director of the campaign against economic crimes in Iran, complaining about the problem. "Every year, [310 million gallons] of refined oil products worth $1.18 billion are smuggled abroad," he was quoted as saying.

"Last year, we seized more than [13 million gallons] of oil products, which is equal to only 10 days of the trafficked amount," Gen. Soltani said.

Iraq, Iran's western neighbor, acted earlier this year to end a heavily subsidized gasoline program that was established during the rule of Saddam Hussein. Iraq also has become a recipient of Iran's cheap fuel.

The fuel smuggled from Iran is colored pink, while that from the refineries in Iraq has a clear color. Because substitution of inferior Iranian fuel is frequent, motorists typically smell and rub a sample of gasoline between their hands to see whether it has been watered down and color added before sale.

Afghanistan is another recipient of smuggled Iranian fuel. The Iranian newspaper Mardom-Salari cited the Baztab news agency on June 6 as reporting that nomadic tribes on both sides of the border are actively transporting oil products to Afghanistan. Fuel thieves typically carry barrels full of oil products across the border at night.

The newspaper said many passenger buses also have concealed fuel tanks. Fuel thieves also use animals as a means of transport.

The long Pakistan-Iran border also is wide open to smugglers, despite denials from Pakistani officials. Smugglers pass through the checkpoints unchallenged and untaxed.

DOJ:

Supreme Court's New Man In The Middle (CSM)

By Warren Richey

The Christian Science Monitor, July 3, 2006

WASHINGTON

The US Supreme Court has grownmore conservative with the addition of President Bush's two nominees, Chief Justice John Roberts and Justice Samuel Alito. But it will be a third justice, Anthony Kennedy, who will likely decide how far to the right the law moves under the new lineup of justices at the nation's highest court.

"Kennedy now holds the center of gravity on the court," says Jonathan Turley, a constitutional law professor at George Washington University. Prior to her retirement in January, Justice Sandra Day O'Connor was frequently called the most powerful woman in the country. As a centrist on the nine-member Supreme Court, she often cast the fifth and deciding vote in some of the nation's most contentious and important cases.

DOJ_NMG_0038345

In years past, Kennedy shared the swing-vote designation with O'Connor. But with her departure he occupies the court's decisive center alone. That puts Kennedy in an even more powerful position than O'Connor, legal analysts say.

"He who casts the decisive vote is going to be the person with all the power," says Michael Dorf, a constitutional law professor at Columbia University Law School in New York.

Tom Goldstein, a Washington lawyer who has argued 16 cases at the Supreme Court, described Kennedy's emergence at a recent gathering of the American Constitution Society. "The basic principle you should understand is it is Justice Kennedy's world and you just live in it."

Kennedy's power was on full display last week when he joined the court's liberal wing to forcefully strike down President Bush's plan to put terror suspects on trial before military commissions at Guantánamo Bay, Cuba.

In other actions during the term, he cast the decisive vote in a case that makes it easier for convicted criminals to get another chance to present claims of innocence to a judge. He sided with the court's liberals in rebuking former Attorney General John Ashcroft for attempting to use his rule-making power to invalidate Oregon's physician-assisted suicide law. And he provided the decisive fifth vote to invalidate a congressional district in Texas drawn to protect an incumbent Republican.

On the conservative side, Kennedy provided the key fifth vote to uphold a Kansas death penalty statute that allowed the imposition of a death sentence even when jurors found that aggravating and mitigating factors concerning the crime and the defendant were evenly balanced. He voted with the conservatives to limit the scope of federal authority to protect the nation's water resources under the Clean Water Act. And he provided the decisive vote to eliminate application of the exclusionary rule to evidence obtained by police who fail to knock and announce their presence before bursting into a private home with a search warrant.Kennedy more reliable for the right

While such results demonstrate Kennedy's power to break deadlocks, they understate his role at the high court, legal analysts say.

Compared with O'Connor, Kennedy is a much more reliable vote for the conservative wing, analysts say. But they add that when he swings to the liberal side, he really swings.

One example was Kennedy's landmark opinion in a 2003 gay rights case called Lawrence v. Texas. The same characteristic came to the fore last Thursday in the Guantánamo military-commission case.

"He is not by nature a balancer, so when he comes out on the liberal side he is going to come out forcefully that way," says Professor Dorf, who clerked for Justice Kennedy in the 1991-92 term. "It is also because he has more of a libertarian streak than O'Connor," Dorf says.

Although Kennedy is clearly the swing justice now, he would hate being described as such, Dorf says. Kennedy does not position himself to wield a tie-breaker. "It is more that his substantive views end up placing him precisely in the middle of this court," Dorf says.

Professor Turley agrees. Kennedy, he says, is more likely than was O'Connor to try to maintain a consistent and coherent line in the law while breaking 4-to-4 ties.

But such consistency also comes at a price. When the high court deadlocked 4-to-4 this term over how to interpret the Clean Water Act, Kennedy sided with the conservatives enough to send the case back to the lower courts. But in a concurring opinion, he also expressed agreement with aspects of the liberal view of the case, staking out and defining a middle ground occupied by Kennedy alone.

The result is that very little was decided, and lower courts will be left to struggle through that indecision. In addition, environmentalists are worried about the scope of federal protection of remote wetlands, and developers are facing increasingly expensive delays and uncertainty.A check on the conservative wing

Others see in Kennedy's middle way a useful check on the conservative proclivities of the newly reconstituted high court. In his majority opinion in the police knock-and-announce case, Justice Antonin Scalia appears to be laying the foundation for a broader assault on the exclusionary rule, which prevents illegally gathered evidence from being presented in court.

DOJ_NMG_0038346

In response, Kennedy, who provided the key fifth vote in that case, wrote in a concurring opinion that "the continued operation of the exclusionary rule, as settled and defined by our precedents, is not in doubt."

The sentence sent a clear signal to conservatives hoping to do away with the exclusionary rule, and to liberals hoping to protect it.

While the 2005 term was a time of transition at the high court, the stage is now set for what could become a blockbuster term next fall. The docket already includes cases dealing with global warming, punitive damage limits, affirmative action in public schools, and a federal ban on so-called partial-birth abortions.

In the affirmative action and abortion cases, analysts expect the court to split 4-to-4. The result: all eyes will be on Kennedy.

"Those briefs could just be mailed directly to his chambers," Turley says.

Disorder In The Court (TIME)

By Jeffrey Rosen

Time, July 3, 2006

Ordinarily the Supreme CourtÂ is not very much like The View. You won't hear much of the Justices' inner thoughts, let alone their outer ones. And with the exception of perhaps the Dalai Lama or, in his day, Alan Greenspan, they are the only people in power who can deliver their opinions and then steadfastly refuse to elaborate on them. Everything about the court's rituals is meant to keep the Justices behind the red velvet curtains and their emotions in check.

The first year of the Supreme Court under John Roberts, though, has not been ordinary. As evidenced last week when the court struck down the Bush Administration's use of military tribunals, the Justices are suddenly unafraid to talk to one another in personal terms. "We are not engaged in a traditional battle with a nation-state, but with a worldwide, hydra-headed enemy," wrote Clarence Thomas in an impassioned dissent. Thomas felt so strongly--he called the majority decision "unprecedented and dangerous" -- that for the first time in his 15 years on the court, he read his dissent aloud. The ordinarily genial Stephen Breyer responded indignantly that the court did not "weaken our Nation's ability to deal with danger." Congress, he added, "has not issued the Executive a 'blank check.'"

The pointed back and forth was characteristic of the sometimes barbed, often unpredictable and really quite fun Roberts court. It began with a surprising number of unanimous decisions, but by the time it adjourned for the summer last week, in what Justice John Paul Stevens called a "cacophony" of discordant voices, the usual decorous costume drama that is a Supreme Court term had morphed into something much closer--in vitriol, tension and drama--to a soap opera (O.K., a PBS soap opera). Having spent 11 years without a change in personnel, the Justices were clearly rejuvenated by two new colleagues, Roberts and Samuel Alito, and the energy fueled their opinions. Although the alliances on the Roberts court are still fluid, even the longest-serving Justices are debating issues that matter to the American people--the limits of death penalty, the war on terrorism--with unusual passion.

Despite the impression left by its rush of final decisions, the Roberts court is, at least so far, less fractured than the court led for 19 years by William Rehnquist. Almost half its decisions this year had no dissents, compared with 38% in Rehnquist's final term, and the tally of 16 cases decided by a 5-to-4 vote is seven fewer than under Rehnquist. That is a tribute to the personality and leadership skills of Roberts, who has made issuing strong decisions and encouraging collegial debate top priorities. In a commencement speech at Georgetown University Law Center in May, Roberts opened with some high-quality lawyer jokes, then set out his goals as Chief Justice: unanimity or near unanimity, which he thought would promote "clarity and guidance for lawyers and lower courts trying to figure out what Justices meant."

Roberts emphasized that a good court should decide cases narrowly so Justices on both sides can reach a meaningful consensus. But he added an important qualifier: "There will of course be disagreements on the court, and these could and should not be artificially suppressed." Roberts practiced what he preached in his three dissents, using often forceful prose. "It is a sordid business, this divvying us up by race," he declared last week in the partisan-gerrymandering case, which left all but one of Texas' redrawn congressional districts in place. Earlier in the term, he attacked an opinion by Justice David Souter that held that a wife couldn't give the police permission to search a house over her husband's objection. "The majority reminds us, in high tones, that a man's home is his castle," Roberts wrote, "but even under the majority's rule, it is not his castle if he happens to be absent, asleep in the keep, or otherwise engaged when the constable arrives at the gate."

DOJ_NMG_0038347

Souter responded in kind. "In the dissent's view, the centuries of special protection for the privacy of the home are over," he announced with an uncharacteristic note of melodrama. Having abandoned his famous Yankee reserve, he started to make a habit of it. During oral arguments in the Gitmo case, the government's lawyer seemed to suggest that Congress could suspend the writ of habeas corpus--which allows prisoners to challenge the legality of their detentions--inadvertently. Souter, incredulous, asked, "Isn't there a pretty good argument that a suspension of the writ [by] Congress is just about the most stupendously significant act that the Congress of the United States can take? The writ is the writ!" Antonin Scalia, one of the most reliable defenders of Executive power, insisted that Congress could suspend habeas corpus even if it didn't say so explicitly.

That mini courtroom brawl between Souter and Scalia, which had the overtones of an 18th century boxing match, was picked up again in the final days of the term. By a 5-to-4 vote, the court upheld a death-penalty verdict in Kansas, and Souter filed an agonized dissent listing recent cases in which DNA testing had led to innocent people's exoneration. Dripping with sarcasm, Scalia chided Souter for encouraging the "sanctimonious criticism of America's death penalty" that he said was common in "some parts of the world." "I say sanctimonious," Scalia added, "because most of the countries to which these finger waggers belong had the death penalty themselves until recently."

Scalia is famous for picking intellectual street fights on and off the court, and this year he has been even more pugnacious than usual. In March, Scalia ridiculed the challenge to military tribunals during a speech in Switzerland. "Give me a break," he declared. "I had a son on that battlefield, and they were shooting at my son, and I'm not about to give this man who was captured in a war a full jury trial. I mean, it's crazy."

A few weeks later, when a Boston reporter asked whether his participation at a Mass for Catholic lawyers might raise questions about his impartiality, Scalia fanned the fingers of his right hand under his chin. "That's Sicilian," he said, explaining that the gesture meant he "could not care less."

Scalia can always be counted on to pick a fight, but what has changed this year is that other Justices, once relative wallflowers, are increasingly emboldened to fire back in kind. In February, Ruth Bader Ginsburg, ordinarily a model of judicial composure, gave a speech in South Africa attacking critics in Congress who have assailed her citations of international law as an offense against U.S. sovereignty. Those criticisms, she said, "fuel the irrational fringe" and have encouraged threats on her life. She singled out Scalia, who had called the consultation of "alien law" a form of "sophistry."

Is the recent round of attacks and counterattacks a sign of internal animosity? Not necessarily. Ginsburg and Scalia, after all, are old friends, united by their love of opera and good cooking. For years they have spent New Year's Eve together, along with their spouses. (Ginsburg's husband Marty often cooks.) Certainly, there's nothing on the Roberts court resembling the antagonism among the Justices that raged after World War II. Consider the blood feud between Hugo Black and Robert Jackson, both appointed by Franklin Roosevelt. Jackson thought F.D.R. had promised to promote him to Chief Justice, but after a vacancy arose in 1946, Black threatened to resign if Jackson became Chief. That led Jackson to fire off an unhinged letter to President Harry Truman and Congress, accusing Black of unethical behavior. The '40s produced another nasty rivalry: Felix Frankfurter was so intellectually condescending to Chief Justice Fred Vinson that during one of the Justices' private conferences, Vinson rose from his seat and nearly punched Frankfurter in the nose. After Vinson died unexpectedly of a heart attack while the court was deciding Brown v. Board of Education in 1953, Frankfurter declared on the train back from the funeral, "This is the first indication I have ever had that there is a God."

By contrast, the Justices of the Roberts court are able to attack one another vigorously in public while maintaining cordial relations in private. Thomas, for example, has told students groups that he has never heard an uncivil word uttered at the Justices' conferences during his time on the court. And despite the disagreement in the military-tribunals case, Thomas is on good terms with his ideological opponent Breyer, who has praised Thomas' skills as a lawyer and photographic memory in technically complicated cases.

It's a good thing for the court and the country that the Justices of the Roberts court seem to be finding a way to disagree vigorously without taking it too personally. During his confirmation hearings, Roberts said, "It's my job to call balls and strikes and not to pitch or bat." Nevertheless, the court under his leadership will continue to decide some of the most momentous questions of American life. It has already agreed to hear important cases next term on the boundaries of affirmative action and abortion. Those are questions about which all the Justices have extremely strong views, and the fact that they are not shy about expressing them helps citizens on both sides of the issues feel as though their own views have been strongly represented and thoroughly aired.

DOJ_NMG_0038348

Still, the Roberts court is walking a delicate line. History suggests that the moment the Justices begin to take their legal disagreements too much to heart, the court may fracture in ways that even the most capable Chief Justices are unable to repair. For that reason, all the Justices might do well to remember Ginsburg's advice for keeping your cool in the face of attacks. "I sometimes find myself alone in chambers momentarily distressed or annoyed," Ginsburg told actress Marlo Thomas in 2002, "thinking, I'd like to strangle Justice So-and-So." At times like that, Ginsburg said, she remembers the advice of her mother-in-law on her wedding day: "Of course, it is important to be a good listener--but it also pays, sometimes, to be a little deaf."

> Rosen's latest book is The Most Democratic Branch: How the Courts Serve America (Oxford University Press)

Hill GOP To Put Heat On Bush For More Judges (WT)

By Charles Hurt

The Washington Times, July 3, 2006

In coming weeks, Republicans on Capitol Hill plan for the first major push on judges since Chief Justice John G. Roberts Jr. and Justice Samuel A. Alito Jr. were confirmed to the Supreme Court.

In the nearly six months since Justice Alito was confirmed, only 14 federal judges have been seated. That's the slowest six-month period since early 2004, according to documents kept by the Department of Justice's Office of Legal Policy.

The plans for renewed emphasis on judges comes after a consortium of conservative leaders expressed deep displeasure with both the White House and Republican leaders on Capitol Hill in recent months over the slowed pace of confirmations.

"We write to remind you of your duty, but also because we are concerned that if the Majority that assured the confirmation votes of Chief Justice Roberts and Justice Alito lose just one seat in the next election, the future of the Supreme Court and the federal appellate bench will again be imperiled by the use of filibusters," the conservatives wrote in a letter to Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist, Senate Majority Whip Mitch McConnell and other Republican leaders in the body.

In particular, said the conservatives led by former Frist aide Manuel Miranda, Republicans' best hopes for keeping their majority in the Senate could rest on the issue of judges.

"We write because we fear that the Majority is ignoring the impact of the nominations debate on its ability to gain the support of those small margins of voters that the Majority needs to secure unobstructed confirmations," they wrote.

The 83 signers of the letter also include such conservative icons as Paul Weyrich, Alan Keyes, Richard Viguerie, Abigail Thernstrom, David A. Keene, L. Brent Bozell III and Bill Donohue.

Efforts to draw attention to the federal bench got a boost last week with the Supreme Court decision that the administration had overstepped its constitutional boundaries by using military tribunals -- rather than civilian courts -- to try enemy combatants held at the U.S. Naval Base Guantanamo Bay, Cuba.

Conservatives think that most American voters support Mr. Bush's efforts to fight the war on terror and that the high court's ruling will underscore yet again how out of touch the court is. Also, the decision caused something of a conundrum among liberal advocacy groups, who hailed the ruling after years of dire warnings about the consequences of allowing Mr. Bush to put people on the Supreme Court like Justices Roberts and Alito.

On the day of the ruling, People for the American Way issued a statement calling it a "major defeat for the Bush administration" and a "victory for the rule of law."

Later that same day, the group issued a second press release about the court's term in general. Instead of listing all of what it sees as disastrous rulings by the Bush court that it had been predicting for so long, the group instead warned that "next year's cases could signal acceleration of the ultraconservative trend."

Just last week, Mr. Bush sent 10 judicial nominations to the Senate, including names for four seats on U.S. courts of appeals.

DOJ_NMG_0038349

The nominations were announced shortly after Senate Judiciary Committee Chairman Arlen Specter, Pennsylvania Republican, told The Washington Times that he couldn't understand what was taking Mr. Bush so long to offer new nominations.

"Not only am I expecting it, I've been expecting it for about six weeks," he said.

"There is an issue here as to how long we're going to be able to confirm judges," Mr. Specter said. "You know the Democrats are salivating to take over the Senate, and if they think they can take over the Senate, it would be a very different confirmation process if [Vermont Sen. Patrick J.] Leahy is the chairman."

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

Unclear What Impact DOJ Report May Have (GUAMPDN)

By Sunmi Kang

Guam Pacific Daily News, July 3, 2006

The fallout over the federal investigation of a possible link between disgraced lobbyist Jack Abramoff and former Democratic Gov. Carl Gutierrez remains unclear.

The U.S. Department of Justice on Friday issued a report on the replacement of Frederick Black as the island's U.S. Attorney, in which lobbyist Jack Abramoff told investigators he was helping Gutierrez get rid of Black. Gutierrez on Saturday denied those allegations.

Former Guam delegate and Democratic gubernatorial candidate Robert Underwood, in a phone interview from Seattle, said the case warrants further investigation. In particular, he said, inquiries should be made into whether Abramoff received monetary compensation of any kind and where that money might have come from. Gutierrez on Saturday said he nor his administration never paid Abramoff for any lobbying efforts.

Underwood went on to say that if any additional information of a conspiratorial nature is revealed in subsequent investigations, those responsible should be prosecuted. Accountable "First of all, the voters should hold them accountable and secondly the law should hold them accountable," he said.

While Underwood had no comment on how the report might affect voters in the upcoming elections, he said now is a critical time for voters on island.

"People have to decide at some point how (the administration) is going to be," he said. "Is it going to be open and transparent or is it going to be closed and manipulated?"

Republican Gov. Felix Camacho, who is running for reelection, yesterday in a written statement declined to comment on the report, saying it is inappropriate to comment on an ongoing federal investigation.

On the issue of the report and this year's gubernatorial elections, Camacho's office said: "The governor believes that people will make an informed decision based on the character of candidates, their records and the issues."

Delegate Madeleine Bordallo could not be reached for comment yesterday, her office said. The Pacific Daily News also tried to reach Lt. Gov. Kaleo Moylan, who's running for governor, but was unsuccessful in its attempts.

While some are calling for more comprehensive investigations, others contend reaction to the Justice Department report is still premature.

Antonio Charfauros, chairman of the Democratic Party of Guam, said it is still too early to tell whether the federal report will be negative or positive for the party itself. However, he said the report will most likely not bode well for the Gutierrez campaign down the line.

"Once people start digesting this information, the impact will be probably be very negative," he said.

Negative light Charfauros, who has already started fielding calls about the report, said whether this puts one candidate at an advantage over the other is anyone's guess.

Charfauros said any investigation, let alone one on a federal level, does not reflect well on the party in the public's eye.

"People don't want to see anymore negative issues like this to come out," he said.

He said the gubernatorial election will be determined by votes from independents — some 10 to 15 percent of the voting population, Charfauros estimated.

Though the recently released report has stirred more than a few political pots, most residents seem ambivalent. For them, they say, it's politics as usual.

"I don't think (the report) is going to impact voters too much," said 39-year-old Sinajana resident Jeanette Concepcion. "I think people already have decided who they want to vote for and they are going to stick with that."

Concepcion said she is disdainful of the mud-slinging political tactics.

Concepcion said though she will vote in the gubernatorial election, she is weary of the divisiveness and chronic problems.

"I just wish everyone had a common goal," she said, to work together for a better community. She said politicians should pay more attention to issues like the state of the economy and the quality of life here.

Tamuning resident 44-year-old Richard Waters, who considers himself an independent voter, said island politics have been too marred by nepotism and corruption.

"It's follow(ing) the family tree," he said.

While public reaction to the report remains lukewarm, more questions are bound to be raised over time, Underwood said.

"It is not the future of individual parties that's at stake," he said. "It's our confidence in our own ability to govern that's at stake."

Gutierrez Praises Report (GUAMPDN)

By Gaynor Dumat-ol Daleno

Guam Pacific Daily News, July 3, 2006

Former Gov. Carl Gutierrez yesterday praised a recently released federal investigation into the removal of former acting U.S. Attorney Fred Black, saying Black's smear of his replacement, Leonardo Rapadas, is a "prime example of his operations."

Gutierrez yesterday released a written statement responding to the report, accusing Black of blocking local attempts at self-government. During a Saturday interview with the Pacific Daily News, Gutierrez denied statements in the Department of Justice report that lobbyist Jack Abramoff was working on his behalf to get Black removed.

Gutierrez in yesterday's statement acknowledged meeting with Abramoff during a dinner in the nation's capital, where the topic of Black's nomination came up, but he did not elaborate on what happened after that, saying only that he found it "interesting" that Abramoff wanted to meet him. A Justice Department Office of Inspector General report, released Friday in Washington, D.C., states that Abramoff told federal investigators he began working on behalf of Gutierrez, who was governor at the time, to lobby for the removal of Black when certain Gutierrez administration officials were under federal investigation.

According to e-mails from Abramoff cited in the report, Gutierrez and former Sen. Mark Charfauros wanted a business associate of Gutierrez's son-in-law to replace Black. But when Abramoff's lobbying group found out the selection of Lenny Rapadas as U.S. Attorney for Guam and the Northern Marianas was well under way before its lobbying, Abramoff still took credit for the removal of Black and the selection of Rapadas, according to the report.

In one e-mail, he told a lobby shop colleague to "spin, spin, spin" that their lobbying had led to the replacement of Black and selection of Rapadas.

"Abramoff's e-mails confirm that in later February 2002, he became involved on Gutierrez's behalf to oust Black from the interim U.S. Attorney position," according to the federal report, issued after an investigation based on allegations from Black. Black had also sought to become nominated to the U.S. Attorney position in a permanent capacity, according to the report.

Abramoff strategy Because the Bush administration, which ultimately makes the nomination for U.S. attorney, would prefer a political appointee who is supported by Republicans at the local level, the report says part of the Abramoff strategy against Black was to paint him as a local Democratic supporter.

Abramoff said he was provided a copy of a letter Gutierrez had written years earlier, when the White House was under the Democratic leadership of President Clinton. In the letter, Gutierrez had described Black as a "good Democrat," according to the report.

Upon receiving the old Gutierrez letter, Abramoff sent it in an e-mail to members of his lobbying team who handled Guam and Northern Marianas issues, according to the federal report. Abramoff e-mailed the letter to Michael Williams, Todd Boulanger, Tony Rudy and Kevin Ring, Abramoff associates at lobby shop Greenberg Traurig. Abramoff and Rudy have pleaded guilty in a broadening influence-peddling case in the nation's capital.

The report states Abramoff, in the Feb. 25 e-mail, described Black as "a total commie," who "has been bashing the CNMI nonstop in the past ... we need to get this guy sniped out of there."

The U.S. Attorney's Office under Black had pursued corruption-related prosecutions involving members of the Gutierrez administration. Several members of the Gutierrez administration had been charged in federal court, and some of them, including former Gutierrez Chief of Staff Gil Shinohara, have been convicted.

Dinner meeting Gutierrez, in his statement yesterday, said he first met Abramoff at a February 2002 dinner in Washington, arranged by Charfauros, a self-proclaimed friend of Abramoff.

In the Justice Department's Inspector General report, Charfauros was identified as Abramoff's main contact on Guam to link to Gutierrez.

Gutierrez's press release yesterday states he met Abramoff while attending a National Governors' Association meeting.

The federal report said, based in part on information from Abramoff, that before the Gutierrez-Abramoff dinner, Abramoff had been working alongside Guam Republicans.

In his press release yesterday, Gutierrez said: "Mark Charfauros told me that Jack Abramoff wanted to meet his most formidable foe in Guam."

"Back then, I didn't know the extent of Abramoff's involvement in the 1998 election fiasco, and I thought it was interesting that he wanted to meet me. I never refuse to meet with anyone, including adversaries," Gutierrez added.

In 1998, when it appeared Gutierrez and his Republican opponent, Joseph Ada, would face off in a runoff election, Abramoff had offered a campaign strategy, according to Pacific Daily News files. The runoff didn't materialize because of a court ruling that paved the way for Gutierrez to serve his second term. Gutierrez is running for governor in the November election, with running mate Democrat Sen. Benjamin J. Cruz.

Gutierrez said the other attendees of the February 2002 dinner with Abramoff were:

Former first lady Geri Gutierrez;

Gutierrez son-in-law Chris Stahl, Carla Gutierrez Stahl and their daughter Lilly;

Former Sen. Charfauros and his wife;

Former Guam Army National Guard Adjutant Gen. Benny M. Paulino and wife Bernie;

Former Gutierrez administration Deputy Chief of Staff Joshua Tenorio;

Former Commission on Decolonization Executive Director Leland Bettis and wife Melissa; and Former Gutierrez Washington staff members John Whitt and Mary Eva Candon.

"At the dinner, Gutierrez recalled that Abramoff raised the subject of Black recommending himself for the U.S. Attorney position in Guam, saying that Black was claiming to be a member of the Republican Party," according to Gutierrez's press release yesterday.

Gutierrez in the press release said he told Abramoff that he had signed a letter in January 1995 to former President Clinton recommending Black to be U.S. Attorney. "Contrary to what Fred Black reported to investigators, he was the one that approached me about signing a letter of recommendation he had drafted," Gutierrez stated.

Black was off island over the weekend when the Pacific Daily News contacted him for comment, but his continuing employment as a part of the U.S. Attorney's Office on Guam, albeit with a diminished role, bars him from giving media interviews, he has said.

Charfauros on Saturday told the Pacific Daily News he disputed the federal report linking Abramoff and Gutierrez to a plan to remove Black. Charfauros said while he did ask his friend Abramoff for help in securing a confirmed U.S. Attorney for Guam, he did not work with Gutierrez on the matter.

'Blatantly racist' The federal report, which is based on an investigation stemming from allegations by Black, also states that Black has given unfavorable comments about other previous candidates for U.S. attorney for Guam and the Northern Marianas.

In that context, Gutierrez yesterday saw the report in a positive light.

DOJ_NMG_0038352

"I am very pleased that the Department of Justice has issued this report, which exposes the inappropriate attempts by former acting U.S. Attorney Fred Black to block the appointment of any local attorney to be U.S. Attorney. It is scathing by all counts and further supports my contention that Fred Black abused his authority as the acting U.S. Attorney. Fred Black successfully eliminated any local candidates for U.S. Attorney for 11 years by alleging that all potential candidates had connections to family members who were suspected of corruption. This is blatantly racist," Gutierrez said.

"The bottom line is this -- for 11 years Fred Black smeared Guam's political leaders and the people of Guam as being corrupt," Gutierrez said yesterday.

On Saturday, Gutierrez denied ever pushing for a business associate of his son-in-law as Black's replacement, as stated in the report.

The report states Abramoff's March 2002 e-mails reflect Gutierrez and Charfauros favored an attorney from the Washington, D.C., law firm Patton Boggs for Guam U.S. attorney.

"Abramoff told the (Office of Inspector General) that the attorney had worked with Gutierrez's son-in-law on a business matter," according to the report.

The report did not mention the Patton Boggs attorney's name.

Stahl, Gutierrez's son-in-law, was president of a company, GIPR, that was on contract as a marketing consultant for the local government's attempt under the Gutierrez administration to sell the Guam Telephone Authority. Stahl worked with Patton Boggs in the GTA privatization, but their joint efforts were unsuccessful in selling the government phone company. GTA was privatized in January 2005, two years after the Gutierrez administration left office.

According to a local government audit, GIPR was paid about $1.7 million in fiscal years 2001 and 2002, while Patton Boggs was paid about $903,000 in fiscal 2002 for its involvement in GTA privatization attempts, according to Pacific Daily News files.

"Carl Gutierrez Had Nothing To Do With This" (GUAMPDN)

By Steve Limtiaco

Guam Pacific Daily News, July 2, 2006

Charfauros disputes DOJ report on Black

Former Democratic Sen. Mark Charfauros yesterday acknowledged that he probably was lobbyist Jack Abramoff's closest friend on Guam, but he disputed a U.S. Department of Justice report released yesterday, linking Charfauros and former Gov. Carl Gutierrez to a plan to remove interim U.S. Attorney Frederick Black.

According to the report, investigators found a January 2001 e-mail from Charfauros to Abramoff, stating that Gutierrez would be unofficially "funnelling" his candidates for U.S. Attorney and judiciary appointments through Abramoff's office.

Charfauros yesterday evening said he did ask his friend Abramoff for help in securing a confirmed U.S. Attorney for Guam, but said he was not working with Gutierrez on the matter and did not send the e-mail stated in the report. "No way. I'd like to see that e-mail. That didn't happen. I never filed any kind of e-mail, saying that nominations are gonna come out of Carl Gutierrez. Carl Gutierrez had nothing to do with this whole issue," Charfauros said.

According to the report, Abramoff spoke to Gutierrez at a dinner in the nation's capital, and said he was aware that Gutierrez wanted Black removed from his position, "in part because of an ongoing corruption investigation Black's office was pursuing into the activities of certain members of the Gutierrez administration."

According to the report, Abramoff's e-mails confirm that in February 2002 he became involved on Gutierrez's behalf in a plan to remove Black.

Charfauros, who once was chairman of the legislative judiciary and criminal justice committee, said he always was interested in getting someone confirmed to the U.S. Attorney job on Guam, and said it did not matter who that person was.

"We have never had the ability to have the clout in Congress to confirm a U.S. Attorney for Guam," he said.

He said he went to his friend Abramoff for help. "Me and Jack's relationship was purely friendship... And this is an issue which is really unfair for Jack because he did this for no pay."

Charfauros also disputed the statement in the report that he hates Black.

"I don't think I hate Fred Black. The only thing I can say about Fred Black was there was a choice between Fred Black and Lenny Rapadas, and the only one I felt was gonna make it was gonna be Lenny Rapadas. He was the only guy I felt would get a confirmed nomination."

Charfauros, who in 1997 was sued by the Gutierrez family for slander, and who countersued them, yesterday described his relationship with the former governor, saying he wanted Gutierrez investigated because of allegations of wrong-doing. He said he started to "think twice" after federal investigations yielded no convictions against Gutierrez.

"I asked that Carl Gutierrez be investigated, and this investigation was done extensively and nothing came out of it. If I was gonna take this any further, then it would basically be personal, and it was never really personal," Charfauros said.

Abramoff: Gutierrez Wanted Black Out (GUAMPDN)

By Gaynor Dumat-ol Daleno, Dionesis Tamondong

Guam Pacific Daily News, July 2, 2006

Disgraced lobbyist Jack Abramoff has told federal investigators and said in e-mails that he worked on behalf of then-Gov. Carl Gutierrez to remove Frederick Black from being the top federal prosecutor on Guam, a new federal report states.

In a Feb. 25, 2002, e-mail, Abramoff wrote Black is "a total commie ... and has been bashing the CNMI nonstop in the past ... we need to get this guy sniped out of there." The e-mail is quoted in the newly released U.S. Department of Justice Office of Inspector General report from Washington, D.C.

Gutierrez late yesterday said he never asked Abramoff to help oust Black from his position. "I've never tried to get Fred Black removed," said Gutierrez, a gubernatorial candidate in this year's election. "As a matter of fact, I nominated him when I first became governor."

The Justice Department report stems from Office of the Inspector General's investigation into Black's allegations that Abramoff worked to get him demoted because he was leading corruption investigations involving people in the Gutierrez administration.

The investigation also was prompted by Black's allegation that Abramoff wants him out of the federal prosecuting loop because he supports applying U.S. immigration laws in the Commonwealth of the Northern Mariana Islands for national-security reasons.

Black could not be reached for comment yesterday. He previously has declined to comment on the Abramoff issue because he works under Rapadas.

"We are opposed to Black. He has been screwing us for years in the CNMI, so this is good payback. I don't care if they appoint Bozo the clown, we need to get rid of Black," Abramoff wrote in a March 6, 2002, e-mail to members of his lobbying firm at the time, Greenberg Traurig.

Abramoff pleaded guilty in January to mail fraud, conspiracy and tax evasion in connection with his lobbying work. He is cooperating with a broadening investigation that has so far produced five convictions.

The federal report states "Abramoff's e-mails confirm that in late February 2002, he became involved on Gutierrez's behalf in a plan to oust Black from the interim U.S. Attorney position."

A few months ago, the Gutierrez camp had portrayed itself as a victim, rather than a partner, of Abramoff lobbying. Gutierrez has served two gubernatorial terms and is running in the November gubernatorial election.

But while the report provides a direct link between Gutierrez and Abramoff on certain attempts to have Black removed, the report also concludes that Abramoff's efforts to influence the White House appointment for U.S. Attorney for Guam and the Northern Marianas did not matter because by the time Abramoff got involved, Leonardo Rapadas already had been chosen by a Justice Department selection panel for the job, and "it was too late to affect the selection," according to the report.

"Abramoff told the (Office of Inspector General) that he recalled being involved in attempts to influence the Guam U.S. attorney nomination beginning in February 2002," according to the report.

"At that time, Abramoff was pursuing a $1.3 million contract with the government of Guam to pursue its interests, including attempting to increase airplane flights to and from Guam," according to the report.

DOJ_NMG_0038354

As part of his efforts to obtain the contract, Abramoff met Gutierrez, who was then governor, at a dinner in Washington, D.C., states the report.

'We may have talked' "Abramoff, who had previously worked on behalf of Gutierrez's Republican opponents, said he was aware at the time that Gutierrez wanted Black removed in part because of an ongoing corruption investigation Black's office was pursuing into the activities of certain members of the Gutierrez administration," states the report.

Gutierrez yesterday said he, along with his family and other government of Guam officials, did meet Abramoff at the Washington, D.C., dinner.

"We may have talked about how Fred Black is hurting the island of Guam. Maybe he came to the conclusion that Fred Black was persona non grata as far as I'm concerned out here, not necessarily for myself but for the people of Guam."

Gutierrez, who was hosting a party at his home yesterday evening, called about five minutes after an initial interview with the PDN to say that former Sen. Mark Charfauros was the one who spoke with Abramoff and asked him to see what he could do to oust Black from his position and to move Rapadas' nomination forward. The report states that Abramoff's main contact on Guam in getting to Gutierrez was Charfauros.

Former Sen. Randy Cunliffe, who was at Gutierrez's party last night, also said Charfauros was the one who spoke with Abramoff. Cunliffe said he was speaking as Gutierrez's attorney.

Gutierrez also said that neither he nor his administration paid Abramoff for any lobbying efforts.

Charfauros in a phone interview yesterday said he did ask Abramoff for help in getting a permanent U.S. Attorney for Guam, but he did not work with Gutierrez on the issue.

On Feb. 26, 2002, after Gutierrez and Abramoff's dinner meeting, Michael Williams, a lobbying associate of Abramoff, sent an e-mail to Abramoff stating that Tony Rudy, who also was in the Abramoff lobbying group, was ready to speak to the White House about "killing" the U.S. attorney candidate (Black's role as acting U.S. attorney)." Williams also suggested that the lobby group suggest "a good Republican alternative," according to the report.

By March 4, 2002, Abramoff's e-mails reflect that Williams had learned that Gutierrez and Charfauros favored an attorney from the Washington, D.C., law firm Patton Boggs for the Guam U.S. attorney position, according to the report.

"Abramoff told the (Office of Inspector General) that the attorney had worked with Gutierrez's son-in-law on a business matter," according to the report. The report did not mention the Patton Boggs attorney's name.

Gutierrez yesterday denied those allegations.

Gutierrez son-in-law Chris Stahl was president of a company, GIPR, that was on contract as marketing consultant in the local government's attempt under Gutierrez's administration to sell the Guam Telephone Authority. Stahl worked with Patton Boggs in the GTA privatization, but their joint efforts failed.

Rapadas subsequently was confirmed by the Senate to replace Black, who had held the position in an interim capacity for years.

The federal report states even after Abramoff knew his lobbying efforts against Black were not what ultimately led to the selection of Rapadas, he took credit for the removal of Black and Rapadas' nomination.

In March 2002, after Abramoff found out that Rapadas had been selected as the replacement for Black, Abramoff e-mailed Michael Williams, an associate of his at the Greenberg lobby shop, to "play it" to their Guam contacts as though their lobbying efforts where what "killed Black," according to the Office of Inspector General report.

On March 8, 2002, Williams e-mailed Abramoff that although the "good news" was that Black would soon be out, the "bad news" was that the Patton Boggs attorney did not make the final cut, according to the report.

Abramoff added in an "e-mail that the Patton Boggs attorney was 'out of the process already. Spin spin spin,'" states the report, quoting from the Abramoff e-mail.

Abramoff and Williams proceeded to track the process in the Senate for confirming Rapadas, according to the report.

Another e-mail reflects that Williams was told by his congressional contacts on May 7, 2002, that Rapadas was on the Judiciary Committee docket the next day and was expected to be "reported favorably" by the committee.

Two days later, on May 9, 2002, after the full Senate voted to confirm Rapadas, Williams e-mailed the news to the governor's son-in-law and asked that the governor be notified.

Fewer prosecutions The report also states that Black alleged that under Rapadas and First Assistant U.S. Attorney Ross Stoddard, Guam saw fewer prosecutions of federal corruption cases, and corruption matters have not been pursued to the degree they should have.

The FBI special agent who has led the public corruption cases on Guam since 1999 said that while the number of cases has gone down, that is due to "the normal cycle of cases," according to the report.

"The special agent stated that the (task force on public corruption) focused its energy on Gutierrez administration cases, and now reached the end of that road so it was necessary to build up some new cases," according to the report.

The report also states that according to the FBI special agent, since the change in the gubernatorial administration on Guam, "the number of public corruption referrals went down."

Tenet CEO Tries To Erase Effects Of Scandals (WSJ)

By Rhonda L. Rundle

The Wall Street Journal, July 3, 2006

Trevor Fetter inherited a financial and legal morass in 2003, when he took the top job at Tenet Healthcare Corp., the big hospital operator. Now, with most of the company's legal woes behind him, Mr. Fetter is turning to his next task: moving on.

Tenet last week agreed to pay the Justice Department $725 million to settle a host of investigations, including allegations that it gamed the Medicare system to generate lucrative payments it didn't deserve. The long-running saga, which hammered the company's stock price and led to the ouster of previous management, also cast a pall on Tenet's future. In recent years, Tenet's hospital roster shrank 40% to 68, as the company sold off many of the facilities where revenues were pumped up by questionable Medicare payments.

Now, Mr. Fetter's job is to restore Tenet's reputation and upgrade cash-starved facilities. The biggest challenge will be to persuade doctors to send more patients to Tenet hospitals, many of which languished as Tenet conserved cash in anticipation of the Justice Department settlement. Today, those hospitals lack the latest CT scanners and other high-tech equipment that doctors crave.

Mr. Fetter is prescribing both culture change and nuts-and-bolts operating improvements. His predecessor built Tenet over eight years through acquisitions, resulting in a deal-driven hospital company that rewarded executives for financial performance. Mr. Fetter himself was part of that management team for several years before leaving in 2000 to run a Tenet spinoff company. He was recruited back after Tenet's problems hit and eventually rose to chief executive. In that role, he has shifted incentives, including executive compensation, to spur quality improvements for patients. And he consolidated headquarters in Dallas last year, moving out of Santa Barbara, Calif., the location former management favored.

Even Tenet's critics give it credit for improving. But rivals aren't standing still, and a physician shortage in many communities is making it that much more difficult to recruit. Mr. Fetter shakes off the pessimism. "The table is set if we can get patients to come in," he says.

In their investigations, the Justice Department and U.S. attorneys in half a dozen cities didn't prove that Tenet had committed crimes. But Tenet acknowledges that a flawed culture led to an aggressive pricing strategy, which blew up when Medicare officials and private insurance companies discovered they were paying too much. "I hope we have changed the culture," Mr. Fetter says, "because ultimately your culture is your only protection."

One root of the trouble, Mr. Fetter says, was insufficient interaction among senior managers. He has imposed a three-day "no fly zone" during the third week of every month, when the company now holds a regular management meeting. In Dallas, he moved senior executives from their 16th-floor offices to rub shoulders with direct reports on other floors. He brought back suits and ties.

Behind the scenes, Tenet has been mending fences with doctors. Mr. Fetter, Chief Operating Officer Reynold Jennings and individual hospital CEOs have been making personal visits to ask doctors what Tenet can do to make their jobs easier. Some of the complaints can be addressed at little expense: Surgeons, for example, want operating rooms to operate efficiently and on-time to maximize the number of procedures they perform in a day.

DOJ_NMG_0038356

Physicians at Houston's Cypress Fairbanks Medical Center complained that bottlenecks resulted in a shortage of critical-care beds, forcing the hospital to turn ambulances away from the emergency room. After an extensive evaluation, the hospital assigned more housekeepers to arrive after lunch, when rooms typically are vacated. Surgeons who tended to miss early start times in the operating room were assigned to later slots. "Patient flow isn't very fancy, but it's the kind of thing that makes Southwest Airlines" so successful, says Terry Wheeler, the hospital's chief executive.

Such changes have boosted volumes, but Tenet hospitals have been hurt by rivals who have taken advantage of favorable interest rates to finance swank new buildings and expensive equipment. "Tenet really hasn't been able to do that, which puts them at a significant disadvantage," says Sheryl Skolnick, an analyst at CRT Capital Group. "The doctors tell us that Houston Northwest, once their crown jewel, is falling apart."

Tenet acknowledges that Houston Northwest Medical Center, built in the 1970s, needs updating. The company is expected this week to provide details of how it will allocate some $800 million available for capital investment this year. The cash will go to buy multislice CT scanners, MRI machines, nuclear-medicine cameras and expansions and renovations of emergency rooms and heart catheterization and other labs.

Under previous management, capital investments tended to be glossy, high-visibility programs rather than physician-friendly upgrades. Tenet often lured cardiologists, orthopedic surgeons and other star specialists with lucrative financial arrangements that appealed more to their pocketbooks than to other professional instincts. Some of those deals drew government scrutiny and contributed to Tenet's reputation for being profit-hungry.

Tenet now has halted those deals, making high-quality care the attraction for both doctors and patients. The strategy turns necessity into a virtue as government programs and private insurers increasingly steer patients to doctors and hospitals based on quality measurements. "People will eventually start paying for quality," predicts Jennifer Daley, Tenet's chief medical officer and a former associate professor of medicine at Harvard Medical School. Other medical experts share her view.

Dr. Daley took her current job after Mr. Fetter pledged that Tenet's quality efforts would be real and transparent. "I'm not going to be part of window dressing," Dr. Daley says. "My goal is [for Tenet hospitals] to be in the top 10% to 20%."

In the past, Tenet had refused to participate in quality assessments that invited potentially negative comparisons with rival hospitals. Dr. Daley has insisted that the company begin submitting data to the Leapfrog Group, an industry consortium, and the California Healthcare Foundation, an independent philanthropy dedicated to helping consumers make informed health-care decisions.

Her efforts got the attention of Tenet hospital CEOs when they learned that some 30% of their compensation would be tied to quality metrics, such as progress in reducing hospital-acquired infections. Executives can check their scores on an internal Web site as part of an incentive system that took effect in January 2004. "My phone started ringing off the hook," Dr. Daley says, as hospital executives asked for help improving their numbers.

Tenet's efforts are paying off: United Health Group Inc.'s UnitedHealthcare, the big health insurer, gave its "premium" designation to 18 Tenet cardiac care centers. And in December, the American Heart Association awarded 12 of 50 performance achievement awards to Tenet hospitals. The awards go to hospitals that adhere to guidelines aimed at ensuring that patients get the right medicines and instructions to prevent a second heart attack or stroke.

The achievement is striking in comparison with another dark chapter from Tenet's past, in which two renegade doctors at a Redding, Calif., facility were accused of performing hundreds of unnecessary heart surgeries over a 10-year period. In 2004, Tenet agreed to pay $395 million to settle most of the resulting civil litigation and sold the hospital.

"Having 12 of [the heart-association awards] is significant," says Gray Ellrodt, chief of medicine at Berkshire Medical Center, a Pittsfield, Mass., hospital that isn't part of Tenet. "That is a good-faith effort to do this right."

Austin Banker Near Victory In S&L Suit (AAS)

By Robert Elder

Austin American-Statesman, July 3, 2006

Austin real estate developer Alfred Hughes was close to giddy when he acquired an El Paso savings and loan in 1988.

DOJ_NMG_0038357

"We're sitting on top of the world," he said after federal regulators approved the purchase. "We're very comfortable working in a regulated environment."

Less than two years later, regulators shuttered El Paso Federal Savings and Loan. For the past 16 years, Hughes has been trying to collect the $46.5 million he says the government cost him by improperly closing and then liquidating the institution.

Among the assets Hughes lost when the thrift closed was his ownership of 4,500 acres of Steiner Ranch in western Travis County, now a development of high-end homes.

Although the legal battle may roll on, in a continuing echo of the massive savings and loan crisis of the 1980s and early 1990s, Hughes won a big victory last month. Senior Judge James Merow of the U.S. Court of Federal Claims awarded Hughes the full amount, ruling that a 1989 federal law had unfairly imposed new financial requirements on thrifts.

The U.S. Department of Justice has two more avenues of appeal: the Court of Appeals for the D.C. Circuit and the U.S. Supreme Court. Arlene Groner, a Justice Department attorney, did not return calls for comment.

Hughes' case shows that the savings and loan crisis, which started mushrooming 25 years ago, isn't yet played out. Hughes' lawsuit was one of at least 150 filed against the government over the 1989 Financial Institutions, Reform, Recovery and Enforcement Act, a far-reaching law that helped push many thrifts into insolvency.

The government has paid more than $1.7 billion in damages so far. About 30 cases were pending as of 2005.

Hughes, 65, seemed blasé about his victory.

"It's just a lengthy process that you have to go through to sue the government for monetary damages," he said last week from his part-time home in Arrowhead, in Colorado's Vail Valley. "We just stayed the course. It doesn't do any good to get yourself worked up.

"We always felt like it would eventually get resolved," said Hughes, who said he has been retired for about five years. "We knew what we had done was right."

The savings and loan crisis sparked the greatest collapse of financial institutions since the Great Depression.

In the decade that ended in 1995, 1,043 thrifts with more than $500 billion in assets closed, according to the Federal Deposit Insurance Corp.

The causes were many: an unsound deposit insurance program that didn't distinguish between conservative thrifts and reckless ones; skyrocketing interest rates that forced thrifts to pay their customers more than they were taking in from long-term mortgages; regulations that permitted excessive borrowing; and plain old fraud by savings and loan owners, with Texas contributing some of the most spectacular examples.

The failures swamped the government's savings and loan insurance program, and taxpayers had to kick in $124 billion to bail out the failed institutions. Thrifts paid another $29 billion.

Hughes already was a banking, business and government veteran by the time he acquired the foundering El Paso Federal, which he bought shortly after a deal to buy an Austin thrift collapsed. He had been a bank director, an executive at an Austin thrift and founder of the Round Rock Savings Association. He was CEO of a chain of day surgery and diagnostic centers.

In 1986, he was chairman of the Texas Department of Corrections board. At that time, the American-Statesman estimated Hughes' net worth at $30 million to $50 million, based on comments from a close associate. Hughes today says that estimate was low. To entice investors such as Hughes to buy troubled thrifts and rehabilitate them, the now-defunct Federal Home Loan Bank Board authorized an unusual accounting maneuver.

Savings and loans need a certain level of capital to meet regulatory requirements. But El Paso had more liabilities than assets and would not have met the requirements.

In these cases, regulators stretched the definition of capital to include the amount by which liabilities exceeded assets and allowed the difference to be counted as goodwill, the business term for an intangible asset.

The goodwill could then be counted toward the capital requirements. It was a crucial step that allowed the thrifts some breathing room while the new owners restored them to financial health.

"It was the only way to make an institution viable," Hughes said.

DOJ_NMG_0038358

Buyers of thrifts also were allowed to use real estate instead of cash as financial backing for their operations. In this case, Hughes used his stake in Steiner Ranch, commercial real estate in North Austin and a number of federally subsidized housing units. He also paid $11.5 million in cash.

In his ruling, Merow noted that though regulators "preferred troubled thrifts to be acquired with cash rather than real estate, which lacks liquidity and has fluctuating values, contribution of real estate was not uncommon during this time of thrift failures as regulators sought to avoid industry collapse."

In 1989, Congress passed a law that was seen as the government's first serious attempt to stem the financial bleeding from savings and loans. One part of the law called for the elimination or rapid phase-out of the accounting allowance, which almost overnight left hundreds of institutions without enough capital to keep operating.

El Paso Federal, which had been in compliance with capital requirements, suddenly had a problem.

The new law took effect in December 1989. By September 1990, El Paso Federal was in regulatory receivership. It later was liquidated.

"It was pretty easy to see what was going to happen," Hughes said.

The U.S. Supreme Court later ruled that the law breached the contracts the government had made with investors who had purchased troubled savings and loans.

The rules for troubled thrifts shifted dramatically with the passage of the 1989 law, said Stephen Skaggs, president of the Bank Advisory Group LLC in Austin, a consulting firm.

Skaggs, who reviewed the court's ruling in the Hughes case, said the law was well-intentioned in its attempt to recapitalize thrifts and eliminate the goodwill accounting change, which he called a menace.

But, he said, the goodwill allowance "probably should have been eliminated far more gradually than it was."

Skaggs said the ruling makes it clear that the rule changes left investors such as Hughes "high and dry . . . simply because the rules under which Hughes capitalized the thrift were then changed after the fact."

Hughes lost the assets he had injected into El Paso Federal, including his ownership in most of Steiner Ranch.

Although he is not prone to looking back, Hughes said, "It sure would be nice to have Steiner Ranch back."

He said he had planned to develop the property in much the same way it stands today.

Hughes owned 4,500 acres. After El Paso's failure, the land ended up back in the hands of Tommy Steiner of the Steiner family, the same person from whom Hughes had bought the property.

BP Traders, Attempting To `Corner' Propane Market, Lost $10 Mln (BLOOM)

Bloomberg, July 3, 2006

3 (Bloomberg) -- The three BP Plc traders accused by regulators of attempting to corner the U.S. propane market lost $10 million when they failed to sell their inventory, court documents show.

The traders in February 2004 sought to make more than $20 million by holding most of the propane on a pipeline that ships the heating fuel from a hub in Texas to the U.S. Midwest and Northeast, according to transcripts filed June 28 with the U.S. District Court in Illinois by the Commodity Futures Trading Commission. Instead, they were stuck with much of the fuel as the market plunged on March 1.

``Not only do they have a public relations problem, they have a financial problem," said Charles Mankin, director of the Oklahoma Geologic Survey at the University of Oklahoma. ``It backfired on them." The losses may be more of a deterrent against future attempts to manipulate markets than any action by regulators, Mankin said. BP on June 28 denied the allegations of market manipulation and said it had fired several employees.

BP, which made $2.8 billion trading oil and gas in 2005, and other oil companies are facing increased scrutiny from U.S. regulators and lawmakers as near-record oil prices have boosted gasoline, heating oil and natural gas prices to records in the past year.

Mark Radley, a former BP trading manager who the Commodity Futures Trading Commission alleges developed the strategy, told his second-in-command that success or failure would show whether ``we can control the market at will," according to transcripts filed with the U.S. District Court in Illinois.

DOJ_NMG_0038359

Grand Jury

BP is the subject of a grand jury investigation after a crude oil pipeline leak in Alaska, which was discovered in March. In September, BP agreed to pay a $21.4 million fine, the largest ever imposed by U.S. safety regulators, for more than 300 safety violations that led to a March 2005 blast at the company's Texas City, Texas, refinery, killing 15 people and injuring more than 170.

Radley's second-in-command, Dennis Abbott, pleaded guilty to conspiracy last week. Radley, Abbott and another trader, Cody Claborn, were all fired for violating BP trading policies, according to the CFTC filing.

Radley's boss, James Summers, the vice president of natural gas liquids for BP Products North America Inc., Martin Marz, compliance manager for the unit's North America Gas & Power business, and Donald Byers, then chief operating officer for the unit, have been suspended since the CFTC named all three in its complaint, the Financial Times reported today, citing people familiar with the matter.

BP can't comment on the FT report or say anything beyond the statement on June 28, Jamie Jardine, a Singapore-based spokesman for the company, said today.

Hunt Brothers

Summers, Marz and Byers were aware of the manipulation scheme, according to the Commodity Futures Regulatory Commission's complaint.

The propane trades caught the attention of other market participants, according to transcripts of telephone calls in which they accused BP traders of trying to corner the market.

One caller referred to BP trader Cody Claborn, who worked for Abbott, as Cody Hunt, a reference to the brothers Nelson and Will Hunt, who were convicted in 1988 of conspiring to manipulate silver prices.

Claborn responded: ``What are you talking about man?"

The caller, identified only as a market participant in the court documents, then said, ``Someone told me you guys were trying to corner the TET market so I figured you were one of the Hunt brothers."

`Badly Mistaken'

``I think you're badly mistaken," Claborn answered. ``Who told you that?"

Charles Mills, the attorney representing Radley, declined to comment. Attorneys representing Claborn and Abbott couldn't be reached for comment.

BP last week denied the trades were illegal. The Commodity Futures Trading Commission alleges the BP employees violated state antitrust and consumer protection laws.

``We are reviewing what has been filed, but based on our investigation of the trades we have examined to date we believe that no manipulation of the market occurred," BP said in the June 28 statement. ``That is not how we operate."

Marz, the compliance manager who approved the trades, told the traders at a February 2004 meeting to refrain from using the word ``squeeze" when discussing the strategy, the CFTC said.

`Feeding an Elephant'

Abbott, who pleaded guilty to conspiracy in a separate court filing by the Justice Department on June 29, was called by another gas trader on Feb. 19, 2004.

``Jeez, what is y'all's appetite for propane? I mean, it's just like feeding an elephant," the market participant said to Abbott.

``Um, yeah, we just like it," Abbott replied.

``You dig it, huh?"

``I'd call it insatiable right now," Abbott told the counterparty.

BP's propane inventory peaked at 5.1 million barrels, 27 percent more than planned, according to its internal presentation, called ``Lessons Learned" and designed to determine how the experience might be useful in the future. The company had hoped to sell as much as 60 percent of that gas in February. It sold 17 percent, forcing it to sell the rest in March when prices fell by 34 cents a gallon, the document said.

`Dominant Position'

``BP employees purchased enormous quantities of propane to establish a dominant and controlling long position," the CFTC said in its complaint. That caused propane prices to rise to more than 90 cents a gallon on Feb. 27, 2004, the complaint said.

``A price that would not otherwise have been reached under the normal pressures of supply and demand," the CFTC said. Propane gas is used to heat homes in the U.S., largely in rural areas without access to natural gas pipelines.

The ``Lessons Learned" document said the trades carried no regulatory risks, ``but could increase the risk of regulatory intervention," the document said. There were no specific legal concerns. The ``primary risk" was to BP's reputation, the document said.

The case is U.S. Commodity Trading Commission v. BP Products North America Inc., 06Cv3503.

BP Suspends Three Traders Amid Calls To Police Markets (FT)

By Jeremy Grant

Financial Times, July 3, 2006

BP, the UK energy group, has suspended three Houston-based traders at the centre of an alleged propane price manipulation scheme, as alarm rose in Washington over the need to police energy markets.

Senior US senators have warned congress that "too many trades" are occurring without regulatory oversight.

Senator Carl Levin, a Michigan Democrat, said: "More and more trading is being conducted by large oil and gas traders on electronic markets where there is no oversight. It's time to put the cop back on the beat in these markets to make sure ordinary Americans aren't ripped off."

Mr Levin's call, in a bipartisan report to congress last week by the Senate's Permanent Subcommittee on Investigations, is the clearest sign yet that lawmakers believe the US energy markets are still open to manipulation years after the collapse of Enron exposed the weakness of lightly regulated energy markets.

Mr Levin and Norm Coleman, his Republican counterpart, urged congress to "eliminate the Enron loophole" by extending the power of the Commodity Futures Trading Commission, the US futures industry regulator, to oversee over-the-counter (OTC) energy markets.

It was in such markets that the alleged BP propane scheme took place. But the CFTC, which regulates exchange-traded energy futures, only spotted the alleged trouble after receiving tip-offs from market participants in the OTC markets, people familiar with the investigation said.

A sweeping CFTC civil lawsuit last week alleged that a five-man team at BP's natural gas trading desk in Houston cornered the market for TET propane, which millions of low-income Americans use to heat homes and fuel cookers and barbecues.

By building up a dominant position, BP drove up the price of the fuel, the suit claimed.

BP denies any manipulation took place. It says it fired two from the team some time ago. The other three were escorted out of BP's Houston offices on Friday after being put on "administrative leave", people familiar with the matter said.

One is Cameron Byers, a British graduate of Insead business school and chief executive of North American Gas and Power (NAGP). The unit is BP's trading arm in North America, where the group is the biggest player in propane.

The others are Martin Marz, former NAGP compliance manager, and James Summers, former vice president of natural gas liquids trading within NAGP.

A fourth, Dennis Abbott is co-operating with the US Department of Justice after pleading guilty to conspiring to manipulate and corner the propane market in the winter of 2004.

BP declined to comment.

BP and other traders of propane typically buy and sell propane and other fuels either using the telephone, or on internet-based markets such as Chalkboard, where the alleged price manipulation took place.

Any attempt to give the CFTC added powers to oversee the OTC markets would present a huge challenge given the opaque nature of record-keeping in such markets and the need to substantially boost the CFTC's budget.

Offshore Disturbance Behind Big Wall Street Failure: An Unregulated Bermuda Unit (WSJ)

By Carrick Mollenkamp, Ian McDonald And Peter A. McKay

DOJ_NMG_0038361

The Wall Street Journal, July 3, 2006

At 7:32 in the morning on Oct. 13, Paul Van Dillen tapped out an urgent email to Refco Inc. "Please return $9.9 mm," he instructed the New York-based brokerage firm.

Refco had a reputation for stellar service, but Mr. Van Dillen, an analyst for AQR Capital Management, got the runaround that morning. He traded six more phone calls and emails with Refco over the next four hours in an effort to recoup the millions held in Refco brokerage accounts by the $25 billion hedge-fund manager. Eventually, in a late-morning phone conversation with Refco employees, he got alarming news: Refco had just frozen $4 billion worth of accounts at the Bermuda unit that held his firm's money. (Read the email string1).

Refco filed for bankruptcy protection four days later, one of the largest and swiftest failures in recent Wall Street history. Refco, one of the world's largest commodities brokerages, was a global trading hub for corporations, government agencies, individual clients and hedge funds. And yet its spectacular collapse came out of nowhere. AQR, based in Greenwich, Conn., is now one of thousands of big and small investors trying to recover about $1.8 billion of assets missing from client accounts.

In recent months, the inside story of Refco's collapse is emerging in federal bankruptcy-court proceedings in lower Manhattan and in related civil and criminal actions. At its center is Refco Capital Markets Ltd. of Hamilton, Bermuda. Court proceedings have uncovered a host of unusual practices by the Bermuda unit that appear to have contributed both to Refco's rapid growth and to its catastrophic fall.

In the U.S., brokerage firms must maintain separate accounts for clients. But at Refco's unregulated Bermuda unit, client and company money was all tossed into a single unsegregated pool, the court proceedings have revealed. Refco routinely used this money for corporate purposes, and the commingled funds flowed freely between the Bermuda entity and New York units and throughout Refco, according to court testimony by employees and clients. Refco Capital Markets also made big loans to customers to finance high-risk investments. When these clients were unable to cover trading losses, the unit helped hide the bad loans, the civil and criminal actions allege.

Refco Capital Markets was incorporated in Bermuda as an "exempt" company, which meant it could do business anywhere except Bermuda. In fact, it employed no one at all at its headquarters address in Bermuda. New York-based employees ran the unit. In effect, it was unregulated: Neither Bermudan nor American regulators had any duty to watch over it.

A spokeswoman for the Bermuda Monetary Authority, the nation's financial regulator, says its main role is to protect "retail and unsophisticated" investors. Firms such as Refco Capital Markets, which cater to sophisticated investors, are entitled to exemptions from Bermuda regulation, she says.

On Oct. 10, Refco disclosed that it had made a series of transactions that could have been used to hide bad debts. That sparked a run on the bank led by its clients. Six weeks after a $583 million initial public offering of stock, Refco sought Chapter 11 bankruptcy protection. Refco Capital Markets had only $1.9 billion in client-account assets, although they were supposed to total at least $3.7 billion. Phillip R. Bennett, then chief executive officer, was arrested on Oct. 11 at his home in Gladstone, N.J., on federal fraud charges.

Refco was founded in 1969 as Ray E. Friedman & Co. Mr. Friedman was a Chicago commodities trader who served a 23-month prison stint in the 1950s for selling substandard chickens to the Army during the Korean War. He was later pardoned by President Lyndon B. Johnson and died in 2004.

Initially, Refco was mainly a middleman between farmers and food buyers. Much of its commodities operation involved futures contracts -- agreements to buy or sell a specified amount of goods at a set price on a specific date, which allow buyers and sellers to hedge against price swings and speculators to bet on price moves.

In the 1970s, futures became a huge business. They were used to bet on prices of everything from currencies to U.S. Treasury bonds to precious metals. Under the leadership of Mr. Friedman's stepson, Thomas H. Dittmer, Refco became a big futures broker with a reputation as a tough competitor.

The firm frequently ran afoul of regulators. The Commodity Futures Trading Commission filed nine regulatory actions against Refco, while the Chicago Mercantile Exchange, the Chicago Board of Trade and other futures markets filed 131, according to the National Futures Association, an industry regulatory group.

DOJ_NMG_0038362

Leo Melamed, former chairman of the Chicago Mercantile Exchange, says he once encountered Mr. Dittmer at an exchange event shortly after his organization fined Refco. "He told me: 'I made a few million, and you took a few thousand back -- so what?' " Mr. Melamed recalls. "Refco came into the industry as a renegade, and it stayed that way until the day it folded." Mr. Dittmer couldn't be reached for comment.

Mr. Bennett joined the company in 1981 from what was then Chase Manhattan Bank. He became chief financial officer in 1983 and chief executive in 1998. Under his leadership, Refco's operations grew significantly, eventually encompassing about two dozen subsidiaries. Mr. Bennett's lawyer, David Frankel, declined on behalf of his client to comment on Refco or the charges against Mr. Bennett.

In Bermuda, Refco set up a foreign-currency brokerage called Refco FX Associates. That later became part of another new Bermuda entity, Refco Capital Markets, which offered trading in exotic securities such as bonds issued by developing countries in Latin America and Asia as well as Russian stocks and silver futures.

Employees of Refco Securities LLC, a regulated subsidiary based in New York, ran the unregulated Bermuda unit. Customers of Refco Capital Markets ranged from overseas hedge funds run by highly regarded money managers to a baked-goods company in Georgia to a college professor in Iowa. It offered attentive service to all comers.

"You could call one person, and whether you had to buy an equity in the United States or in Korea or in Brazil, that one person could handle the transaction," said Richard Deitz, founder of a Moscow-based hedge-fund firm, VR Capital, during a bankruptcy-court hearing. Mr. Deitz said he and the Refco trader dedicated to his account communicated about trades and markets at least five times a day.

The service "was beautiful," says Peter Catranis of Aliso Viejo, Calif., who oversaw accounts for small investors.

The interest paid to clients on cash in their accounts was often 1.75 percentage points higher than Wall Street brokerages offered, one Refco executive testified in bankruptcy court.

Refco Capital Markets eventually counted more than 3,000 customers world-wide. By 2005, it produced more than half of Refco's pretax profit, according to bankruptcy-court testimony.

Big investors often borrow money from brokerages to invest, pledging securities in their portfolios as collateral. Most brokerages set limits on the emerging-market bonds and stocks they accept as collateral because of the risks associated with them. Refco Capital Markets often didn't set such limits. Thomas Yorke, who ran the Refco Capital Markets financing desk, said in bankruptcy-court testimony that Refco Capital Markets "didn't have any of the U.S. regulatory requirements to adhere to."

Vera Kraker, who ran the desk with him, said in a sworn statement: "We would look at pretty much any security a client would bring into Refco for financing."

Bahamas-based Capital Management Select Fund was able to borrow 50% of the value of its shares of Russian oil giant OAO Lukoil, its manager said in a court statement. Another brokerage, Bear Stearns Cos., wouldn't let it borrow more than 15% of the shares' value, the manager said.

As an "exempt" Bermuda company, Refco Capital Markets wasn't required to keep customers' money distinct from Refco's. Client and company money circulated among various Refco entities. Every day, the Bermuda unit sent money to an affiliated Refco entity, which used the cash to run Refco's varied businesses -- to pay bills, make loans and finance acquisitions, according to bankruptcy-court documents and testimony. And other Refco units ultimately sent funds to Bermuda for Refco Capital Markets to invest. Investigators have traced thousands of money transfers since 2000, with about $20 billion going from Bermuda to other Refco entities and about $18 billion going back.

Refco Capital Markets "had full use of all of the cash invested" with it, "and I am not aware of any restrictions that apply to the use of that cash," said former Refco treasurer Matthew Hreben in a sworn statement filed in bankruptcy court.

Many customers testified they had no idea the firm was using their assets this way. "That is not a business model of which I am familiar with," Mr. Deitz, the Moscow-based hedge-fund manager, said at a bankruptcy-court hearing. "It's something that I think is more in common with three-card monte."

In testimony, Refco executives said documents sent to customers to confirm trades disclosed that Refco had a free hand with client assets. They also said clients should have known that dealing with an unregulated Bermuda firm involved risk. "These are all big boys," Mr. Yorke said in court of the clients. "These aren't widows and orphans."

DOJ_NMG_0038363

Much client money was transferred to other Refco entities, testified Todd Brents of AlixPartners LLC, a firm helping unravel Refco's books. Sometimes "there will be a notation in the accounting records that will say transfer $10 million for X," he said. "Other times," he added, "there will be no explanation." He testified he suspected a large transfer last August was used to acquire the brokerage operations of Cargill Investor Services, because it was made on the same day Refco paid $208 million for the rival trading firm. Days earlier, a similar amount had flowed into Refco Capital Markets.

Clients "didn't know that what they thought was a broker was actually acting as a bank for Refco," says New York lawyer Howard Seife, who represents two dozen Refco Capital Markets customers.

The practices that brought Refco down appear to have arisen because some brokerage customers suffered investment losses and were unable to repay loans made by Refco. Some of these bad debts dated to the late 1990s.

In February 2000, Mr. Bennett made an unusual proposal to Bawag P.S.K. Group, an Austrian bank that bought 10% of Refco in 1999. In emails between Mr. Bennett and Bawag executives, the project was referred to as "Cleanup," say people familiar with the matter.

The project was a complex effort to hide hundreds of millions of dollars of bad debts, including loans customers couldn't repay due to trading losses. A private company controlled by Mr. Bennett assumed those bad debts to make Refco's books look better, according to federal prosecutors and Refco creditors.

In order for Refco to mask the transaction from auditors, Mr. Bennett's company engaged in a circular series of money transfers, which took place just before Refco closed its books each financial period. His company borrowed money from Bawag and Bawag borrowed money from Refco Capital Markets, prosecutors and creditors allege. Then, Mr. Bennett paid the money to Refco.

Thus, the bad debt on Refco's books was converted into a standard, collectable loan to Bawag. None of the transactions were visible to investors. Days after the financial period ended, the transactions would be reversed, creditors say, saddling Refco once again with the bad debt. (Read letters discussing the Bawag transactions: one3 | two4)

Eventually, these transactions were conducted quarterly and involved both the Austrian bank and a New Jersey hedge fund, Liberty Corner Capital Strategies LLC, Refco creditors allege. Investors in Refco stock and bonds make similar allegations in lawsuits against Refco executives and the company's auditor and underwriters. (Bawag agreed last month to settle criminal and civil claims that it helped carry out the alleged fraud. Liberty Corner has denied knowingly participating in the alleged wrongdoing.)

In early 2004, Thomas H. Lee Partners, a buyout firm, was preparing to acquire a stake in Refco with an eye toward transforming it into a publicly traded company. As part of the deal, Refco was planning a large bond offering, which meant that investors would be scouring its books. Creditors allege that at that time, Refco hid $970 million in debts, including bad debts. Although the Lee buyout firm spent $10 million investigating Refco, it didn't uncover the problem, and the deal went through.

On Aug. 11, 2005, Refco went public. To celebrate, Mr. Bennett rang the opening bell at the New York Stock Exchange. Two weeks after the IPO came another series of debt-hiding transactions with Liberty Corner valued at $420 million, according to the civil complaint by investors.

As Refco closed its books for the period ending August 2005, company bookkeepers noticed an irregularity, a move that forced Mr. Bennett to disclose his role at an Oct. 6 meeting with Refco's audit committee, according to bankruptcy-court testimony and court filings. Four days later, Refco disclosed the transactions relating to the bad debt. Over the next few days, "we had literally hundreds and hundreds of millions go out the door," Mr. Yorke testified.

Among those demanding money was Christopher Sugrue, a former Refco executive who ran a money-management firm called PlusFunds Group Inc. On Oct. 11, he burst into the office of Mr. Hreben, Refco's treasurer, in the company's lower Manhattan headquarters, according to sworn testimony from Mr. Hreben. Mr. Sugrue demanded that $300 million of PlusFunds money be transferred from unregulated Bermuda accounts to regulated U.S. ones in order to protect the funds, according to the sworn statement. "He appeared to be very upset and was shouting," Mr. Hreben said in his statement. Mr. Hreben ordered him out. (Read Mr. Hreben's account.5)

DOJ_NMG_0038364

The next day, Mr. Sugrue returned to see Ms. Kraker, who helped run the Refco Capital Markets financing desk. "He stood behind me at my station on the trading floor asking repeatedly if the money had been transferred as he had demanded," she said in a sworn statement.

Refco transferred the money, and Mr. Sugrue withdrew it. Others also withdrew their funds, depleting the coffers of Refco Capital Markets. Refco froze the unit's customer accounts and declared bankruptcy. A bankruptcy court later froze the money withdrawn by PlusFunds because under bankruptcy law, all Refco Capital Markets clients have to be treated equally. In an interview earlier this year, Mr. Sugrue said he had every right to recover the money.

Customers of Refco Capital Markets continue to try to recoup their money through bankruptcy court. Refco has sold its regulated futures-brokerage business to a unit of London-based Man Group PLC. Its remaining assets, including some expensive art work, are being sold off piece by piece. Mr. Bennett remains under house arrest. No date has been set for his trial.

SEC Dubious Of German Bond Deal (USAT)

By Elliot Blair Smith

USA Today, July 3, 2006

Las Vegas investor Jeffrey Weston has been snapping up Germany Weimar Republic bonds from the 1920s on the premise that $1,000 in IOUs payable in gold then are today worth about $1 billion apiece.

Along the way, Weston, 46, persuaded dozens of investors to give him $7.7 million to purchase the antique certificates, which lost much of their value after Adolf Hitler came to power in 1933.

Last week, the Securities and Exchange Commission said Weston had spun a fantastic tale while spending $2 million of investors' money on a house and cars and tucking away $454,000 more in Swiss bank accounts. The SEC said Weston bought some German bonds of dubious value, paying as little as $190 apiece for them, but laid little of the legal groundwork he promised investors toward establishing an investment trust he called INGOTs for Insured Notes of German Obligations Trusts.

In an emergency filing in Las Vegas, the SEC sued to halt Weston's promotions, freeze his funds and recover what authorities say might be only pennies on the dollar. The FBI and Texas authorities also are investigating, court records show.

SEC attorney Jeffrey Norris called Weston's investment sales pitch “far-fetched and impossible.”

Weston, author of The German Financial Time Bomb: A Betrayal of the American Public, a Fantastic Deception, 50 years of Cover-up and Now a Solution, which investigators say he published with investors' funds, declined to comment. In a brief phone conversation, Weston said he was unfamiliar with the SEC lawsuit but promised to “be in touch” with his investors about the government case.

Since 1953, Germany has offered to honor bonds belonging to their legitimate owners — at face value, and without interest — while contending that most paper certificates now in circulation have no redemption value because they were pillaged by Russian troops from its banks at the end of World War II.

Weston's far greater expectations are based on his assertion that “Germany was lying about the looting by Russian soldiers” and appraisals that value the certificates much higher, his sales materials state. One marketing document identifies the Iowa high school graduate as “one of the world's foremost experts” in finance.

In June, Weston gave SEC investigators a lengthy deposition in which he cited previous jobs as a “penny stock” broker, a multilevel cosmetic salesman and manager of a Cayman Islands mutual fund that authorities liquidated in 2002. Weston acknowledged he'd had no income since the fund folded.

Weston told investigators he had “used a significant portion” of investors' funds for “personal expenses,” which he'd recorded as a loan with “a sticky (note) that I put in my calendar book … indicating that it was a loan that I had taken that needed to be repaid.”

Far from shy, Weston recounted previous clashes with the FBI and disgruntled investors and boasted he was able to buy the prewar German bonds far cheaper than anybody else “because most people won't sell them to anybody but me, because they're afraid that the person they're dealing with is an agent of the German government and going to confiscate the bonds.”

Several investors expressed confidence Weston will prevail and force German authorities to honor the securities.

DOJ_NMG_0038365

"I don't find anything untoward in anything Mr. Weston's told me," said George Vaile of Las Vegas, who invested $830,000 with Weston. "I believe the bonds have value."

James Long of Austin, who invested $300,000, said: "He's got, frankly, the German government in a very terrible position and I feel like this is a good investment even for somebody who's a moderate risk taker like I am."

CRIMINAL LAW:

Justice Dept. Subpoenas Jefferson's E-mails (RC)

By John Bresnahan

Roll Call, July 3, 2006

The Justice Department has issued a new subpoena for e-mails from Rep. William Jefferson (D-La.), who is at the center of an ongoing bribery and corruption investigation.

The subpoena, approved by a federal grand jury in Alexandria, Va., was sent last week to James Eagan, Chief Administrative Officer of the House. The Jefferson probe is being overseen by the U.S. attorney's office in Alexandria.

The subpoena was read into the Congressional Record on Thursday evening, as required under House rules, but did not specify that Jefferson was the target of the request.

The Justice Department is seeking e-mail traffic from Jefferson's office prior to Aug. 3, 2005, when FBI agents raided his home and car, according to sources close to the case. The Justice Department and House officials have been negotiating over the scope of the subpoena for months, said the sources.

Any e-mails relevant to the Justice Department search will now be assembled, and Jefferson will be allowed to review them and decide whether he wants to try to assert his privilege under the Speech or Debate Clause and withhold them from the federal prosecutors. Jefferson would then have to file a legal motion in federal court in Alexandria outlining the reasons for why they should not be turned over to federal investigators.

Jefferson's attorney declined to comment for this article.

The House Administration Committee, which oversees Eagan's office, also had no comment.

Jefferson's office in the Rayburn House Office Building was raided by FBI agents on May 20, a move that infuriated both Democratic and GOP leaders. Jefferson's legal team, backed by the House leadership, has challenged the propriety of the raid in court. An initial ruling in that case is expected soon. House officials are negotiating with the Justice Department over ground rules for any future search of a Congressional office. Those talks remain ongoing.

Jefferson has been waging a legal fight with the Justice Department in federal court in Alexandria, but the proceedings in that case are under seal and not publicly available.

Jefferson is suspected of taking hundreds of thousands of dollars in bribes in return for his assistance in aiding a Kentucky businessman win several telecom deals in Africa. That businessman, Vernon Jackson, has already pleaded guilty in federal court to paying bribes to Jefferson beginning in 2001 through a company owned by his wife and five daughters.

A former Jefferson aide, Brett Pfeffer, pleaded guilty in January to conspiracy to commit bribery and aiding and abetting the solicitation of bribes by a Member of Congress. Pfeffer has been sentenced to eight years in federal prison for his role in the bribery scheme.

Ohio's Rep. Ney Stuck In Wait-and-see Game (USAT)

By Jill Lawrence

USA Today, July 3, 2006

CHILLICOTHE, Ohio — There's often a caveat these days when Ohio Republicans talk about re-election prospects for their embattled congressman, Bob Ney. As state Rep. Clyde Evans put it at a recent GOP barbecue, "Unless he's indicted, I think he'll do very well."

DOJ_NMG_0038366

In a district that stretches more than 200 miles through hills, farms and small-town Main Streets, Ney has been the go-to guy for a dozen years. He won 66% of the vote in 2004. Now he's a central figure in the federal corruption investigation of convicted lobbyist Jack Abramoff and, according to the political newsletter Hotline, the most vulnerable House incumbent.

The six-term Republican from Heath is accused in court papers and testimony by a former aide of accepting gifts, trips and campaign donations from Abramoff and his clients in exchange for official actions. The House ethics committee is investigating him. Ney's top Capitol Hill aides are leaving, and federal investigators last week subpoenaed his district director.

Ney, who turns 52 on Wednesday, hasn't been charged and says he has done nothing wrong. He also says he'll run even if he's indicted. "I'll be serving … until the day the voters decide whether they want me to continue," Ney said in an interview. "They make the decision. No one else."

Diane Carnes, head of the Ross County GOP, says an indictment won't shake her support. "I trust him," she says. "I'm going to be there for him because he's always been there for us."

Some of Ney's past backers, however, say an indictment would change their votes. Some already are considering a switch to Democrat Zack Space, 45, an attorney and hotel developer from Dover.

Retired paper mill supervisor Arlan Cox said he is "up in the air" about whether he'll stick with Ney. As he prepared for a Lion's Club fish fry at a downtown park, Cox said he knew little about Space, but "we need to clean house in Washington and start over."

Ohio is awash in scandal, making it prime territory for the "culture of corruption" argument Democrats are using against Republicans in their quest to take control of the House and Senate. The largest corruption probe in Ohio history has produced charges against 14 people. The two most prominent:

•Republican Gov. Bob Taft was convicted of four misdemeanors involving golf outings, dinners and other unreported gifts; his approval rating in May was 26%.

•Tom Noe, a rare coin dealer and party fundraiser, pleaded guilty to illegally funneling contributions to President Bush. Noe also is charged with embezzlement arising from his management of a $50 million coin investment for the state worker's compensation fund.

The drag on GOP candidates here is palpable. Two-term Sen. Mike DeWine, seven-term Rep. Deborah Pryce and six-term Rep. Steve Chabot are in contests that Hotline editor Chuck Todd and other independent analysts rate as tossups or potential upsets, although all three won their last races with 60%.

Ken Blackwell, the Republican candidate for governor, doesn't talk about Taft. "Bob Taft is not in the matrix," he declared, smiling, when asked why. Lieutenant governor candidate Tom Raga, rallying the troops at the backyard barbecue here in Ney's district, stuck to indirect allusions. "Republicans in Ohio love being Republicans," he said. "They may have someone they're disappointed in or unhappy with, but they're Republicans."

Space, who declined interview requests, won the Democratic primary with a campaign centered on ethics. His website features a pledge to accept no gifts, trips or meals from lobbyists.

Ney stepped down as head of the House Administration Committee in January after Abramoff, in his plea agreement, described official acts performed by "Representative #1," later identified in court papers as Ney, in exchange for "a stream of things of value." Abramoff partner Neil Volz, once Ney's chief of staff, pleaded guilty to trying to corrupt Ney. He testified that Ney was a "champion" for Abramoff's clients.

Ney, Abramoff and former House majority leader Tom DeLay took an expensive golf trip to Scotland, subsidized by the Tigua tribe of Texas, an Abramoff client. Ney later tried to help the Tiguas reopen a casino.

Ney calls Abramoff "a con man" who deceived him and wants to stay out of jail. Accounts of his own activities are distorted, Ney says: "Did I spend hours and hours and hours and hours on his issues? No."

If Ney survives the election, it could be because of the Social Security glitches he has unraveled, the federal money he has secured, the sympathetic ear he offers his constituents. "People know him personally," says Republican Connie Meyer, a registered nurse here. "Word of mouth is going to help."

Controversy has only intensified Ney's attentions to the home folk. "I don't cancel events" in tough times, he says. "I just continue on a pretty rigorous schedule."

DOJ_NMG_0038367

One staple is leading students on tours of the Capitol. “Welcome to the floor of the U.S. House. My name is Bob Ney, and I'm your member of Congress,” Ney began recently, standing before 63 sixth-graders and 14 chaperones from Jackson (Ohio) Middle School.

Ney recently did the tour for 84 students from a neighboring district after they got stuck in traffic and missed their scheduled tour. The desperate request came from Democrat Violet Cummings, a Ney constituent on the trip. When he came through, driving all night from Ohio to Washington because of a canceled flight, Cummings took down her Zack Space lawn sign.

“How could I work against somebody who cares that much? … He can't be all bad if he cares that much about the kids,” she said.

Political Scandals Refuse To Go Away In 'Corrupticut' (WP)

By David A. Fahrenthold

The Washington Post, July 3, 2006

NEW HAVEN, Conn. -- There was the mayor who liked to be plied with $100-plus bottles of Bordeaux. The governor who took a free hot tub. The state senator who was given a job that paid $30,000 for doing nothing -- and then demanded a raise.

The past few years have revealed so many tales of graft, malfeasance and all-purpose criminality by public servants in Connecticut that it's hard to choose the most brazen. But for Kevin J. O'Connor, the U.S. attorney here, one moment stands out.

It came in June 2004, while then-Gov. John G. Rowland (R) -- he of the hot tub -- was facing impeachment in the legislature for improperly taking gifts. Even in that fraught time, O'Connor said, federal agents recorded state Sen. Ernest E. Newton II (D) -- he of the no-show job -- asking someone for a bribe.

"I thought to myself, you know, 'What are these people thinking?' " O'Connor said.

When Connecticut forefathers nicknamed their state "The Land of Steady Habits," this was probably not what they had in mind. But a tradition of bad behavior by officeholders persists here, despite numerous prosecutions and attempts at reform.

If more proof were needed, it has come in the past few weeks, with three new scandals involving current or former big-city mayors.

When Rowland resigned, pleaded guilty and was sentenced in March 2005 to a year and a day in jail, "everybody thought that was going to be the end of it," said John M. Orman, a professor of politics at Fairfield University in Fairfield, Conn. Instead, he said, the continuing parade of misdeeds has helped the state live up to a new nickname, "Corrupticut." "We just keep having 'em in Connecticut," Orman said.

The recent scandals here include the tearful, nationally televised admission on June 20 by Bridgeport Mayor John M. Fabrizi (D) that he had used cocaine while in office. "I am pleased to tell you that I have not used drugs in the last 18 months," said Fabrizi, who has been mayor for more than three years. For now, the U.S. attorney's office says it has no plans to prosecute him for the drug use.

Other cases include a former mayor and city council member from Middletown -- who pleaded guilty late last month to fraud for embezzling money from his law clients -- and a new charge against Joseph Santopietro, the former mayor of Waterbury. Santopietro previously was convicted on bribery charges stemming from his conduct as mayor in the 1990s. Now out of jail, he has been charged with racketeering conspiracy for allegedly serving as a consultant to a mob-affiliated garbage-hauling business.

These cases are just the latest in a long string of charges against officeholders this year. There was Rowland's former chief of staff, who was sentenced to jail in April for bribery and tax offenses. There was a postmaster who stole from a customer, a public-works official who lied to federal investigators, and a state transportation worker who helped rig a bidding process and got a free TV from the winning contractor.

It all adds up to a big problem, officials here say. Statistically, the state's corruption prosecutions still don't equal those of places such as New Jersey, Illinois or Mississippi. But many fear that businesses will be driven away, or that voters and potential candidates might be disillusioned by a perception that Connecticut is -- as one pol has put it -- "Louisiana with foliage."

"We thought we were a state of Yankee integrity," said Howard L. Reiter, a professor of political science at the University of Connecticut. "Clearly, that's not the case anymore."

DOJ_NMG_0038368

Observers of Connecticut politics say that part of the problem was that ethics rules went unenforced here for so long, allowing corrupt practices to become ingrained before large-scale prosecutions began in the 1980s and 1990s. Another problem is the state's network of political machines, which incubate Republican and Democratic hopefuls in systems in which friendship and favors rule.

In recent years, the two most prolific incubators have been a pair of old manufacturing cities in Connecticut's western half. Waterbury, in addition to being Rowland's home town, had three mayors charged with crimes, and two of them imprisoned. In Bridgeport, Fabrizi's predecessor, Joseph P. Ganim, also a Democrat, was convicted of taking bribes and kickbacks.

In the Ganim case, one of those doing the bribing was Lennie Grimaldi, a public relations consultant. Grimaldi said that the city's political culture dictated that he lavish gifts on the mayor or else worry that his clients would be frozen out of city business.

"It started off with, you know, buying dinners, and then expensive dinners, and then a little bit of wine, and then the gifts. . . . It became this monster," recalled Grimaldi, who served 10 months in prison and has become a successful freelance writer after his release. "I didn't have the guts to say no to a mayor that had a tremendous amount of economic power over me."

Last year, the Rowland scandal galvanized legislators to try to change the atmosphere. They created a system that bars political contributions from state contractors and lobbyists, and aims to reduce the influence of donors overall by providing public financing for candidates in future elections.

Locally, some officials have made their own efforts at doing politics strictly by the book. These days, Waterbury Mayor Michael J. Jarjura (D) said, even fruit baskets sent by constituents won't be accepted.

"I know they're just trying to be kind," Jarjura said, "but we immediately send it back, and we document that we sent it back."

These efforts at reforming the system are now widespread enough that Rowland's defense attorney, William F. Dow III, said he fears the good in the state's old system might be lost.

"Government will operate less efficiently" if politicians obsess over avoiding appearances of impropriety, Dow said. "I think this dotting the i's and crossing the t's is going to have a chilling effect."

The chill isn't here yet, though. Instead, last week saw another of the kind of embarrassing spectacle Connecticut is seeking to avoid, as defendants in the garbage-hauling case were arraigned in New Haven's federal court.

In that case, prosecutors allege that a slew of Connecticut businesses used mob muscle to keep competitors away from the routes where they picked up trash. Those charged include an 86-year-old man alleged to be mob boss "Matty the Horse," plus a number of lower-level players who appeared in court wearing pompadour haircuts or tailored suits.

Then there was Santopietro, the former Republican mayor of Waterbury, who stood out because he wore just slacks and a sensible-looking short-sleeved dress shirt. Out of the whole bunch, he was the only one who looked like a civil servant.

Missouri Court Ruling Limits Names On Sex Offender Registry (SLPD)

By Matt Franck

St. Louis Post-Dispatch, July 2, 2006

Thousands of offenders would no longer be required to provide information for Missouri's sex offender registry after a ruling Friday by the Missouri Supreme Court, according to the lawyer behind the litigation.

While the high court upheld the constitutionality of the state's sex offender registry law, it ruled that the statute should not apply to nearly all of those convicted of crimes prior to 1995, when the law took effect. One key exception is sexually violent predators, who will stay on the list regardless of when their crimes occurred.

Just how many of Missouri's more than 11,000 registered sex offenders would be affected by the ruling was unclear Friday. Tim Hull, a spokesman for the Missouri Highway Patrol, which maintains the list, said officials must review the ruling in detail.

But Arthur Benson II, the lawyer who brought the case, estimates that thousands would no longer have to be registered as sex offenders. Currently, the registry includes offenses from 1979 to the present. Crimes committed during more than half of those years would not be included in the registry.

Benson said the ruling addresses "the height of unfairness" in the current law, which requires people to register even for crimes they committed years before the registry law was conceived.

Eleven of Benson's clients claimed their inclusion on the sex offender registry was unconstitutional on numerous grounds.

DOJ_NMG_0038369

The high court rejected nearly all their claims, affirming the constitutionality of requiring offenders to register even after they had completed prison sentences. The court ruled - as it and others have in the past - that the registration requirement does not represent an additional criminal punishment.

But the unanimous opinion, written by Judge Laura Denvir Stith, said applying the law retrospectively conflicts with constitutional interpretation dating back to 1820.

The ruling continues to allow publication of information about prior sex offenders, whose crimes are a matter of public record. But those who committed crimes before 1995 would not face criminal charges for failing to register or update their address.

Benson said the ruling in no way places the public at risk. He said the true sexual predators are known by law enforcement and will continue to be tracked.

One Missouri legislator who has recently worked to toughen sex offender laws disagrees.

"There will be people who will drop off the registry who the public would feel would be a threat," said Sen. Matt Bartle, R-Lee's Summit.

Bartle co-sponsored a sex offender bill signed by the governor this year that addresses many of the issues raised in the Supreme Court case.

The new provisions allow people who committed certain nonsexual crimes, such as kidnapping by a parent or other forms of child abuse, to be removed from the registry.

The law also allows those who were found guilty of consensual sex between teenagers to petition to have their names removed. Several of the plaintiffs involved in the Supreme Court case are now eligible to make use of the new law.

According to the ruling, the new law made it unnecessary for the high court to rule on whether certain offenders don't belong on the registry.

Bartle said he believes lawmakers this year worked to make sure the registry was both fair and useful to those wanting to track serious offenders. Friday's ruling, he said, goes too far by striking scores of names from the list.

Guiding Kids From Net Danger (DENP)

Denver Post, July 3, 2006

There has been a great deal of concern recently - among lawmakers, in the courts and in the media - about the dangers faced by children on the Internet.

Indeed, the statistics about online predators are frightening. Just in the last three years, 7,600 offenders have been caught and arrested for sexual solicitations.

According to a U.S. Department of Justice survey, 1 in 5 girls and 1 in 10 boys admitted to being sexually solicited on the Internet.

The Internet has proven to be a riveting tool for children - it provides an incredible opportunity for students to gain a broader view of the world, collect research for school projects, and keep in contact with family and friends.

Kids are a lot less likely to become victims of sexual solicitation with proper supervision and education about online dangers. That is why we were so encouraged by the program established by Qwest and the National Center for Missing & Exploited Children in an effort to educate parents about monitoring their kids on the Net.

To raise Internet safety awareness in Colorado, Qwest is calling for 10,000 Coloradans to become educated about online safety. The Denver-based telecommunications company is offering grants of up to $250 to the first 100 schools that provide instructions to at least 20 percent of parents by the end of the year, using the website incredibleinternet.com.

The site, among several

Advertisement

services, provides tips on safe surfing and teaches parents about social networking sites such as MySpace and Friendster. It also offers information on the top anti-spyware scanners and an online safety video featuring former Olympic speedskater Bonnie Blair.

The National Center for Missing & Exploited Children provides a site, www.cybertipline.com, that reaches out to both parents and children. It describes the dangers of the Web and discusses situations to avoid. There is even a game where children can use simulated chat rooms, instant messaging and e-mail, and are asked to identify possible predators - a creative way to practice identifying red flags on the Web.

It doesn't make sense to deal with Internet risks by locking up your children's computer, but it's vital for parents and guardians to monitor their online use.

Through awareness, parent-child communication and a few safety precautions, kids and teens can appreciate the benefits of the Internet while dodging most of the dangers.

Toddler Didn't Meet Amber Alert Criteria (DMN)

By Jeff Mosier, The Dallas Morning News

The Dallas Morning News, July 2, 2006

Irving: Case lacked proof of kidnap, but chief says he 'couldn't rule it out'

The Irving Police Department could face an informal reprimand for issuing an Amber Alert for 2-year-old Elian Majano, who disappeared from a park more than a week ago and is still missing.

Evidence of abduction is a requirement for activating the regional alert system, but Police Chief Larry Boyd said there was no such evidence in this case. The task force that runs the local system reviews each alert to determine whether it was warranted.

There were "no signs of abduction, but we couldn't rule it out," Chief Boyd said.

Elian disappeared in Lively Park on June 21 while his mother was sitting in a truck with a man described by authorities as her boyfriend. The toddler and his 4-year-old brother were playing outside at the time.

Police are unsure whether Elian was abducted or fell into a sinkhole that leads to the sewer system. Authorities said that there's no evidence to support either theory but that no other option makes sense.

Chief Boyd said it was important "to err on the side of caution and make sure the maximum amount of people heard about the child."

Tarrant County Sheriff Dee Anderson, a member of the local and state Amber Alert committees, said the system wasn't created only to drum up extra media coverage or to determine what happened.

He said the system should be used when police know that an abduction has occurred and there is sufficient information to help the public spot the kidnapper and child.

"I do not like to Monday morning quarterback this without full knowledge of the case, but my overall obvious concern is that there was never any evidence of an abduction," Sheriff Anderson said. "To my knowledge, there still isn't."

In Elian's case, police had a description of the boy and his flower-print shorts and Spider-Man flip-flops. But there were no other details about what might have happened to him.

Sheriff Anderson said that improper use of the system often happens when there is pressure from the family or media to issue an alert or when an investigation has stalled. He said the task force has written many letters during the past two decades reprimanding departments for using those criteria.

Capt. Richard Holland of the Houston Police Department said he could sympathize with Irving's decision.

"It's one of the most challenging calls that a law enforcement agency is asked to make," he said.

Capt. Holland, a member of the Houston regional Amber Alert committee, said that when other possibilities are eliminated, a department has to assume that a child has been abducted.

"If you have a very young child, sometimes you have to make that presumption," he said.

Strict rules

Most Amber Alert systems use standardized criteria for when it should be activated, such as evidence of abduction and risk of harm to the child. But there are some differences.

The Texas Department of Public Safety operates its own statewide Amber Alert system with even stricter rules. Elian's case would not have been eligible for that alert because a description of the suspect is required.

DOJ_NMG_0038371

Lisa Block, a DPS spokeswoman, said that such stringent standards ensure that the system isn't overused and remains effective. Since the system was created in August 2002, DPS has issued Amber Alerts for 27 children. Twenty-five were returned safely, one child was killed and one is still missing.

"The suspect information is vital to what we do," Ms. Block said.

Statistics for the North Texas regional Amber Alert system were not immediately available.

The Amber Alert for Elian has been active for about a week and half, far longer than the usual one to three days.

Alerts stay active

In the Houston area, the regional committee does not rescind its Amber Alerts until the child is found. Since the regional system was created in 2000, there are three subjects of Amber Alerts who are still missing.

Each of those is still listed as active even after several years, although those alerts are no longer broadcast by local media or placed on digital highway signs.

DPS re-evaluates Amber Alerts every 24 hours to determine whether they are still helping with the investigation. In a Houston case from 2004, the state Amber Alert was canceled on the third day while the local alert remains in effect today.

Chief Boyd said he understands that the Amber Alert system could lose its potency if it's used too often, but he also noted that it's a critical tool that can't be overlooked during an investigation.

"I hope it was for nothing," he said about the Amber Alert for Elian. "But we still need information, and that's what the system is for."

Sheriff Anderson said it appears that Irving issued the alert because officials ran out of other options.

"The Irving people will certainly have a chance to explain their thought process," he said. "We'll see where it leads us."

Staff writer Eric Aasen contributed to this report.

CIVIL RIGHTS:

Chabad Fight Goes To Court (MH)

By Todd Wright

The Miami Herald, July 3, 2006

Hollywood is expected to ask a federal judge today for more time to settle a religious discrimination lawsuit brought against the city by an Orthodox synagogue.

Jury selection is scheduled to start at 9 a.m. before Judge Joan Lenard in U.S. District Court in Miami.

The city last week offered a last-minute deal to end the five-year dispute with the Hollywood Community Synagogue Chabad Lubavitch. Now, the congregation wants time to consider the offer.

Even if the settlement is accepted, Hollywood leaders may face a fresh round of lawsuits -- this time from neighbors concerned that the deal would allow the synagogue to expand without their input or city approval.

"The point is to end this litigation, not start 10 more lawsuits," said Commissioner Peter Bober, who supports the latest deal. ``How are we not liable to all these other property owners?"

The proposal now on the table would give the Chabad $2 million and allow it to remain in the homes at 2215 and 2221 N. 46th Ave. -- with some restrictions on expansion.

Under the agreement, the synagogue would be allowed to buy only three more lots in a two-block area to expand and build whatever it wants. Initially, the Chabad had wanted to be able to buy as many lots as it needed, without any restriction.

Some 40 homes are located in that two-block area.

Rabbi Joseph Korf said the congregation may consider a day care, school or parking lot.

Chabad leaders agreed to consider the deal and ask Lenard for a delay this morning.

NEIGHBORS UNHAPPY

But neighboring homeowners say the city's deal -- allowing the Chabad to expand without regard to existing zoning rules -- subjects them to noise and traffic without giving them a chance to object.

DOJ_NMG_0038372

Even City Attorney Dan Abbott said residents could claim the city never gave them the opportunity to voice their opinion on how a neighboring property impacts theirs.

Already, several homeowners have threatened legal action.

"The whole thing about neighborhoods is the protection you have around your house," said Christie DeMinico, president of the Hollywood Hills Civic Association. ``We trusted the city to make the right judgment call on special exception and how it will impact the neighborhood. They have taken the protection away."

Homeowners are concerned that a settlement with the Chabad could give religious groups the right to locate and expand in neighborhoods, with little worry about restrictions, said Charles Vollman, president of the Hollywood Council of Civic Associations.

"What affects one neighborhood," he said, ``affects all of our neighborhoods."

Several homeowners associations want the city to take Chabad to trial, which could cost taxpayers millions if Hollywood should lose.

Currently, about 70 religious groups hold the special permit needed to operate a house of worship in a single-family district.

The most recent settlement proposal is the latest twist in a dispute that started in 2001, when neighbors complained about noise, trash and illegally parked cars at the synagogue.

SUITS, COUNTERSUITS

The disagreement led to a series of lawsuits, with the synagogue charging discrimination. The U.S. Justice Department joined in on the side of the congregation.

On June 23, in a last-minute effort to settle the matter before going to court, city leaders offered the synagogue the right to stay in the houses temporarily, until they could come up with new rules allowing houses of worship in residential areas.

The Chabad rejected the city's deal, calling instead for the right to stay in the houses permanently, then asking for a $2 million settlement.

The congregation also wanted the right to expand without restrictions.

On June 26, when the lawsuit hearing opened in U.S. District Court, attorneys for both sides said everyone -- city leaders and the Chabad -- had signed off on the Chabad's version of the proposed settlement.

Lenard postponed the trial, with the understanding that an agreement had been worked out.

Later that day, in a separate portion of the case, Lenard ruled that the city's requirements for granting permits for houses of worship in residential neighborhoods are unconstitutional.

She also ruled that the Chabad has a right to stay permanently in the two homes, and that the congregation was entitled to monetary damages.

What followed was massive confusion at City Hall.

Mayor Mara Giulianti said she never agreed to Chabad's version of the settlement.

The Chabad's lawyers went back to federal court, accusing the city of reneging.

At their meeting Wednesday, commissioners agreed to meet with Chabad leaders the next day to give negotiations another chance.

Lenard told both sides to be prepared for trial this morning.

La Tuna Inmates Say Prison Doesn't Follow Procedures (EPTIMES)

By Chris Roberts

El Paso Times, July 3, 2006

Inmates held at the various La Tuna federal prison facilities are convinced they have been denied visits, thrown in "the hole" for minor infractions and denied access to the prison law library because they went public with a lawsuit claiming the federal Bureau of Prisons isn't following its own procedures.

Requests for interviews with two of the inmates have been denied twice by La Tuna officials who said it was for the safety of the prisoners. By mail, those inmates have said they want to be interviewed. In that correspondence, they have claimed they are experiencing retaliation for their lawful actions.

DOJ_NMG_0038373

"That's just simply not true," said La Tuna spokesman Israel Jacquez. "These guys went to the press. That's their right. ... If we believe a staff member is retaliating against an inmate, no matter how frivolous the allegation may be, it is referred to the office of internal affairs."

Wayne D. Beaman, special agent in charge of the Dallas Office of the Department of Justice's Office of the Inspector General,wouldn't comment on the specific allegations, but said, "La Tuna is a well-managed facility." The Dallas office oversees federal prisons in Texas, Oklahoma, Louisiana and Arkansas, Beaman said.

The inmates' lawsuit claims that the Bureau of Prisons, or BoP, is ignoring its own policies when it houses prisoners in facilities with more severe security measures than are required by the inmates' classifications and when it houses inmates outside a 500-mile radius from the areas where they expect to be released.

However, a convict needs "rock-solid proof" to make a case against the BoP, said Jay Hurst, an attorney and chief of legislative affairs for FedCURE, an inmates' rights group. Hurst had a client in La Tuna -- he recently was transferred to another facility -- who also says he suffered retaliation.

"The Constitution doesn't apply in the federal system any more than it does in the state systems," Hurst said. "It's hard to make a case because you can't get records and you are relying on the testimony of a bunch of 'cons.' ... It's a system-wide culture. As long as the good order and security is preserved, that's what they care about."

Harassment

Lawrence J. Levine, convicted of possessing counterfeit securities and conspiracy to distribute methamphetamine, filed the lawsuit for himself and others in the system. He and others, including Robert Carter, convicted of mail and tax fraud, have said they are being targeted by guards and administrators because of their actions.

Levine's lawsuit recently was dismissed by U.S. District Judge David Briones after it appeared Levine had failed to respond to a Bureau of Prisons motion to dismiss. However, Levine said he mailed the response and it was lost in the mail or intercepted. He has asked the judge to reopen the case.

Jacquez said the U.S. Attorneys Office is reviewing Levine's claim. Levine said prison officials also have been gradually limiting his access to the law library. Jacquez said everyone has to work their hours unless they can prove they have an impending court date.

"There is no preferential treatment," he said.

Levine said his work assignment originally was in food service because of medical issues, including bulging disks and a heart problem, which require limitations on the amount of walking, standing and lifting. That job allowed time to use the law library, he said.

He says he was switched to ground maintenance, which requires prolonged standing and walking on shifts that coincide with the law library's daytime hours. A week after stories about the lawsuit appeared in the media, Levine says, his education schedule was changed from daytime to evening hours, which limits his evening access.

Levine asked the judge to issue an order directing La Tuna staff to allow him unrestricted law library access, which he argues is required by BoP policies.

Carter says he was subjected to entrapment when he picked up a bag on the floor of the chapel -- which also serves as a visiting room -- containing two white T-shirts and a watch. Those items were labeled as "contraband" by BoP officials who apparently believed someone left it for him.

Carter said the bag wasn't his and said he was taken into custody by guards at the scene before he even had a chance to look inside.

Carter said he was put in the special housing unit, or the SHU, which some inmates call "the hole" because of the limited human contact they are allowed there. Documents Carter provided show he lost visits from the outside for eight months, and commissary privileges for 90 days. He said he was only allowed one 10-minute phone call each week. All this, he said, even though he had a clean record before the incident.

Advertisement

He is now at the La Tuna Federal Correctional Institute, which houses medium- and low-security inmates, requiring an even higher level of security than his previous La Tuna placement.

"He was sanctioned for a violation and subjected to disciplinary action," Jacquez said. "It was the introduction of contraband. ... There's no way he could be trusted out at the (low- and minimum-security) Biggs facility."

Treated like a criminal

The original inmate complaint involved placements with appropriate security levels.

Some prisoners, including Levine and Carter, were housed at a federal prison camp -- which is the least restrictive type of facility -- near Nellis Air Force Base, Nev. That facility was closed for budget reasons and they were transferred to the La Tuna Federal Satellite Low, or FSL, prison on Biggs Army Airfield. The FSL houses both minimum- and low-security inmates, which require a higher level of security.

The inmates say the bureau is ignoring its own stated mission of confining offenders in safe, humane and appropriately secure facilities that provide work and other self-improvement opportunities "to assist offenders in becoming law-abiding citizens."

They claim that transferring inmates to a higher security facility requires "a specific and compelling reason," which the BoP did not provide. They say these transfer policies are contained in the bureau's own Program Statements.

"We try to place inmates in facilities where they're all equal in classification," Jacquez said. "It has to do with length of sentence, type of crime, history of violence."

Jacquez said part of the reason Carter originally could have been transferred from the minimum-security camp in Nevada to the low-security facility at Biggs is that his sentence is "pretty heavy duty. He was fairly fortunate to be classified as minimum security."

Carter was sentenced to five years and 11 months and has a release date of June 19, 2010.

Budgets and beds

Hurst said he believes there is a case that the BoP didn't follow its stated policies, but, in his experience, it won't be easy to get a judge to agree.

With federal budget cuts and efforts to make the system more efficient, particularly in the Western region, prison officials have said bed space is at a premium and the policies can't always be followed. Jacquez said another satellite camp opening in Tucson will help relieve some of those problems.

"We might be able to refer a little closer" to the inmates' homes, he said.

The Biggs facility "used to be just a prison camp, but the BoP needed more space for low-security," Jacquez said. "It's rare that you're going to have a stand-alone prison for one group of inmates."

Every Biggs facility prisoner is subject to the security measures designed for low-security inmates, which are more strict than the minimum measures used at prison camps. The only way an inmate is rewarded is with time off for good behavior, Jacquez said. Otherwise it would be seen as preferential treatment, he said, which could single an inmate out for retribution from other inmates.

"You've got to treat all the inmates the same," Jacquez said. And to be placed at the Biggs facility, he said, they must have "very little history of disciplinary actions in prison."

Ostensibly, the purpose of those policies is to keep inmates connected with the more positive elements in society -- including family and friends -- and in the prison system so they don't leave prison more isolated, angry and educated in crime than when they entered.

Relatives, who often are traveling thousands of miles, have been turned away for triggering a drug screening device. Carter's wife, Ginny, who lives in Illinois, said she was turned away once and when she asked for documentation of the incident, the BoP responded that it had no records.

"It is disheartening and appalling to see how the prison staff use the ion spectrometer machine to deny visits to people who simply want to spend time with their loved ones," said Ginny Carter. "It appears that the machine is used both randomly and specifically when certain persons are targeted as I was."

Chris Roberts may be reached at chrisr@elpasotimes.com; 546-6136.

Fallout Felt From Texas Redistricting Ruling (WT)

By Hugh Aynesworth

The Washington Times, July 3, 2006

DALLAS -- Last week's Supreme Court ruling on the constitutionality of the 2003 Tom DeLay-led Texas redistricting coup was a distinct victory for the Republican Party, but it could spawn some interesting fallout.

There was only one instance in which the court said the Republican gerrymandering could not be upheld -- District 23, which sprawls from San Antonio to far West Texas. The court criticized the redrawing of a second district, District 25, which meanders from Austin to the Mexican border, and said it expected that district would be somewhat redrawn.

Despite the fact that the redrawing of district lines took months to accomplish -- resulting in the defeat of a half-dozen Democratic congressional incumbents throughout the state -- a panel of judges overseeing the changes is making sure they are determined well before this November's elections.

Within hours of the ruling, a federal judge from Texas' Eastern District ordered that all participants in the lawsuit claiming that the Voting Rights Act had been violated must have new maps and arguments submitted to the court within two weeks. Oral arguments are scheduled for Aug. 3 in Austin.

In making District 23 voter alignment comply with the Voting Rights Act, some predict that several additional districts will have to be retooled.

"Anyone who thinks there isn't going to be a ripple effect when countless counties are traded with other congressional districts is not seeing the big picture," said Rep. Henry Bonilla, the current District 23 congressman.

Despite slight realignment in several other districts to make the Bonilla district acceptable, the new map is not expected to alter the course of growing Republicanism throughout Texas. The worst that could happen from the Republican viewpoint, several political analysts say, is that Mr. Bonilla might lose the reconstituted 23rd District.

Most Hispanics in Texas still vote Democratic, and Mr. Bonilla has not been overly effective at courting them. However, he has repeatedly predicted he will win his seat again, if by a smaller margin.

The Republican redistricting effort in 2003, strongly guided by Mr. DeLay, reconfigured District 23 to protect Mr. Bonilla, who had barely eked out a victory against Laredo Democrat Henry Cuellar in 2002.

It shifted about 100,000 Hispanic voters in Webb County -- Mr. Cuellar's stronghold -- out of Mr. Bonilla's 23rd District to a newly configured district to the east of Laredo, the 28th.

Though the court said the dilution of Hispanic voters from Mr. Bonilla's district was unlawful, it did not suggest how the situation should be rectified.

Both Mr. Bonilla and Mr. Cuellar prefer that they not be thrown in the same district.

"Laredo is not the only magical place where you can get Hispanic voters," Mr. Cuellar said last week.

Meanwhile, Democrat Lloyd Doggett, of the 25th District, expects there will be major changes in his district also.

"I don't think this is a matter of mere tweaking," he said.

The Flag Fetish (WSJ)

By Christopher Hitchens

The Wall Street Journal, July 3, 2006

The night before my interview for American citizenship, I suddenly decided that it was too long since I had read the Constitution. Taking it down from the shelf (I am not one of those who makes a fetish of carrying it around on my person) I found myself staying up much later than the vestigial civics exam would have required of me. To turn these pages is to revisit the record of American history. It's also a bit like viewing a cross-section of mammalian evolution, as a clumsy creature gradually acquires the needful adaptations.

The original three-fifths rule was never really designed for flight, but some wings and feathers (and talons) are then added by those amendments that abolish slavery. There are backslidings -- the attempt to impose Prohibition -- and there are the fossilized records of political vendetta, such as the limitation of presidencies to two terms. I have some personal favorite details, such as the provision that forbids office-holders from accepting any titles or decorations from foreign potentates. And I've never quite understood why increases in congressional pay should require an amendment of their own. But to speak generally, it can be said that the Constitution is written with admirable force and clarity, with remarkably few weasel-words and with a great respect for citizens who desire a document that is both intelligible, flexible and authoritative. With fascination and emotion, as if reading by candlelight, one watches the fledgling gradually become an eagle. The King James Bible to one side, the Constitution is probably the greatest document ever composed by a committee.

DOJ_NMG_0038376

It is of course designed to be amended and made more spacious, and many brave people fought and died to make this point. But it should never be burdened with anything trivial or transient, such as the zeal of certain Calvinists to ban alcohol, or the horror of certain other people at the idea of homosexual weddings. And this, it seems to me, is part of the reason why the so-called "flag-burning" amendment should never be allowed to waste any more congressional time.

I would perhaps be suspected of excess Fourth-of-July zeal if I said that the First Amendment is my life as well as the source of my living, but I swear that it would not be that far from the truth. No other country has such a terse and comprehensive statement of the case for free expression: considered important enough to rank first, and also to rank with the freedom of religious conscience. The jewel in the crown of the Bill of Rights does not say that Congress shall make no hasty or crowd-pleasing law abridging the right of assembly and protest. It stoutly insists that Congress shall make no such law.

Thus, it does not matter at all which opinion, or which "sensitivity," is being outraged. The uttermost limit of contempt for America, or American foreign policy, is evidently the vandalizing (and, mindful of the careful neutrality of the Constitution regarding religion, let us not say "desecration") of the stars and stripes. Shall we then say that expression is protected only until it reaches its symbolic limit? What could be more absurd? It is precisely because the flag is so important to some people that we must permit its trashing by others. To legislate otherwise would be to instate a taboo, and that is exactly what the First Amendment exists to forestall.

Of course there are various more pragmatic ways of ridiculing the flag-fetishists. This ponderous "cure" is in response to exactly what "disease"? Like a good number of today's "left," the supporters of the amendment are still living in the '60s. (And even in that incendiary time, the great American socialist Norman Thomas proposed that the flag be publicly washed, not publicly ignited.) Foreign crowds may still torch the flag with impunity, but domestic ones now prefer to represent the president of the United States in full Nazi regalia. I dare say Mr. Bush can stand it; in any event the Constitution says that he has to. As to the myriad other forms in which flags are misused, from album covers to headbands and tattoos, we may as well face the fact that, as the patron of globalization, our country has had to see its emblem become to some extent a logo. No law could even attempt to contain this without becoming richly farcical. And the future possibilities of satire are themselves protected from any prior restraint.

When it was proposed that my apartment building in Washington, D.C., display Old Glory after Sept. 11, 2001, I was not at all opposed but did express a misgiving. What about the day when the flag becomes tattered and drooping, and it's nobody's particular job to take care of it? (You can all think of a comparable example, from a ragged flag on a truck to a half-vanished flag decal on a taxi.) There is nothing more dispiriting than the ebb of such a tide. If I find that I have stuck a flag-stamp on an envelope and accidentally put it on upside-down, I admit with slight embarrassment that I now start over with a new envelope. Nobody would ever notice my tiny disrespect, but I still won't commit it. However, the whole case would be altered if I was told that I had to get it right. The flag would no longer stand for the constitutional spirit that gives it meaning in the first place. It may once have waved over hellish plantations but it was also defended to the end by the Maine regiment at Little Round Top. Without ambiguities and ironies, it would not be what it is. And ambiguity and irony are just what the flag-fetishists do not understand.

If they did have any concept of historical and political irony, they would surely be repelled by at least some of the senators who affected to take their side. You may believe if you choose that Hillary Clinton has abruptly decided to stand between her country's star-spangled banner and its unsleeping enemies. I cannot quite shake the feeling that she is instead putting the flag between herself and her potential critics. Is it this kind of degraded election-year parody that the sponsors of the proposal seriously wanted to encourage? In Iraq, our most desperate field of battle, our troops do not display the flag on patrol because they are in someone else's country. No thinking soldier needs to have this explained to him, or her. But in Washington, the alleged "defense" of the flag depends, for its swing-votes, on people whose very stock-in-trade is cowardice. That ought never to have happened, and is an insult to those who serve, and ought not be permitted to happen again.

DOJ_NMG_0038377

It's easy enough to boast that "these colors do not run." However, those who mistake the symbol for the essence are manifesting not a show of spirit for the former but a pathetic lack of confidence in the latter.

Mr. Hitchens is a columnist for Vanity Fair. His most recent book is "Thomas Jefferson: Author of America" (HarperCollins, 2006).

Flagging Rhetoric (WP)

The Washington Post, July 3, 2006

THERE ARE TWO things to be thankful for in the recent flag waving over flag burning. The first and most important is that this politically timed effort to amend the First Amendment failed in the Senate, albeit by a single vote. The second is that the threatened four days of more-patriotic-than-thou chest-thumping were truncated to two -- which was two more than the Senate ought to have spent on this phony issue.

As these kinds of amendments tend to do, the flag-burning debate managed to bring out some of the worst in politicians of both parties. Take, for example, the smarmy statement put out by Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist (R-Tenn.) after the amendment's defeat.

"Old Glory lost today," Mr. Frist said, starting on a low note and heading lower. "At a time when our armed services are defending America's freedom in the war on terror, it's unfortunate that a minority of my colleagues blocked this amendment." We don't know which is more repugnant: Mr. Frist's cynical invocation of troops "defending America's freedom" as an excuse for limiting freedom of speech or his insinuation that it was dirty filibuster-like tactics that killed the amendment when, in fact, the Constitution requires a two-thirds vote.

The majority leader went on to inveigh against the "activist Supreme Court decision" that invalidated flag-burning laws. Perhaps Mr. Frist should read the ruling -- or at least take a look at the lineup. Among the "activists" in the five-justice majority was archconservative Justice Antonin Scalia.

Not that Mr. Frist's Democratic counterpart, Sen. Harry M. Reid (D-Nev.), was exactly a profile in courage on this issue. "I don't think it's the right time to bring up the issue," Mr. Reid said. So why break with the majority of his party to support it? "I'm confident it won't pass," Mr. Reid explained. There's a principled stand.

If there is a hero in this episode, it is the man who would succeed Mr. Frist as leader, Majority Whip Mitch McConnell (R-Ky.). Mr. McConnell could have put the amendment over the top by abandoning his opposition. To his credit, he didn't, and he was joined by two other Republicans, Sens. Lincoln D. Chafee (R.I.) and Robert F. Bennett (Utah). As Mr. McConnell explained in a column posted on his Senate Web site, "No act of speech is so obnoxious that it merits tampering with our First Amendment. Our Constitution, and our country, is stronger than that."

Too bad 66 fellow senators (52 Republicans and 14 Democrats) don't think so.

ANTITRUST:

Kosher Slaughterhouses Investigated By Feds (APP/AP)

Asbury Park Press, July 3, 2006

MELVILLE, N.Y. — The federal government is investigating kosher slaughterhouses and suppliers for possible antitrust practices, according to a lawyer for one of the firms.

AgriProcessors Inc., the world's largest kosher slaughterhouse, received a grand jury subpoena requesting documents and was cooperating with the investigation, attorney Nathan Lewin said Friday.

"It has been told that neither the corporation, nor any corporate officer or employee is presently a target of the investigation," Lewin said in a statement.

It was not immediately clear exactly how many slaughterhouses and suppliers were involved in the probe.

The U.S. Department of Justice did not immediately return a phone call for comment from The Associated Press late Friday. A telephone number listed for AgriProcessors Inc. was out of service Saturday.

DOJ_NMG_0038378

Based in Postville, Iowa, AgriProcessors employs about 700 people. Trained rabbis at the plant slaughter cows at a rate of about one every three minutes. The meat is sold under the brands Iowa's Best Beef, Rubashkin's and Aaron's Best.

The slaughterhouse became the focus of controversy two years ago when People for the Ethical Treatment of Animals, or PETA, made public an undercover videotape showing steers walking or bellowing up to three minutes after their throats were slit.

The group claimed the video proved the animals were conscious and victims of cruel and inhumane treatment.

Company officials have said that the video depicted only the involuntary movements animals make after death.

Merger Machine Keeps Churning Out Deals (WSJ)

By Dennis K. Berman

The Wall Street Journal, July 3, 2006

A strong first quarter for mergers continued in the second quarter, as deals rolled in from seemingly every sector: banks, stock exchanges, oil companies, real-estate firms and consumer-products companies. It was one of history's largest and most diverse corporate-buying sprees, with nearly $1 trillion in deals around the world.

The frenetic deal-making produced the third most-active quarter since Thomson Financial began keeping track in 1985. It amounted to more than $916 billion of announced transactions, according to Thomson, up about 35% from about $676 billion a year earlier.

World-wide deal volume in the latest three months trailed only the inflated totals of late 1999 and 2000, during the stock-market bubble. It beat the record set in this year's first quarter of $914 billion. The numbers in the U.S. also were impressive, with total volume of $369 billion, up 25% from the year-earlier total of $294 billion.

In the first half of the year, global deal-making moved at a clip of $1.83 trillion, up 43% from last year and on pace to make 2006 the most active year ever, based on noninflation-adjusted dollars. When controlling for inflation, 2006 is on pace to be the third most-active year after 1999 and 2000.

"Even factoring in the tech bubble, our [mergers and acquisitions] backlog is the strongest in history," said Boon Sim, U.S. merger head for Credit Suisse Group. "With the Fed's recent remarks on interest rates," he said, referring to indications from the Federal Reserve that interest rates won't go much higher, "we can expect things to remain pretty healthy for the near future."

For deal makers and deal junkies, the quarter brought a bounty of notable milestones: Thirteen transactions valued at more than $10 billion; headline-grabbing cross-border transactions such as the NYSE Group Inc.'s $10.2 billion bid for Euronext NV, of Amsterdam, and a high-stakes battle over Toronto mining companies Inco Ltd. and Falconbridge Ltd. that started when Inco announced plans to acquire Falconbridge last October. A competing bid for Falconbridge and two bids for Inco were announced in the latest quarter.

Deal-making continued through the last day of the three-month period, with Blackstone Group's $4.3 billion offer for the Travelport travel-services unit of Cendant Corp. And late Friday, Michaels Stores Inc. announced that it accepted a more than $6 billion takeover bid from a private-equity group including Bain Capital and Blackstone Group. That deal came too late to be included in Thomson Financial's calculations for the quarter.

Like the first quarter, the center of the deal making in the latest period wasn't the U.S., but Europe. A series of cross-border combinations continued the first quarter's pattern. Abertis Infraestructuras SA, of Barcelona, Spain, agreed in April to purchase Italian toll-road operator Autostrade SpA, of Rome, for about $16 billion. In May, AXA SA, of Paris, agreed to buy the Winterthur insurance unit of Credit Suisse Group, of Zurich, for nearly $10 billion. They joined a series of massive deals that stand to unite some of the biggest companies on the Continent, such as French state-owned gas company Gaz de France's $40 billion bid for French-Belgian utility Suez SA in the first quarter.

Cross-border mergers and acquisitions surged to about 40% of total deal volume, or $685 billion-plus of transactions year-to-date, according to data from Citigroup. In just the first five months of this year, the volume of international deals already was greater than full-year totals for 2001 through 2004.

The weakening and volatile stock market failed to deter the deal making. Steven Baronoff, Merrill Lynch's global-mergers chief points to a few fundamental changes supporting the wave of acquisitions. Hedge funds are forcing companies to put themselves on the block by agitating for corporate changes that would increase stock prices. From there, private-equity funds -- flush with billions of dollars to invest -- are scooping up the prey.

DOJ_NMG_0038379

Private-equity funds are proving to be the ballast of the overall market, willing to inject capital into all kinds of deals, including the pending $13.55 billion acquisition of Houston oil-pipeline operator Kinder Morgan Inc., announced in late May. There, a group of private-equity investors including Goldman Sachs Capital Partners, the Carlyle Group and its Riverstone Holdings affiliate and American International Group Inc., along with Kinder Morgan Chief Executive and Founder Richard Kinder assembled cash and debt to propose the second-largest private-equity transaction ever.

Acquisitions involving private-equity firms surged 51% in the first half to about $335 billion, according to data provider Dealogic, from $222 billion in the first six months 2005. Private-equity transactions represent about 18% of all merger-and-acquisition activity world-wide, roughly in line with a trend that has been building since the end of 2003.

"This market is fundamentally different than in prior expansion periods," said Louis Friedman, global chairman of mergers and acquisitions at Bear Stearns Cos. "These huge pools of private capital are consistently able to compete with strategic, corporate buyers."

That was clear when Cerberus Capital Management announced in April a $7.85 billion transaction to purchase a controlling stake in General Motors Corp.'s financing arm, General Motors Acceptance Corp. In this complex deal, large banks largely steered clear, letting private investors take on the risk of the transaction.

There are plenty of reasons to be cautious. Rising interest rates, greater competition for deals and some more adventurous combinations -- such as Phoenix mining company Phelps Dodge Corp.'s audacious $35 billion, three-way deal involving both Inco and Falconbridge -- show that the market is getting frothier.

"There is one thing you can say for sure," said George Bilicic, a managing director at Lazard Ltd. "There will be deals that destroy value. There always are. And people have to be careful."

When corporations and private equity are competing for deals, "something has to give," said Paul J. Taubman, global head of mergers and acquisitions at Morgan Stanley. "You will probably see premiums [over current stock prices] start to trend upward."

For now, though, it appears that general conditions will support a sustained merger boom, which is good news for the investment banks and lawyers who assemble the transactions. Based on calculations by Thomson Financial, nearly all the investments banks are raking in higher revenue than last year.

On Wall Street, Goldman Sachs Group Inc. continued its dominance over the merger business in the first half, advising on more than $660 billion of transactions globally. The second slot went to Citigroup Inc., which has picked up momentum since being ranked sixth at the same time last year. Citigroup worked on a third of the deals valued at $5 billion or more during the quarter, and 40% of these large transactions year-to-date.

J.P. Morgan Chase & Co. came in third. Morgan Stanley was fourth, after a slow start to the year. It appears to be on pace to regain its usual place among the top two or three by the year end. Merrill Lynch & Co. took fifth place, after working on some of the largest transactions, especially in Europe.

Perhaps the most surprising finish was Evercore Partners Inc., a New York boutique firm that ranks sixth this year among advisers on U.S. deals, a notable accomplishment for an operation that is considerably smaller than its big-bank competitors.

Among legal advisers, the top five firms as measured by dollar volume for the year to date are: Sullivan & Cromwell LLP; Skadden, Arps, Slate, Meagher & Flom LLP; Simpson Thacher & Bartlett LLP, all of New York; London's Linklaters; and New York's Wachtell Lipton Rosen & Katz.

Street Sleuth Countdown Starts For Satellite Giant (WSJ)

By Andy Pasztor

The Wall Street Journal, July 3, 2006

Consolidation and cost cutting have swept across the commercial-satellite industry, but surviving operators are finding growth opportunities as elusive as ever.

DOJ_NMG_0038380

Intelsat Ltd. and PanAmSat Holding Corp. are set to complete a $3.2 billion merger today, creating a closely held company whose fleet of more than 50 orbiting spacecraft will make it the largest and most diversified global satellite-services operator. The transaction is the end game of three years of intense deal making by prominent private-equity firms on both sides of the Atlantic. The combined company's performance will show how effective the private owners will be in balancing cost cutting with creative investments and strategies for boosting revenue and profit over the long haul.

With offerings that include direct-to-home television broadcasting and support for classified U.S.-government operations, the enlarged Intelsat has promised to shrug off the industry's staid image by exploiting burgeoning technologies. Investors who just purchased some $3 billion in high-yield bonds from the two firms will demand significant synergies, little geographic overlap and streamlined management bent on revving up growth in unconventional ways, if necessary.

But a close look at the business shows how tough it will be to meet those demands. In an industry with huge capital-investment needs and average annual growth rates hovering around 3% or less, the combined company faces major integration, personnel and marketing challenges to break out of that historical slow-growth pattern.

Indeed, before Apax Partners & Co. and the other private-equity owners of Intelsat bid for PanAmSat last August, they agonized over whether the satellite industry could produce the growth rates such investors typically expect. There is reason for concern: In the past, PanAmSat has had to rely on small bits of revenue from specialty consulting contracts -- a minor part of its business -- to meet closely watched revenue guidance for a particular quarter.

The combining companies insist they can make a go of it: "This is not going to be satellite operations as usual," incoming Chairman Joseph Wright vowed during an industry conference earlier this year. Mr. Wright has advocated investments that blur the line between space and ground-based systems to better serve consumers. PanAmSat is even experimenting with distributing ethnic programming it owns to various cable-TV systems.

Wall Street, while recognizing the benefits of fresh investment dollars, has doubts about satellite-industry strategy.

The emergence of private-equity groups as owners has created "a much larger field of banks willing to participate" in satellite debt and equity offerings, according to Carol Goldstein, head of telecommunications and media at ABN Amro Inc. But Heidi Wood, an analyst at Morgan Stanley, said many remain skeptical about space projects.

PanAmSat of Wilton, Conn., posted revenue of $213.2 million, up 2.1%, for the first quarter. Intelsat, which is based in Bermuda but has its headquarters in Washington, reported a 4% drop in overall revenue to $280.4 million.

The new company is betting big on expanding its business in India and Latin America. At the same time, it hopes to participate in the drive to turn cellular phones and other mobile devices into Internet connections and entertainment centers. With phone and cable rivals maneuvering to tap many of the same markets, satellite firms are searching for novels ways to expand their reach.

The biggest immediate financial boost is likely to come from a nearly 40% cut in the combined company's work force, a process that is under way but will take as long as 18 months to play out. Total head count eventually will dive to about 1,000 from 1,400 or so, with PanAmSat executives largely overseeing marketing efforts and Intelsat officials primarily in charge of technical and operating issues.

Mr. Wright, who served as PanAmSat's chief executive, said last week that early personnel decisions will make it easier for the combination for proceed. "The major cuts have been made on the front end," he said, with the aim of easing employee uncertainty and boosting the morale of those who are staying.

David McGlade, Intelsat's chief executive, who will keep the same title at the merged company, stressed in a separate interview that sustainable growth is the company's ultimate goal rather than cost cutting. That means smarter, smaller bets on new markets, combined with "a lot more discipline than either company has had before," he added.

For the next quarter or two, however, some veteran insiders anticipate lackluster results. Combined year-over-year revenue may be flat or even take a dip, they predict, as integration efforts sap momentum from marketing campaigns and other sales initiatives.

The satellite companies that succeed will have to avoid the mistakes of the 1990s, when "indiscriminate cash was thrown" at economically flawed projects, said Andrew Sukawaty, chief executive of Inmarsat Ltd., which provides satellite services to ships and other mobile users.

DOJ_NMG_0038381

Intelsat To Get Much Bigger, But Not Yet Profitable (WP)

By Griff Witte

The Washington Post, July 3, 2006

Intelsat Ltd. of Washington is to become the world's largest commercial satellite operator today when it completes its purchase of the firm that had been its toughest domestic competitor.

The deal to buy longtime rival PanAmSat Holding Corp. creates a company that will carry about a quarter of the world's commercial satellite-delivered television programming on a fleet of 51 satellites and can reach 99 percent of the world's populated areas with communications services.

Intelsat and PanAmSat had flirted with a merger before, but each time the rivalry between the two proved to be too deep to make a deal.

Last August, the companies worked out their differences and settled on a $6.4 billion acquisition, which included the assumption by Intelsat of about $3.2 billion worth of PanAmSat's debt. If the deal closes as scheduled today, PanAmSat will become a wholly owned subsidiary of Intelsat, and its stock-ticker symbol will disappear from the New York Stock Exchange.

The combined company will lose money. PanAmSat earned $72.7 million last year, but Intelsat lost far more, about $325 million. Already deep in debt, Intelsat is borrowing heavily to finance the purchase.

Intelsat chief executive David McGlade said that given the level of debt and interest payments, the company does not expect to become profitable in the foreseeable future. He said the company's investors have been pleased with Intelsat's positive cash flow and its heavy backlog of orders.

Intelsat executives said the merger, approved by government officials from several agencies, consolidates companies with different strengths at a time they expect demand for satellite services to grow rapidly.

The traditional core of Intelsat's business has been telecommunications, a rough arena in recent years. The combined company will be more diverse with the addition of PanAmSat media and entertainment customers such as the British Broadcasting Corp., News Corp., Time Warner Inc. and the Walt Disney Co. PanAmSat also gives Intelsat expanded reach worldwide.

"Scale is important in this industry. Customers increasingly want global coverage," McGlade said.

Intelsat has its operating headquarters in a distinctive building on Connecticut Avenue, from which it controls its satellites. Its corporate headquarters are in Bermuda.

The company was born in 1964 as an intergovernmental organization that provided satellite communications services worldwide. It has been a privately owned corporation since 2001.

Together, Intelsat and PanAmSat would have had $2 billion in revenue for the 12 months ended in March, with about $8.3 billion in pending contracts for the next 15 years.

Even though Intelsat has now acquired its main domestic rival, the competition is far from over. The company still has many competitors overseas, some of which are deeply entrenched in their parts of the world.

"Intelsat and PanAmSat are a good match. But I don't believe it's going to create a huge, dominant player in the industry," said Patrick M. French, a senior analyst with NSR LLC, a satellite industry research company. "At the end of the day, it's still a very regional market."

Intelsat is the largest supplier of commercial satellite services to the U.S. government, doing business with the Defense Department, the State Department and other agencies that the company won't disclose. Its government business, about 15 percent of its total, is run separately from the rest of the company and has its own board of directors, whose names are kept secret.

After the deal closes, the company's management team will include several former PanAmSat executives, including James B. Frownfelter, PanAmSat's president, who will become Intelsat's chief operating officer. Joseph R. Wright Jr., PanAmSat's former chief executive, will become chairman of Intelsat's board.

McGlade said the two companies will fully integrate over the next 18 months. About 400 of the combined company's 1,400 employees will lose their jobs, including some now based in Washington.

DOJ_NMG_0038382

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

An Exodus Of Agents (TIME)

By Brian Bennett And Adam Zagorin

Time, July 3, 2006

Office birthday parties must make FBI Director Robert Mueller a little nervous these days. Consider his No. 2, John Pistole, who hits retirement age when he turns 50 this month. For weeks rumors bubbled up to the seventh floor of the FBI's headquarters at the J. Edgar Hoover Building in Washington: Pistole was going to bolt for a lucrative job in the private sector. The whispers got so loud that Pistole took it upon himself to assure Mueller that he wasn't leaving. One reason he gave: it wouldn't be right to split when so many other senior officials have headed for the exits.

Years of pummeling by the press and Congress, plus wrenching changes produced by the bureau's shift in focus to antiterrorism, have depressed morale, even in the highest ranks. That has coincided with lucrative employment offers to agents from firms desperate for experienced security chiefs in the wake of 9/11. On July 15, just weeks after his 50th birthday, acting executive assistant director for law-enforcement services Chris Swecker is to leave for a new job as head of global security for Bank of America, where he will earn a reported $600,000, more than triple what he makes as the FBI's No. 3. Better pay isn't the only motivation--one former senior FBI manager says he quit after tiring of the "constant berating" he got from lawmakers when briefing Congress. "All these factors play into a decision to leave: family, finances, burnout, pressure, criticism," he says. "You've worked your a__ off. Eventually you say, Hey, the heck with this."

The turnover has hit some of the most vital positions in the bureau hierarchy. In five years, six different people have moved through the post of counterterrorism chief, overseeing what has been the FBI's core mission since 9/11. And June 2 was the last day for 29-year veteran Gary Bald, 52, who retired just 10 months after being tapped to start up the FBI's new National Security Branch. He's taking a security job with Royal Caribbean Cruises.

Members of the Senate Judiciary Committee have been debating whether the brain drain at the FBI poses a threat to national security. "The FBI cannot be a revolving door for senior managers," says Senator Chuck Grassley. "It needs stability in these important positions to fight in the war on terror."

Mueller seems to agree. When promoting agents to senior-executive levels, he "is trying to extract some promise as to how long they are willing to stay," says Michael Mason, who runs the administrative side of the FBI. Grassley suggested to TIME that "the FBI needs to appeal to the patriotic spirit of its senior managers." But beyond that, the bureau is offering few tangible perks to make working there more attractive. Nor will the jobs be getting easier--Mason says new recruits should expect to be rotated around the country and the world, even if it means uprooting their families, a practice that, for budgetary reasons, had waned in recent years.

Mason, however, is optimistic that the new generation of agents will make the sacrifices necessary for the job. At the Washington field office, he notes, 65% of the new recruits last year had taken pay cuts from previous jobs to work at the FBI.

Despite New Allegations, Blagojevich Says Misconduct Is Limited (CHIT/AP)

By F.n. D'alessio, Associated Press Writer

Chicago Tribune, July 3, 2006

CHICAGO -- Gov. Rod Blagojevich insisted Saturday that misconduct in his administration is limited to isolated events by people who are soon punished, even though his own inspector general found a top Blagojevich aide took part in a "concerted effort" to subvert the law.

"As you police the system, every so often you're going find some people who violate the rules. The test of leadership is what do you do about it? Do you act and do you pursue it? Do you work with other law enforcement agencies to ferret more of it out?" he said. "Those are the things we've been doing."

His comments came one day after the release of a letter saying that a yearlong federal investigation had produced credible witnesses related to hiring fraud at multiple state agencies.

DOJ_NMG_0038383

And the Chicago Tribune reported that Blagojevich's former inspector general, Zaldwaynaka "Z" Scott, found that the governor's patronage chief had worked with the Illinois Department of Employment Security to manipulate state hiring.

Joe Cini, head of the Governor's Office of Intergovernmental Affairs, worked with personnel officials at the Department of Employment Security to manipulate job titles, candidate credentials and job descriptions to aid jobseekers sponsored by the governor's office, Scott concluded.

"This effort reflects not merely an ignorance of the law, but complete and utter contempt for the law," Scott wrote in a Sept. 9, 2004, report obtained by the Tribune.

Scott, who resigned a year ago to join a private law firm, found "a concerted effort to subvert the laws including veterans' preference and the hiring process" for jobs that are supposed to be insulated from politics.

Blagojevich said he was not concerned about her blistering criticism of Cini.

"In fact, that's a good sign," he said at a news conference. "Again, that shows we're not even afraid to police people, you know, who are working for us who have responsibilities."

Cini and his aides received additional training on hiring law, as Scott had recommended. Some personnel at the Department of Employment Security were fired, said a Blagojevich spokeswoman.

Blagojevich said his administration has referred some misconduct allegations to the U.S. attorney for possible prosecution. He did not say whether the report on Cini was sent to federal authorities.

The Democratic governor has been hit with a series of revelations about possible misconduct in the way he hands out state jobs and contract. The disclosures create a huge political obstacle for someone who was elected on a promise to clean up state government and now is asking voters for a second term.

Blagojevich acknowledges he has been interviewed by the FBI. Prosecutors have issued subpoenas for hiring records and other information from state agencies, but Blagojevich won't say which agencies.

The administration -- after a list surfaced to prove the practice -- admitted it keeps track of jobseekers and their politically influential sponsors. Another list obtained by The Associated Press showed the administration tracked, by name, hundreds of jobs and promotions that are supposed to be shielded from political considerations.

Then Illinois Attorney General Lisa Madigan released the letter confirming the federal investigation and providing details. In it, U.S. Attorney Patrick Fitzgerald says he is looking into "very serious allegations of endemic hiring fraud."

Jay Stewart, head of the watchdog Better Government Association, said the letter shows Fitzgerald is well beyond a preliminary review of the facts. He concludes Fitzgerald is conducting a broad, aggressive investigation like the ones into former Gov. George Ryan and Chicago Mayor Richard Daley's administration.

"Given what (Fitzgerald) has done, I would be surprised if there are not indictments," Stewart said.

As he has before, Blagojevich portrayed the hiring scandals as fallout from his efforts to change the way things are done in Springfield after 26 years of Republican governors.

Blagojevich noted that one of the changes is that every state employee must now understand the state's ethical standards and answer a series of questions about them.

"I just completed mine," he said, "and I'm happy to say I got every one right."

Associated Press reporter Christopher Wills contributed to this story from Springfield.

Watchdog Rips State Hiring (CHIT)

By Ray Long, Rick Pearson And John Chase, Tribune Staff Reporters

Chicago Tribune, July 3, 2006

`This effort reflects not merely ignorance of the law, but complete and utter contempt for the law.' --Excerpt from report by governor's own inspector general

Nearly two years ago, Gov. Rod Blagojevich's inspector general issued a searing confidential rebuke that called the governor's patronage office "the real machine driving hiring" in one state agency for jobs that were supposed to be free of political influence.

The investigation concluded "the governor's office improperly exercised a great deal, if not all, control over the hiring" at the Illinois Department of Employment Security since shortly after the Democratic governor took office in January 2003.

The report said Blagojevich's patronage office--known formally as the governor's Office of Intergovernmental Affairs--played a key role with compliant agency officials in subverting state laws that give veterans a preference in getting state employment and ban political considerations in hiring for most state jobs.

"This effort reflects not merely an ignorance of the law, but complete and utter contempt for the law," wrote Zaldwaynaka "Z." Scott, who served as Blagojevich's first executive inspector general under an ethics law he signed. Scott, who left the post to join a private law firm last year, said she could not comment on her report.

Details of the Sept. 9, 2004, report, obtained by the Tribune, have never before been made public. The inspector general's findings take on added significance after Friday's disclosure that U.S. Atty. Patrick Fitzgerald is looking into allegations of "endemic hiring fraud" within Blagojevich's administration.

Blagojevich said Saturday his office complied with disciplinary recommendations for employees made in the confidential inspector general's report. Publicly, Blagojevich has defended his top patronage aides and said he maintained that "qualifications, all the time," guided his system for hiring state workers.

"We're more than happy to have all of that referred to other agencies if there's wrongdoing," Blagojevich said. "Because as far as I'm concerned, I'm as determined as anybody else to make sure there is no wrongdoing in state government."

But the inspector general's report contended the governor's patronage office, whose head, Joe Cini, is under federal scrutiny, worked with Department of Employment Security personnel officials to manipulate job titles, candidate credentials and job descriptions to place applicants sponsored by the governor's office "without following state law or normal state hiring protocol."

"Evidence shows non-compliance with state hiring laws," the inspector general wrote. "In fact, it reveals a concerted effort to subvert the laws including veterans' preference and the hiring process" for jobs protected under a 1990 U.S. Supreme Court ruling known as the Rutan decision.

The report cites repeated violations of Rutan, which prohibits political influence in hiring, promotions and transfers for most state jobs.

The report's critique of the heavy involvement of Blagojevich's patronage office into hiring decisions occurred months before Fitzgerald launched his investigation into the administration and some of the governor's top patronage aides. Prosecutors detailed the criminal grand jury investigation in a March 2005 letter that was disclosed by the Tribune last fall.

Letter to attorney general

Fitzgerald provided the clearest context to date on the status of the yearlong federal probe in a letter to state Atty. Gen. Lisa Madigan that was released Friday. Fitzgerald said his investigation involves "the alleged rigging of state employment practices to enable political hiring in violation of Rutan" and includes, "among other things, the preparation of fraudulent hiring documentation."

"Our investigation has now implicated multiple state agencies and departments and we have developed a number of credible witnesses," Fitzgerald said in thanking Madigan for turning over her own state investigation to the FBI and federal prosecutors.

The federal investigation into state hiring is taking place against the larger backdrop of the high-profile federal prosecution of alleged political hiring in Chicago's City Hall. Federal prosecutors have charged top city patronage aides with rewarding Mayor Richard Daley's loyal political workers with jobs in violation of another federal decree prohibiting political considerations in most city hiring.

`We do things right'

The inspector general's report also was written four months before Blagojevich's estranged father-in-law, Ald. Richard Mell (33rd), alleged that the administration traded appointments on state boards and commissions for campaign cash. Mell later recanted the allegations under threat of a lawsuit, but Blagojevich has blamed Mell for the federal and state hiring investigations.

Blagojevich was questioned by federal authorities early in 2005, but he has said the issue involved Mell's allegations, which he called spurious.

On Saturday, Blagojevich said his legal counsel more than a year ago shared information with federal prosecutors and he has told them again to hand over everything to Fitzgerald's office. Blagojevich has said such investigations provide a chance to show "that we do things right."

Such comments contrast with a recommendation from the inspector general's findings on the Department of Employment Security, the federally funded agency in charge of jobless benefits.

"This administration has made many public statements critical of the way in which those seeking political gains have compromised systems," the inspector general wrote. "We urge a similar response to the issues raised in this report."

But it wasn't until May that the Blagojevich administration publicly conceded it had a problem in its hiring system, when it disclosed it had fired two personnel supervisors at the state's office-management agency, the Department of Central Management Services. The fired workers contend they were being made scapegoats for standing up to political intimidation from the governor's office.

`Some bad apples'

On Friday, in response to the release of Fitzgerald's letter, a Blagojevich spokeswoman acknowledged in a statement that among the administration's hires after taking office in January 2003 were "some bad apples who violated the rules."

Yet the inspector general said after investigating hiring at the Department of Employment Security, "The evidence supports the conclusion that the real machine driving hiring decisions in the IDES HR department was the Governor's Office of Intergovernmental Affairs rather than any professional management team in place in the agency."

The inspector general recommended that six employees at Employment Security be disciplined, "up to and including discharge for unethical and fraudulent activity." Three of those employees are still working for the department, including one who has been promoted since the report to become deputy director of administration.

Blagojevich and his administration have touted the work of his inspector general, under an ethics law he sought, as evidence of his reform credentials.

"Whether it's an employee that preceded my being there who came from one of my predecessors or whether it's somebody we hired, if they're doing something wrong and they're violating the rules, we act on what the inspector general suggests and recommends," Blagojevich said.

Though the inspector general's report portrayed the extensive and improper influence of Cini's office on hiring at the department, it only recommended "additional training" for him and his aides on state hiring laws. Scott, the inspector general at the time, would not comment on the rationale of her recommendation for Cini.

While saying "every so often some people make some mistakes and you correct those and you move forward," Blagojevich said he wasn't worried about the allegations against Cini because he received the recommended training.

"Again, that shows we're not even afraid to police people who are working for us who have responsibilities," he said.

Hiring procedures outlined

In describing the pervasive influence of Cini's office at the Department of Employment Security, inspector general investigators found a memo titled "Procedures for Hiring" at the agency. "Step one in the process is, `We receive resume from Governor's Office'" the inspector general's report said in quoting the memo. "Step nine is, `Information should be logged on one status report for the Governor's Office.'

"The process starts and ends with GOIA," the inspector general wrote, using the acronym for the governor's Office of Intergovernmental Affairs.

Investigators for the inspector general's office reported that when a new human resources director for the Department of Employment Security questioned some of the agency's own hiring practices, "Cini also said that the governor's office determines the hiring process, not the agency."

The inspector general noted that it did not investigate every hiring that occurred at the Department of Employment Security since Blagojevich took office. "Thus," the report said, "this sampling may not represent the entirety of the illegalities in hiring at IDES."

---

rlong@tribune.com

rap30@aol.com
jchase@tribune.com

Governor, It's Mr. Fitzgerald (CHIT)

Chicago Tribune, July 3, 2006

U.S. Atty. Patrick Fitzgerald guards news of what he's investigating as fiercely as mama grizzlies protect their cubs. So his disclosure that federal prosecutors are aggressively probing "very serious allegations of endemic hiring fraud" in Gov. Rod Blagojevich's administration is unexpected on one level, not completely shocking on another. The FBI and the office of Illinois Atty. Gen. Lisa Madigan have been digging into reports of state hiring abuses since last year.

But Friday's disclosure that the feds have "implicated multiple state agencies and departments" in politically motivated hiring comes as Blagojevich must stand uneasily for re-election. Awarding state jobs to folks with political connections might strike most of us as business as usual, to borrow a phrase. But it would violate a 1990 U.S. Supreme Court decision that said most state hiring in Illinois has to be free of political influence. That's serious business to a prosecutor who's clearly determined to purge criminals from the Illinois culture of political sleaze.

Fitzgerald's revelations, contained in a letter to Madigan, cite the possibility of federal indictments of state officials. We're content to let the feds figure out what to do and when to do it. Fitzgerald routinely says his office brings prosecutions when the cases are ready, regardless of what's coming up on the calendar. Fitzgerald proved that by announcing the indictment of former Gov. George Ryan for public corruption on Dec. 17, 2003, eight days before Christmas.

We note this because, in barely five months, Illinois voters will elect their next governor. Those voters deserve what they didn't get in 1998 before Ryan was elected governor: a sense of the nature and sweep of a federal investigation. The issue then was the fetid swamp of corruption over which Ryan had presided as secretary of state.

What happens now, happens. Our hope, though, is that to the extent possible, the federal investigation of the Blagojevich administration either culminates or collapses before voters must make their quadrennial choice.

On Friday, the governor's office asserted that there were "some bad apples who violated the rules" among the officials who were hired to run state government after Blagojevich took office in 2003. "The systems we put in place in our first year helped ferret out this wrongdoing." That's hard to square with the disclosure in Sunday's Tribune that in 2004, Blagojevich's own inspector general said the involvement of the governor's patronage office in state hiring reflected "not merely an ignorance of the law, but complete and utter contempt for the law."

Here's the lovely thing about a full-bore FBI investigation with federal prosecutors evaluating evidence the agents unearth. The feds can assess Blagojevich's reassurance that "We do things right" in hiring state employees. Just as they'll no doubt assess the explosive 2004 report from his inspector general.

The bottom line here is ... well, the bottom line is yet to be written. Fitzgerald is keeping to his pattern of probing what he finds to be credible allegations of public corruption, whether they originate in state government, in Cook County or in Chicago's City Hall. And Madigan has correctly ceded her own probe to the feds, who have greater resources. Illinois doesn't need investigators tripping over one another.

What Illinois does need is an end to business as usual. To borrow a phrase.

Late Mobster's Ex-girlfriend A Key Witness (KCS)

By Tom Hays And Larry Mcshane

The Kansas City Star, July 3, 2006

NEW YORK - When Linda Schiro was just 16 years old, she was already a mistress to the mob. The Brooklyn teen hooked up with an older man, a veteran of the Colombo crime family, and they lived together for nearly three decades.

Gregory Scarpa Sr. was convicted of murder and racketeering and died in a Minnesota prison.

A dozen years later, Schiro has emerged as a key witness against an FBI agent accused in what a prosecutor has labeled one of the worst cases of law enforcement corruption in the nation's history.

The agent, R. Lindley DeVecchio, allegedly fed Schiro's late boyfriend inside information that led to four mob slayings - including hits against another mobster's girlfriend and a gangster turned born-again Christian.

DOJ_NMG_0038387

But attorneys for DeVecchio say the longtime mob mistress lacks the credibility to implicate the former FBI agent. Her story has changed drastically over time, the defense says.

Authorities insist that Schiro's initial reluctance to detail the relationship between the agent and the mob capo was motivated by fears for her life. Only recently was she persuaded to tell the truth, they say.

Schiro met Scarpa in 1966 when she was 16. They quickly moved in together and shared the same home for 28 years - except when Scarpa was behind bars. The couple had two children.

DeVecchio was the head of the FBI's Colombo crime family squad and became Scarpa's handler when the mobster turned informer. During Scarpa's time as a mole, DeVecchio put together a 700-page informant file detailing their relationship, court papers showed.

Allegations about possible leaks from DeVecchio to Scarpa first surfaced after the mobster's June 1994 death from AIDS, contracted when he received a tainted blood transfusion. But the Department of Justice declined to prosecute DeVecchio following an internal investigation.

DeVecchio, now 65, retired to Florida in 1996. The former agent has pleaded not guilty to murder charges and is free on $1 million bond.

A law enforcement official, speaking on condition of anonymity because the investigation remains open, said authorities approached Schiro two years ago after a private investigator turned up fresh evidence against DeVecchio.

Prosecutors persuaded Schiro to come clean about the relationship between the agent and Scarpa by promising relocation and police protection. "It was a matter of making her feel safe, telling her, 'You're not going to get whacked,'" the official said.

Court papers filed by the prosecution present a sinister relationship between Scarpa and DeVecchio.

The pair met once a week at Scarpa's home, where the agent accepted a roll of bills bound with a rubber band - the payoff for DeVecchio's tips from inside the FBI, according to an affidavit from Assistant District Attorney Ann Bordley.

The prosecutor maintains that Schiro has direct knowledge about the 1990 slaying of Patrick Porco, who with Scarpa's son Joey and two other suspects murdered a man outside a church in Brooklyn on Halloween 1989.

In May 1990, Schiro answered a phone call from DeVecchio, asking for Scarpa. The mobster had Schiro drive him to a pay phone, where he spoke with DeVecchio for about 10 minutes before returning to the car.

"I can't believe this (expletive) kid," Scarpa allegedly told Schiro. "Patrick is going to rat on Joey. We got to do something about this."

Porco, 18, was found the next morning on a Brooklyn street corner with a bullet in his head.

Suspect Pleads Guilty To Terrorism Hoax (CHIT)

Chicago Tribune, July 3, 2006

A man accused in a terrorism hoax pleaded guilty in the case Friday and faces up to 41 months in prison.

Gilbert Romero, 31, pleaded guilty to "conveying false information about the use of a weapon of mass destruction against property in the United States" and making false statements to federal agents. Romero is to be sentenced by U.S. District Judge Elaine Bucklo Oct. 13.

Romero in June 2005 told the FBI that a terrorist attack was to be carried out against the Chicago headquarters of a U.S. company.

The claim came after Romero was detained in Lake County on state charges, according to his plea agreement.

IMMIGRATION:

Immigration Bill: GOP Firmly Against Amnesty (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, July 3, 2006

In response to your June 23 editorial "The Tancredo Republicans": You're correct that the Republican-led Congress should learn from the mistakes of the Democrats handling the crime bill in 1994 as it deals with the difficult issue of immigration.

DOJ_NMG_0038388

The then-Democrat-led Congress did pass a crime bill in 1994 -- and the voters rightfully responded by sending a Republican majority to Congress for the first time in 40 years. Speaker Tom Foley, House Judiciary Committee Chairman Jack Brooks, and numerous other senior Democrats were ousted by voters precisely because they passed a crime bill that the public didn't support.

House Republicans are committed to enacting border security and immigration legislation, but not if it makes the current situation worse. The upcoming hearings should help Congress understand the public's views on issues such as holding employers accountable who hire illegal workers and, as the Senate bill requires, whether the U.S. must consult with Mexico before the U.S. can secure the border by erecting more walls and fences.

House Republicans will diligently work with Democrats, the Bush administration, and the Senate to solve the enormous immigration problems, but will not support any bill that includes amnesty, weak border enforcement, weak interior enforcement, weak work site enforcement, or other provisions that the public doesn't support. In November, voters will judge members of Congress based upon whether they lead with an understanding of voters' concerns, as House Republicans are committed to doing, or whether they ignore voters by enacting legislation, such as the Senate amnesty bill, that the public doesn't support.

F. James Sensenbrenner Jr. (R., Wis.)
Chairman
House Committee on the Judiciary
Washington

Winning On Immigration (NATLREVIEW)

By Kate O'Bierne
National Review, July 3, 2006

While talking to reporters about immigration reform recently, Sen. John Cornyn, Republican of Texas, floated a tantalizing option available to the House that would bedevil the Senate. “What if the House passed just the enforcement provisions of the Senate bill and sent it back to us?” Cornyn wondered aloud. When he was asked whether he’d vote for just those sections of the Senate’s “comprehensive” bill, he replied with a chuckle, “I’d sure take a look at it.” Later that week, House Republican leaders announced plans to hold hearings across the country on border security and on the most controversial provisions of a bill they have dubbed the “Reid-Kennedy” bill; and the “Border Security First Act” was introduced in the Senate by Pennsylvania Republican Rick Santorum.

In Washington’s immigration-reform script, congressional Republicans have been cast as villains intent on blocking enlightened policies — but they are refusing to play the part of spoilers. They are instead spoiling for a fight they are confident they can win.

Rather than merely blocking action on a Senate bill they refuse to support, a unified House GOP caucus has decided to go on offense in order to wring the maximum political credit from being on the right side of their reading of public opinion. Because House Republicans fear the appearance of compromising with a Senate bill they are convinced is wildly unpopular, they have — according to a leadership aide — no intention of taking part in a conference to hammer out differences between the House and Senate unless “there is a sea change in either public or Senate opinion.” The “Tancredo Republicans” the Wall Street Journal rails against as being out of touch with public sentiment include the majority of Republicans in the House and Senate. (Rep. Tom Tancredo, a Colorado Republican, is contemplating running for president on a border-security platform, hence the Journal’s phrase.)

The White House is touting a recent poll commissioned by the Manhattan Institute claiming that likely Republican voters are clamoring for “comprehensive” reform, including “earned citizenship” for illegal aliens; Wall Street Journal editors profess to be unaware of any contradictory polling evidence of public sentiment. But congressional Republicans who will be facing the voters are firmly convinced that backing border security now will mean job security in November.

Senators Reid and Kennedy
Roman Genn

DOJ_NMG_0038389

The mid-June Tarrance Group survey of likely Republican voters found that 75 percent favored tougher border security, a crackdown on employers who hire illegal workers, and earned legalization for illegal aliens. The survey asked respondents about a proposal under which current illegal aliens would have to pay a fine, pay taxes, learn English, and go to the back of the line before being granted citizenship. A House GOP leadership aide scoffed at the poll as providing what Republican members consider a misleading summary of the Senate plan. (For example, under the Senate's bill illegal aliens will form a wholly new line — one that permits them to remain legally in the U.S.)

The leadership aide explains that, in any case, the GOP members' position on this issue doesn't rest on poll results. He allows that politicians can sometimes misread the public mood, but says that "this time the mood is so overwhelming, they can't miss it." Voters aren't waiting for a pollster to call to express their views on illegal immigration. In phone calls, in writing, and in person they are letting their congressmen know where they stand. Even the more liberal members of the House GOP caucus grant that in the short term it's good politics to strongly oppose the Senate bill, even as they fret over the possible political effects a decade or so from now.

A Senate Republican aide flatly adds, "If it were true that 75 percent of Republican voters want an amnesty bill, Rick Santorum wouldn't be introducing a border-security-only bill." He noted that the embattled Santorum faces reelection in a "purple" state — a mixture of blue and red — where he hopes to appeal well beyond the conservative base.

The polls promoted by supporters of the Senate's version of immigration reform typically don't mention the issues House Republicans will be raising during their hearings this summer. Provisions of the White House–backed bill that the House GOP will be highlighting include in-state tuition for illegal aliens and the allowance of Social Security benefits for illegal workers based on their use of fraudulent documents. Some hearings will focus on the national-security risk posed by chaos at the border, the problem of voter fraud, and the importance of English fluency and assimilation. One influential conservative who advises House Republicans expects "the drumbeat of bad publicity against the Senate bill" to put the Bush administration on the defensive for the next couple of months.

Republicans anticipate that their hearings will prompt demonstrations calling for amnesty — which, according to the Tarrance poll, 57 percent of Republican voters define as allowing illegal aliens to apply for citizenship. The poll also found that 47 percent of those who were aware of previous "pro-immigration demonstrations" were "strongly less likely" to support amnesty.

In a battle of the dueling polls, House Republicans find support in an April survey of likely voters by McLaughlin & Associates. The poll tested alternative messages on border security and found 93 percent agreeing that "we have to regain control of our borders so that we are the ones deciding who enters our country," and 84 percent agreeing that "we have to stop the flow of illegals before we address what to do about those who are already here." Even the survey promoted by the White House found that when presented with a range of choices on how to handle the problem of 12 million illegal aliens living in the U.S., the largest percentage of likely GOP voters (65 percent) "strongly" favored a proposal that included only border security and workplace enforcement.

While support for legalization of illegal aliens and guest-worker programs depends on how questions are phrased and what details are omitted, the overwhelming support for controlling the border is indisputable. So rather than being intimidated with the need to back "comprehensive" reform, congressional Republicans confidently favor a "consensus" reform that would dramatically reduce illegal border crossings. Republicans argue that "border security first" would avoid the costly mistake made in the 1986 immigration reform that promised border enforcement but only delivered an amnesty that encouraged more illegal immigration.

If Senate majority leader Bill Frist permits a vote on Senator Santorum's new bill — or if the House approves the border-security provisions of the Senate bill and returns them to the Senate — senators will have to decide whether they are willing to hold the border-security measures they claim to favor hostage to an amnesty program.

House Of (immigration) Blues (LAT)

The Los Angeles Times, July 3, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0038390

LAST WEEK SAW THE FIRST narrowing of the chasm between the Senate's recent comprehensive immigration bill and the House of Representatives' punitive enforcement-only package from December. Trouble is, the overtures are all going in the House's direction.

Sen. Arlen Specter (R-Pa.) announced that he'd be willing to stagger reform measures so that all enforcement issues were enacted first. Sen. John McCain (R-Ariz.) seconded that motion and emphasized that the border was being strengthened. And President Bush invited Rep. Mike Pence (R-Ind.) to the White House to discuss Pence's proposal to delay all other action until the border was somehow "certified" as secure, after which the estimated 11 million illegal immigrants in the United States would be asked to leave and apply for a visa, perhaps in fancy new e-kiosks operated by an Internet job-search company. No word on who would pick our crops, work construction sites and clean our bathrooms in the meantime.

Worrying solely about "securing" the border without securing and legalizing a flow of needed workers would have three sure-fire side effects. First, the current stream of illegal immigration would turn into a panicky flood, as people risk even more life and limb to sneak in before the southern border is militarized. Second, as has happened during nearly every proposed U.S. immigration crackdown, a rush of legal immigrants would jump into line, backing up an already interminably clogged process. And worst of all, the millions of workers who live in the shadow economy would be even less likely to come out of the cold and into the reach of U.S. law.

Pro-reform senators are making two classic negotiating mistakes: confusing their opponents' line-in-the-sand intransigence with a negotiating ploy, and elevating the importance of making a deal above its actual content. House Speaker J. Dennis Hastert (R-Ill.) has already indicated that he will abide by his "majority of the majority" rule, preventing even consideration of a bill that's not supported by most House Republicans.

Considering that the infamous HR 4437 was co-sponsored by Republicans such as Texan Ted Poe, who believes (among other things) that "Mexico is at war with the United States" to "occupy this entire land," and given that Congress has chosen to spend the run-up to the November elections holding unusual public "field hearings" instead of conference committee sessions, it's clear that the House GOP is most interested in inflaming xenophobic passions.

What's odd is that Senate Republicans seem to know this. At a pro-reform news conference last week, McCain expressed "regret" at the "level of dialogue" in the House. Sen. Lindsey Graham (R-S.C.) advised Americans not to be led astray "by a few loud people" and stated his belief that "the good people can prevail." Conservative flamethrower Grover Norquist called Republican anti-immigration rhetoric "hateful" and "damaging" and even choked back sobs.

Such bluntness is startling and overdue within the ranks of the GOP. Senators should not be overly desperate to reach any deal they can call "comprehensive" with their intemperate colleagues on Capitol Hill. If the House dictates terms of an immigration compromise, it is certain that the "reform" will only aggravate the problem it aims to fix.

Border Apprehensions Increase In 2006 (WT)

By Jerry Seper

The Washington Times, July 3, 2006

U.S. Border Patrol agents have detained 901,428 foreign nationals seeking to sneak into the United States in the past nine months -- more than 3,300 a day -- up from the 890,358 apprehended in the same period last year.

Border Patrol spokesman Michael Friel said the number of apprehensions, monitored since the Oct. 1 start of fiscal 2006, was a 1 percent increase over detention totals in the first nine months of fiscal 2005. He also said that although arrests had edged up, the number of apprehended non-Mexicans, known as "other than Mexicans" or "OTMs," had declined by about 16 percent.

Mr. Friel said non-Mexican apprehensions totaled 89,059, compared with nearly 106,000 detained in the first nine months of fiscal 2005.

The Border Patrol, an agency within U.S. Customs and Border Protection, is responsible for protecting U.S. borders between the land ports of entry.

DOJ_NMG_0038391

"CBP continues to enhance border security by innovative programs such as the Secure Border Initiative, which will increase border-security effectiveness through the right mix of personnel, infrastructure, technology and rapid-response capability," Mr. Friel said.

The initiative is a comprehensive, multiyear plan aimed at securing the borders and reducing illegal entry.

It involves the deployment of additional agents to patrol the borders, secure ports of entry and enforce immigration laws; expanded detention-and-removal capabilities; upgraded technology, including airplanes, helicopters and unmanned aerial vehicles; additional resources for infrastructure improvements; and expanded interior enforcement, including work-site inspections.

The initiative's goal is to gain "operational control" of both the northern and southern borders.

Congress has authorized the hiring of 6,000 additional Border Patrol agents to augment the agency's 12,000-member force. President Bush has ordered the deployment of 6,000 National Guard troops to the southern border to assist while the Border Patrol hires and trains the additional agents.

Mr. Friel said that since Oct. 1, Border Patrol agents have seized more than 1.15 million pounds of narcotics, including marijuana, cocaine and heroin, with an estimated street value of $1.2 billion. The nine-month total represents about 4,300 pounds of drugs being seized every day.

He also said that in the past nine months, agents rescued 2,281 aliens attempting to cross into the United States, a 39 percent increase from fiscal 2005. Last fiscal year, he said, the agency recorded 473 migrant deaths, compared with 240 this fiscal year.

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

Bush To Name Virginian To Lead Maritime Agency (WT)

The Washington Times, July 3, 2006

The chairman of the Prince William Board of County Supervisors is going national.

Last week, President Bush announced that he would nominate Sean T. Connaughton to lead the Maritime Administration at the Department of Transportation.

Mr. Connaughton, a lawyer, unsuccessfully sought the Republican nomination for lieutenant governor last year, losing in the primary to William T. Bolling. Mr. Bolling went on to win the seat.

Mr. Connaughton has served as a senior transportation associate for the American Petroleum Institute.

He served in the Coast Guard from 1983 to 1986 after receiving a bachelor's degree from the Merchant Marine Academy, He is a commander in the Naval Reserve.

He also holds a master's degree from Georgetown University and a law degree from George Mason University.

•Hispanic history

The D.C. Office of Latino Affairs (OLA) is teaming with Maya, a Hispanic marketing firm, to produce a documentary about the history of Hispanics in the District.

"Through Our Eyes" -- a documentary funded by OLA in celebration of its 30th anniversary -- will feature donated pictures, stories, videos and recorded music that showcase Hispanic life in the District since the 1970s.

The fast-paced, English- and Spanish-subtitled film will feature residents, community leaders, activists and journalists discussing issues such as Hispanics' settlement 30 years ago near the newly established embassies in Adams Morgan, increased Salvadoran emigration in the 1980s and the immigration rallies this spring.

OLA Director Gustavo Velasquez said the film will "look retrospectively at the contributions of Latinos in the nation's capital."

A film screening will be held in mid-September.

•Singalong campaign

With 10 candidates running for one seat on the D.C. Council, bold and daring campaigning isn't out of the question, or so the minds behind Bill Rice's council run seem to think.

DOJ_NMG_0038392

Mr. Rice, a former journalist and a one-time spokesman for the D.C. Department of Transportation, plans to spice up his campaign for the Ward 3 council seat with a catchy jingle and some July Fourth fun.

The candidate plans to distribute Rice Krispies treats as he bikes along MacArthur Boulevard in the July Fourth Palisades parade tomorrow.

But it won't stop there.

Bridget Davis, a spokeswoman for Mr. Rice, said he will be accompanied by singers from Middle C Music who will "belt out" the official campaign song, "Rice is Running," which is sung to the tune of the advertising jingle for "Rice-a-roni, the San Francisco treat."

Rice is running for Ward 3 council seat.
Rice is running;
his platform can't be beat.
For services that you've paid for,
his policy is open door.
Rice is running.
Your vote is all he needs.

"Everybody can join and march in perhaps the most American hometown experience we have in our nation's capital," Mr. Rice said. "Rain or shine, we will be handing out the Rice Krispies treats. It's always fun."

•Settlement

Frederick County, Md., has agreed to pay $55,000 to settle a lawsuit that says State's Attorney Scott L. Rolle wrongly fired a worker, saying she abused sick leave.

The county agreed to give $40,000 in back pay and benefits to plaintiff Amy Hill-Boyer and to pay her $15,000 in legal fees, but it won't reinstate her, the Frederick News-Post reported Thursday.

The county denies any wrongdoing in the settlement reached earlier this month after a mediation session in U.S. District Court in Baltimore.

Miss Hill-Boyer was fired in September after 10 years with the state's attorney's office.

Mr. Rolle is a Republican candidate for state attorney general.

•Call to resign

A Chesterfield County, Va., supervisor pleaded guilty Wednesday to sexually abusing a teenager, prompting board members to ask for his resignation.

Edward B. Barber, the former board chairman, pleaded guilty to two misdemeanor counts of sexual battery against a 16-year-old girl as part of a plea agreement. He originally was charged with one felony count each of aggravated sexual battery and object sexual penetration.

Mr. Barber, 50, was sentenced to two years in prison, suspended, and must submit to a sex offender evaluation. He was placed on three years of probation and must serve 100 hours of community service.

If Mr. Barber had been convicted of a felony, he would have been forced to give up his seat on the board. But at the Board of Supervisors meeting on Wednesday, members requested that he step down.

"In view of the serious nature of the convictions today, we feel he has violated the public trust and it would be inappropriate for Mr. Barber to continue to serve on this board," board Chairman Dickie King said, a stand endorsed by the three other supervisors.

Mr. Barber told the Richmond Times-Dispatch that he had no plans to give up his seat.

"I've represented that district well for 14 years, and I plan to continue to do that," he said.

Mr. Barber would not say whether he would run for re-election in 2007.

Mr. Barber already had been suspended from his job as a physical education teacher at Crenshaw Elementary School. School officials said last week that his contract would not be renewed.

The charges did not involve a student at the school.

DOJ_NMG_0038393

Push For Government Openness On Right And Left (NYT)

By Jason DeParle

The New York Times, July 3, 2006

WASHINGTON, July 2 — Exasperated by his party's failure to cut government spending, Senator Tom Coburn, Republican of Oklahoma, is seeking cyberhelp.

Mr. Coburn wants to create a public database, searchable over the Internet, that would list most government contracts and grants — exposing hundreds of billions in annual spending to instant desktop view.

Type in "Halliburton," the military contractor, or "Sierra Club," the environmental group, for example, and a search engine would show all the federal money they receive. A search for the terms "Alaska" and "bridges" would expose a certain $315 million span to Gravina Island (population 50) that critics call the "Bridge to Nowhere."

While advocating for openness, Mr. Coburn is also placing a philosophical bet that the more the public learns about federal spending, the less it will want.

"Sunshine's the best thing we've got to control waste, fraud and abuse," he said. "It's also the best thing we've got to control stupidity. It'll be a force for the government we need."

But Mr. Coburn's plan, hailed by conservatives, is also sponsored by a Democrat, Senator Barack Obama of Illinois, and applauded by liberal groups that support activist government. The result is a showcase of clashing assumptions and the oddest of coalitions, uniting Phyllis Schlafly, a prominent critic of gay rights, with the National Gay and Lesbian Task Force.

Liberal groups, while also praising openness, are hoping for a new appreciation of what government does, like provide clean water and feed the hungry. "We need to remind people where Uncle Sam helps us each day," said Gary Bass, director of OMB Watch, a liberal group that got its start monitoring the Office of Management and Budget.

The House unanimously passed a version of the proposal in late June, though in a form that had drawn outside criticism. The House bill creates a database that would omit contracts, which typically go to businesses, but would include about $300 billion in grants, which usually go to nonprofit groups.

"Contracts are awarded in a much more competitive environment," said Representative Thomas M. Davis III, a Virginia Republican who was a sponsor of the bill. That makes them more self-policing, he said. Mr. Davis, whose district includes many government contractors, said grants "are more susceptible to abuse."

But liberal critics see a revival of what they call old partisan efforts to "de-fund the left," by reducing grants to liberal groups or adding conditions that limit their activities.

Mr. Coburn joined them in criticizing the House omission of contracts. Including them in the database, he said, is "the only way you're going to bust these indecent relationships of former Pentagon employees working for defense contractors and getting sweetheart deals from buddies inside."

When told of Mr. Coburn's statement, Mr. Davis said, "As usual, I think he's headline grabbing." While Mr. Davis supports more openness in contracting, he said including contracts would "gum up the works" legislatively since more Congressional committees would be involved.

Spending hawks have sought a spending database for years. The Heritage Foundation, a conservative Washington group, tried to build one itself, but search-engine technology now makes the task easier.

On the right, support for the plan reflects an old concern about spending and a new faith in the power of blogs. Supporters picture a citizen army of e-watchdogs, greatly increasing the influence of antispending groups in Washington.

"Now that you've got the Internet, you'll have tens of thousands of watchdogs," said Bridgett G. Wagner of the Heritage Foundation, who is leading a coalition of conservative groups that support the Coburn bill. "That's what people see in it."

Among the bill's leading supporters is Mark Tapscott, the editorial page editor of The Washington Examiner, who has promoted it there and on his blog, Tapscott's Copy Desk. While most spending is already a matter of public record, Mr. Tapscott argues that it is often buried in obscure documents.

"The spending cannot be sufficiently scrubbed," Mr. Tapscott said. Whether the database causes spending to rise or fall (he guesses it will fall), "what's important to me is the principle of the public's right to know," Mr. Tapscott said.

DOJ_NMG_0038394

A number of blogs popular among conservatives have praised Mr. Coburn's bill. Instapundit, among the most popular, has pushed it. Seeker Blog called it "the best news I've heard out of D.C. this year." Captain's Quarters demanded "Give us the Pork Database," and Porkopolis hailed the measure with the slogan, "Show Me the Money."

While the bill has few overt critics, it may encounter resistance from Congressional insiders who have used their influence to secure projects back home. When Mr. Coburn tried to attach the measure to a lobbying reform bill this spring, Senator Trent Lott, a Mississippi Republican known for his zeal in aiding his state, killed it on procedural grounds.

Not everyone is convinced more sunshine will matter. "All this information is out there right now" and being mined by watchdog groups, said Douglas Holtz-Eakin, a former director of the Congressional Budget Office. While it was "certainly appropriate" to build a database, he said: "I don't think it would dramatically change public perception of the appropriate size and scope of government. That's a much deeper issue."

One important challenge involves tracking subcontractors. Money awarded, for example, to Lockheed, to build a military plane, might get divided among hundreds of parts suppliers. The database, Mr. Coburn said, would seek to list them all.

The push for openness runs counter to the trend of increased secrecy among government officials who cite the need to protect national security. Criticizing that trend, Mr. Tapscott said, "people in the Pentagon, like bureaucrats everywhere, overclassify too much because of the basic instinct to protect yourself."

But Mr. Coburn said he was comfortable with the overall level of secrecy. His database would adhere to current disclosure rules, he said.

What if sunlight so cleanses the government that the public wants more of it? Grover Norquist, an antitax advocate who supports the House bill, just laughed. "They might say, 'Oh my goodness, look at all the good work that's being done,' " he said. "But I'm willing to take that chance."

Growers Reap Benefits Even In Good Years (WP)

By Dan Morgan, Sarah Cohen And Gilbert M. Gaul

The Washington Post, July 3, 2006

EDEN, Md. -- Roger L. Richardson, a vigorous 72-year-old who grows corn on 1,500 acres of prime Eastern Shore farmland, had a good year in 2005. Thanks to smart planning, shrewd investing and a little luck, he grossed a healthy $500,000 for his crop.

But the federal government treated him as if he needed help and paid him $75,000.

The money came from a little-known, 20-year-old U.S. Agriculture Department program that was intended to boost farmers' incomes when prices are low.

The farmers do not have to sell at distressed prices to collect the money. They can bank the government payments and sell when prices are higher.

Since September, the program has cost taxpayers $4.8 billion. Most of that money -- $3.8 billion -- went to farmers such as Richardson who sold at higher prices, according to a Washington Post analysis of USDA payment data.

The subsidy is called the loan deficiency payment. Although it has cost taxpayers $29 billion since 1998, it is virtually unknown outside farm country. But in rural America, the LDP is a topic at backyard barbecues and local diners along with the high school football team and the weather. Despite its name, it is neither a loan nor, in many cases, payment for a deficiency. It is just cash paid to farmers when market prices dip below the government-set minimum, or floor, if only for a single day.

The LDP has become so ingrained in farmland finances that farmers sometimes wish for market prices to drop so they can capture a larger subsidy.

"In the fall of the year, we find the farmer wanting the price to go down," John Fletcher, a Missouri grain dealer, told Congress last year. "It's almost unnatural."

Corn farmers collected the LDP on 90 percent of their crop last year, but most did not suffer the losses that traditional subsidies are meant to offset. Some collected hundreds of thousands of dollars.

"Most smart farmers are cashing in on it," said Bruce A. Babcock, director of the Center for Agricultural and Rural Development at Iowa State University. "It shows me that farmers are being overcompensated."

DOJ_NMG_0038395

The LDP bears little resemblance to the original price-support system, created in 1938 to help millions of desperate farmers during the Depression. The government then propped up prices by buying grain and cotton whenever the market dipped below a government-set floor.

But by the 1980s, the government had accumulated huge stockpiles of commodities that it could not sell abroad. With the backing of Southern rice- and cotton-state lawmakers, Congress in 1985 came up with a way to protect farmers from low prices: the LDP. The government encouraged farmers to sell their crops on the market and paid them cash when prices fell below the floor.

This reduced the stockpiles and made U.S. farm products a better buy abroad. But few foresaw where the program would end up, according to Arkansas Secretary of Agriculture Richard E. Bell, who lobbied for the change as president of the state's largest rice cooperative.

When corn prices fell in the late 1990s, the cash payments to farmers soared.'Location, Location . . .'

Roger Richardson's experience with his corn farm in Maryland's Worcester County illustrates one way farmers take advantage of the LDP.

After harvesting his corn last summer, Richardson stored 190,000 bushels in silos that he owns with other farmers. He then waited for prices to rise. He had reason to be hopeful because the corn-dependent Delmarva poultry industry pays a premium to lock up local supplies for chicken feed.

Meanwhile, in the Midwest, prices briefly dropped to their lowest level in five years after Hurricane Katrina. The storm stalled grain barges up and down the Mississippi. Huge yellow piles lay in fields outside stuffed grain elevators, and a sign outside one elevator said, "Blame it on Katrina."

The drop in prices brought the government's safety net -- the LDP -- into play.

In DeKalb County, Ill., the subsidy had reached 46 cents a bushel one day in September. (The LDP for each county is calculated by subtracting the USDA's daily estimate of the local market price from the government's floor, which is set each year and was $1.98 a bushel in DeKalb.)

Yet in one of the oddities of the system, across the country on the Eastern Shore, where corn market prices were much higher, the subsidy was about the same: 48 cents. It hovered around that level for the next two months.

To book the subsidy being paid on a particular date, Richardson simply had to walk into the local USDA office in Snow Hill, Md., with the ability to prove that he owned a harvested corn crop. He applied for the subsidy for different portions of his crop on several days throughout the fall.

By December, feed mills on the Eastern Shore had begun running short, and prices were rising. Richardson began selling for an average $2.60 a bushel. That was about 50 cents more than the price quoted in Chicago, the national benchmark. Richardson cashed in because of his ability to store grain until it was needed and his proximity to the mills.

"It's like real estate," he said. "It's location, location, location."

The LDP subsidy that he had already booked would bring his total take to more than $3 a bushel -- he made $75,000 from the LDP alone.

The paradox of paying roughly equal subsidies regardless of local conditions was a deliberate policy devised by Congress. In 2002, it directed the USDA to "minimize" the difference in LDP subsidies across states and between counties -- and, in effect, across the country.

"We were trying to make certain that you wouldn't have a farmer receiving 5, 10, 15 cents less than another farmer across the river or the county line," said former representative Charles W. Stenholm (D-Tex.).

Lawmakers are frequently deluged by complaints from farm constituents who are outraged by a higher LDP across state or county borders. The lawmakers, in turn, lean on the USDA.

In June 2002, for example, South Dakota's senators demanded that an injustice be corrected: Corn farmers in Iowa were getting 9 cents a bushel while those just across the border in South Dakota were getting 7 cents.

"These inequities are more than just numbers because for farmers they could make the difference between profit and loss," wrote Sens. Tim Johnson (D) and Thomas A. Daschle (D) in a two-page, single-spaced letter to then-Agriculture Secretary Ann M. Veneman obtained under the Freedom of Information Act.

DOJ_NMG_0038396

Efforts to equalize the subsidies fall to a staff of 10 officials housed in the USDA's Commodity Office in suburban Kansas City. Every workday, they check with online services, call grain elevators across the Midwest and poll 19 major grain markets, where large merchants and food processors go to buy.

Then, in a 4 p.m. ritual, the USDA officials gather around a conference table with an open phone line to headquarters in Washington. Poring over maps and prices, the group sets the next day's LDP for corn, wheat and 15 other commodities in more than 3,000 counties.

Officials add a few cents in one county and take away in another, when the research shows that subsidies in different areas would be too far apart.

"Congress gave us conflicting requirements," said Bert Farrish, director of the USDA's Commodity Office in Washington. "We have to minimize the difference in benefits across state and county lines, but administer it in a way that reflects local markets as closely as we can."

Stenholm acknowledges the problems but believes it all evens out.

"There's no way you're going to get a national program that works perfectly," he said. "Some get an advantage, some get a disadvantage. And you hope over 10 years it balances out."Financial Hedging

Increasingly, farmers have learned to lock in their subsidies when prices are low and sell when prices are higher.

For last year's crop, farmers sold their corn for an average of $1.90 per bushel, only 5 cents below the national floor price. But they received an LDP averaging 44 cents, government payment records show. The difference amounted to $3.8 billion.

The same thing happened in 2004, when the LDP was 27 cents even though the price farmers received when they sold their crops was above the floor. The windfall for farmers was $2.7 billion.

One reason for the discrepancy is that farmers have adopted modern methods to limit their financial risk.

"A farmer who plays it right can make a bundle at times," said Daniel A. Sumner, an agricultural economist at the University of California at Davis.

One who played it right last year was Michael T. Sullivan, who produces a million bushels of corn annually with his three sons in Franklin, Minn. He thrived even during the depressed post-Katrina market.

Well before the storm, Sullivan said, the family had arranged to sell three-quarters of its crop to a local grain elevator for about $2 a bushel. The practice, called "forward contracting," is increasingly common and helps insulate farmers from the market's routine ups and downs.

On top of their contracted price, the Sullivans got the subsidy: $292,054 for that same corn, according to payment records.

Sullivan considers the LDP a godsend, given the uncertainties of farming. "Without it, Main Street Minnesota would have no money to keep the economy rolling," he said.

Richardson also makes no apologies for taking the government money. He contends that the LDP helps keep him and other farmers afloat by offsetting rising energy costs. Maryland farmers, he adds, deserve higher subsidies because they have higher costs and lower yields than Midwestern farmers.

"Without the LDP last year, farmers would have been in deep water," he said recently. As a large farmer, he said, "You handle a lot of dollars, but that's no panacea."

The bigger the farm, the bigger the payouts.

Walker Place, an operation based in Danville, Ill., that farms in 23 counties in six states, has received $3.4 million in LDP checks over the past decade, including $491,726 on the 2005 corn crop, government records show.

Stephanie Walker Spiros, who helps run the sprawling family farm empire, acknowledged that the system has flaws. But she defends it as necessary to cushion other farmers who do not have access to sophisticated financial hedges, and to buttress the farm economy in bad years.

"It's a protection in years of depressed prices," she said.

But the payments for corn alone have grown, from $1 billion for the 1998 crop to $4.3 billion for last year's, even though the average price farmers received for a bushel has remained near or above the government floor for the past five years.

U.S. farmers can also make up for declining prices with higher yields. They now harvest 20 percent more corn from each acre than just a decade ago, and yields in the past three years were the highest ever, according to USDA statistics.

DOJ_NMG_0038397

'Paper Corn'

Riding his combine through the heart of Illinois corn and soybean country early last October, Mackinaw farmer John Kuhfuss personified the business-savvy farmer who profits from the LDP.

Kuhfuss is a modest-size farmer by Illinois standards. He sharecrops 1,000 acres of corn and soybeans, splitting the revenue and the government payments with several landowners.

Still, he uses a financial adviser and a commodity broker to help hedge his farming risks with options and futures contracts at the Chicago Board of Trade and Chicago Mercantile Exchange. Farmers call that "paper corn."

It is a different world from that of the 1970s, when his father, the late William J. Kuhfuss, was president of the American Farm Bureau, the nation's largest farm group.

"When he started farming, he hitched a couple of horses to a wagon, hauled his corn to the nearest railroad siding and sold it for whatever the cash offer was -- and in the Depression it was cheaper to burn corn than sell it," Kuhfuss said.

He talked his father into his first contract on the corn futures market -- and he came out a winner.

Now the son uses the lingo of the trader as much as that of the farmer, throwing around terms such as "strike price," "puts" and "calls." He looks for opportunities to sell his crop more than a year before it is harvested.

"I'm perfectly willing to plan a year out," he said. "Sometimes there are opportunities there."

In spring 2005 he had seized such an opportunity and sold 30,000 bushels of corn to a local elevator for $2.25 a bushel. By October, with buyers offering only $1.70 a bushel, that decision looked smart.

With his price assured, Kuhfuss made another smart decision: "I LPDed all my corn at over 40 cents a bushel," he said.

He said he and his partners netted nearly $40,000 in LDP on their 500 acres of corn. They were not alone. On the days he received his checks, other Illinois corn farmers netted $36.5 million.

In Lincoln, Ill., not far from Kuhfuss's place, the farmer-owned Kruger grain elevator was at full-harvest tilt.

General manager Hugh Whelan was keeping a close eye on the LDP.

"The best thing for farmers now is for the market to go lower," he said. But then Whelan put on his taxpayer's hat:

"It's going to take a lot of dollars to pay that LDP."Global Impact

Today, farm price supports, especially the LDP, are under serious attack.

Last year at the economic summit of the Group of Eight leading industrial nations in Gleneagles, Scotland, President Bush shocked U.S. farm organizations by proposing that certain farm subsidies by rich industrial nations be eliminated. That would mean the end, or drastic scaling back, of the LDP.

The main objection to the LDP is that it hurts world commodity prices by encouraging overproduction.

Farmers abroad lose because "the LDP causes us to grow more corn than we otherwise would," said Sumner, the University of California economist. He advised Brazil when it successfully argued to the World Trade Organization last year that the LDP and other U.S. subsidies depress world cotton prices.

Negotiations over a new world trade deal broke up in disarray Saturday after the United States and other countries deadlocked on the issue of reducing farm subsidies.

Lawmakers from Midwestern farm states -- most of which backed Bush in the past two presidential elections -- have vowed to defend the LDP.

Supporters say it has helped the U.S. trade balance and has encouraged the efficient marketing of grain. Moreover, they say, European and Asian nations subsidize their agriculture at even higher levels.

Senate Finance Committee Chairman Charles E. Grassley (R-Iowa) has warned U.S. trade negotiators not to bow to foreign pressure unless they win major concessions for U.S. agriculture.

"We're not going to buy a pig in a poke," he said.

Democrats Seek To Enact Lobby Reforms By Rule (RC)

By Tory Newmyer

Roll Call, July 3, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0038398

In a bid to salvage some progress from the fizzling drive to overhaul lobbying and ethics laws, Democratic Sens. Russ Feingold (Wis.) and Barack Obama (Ill.) are pushing their colleagues to adopt as a rules change a slate of reforms from a package the Senate passed months ago.

A resolution the pair introduced late last week would immediately ban gifts, meals and tickets from lobbyists, require pre-approval for privately funded trips and expand revolving-door prohibitions, among other items.

While the Senate approved the changes, 90-8, as part of a broader reform package in March, that bill has stalled awaiting House action. The House approved its version of the measure in May but has yet to name conferees, and negotiations over the bills have run aground on disagreements about campaign finance and earmark provisions.

"The Senate congratulated itself for passing new travel and gift rules back in March, but those rules aren't yet in effect because the lobbying reform bill has stalled," Feingold said in a statement. "Lobbyists can still buy meals for Members, despite what the public has been led to believe. It is time for the Senate to start living by the rule changes it adopted with such fanfare three months ago."

Senate rules changes require a simple majority to pass, but two-thirds of those voting to invoke cloture, setting the bar for the resolution as high as 67 votes. Obama and Feingold wrote to Senate leaders last week, asking their resolution be adopted as soon as Senators return from the July Fourth recess.

Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist's (R-Tenn.) office did not respond to a request for comment.

Senate Minority Leader Harry Reid (D-Nev.), who has sought to portray a GOP "culture of corruption" as a central theme in his party's midterm messaging, stopped short of a full-throated endorsement of the approach. "Our first priority is to get a bill out of conference," Reid spokesman Jon Steinberg said. "There shouldn't be an either-or choice here. It's time for the Republicans to step up. They had a lot of rhetoric in January and February about changing the way things are done in Washington, but they don't seem to be following it up with action."

Sen. Chris Dodd (D-Conn.), a conferee on the lobbying bill, called the plan by Obama and Feingold "an interesting proposal that should be given consideration." Other conferees were unavailable for comment Friday.

In addition to the gift, travel and revolving-door provisions, the new resolution would end floor privileges for former staffers and lawmakers-turned lobbyists. It would force Senators to quickly disclose any outside job negotiations; ban close relatives from lobbying that Senator or the lawmaker's staff; and prohibit Senators from trying to influence hiring decisions by outside groups on the basis of partisan affiliation.

The resolution leaves unaddressed several key changes the broader bill would accomplish. That package requires more frequent and fuller disclosures by lobbyists, including new requirements for grass-roots lobbying campaigns. It also adds transparency to the earmarking process.

Nevertheless, Congressional watchdogs praised the effort as one that could inch a mired reform process forward.

"This is a great move because half of these reforms could be implemented by each body on its own as a rules change," said Craig Holman, ethics lobbyist for Public Citizen.

Fred Wertheimer, president of Democracy 21, said while the broader package is inadequate, "this is just laying down a marker that says, 'We can adopt our rules changes immediately, and we ought to do it.'"

"This is a statement to the Senate, and the Senate leadership," Wertheimer said.

Feingold and Obama were at the forefront of their party's drive to strengthen ethics rules in the wake of high-profile corruption cases early this year, but both ended up dissatisfied with the package that emerged months later. They joined a slim minority of Senators opposing the reform bill on final passage, calling it too weak. Obama last week reiterated his criticism of the bill but added that enacting some of its measures would be "better than no reform at all."

"Even if this bill doesn't become law, the Senate should adopt these modest rules to put an end to lobbyist-paid lunches and gifts and start to change the culture in Washington that led to the rise of Jack Abramoff and Duke Cunningham," he said in a statement.

Several Senate Democratic offices have been voluntarily complying with their own versions of new ethics rules. Reid's staff, for example, is abiding by the terms of the Democratic-sponsored package, the Honest Leadership and Open Government Act, which goes further than the Senate-passed measure on several fronts. Both Feingold and Obama have both imposed strict ethics guidelines on their own staffs.

DOJ_NMG_0038399

Meanwhile, on the other side of the Capitol, Rep. Jeff Flake (R-Ariz.) is attempting to enforce the provisions of the House-passed measure requiring new disclosures on earmarks. Last week, Flake pledged to challenge any special project that does not identify its sponsor.

"The House passed a lobbying reform bill in May that required that the sponsors of earmarks be identified," he said in a statement. "There's no good reason why that policy hasn't been implemented."

President Wanted, MBA Not Required (LAT)

By Charles R. Kesler

The Los Angeles Times, July 3, 2006

GEORGE W. BUSH is the first president with an MBA (from Harvard Business School, no less), but it's not clear that being a master of business administration has made him a better chief executive. The disarray in Iraq, the debacle after Hurricane Katrina — these aren't exactly the kinds of triumphs that the alumni office likes to boast about.

Business schools are a relatively new institution. The MBA was invented in the Progressive era as a way to abort future generations of robber barons. The idea was to train a class of business administrators (the ethos was anti-entrepreneurial) who would expiate capitalism's sins by managing their corporations in keeping with higher morality. The higher morality was whatever the spirit of the age revealed to professors and high-toned Protestant ministers. Over decades, the pursuit of ethical uplift waned, and the pursuit of efficiency and new methods of reading a balance sheet waxed, paving the way for the increasingly empty trendiness of modern management books.

It's hard to say what President Bush absorbed from his management studies. We can only draw inferences, though eventually historians may know more. Defending Donald H. Rumsfeld a few weeks ago, Bush said: "I hear the voices, and I read the front page, and I know the speculation. But I'm the decider, and I decide what is best. And what's best is for Don Rumsfeld to remain as the secretary of Defense."

Being the decider-in-chief suggests one paradigm of modern management: the executive who makes the final decisions, the tough calls. He "hears" and even listens to others before deciding, but the point of a decision (from decidere, "to cut off") is to be decisive, not to reason your way to a judgment that can be explained to others.

Bush's management style is long on decisions and short on explanations. He's apparently better at listening to others than questioning their views. He prefers to have around him people whose judgment he trusts implicitly, even as he insists that they trust and abide by his decisions implicitly.

This isn't simple cronyism or "hackocracy," as the left charges. But neither is it a model of political wisdom. It leads to a disinclination to deliberate, a reliance on peremptory assertions of subordinates' good character to quiet doubt about their judgments, and a certain habitual speechlessness. On ordinary rhetorical occasions, Bush and his text seem hardly acquainted. On great occasions, he tends to overshoot the mark, calling for impossibilities such as an "end to evil." He lacks a rhetorical mean, much less the rhetorical mien that served Ronald Reagan so well.

Democrats usually turn for inspiration to universities and law schools (not exactly fonts of conservatism or even of moderation), Republicans to business and business schools. The GOP loves to call for applying the businessman's common sense to government problems. Rumsfeld, a former Fortune 500 executive, is applying business methods (just-in-time inventories, information networks, strict control of labor costs) to try and transform the Pentagon and, while he's at it, win the war in Iraq.

The precedents aren't entirely encouraging. In the 1960s, Secretary of Defense Robert McNamara tried to revolutionize the Pentagon using the systems analysis techniques he'd championed in his former job as president of Ford Motor Co. He succeeded in discrediting himself, the techniques and the war he was trying to win.

Pray things work out better this time. In general, however, the analogy between business and politics so beloved by Republicans is a flawed one. At the simplest level, politicians report to a large electorate and have fixed terms of office; businessmen do not. And although the latter can hire and fire at will, the former cannot, and thus face vast, recalcitrant bureaucracies.

DOJ_NMG_0038400

Second, government deals not merely with property, vital as that is, but also with life and liberty. Government thus involves issues of national defense, criminal justice and other "involuntary transactions" backed by a monopoly on the legitimate use of force.

Third, though both pursuits involve self-interest, economic self-interest is less complicated. By contrast, there are many forms of political self-interest, frequently in conflict: Should you desire security or glory? Low taxes or a balanced budget? Much political skill must be devoted to persuading people where, exactly, their interest lies. (This is the rhetorical part, at which Bush doesn't excel.)

Finally, and most significantly, politics has to reconcile multiple goals — consent, security, liberty, prosperity, justice, virtue — in the presence of continuing disagreements about both means and ends. These inherent differences frustrate, eventually, all businesslike schemes of government. Too bad they don't teach that in business school.

Charles R. Kesler is a professor of government at Claremont McKenna College and editor of the Claremont Review of Books. A version of this article will appear in the summer 2006 issue.

A New Partnership Binds Old Republican Rivals (NYT)

By Jim Rutenberg And Adam Nagourney

The New York Times, July 3, 2006

After years of competitive and often contentious dealings, President Bush and Senator John McCain of Arizona are building a deepening if impersonal relationship that is serving the political needs of both men.

Given their history of intense rivalry and sometimes personally bitter combat, their newfound partnership is seen by some Republicans as born more of political calculation than personal evolution. Either way, it could prove valuable to Mr. McCain in his efforts to win the Republican presidential nomination in 2008 by sending a signal to Mr. Bush's conservative base and fund-raising network that, at a minimum, the White House will not stand in the Arizonan's way.

The president had Mr. McCain to the White House three times in one week recently to talk about how Mr. Bush should make the case for the war in Iraq and how to break the wall of conservative opposition to the immigration measures proposed by both men. Mr. McCain was back in the Oval Office again on Tuesday to talk about ways to win approval of the line-item veto.

Behind the scenes, during a month in which he repeatedly came to Mr. Bush's public defense, Mr. McCain called the president to offer words of support, he recounted in an interview.

"I said, 'Look, hang on, things are bad,' " Mr. McCain said. "I said, 'I'm proud of the job you are doing, and I wanted you to know that I will continue to do what I can to help.'

"I've tried, when his numbers went down, to be more supportive and outspoken, because I'd love to pick him up," Mr. McCain said.

The senator showed that again on Sunday in an interview on the ABC program "This Week," saying he was "proud" of the president's leadership on immigration and emphasizing cooperation with the administration on a former issue of serious contention, the treatment of American-held prisoners of war.

Aides said a thaw that began when Mr. McCain campaigned alongside Mr. Bush in the 2004 election has continued through the tougher days of Mr. Bush's second term. The appearances began after top aides for the two men met to hash out some of their differences. During private moments in joint appearances — at the White House, at campaignlike events pressing for immigration reform and on Air Force One — the two even chat about baseball and golf.

"He calls me Johnny Mac," Mr. McCain said.

Still, for all the talk of reconciliation, both sides describe the relationship between arguably the two highest-profile leaders of the Republican Party as almost entirely professional, a little stiff and the product of the pragmatic calculation by two politicians who see potential gain in striking a peace with a powerful rival.

DOJ_NMG_0038401

"This is a very odd partnership that is almost founded at the moment on mutual need," said Tom Rath, a Republican leader in New Hampshire and a longtime ally of the Bush family, who hastened to add that Mr. Bush and Mr. McCain share more convictions than people realize and would not be working so closely if that were not the case.

But Mr. Bush has not had Mr. McCain to Camp David or the White House for dinner or a movie, and Mr. Bush has not visited Mr. McCain's cabin in Sedona, Ariz., since 2001. Mr. McCain, who served 22 years in the Navy, rises to his feet whenever he takes a call from Mr. Bush, even in the privacy of his office. But Mr. McCain's friends say he is fonder of Mr. Bush's father.

Even as he called Mr. Bush a friend, Mr. McCain described their relationship as a function of their positions and their shared views on such big issues as Iraq and immigration. "I believe if I were not in the Senate and not working on these issues, we might communicate once in a while, but not the way we do," he said. "We have a very good personal relationship, but it's primarily based on the agenda."

Mr. Bush is in need of a loyal Republican at a time when there is so much wariness within the party of a president whose popularity has declined. Mr. McCain would like the support of Mr. Bush's supporters and contributors in 2008 and could not afford to have a hostile White House that could trip up his own presidential bid.

Whatever the motivation, the relationship has potentially big political implications for the 2008 race, although Mr. Bush's aides have said that he would almost certainly stay out of the Republican primary contest. And some aides declined to comment publicly for this article out of concern, they said, that they would appear to be giving the White House stamp of approval for a McCain campaign. But the president appears to have stronger ties to Mr. McCain than to the other likely presidential candidates.

There has been a steady stream of Bush advisers who have ended up in Mr. McCain's orbit. Most recently, Republicans close to both candidates said that Nicolle Wallace — who just stepped down as Mr. Bush's communications director and has long been close to the president — was likely to serve in some formal or informal role in a McCain campaign. Her husband, Mark D. Wallace, Mr. Bush's deputy campaign manager in 2004 and now an ambassador-level representative to the United Nations, is already lending advice. In another high-profile move, Wayne L. Berman, a longtime supporter and fund-raiser for Mr. Bush, has signed on to help Mr. McCain.

On the other side of the divide, some of Mr. McCain's supporters made it clear in interviews that the McCain camp viewed Mr. Bush's brother Jeb, the governor of Florida, as an ideal running mate for Mr. McCain. This news would presumably be pleasing to President Bush, who has made it clear in recent weeks that he would like his brother to move onto the national stage; Governor Bush has made it just as clear that he has no interest in running for national office in 2008.

And Mr. Bush's senior political adviser, Karl Rove, was said by associates to have put aside his suspicion and dislike of Mr. McCain. The two spent time together during the 2004 campaign when, Mr. Rove told associates, they drew close. Mr. Rove gave Mr. McCain a pair of antique Theodore Roosevelt presidential cufflinks at the end of that race.

John Weaver, a senior adviser to Mr. McCain, said that accounts of animosity between Mr. McCain and Mr. Bush had been at least slightly exaggerated.

"There's heat in a campaign, and it can get pretty raw," said Mr. Weaver, who had a particularly famous feud with Mr. Rove. "I can speak for ourselves: after we lost the nominating process in 2000, it was time to move on. It took longer for some of us on the staff level to get to that point, but we did."

Still, it was just last year when Mr. McCain, a prisoner of war during the Vietnam War, led something of a revolt in the Senate to push a ban on cruel or inhumane treatment of prisoners in American custody, over Mr. Bush's threat of a veto. And for much of Mr. Bush's first term, the senator had a reputation as one of the few Republicans who would publicly criticize the administration, on issues like Mr. Bush's tax cut proposals, the Abu Ghraib prison torture scandal and the administration's postwar planning in Iraq.

But Mr. McCain has become one of the biggest defenders of Mr. Bush, even on some of the president's most unpopular moves, including the administration's decision this year to approve a deal giving control of several American ports to a company owned by the Dubai government.

"On a series of very tough issues, McCain's been there," said Tony Snow, the White House press secretary.

The jelling of the McCain-Bush relationship has included a series of gestures, some odd, on both sides. When Mr. McCain visited Mr. Bush at his ranch in Texas during the 2004 presidential campaign, he suggested to the president that he try cooking turkey with a turkey fryer, promising to rustle one up for him. Mr. McCain apparently forgot the promise until White House aides started calling Mr. McCain's office, saying the president was still waiting for his turkey fryer.

DOJ_NMG_0038402

And aides said there were long memories in both camps stemming from the bitterly fought presidential primary season of 2000, in which Mr. McCain embarrassed Mr. Bush with a defeat in New Hampshire, and Mr. Bush responded with a searing campaign — which provoked charges of dirty tricks — that knocked Mr. McCain out in South Carolina.

A Republican with ties to the administration said there was lingering resentment among some Bush aides at Mr. McCain for so regularly going on television, especially during Mr. Bush's first term, to criticize the president. And Mr. McCain, a politician who is given to speaking his mind, could certainly still say something critical of the White House that would set back this rapprochement, his aides said.

But Mr. Bush and Mr. McCain have both instructed their aides to cease their hostilities. "We both made it very clear to all of our supporters that that's over," Mr. McCain said. "What people find difficulty understanding," he said, "is that we're capable of putting that behind us."

OTHER NEWS:

Emanuel, Dean Still Sparring (RC)

By Steve Kornacki

Roll Call, July 3, 2006

A letter to Democratic National Committee Chairman Howard Dean from Rep. Rahm Emanuel (Ill.), the head of the Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee, has set off a new round of sniping over party strategy and resources between allies of the two party leaders.

Emanuel, who reportedly stormed out of a May meeting with Dean, penned a letter, dated June 22, to the party chairman demanding $100,000 per targeted district from the DNC to defray the cost of the DCCC's proposed field operation, several individuals who have read the letter said.

Attached to the letter was a sample field plan for a district, itemizing various projected expenses, down to details such as $1,500 for T-shirts. The expense plan was dated June 26, although it was unclear when Dean actually received the missive.

In making his monetary request, Emanuel cited the example of 1994, when, he said, the Republican National Committee earmarked $20 million for then-Speaker Newt Gingrich's successful drive for a House takeover. By contrast, Emanuel suggested that Dean had offered a woefully inadequate $20,000 per district.

But while his allies argue that Emanuel, through his record-setting fundraising for the DCCC, deserves wide latitude in shaping '06 strategy, Dean loyalists took the letter as hostile in nature, coming as it did after months of coy suggestions by Emanuel that Dean and the DNC were shirking their financial obligations to the DCCC's election year effort.

"This is all about C.Y.A," a Democrat familiar with DCCC operations, and sympathetic to the DNC, said. "He's trying to lay the groundwork to blame someone else in case things go bad in November."

On top of that, Dean's backers contend he is not low-balling the DCCC on field operations as Emanuel suggests, and that the $20,000-per-district figure was simply a number being bandied about during negotiations, which were still proceeding when Emanuel wrote the letter.

More to the point, Dean's allies contend, Emanuel is not taking into account what they call the unprecedented support the DNC is providing this year at the state level.

For instance, in Ohio — a quintessential battleground state where Democrats are locked in competitive contests for the governorship, a Senate seat and several House seats, a slew of statewide offices, and control of the state Legislature — the DNC has earmarked significant resources for coordinated statewide campaign efforts and has also implemented early voting and voter outreach programs designed to drive up turnout among the party's core supporters.

"Anybody's who's an operative and who has been around can tell you that the DNC has never stepped up like this before," the same Democrat said.

DOJ_NMG_0038403

Emanuel refused to comment on the letter. His press secretary said, "The DCCC does not confirm or comment on the private correspondence that takes place between the chairman of the committee and anyone else."

Stacie Paxton, press secretary for the DNC, said, "The DNC will continue to focus on working with the other Democratic committees and state parties, helping to unify the party, activate and engage voters, and ensure Democrats are successful up and down the ballot this November."

Dean and Emanuel have been squabbling over campaign strategy for months, with Emanuel pushing Dean to fork over large sums directly to the DCCC for this year's efforts. Dean has been reticent, and Emanuel's frustrations have often spilled into the press. Despite strong suspicions that Emanuel was the source of many of those stories, Dean and the DNC have largely held their fire for the sake of party unity.

Since taking over the DNC, Dean's relations with other Democratic leaders on Capitol Hill have been similarly strained, a result of his unapologetic investing of DNC money in all 50 state party organizations — at a time when a handful of states and districts could give the party control of Congress.

Emanuel's backers point out that the RNC is poised to spend heavily down the stretch in key House and Senate races and argue that a lack of similar support from the DNC could cost the party winnable seats. As of the end of May, the RNC had $43.1 million on hand compared to the DNC's $10.3 million.

Emanuel himself suggested as much in May, when he told Roll Call, "There is no cavalry financially for us."

Originally, Emanuel asked Dean to help bankroll a fall strategy that relied heavily on television ads, but Dean balked, arguing that such a plan had failed in the past and that beefing up field operations would be a shrewder course.

One Democrat sympathetic to Emanuel argued that the DNC's efforts in statewide campaigns shouldn't preclude a significant investment in the DCCC's own plan.

"If you were to look at each state, you'd see that they're a minor player," this Democrat said of the DNC. "If they covered half the costs in some of those states, that would be one thing. But they don't."

As DCCC chairman, Emanuel, who amassed a small fortune as an investment banker after serving as a top aide to then-President Bill Clinton, has won rave reviews for his fundraising prowess, although his aggressive and impatient manner has rubbed some the wrong way. If his party were to reclaim the House this fall, Emanuel would be hailed by his fellow Democrats as a hero — and the guessing game is already under way about how he might seek to capitalize on that status.

GOP Claims Edge In House Races (WT)

By Eric Pfeiffer

The Washington Times, July 3, 2006

Congressional Republicans say they have a strategic advantage in their effort to increase their House majority, even as national polls show Democrats with a significant lead heading into this year's elections.

The National Republican Congressional Committee says that despite the polling edge for the Democrats, Republicans are targeting conservative districts that went for President Bush in 2004. "We're competing for red turf held by Democrats," NRCC spokesman Jonathan Collegio said.

Four districts stand out as leading prospects for Republican gains, but none is considered a guaranteed win.

The House Race Hotline, a nonpartisan publication, lists Iowa's 3rd District as the top contender for a Republican pickup. Rep. Leonard L. "Boswell's facing a well-funded, politically experienced opponent this cycle in state Senate President Jeff Lamberti," House Race Hotline Editor Josh Kraushaar said.

"And the district narrowly voted for Bush in the last presidential election. If there's one incumbent that Democrats are worried about, it's probably Leonard Boswell, especially given recent concerns about his health."

Mr. Boswell, 72, recently had a noncancerous tumor removed from his abdomen and has been restricted in his ability to make campaign appearances.

The top three other prospects for Republicans are two seats in conservative Georgia districts and the home of embattled West Virginia Democrat Alan B. Mollohan, who faces accusations of corruption from critics who say he delivered lucrative private contracts to his campaign's financial supporters. Mr. Bush carried the district by 15 percentage points in 2004.

DOJ_NMG_0038404

Republicans say they are also targeting Reps. John M. Spratt Jr. of South Carolina and Melissa Bean of Illinois. Both districts voted for Mr. Bush by more than 10 points in 2004, but both incumbent Democrats are considered likely winners.

The Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee (DCCC) described the Republican strategy as "desperate," and one not likely to yield results.

"Republicans are behind on money, recruiting and support from the American people," said DCCC spokesman Bill Burton. "Not one of those things can be made up for with spin."

Mr. Burton said that even if the districts targeted by Republicans are competitive, Democrats are targeting more than 40 Republican districts they consider up for grabs. Democrats need to win 15 Republican seats to gain control of the House.

After relying heavily on Mr. Bush in 2002 and 2004, some Republicans are keeping their distance from the president as he battles the lowest approval ratings of his presidency. Yet even with Mr. Bush's poll numbers showing a small upward trajectory in recent weeks, House Republicans remain far behind in all generic national polls.

Even if Republicans are unable to win those competitive Democratic seats, there is evidence some of their own districts may be less vulnerable than national polls indicate.

Earlier this month, many observers considered the special election in California's 50th District a bellwether for Democrats' hopes of winning control of Congress. However, the race's Republican candidate, Brian P. Bilbray, defeated his Democrat opponent, Francine Busby, by four points, despite two right-of-center minor candidates drawing away 5 percent of the vote. What's more, Mr. Kraushaar said that nearly half of the Democrats' top prospects in 2006 are in districts that supported Mr. Bush in 2004 by a higher margin than in Mr. Bilbray's district.

In Political Waves, Tide Doesn't Rise To Same Level In Every State (RC)

By Stuart Rothenberg

Roll Call, July 3, 2006

The last major national political wave, in 1994, didn't sweep over all areas of the country with equal force. In some states, Congressional Democrats suffered minimal losses, while in others Democratic House seats fell in bunches.

For Democrats to take the House this year, they may need one or two states to deliver a significant number of wins, not just an isolated victory. Which states give Democrats the best chance to score victories in bunches?

The best examples of how the impact of the '94 Republican wave differed from state to state are four states on three coasts: Washington, Virginia, North Carolina and Alabama.

In Washington, Democrats went into Election Day holding eight of the state's nine House seats. Jennifer Dunn was the only Republican member of the House delegation (though Republican Slade Gorton held one of the state's Senate seats).

On Nov. 9, Republican candidates emerged with seven of the nine districts, leaving only Democrats Norm Dicks and Jim McDermott standing. Five incumbent Democrats were defeated, and one open Democratic seat went to the GOP, a net gain of six seats.

In North Carolina, Republicans also made major gains, turning an 8-4 Democratic-majority delegation before the election into an 8-4 Republican majority after the votes were counted, for a net GOP gain of four seats.

Together, Washington and North Carolina combined to produce a 10-seat gain for the Republicans, almost one-fifth of the party's 52-seat gain nationwide.

But just to the Tar Heel State's north, in Virginia, the wave was little more than a ripple.

In the Old Dominion, Democrats headed into Election Day with a 7-4 majority in the commonwealth's delegation. But unlike their neighbors in North Carolina, Virginia Republicans picked up only a single additional district. Democrats came out of the election still holding six of 11 Congressional districts.

And further into the Deep South, in conservative (and increasingly Republican) Alabama, Republicans failed to pick up even a single new House seat. Democrats went into the election holding four of the state's seven districts, and they retained that margin and all of their seats after the election. Three white and one African-American Democrats were re-elected.

What states deserve special attention as possible candidates for a wave within a wave?

DOJ_NMG_0038405

Democratic operatives have been suggesting that at least a handful of states are ripe for a Democratic wave: New York, Ohio, Pennsylvania, Connecticut and Indiana.

In Connecticut, where Republicans represent three of the state's five Congressional districts, a wave conceivably could sweep Reps. Rob Simmons, Christopher Shays and Nancy Johnson out. But a true partisan wave would inundate Republican lawmakers at all levels, and Republican Gov. Jodi Rell appears headed for a thundering victory.

In New York, Democrats are aggressively competing in at least four Upstate districts (against incumbent Reps. John Sweeney, Randy Kuhl and Jim Walsh, and in retiring Rep. Sherwood Boehlert's open seat) and, possibly, in Rep. Sue Kelly's Westchester to Poughkeepsie district just north of New York City.

Democratic strategists reason that party strength in the gubernatorial and U.S. Senate races should produce a big Democratic turnout that could also deliver a number of Congressional seats. That's possible, but all of the districts being targeted by Democrats have a Republican bent, and easy victories by Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton and all-but-certain gubernatorial nominee Eliot Spitzer could easily make voters bored rather than energized. The Democrats, in other words, are more likely to get shut out than sweep the seats.

Ohio, Pennsylvania and, to a lesser extent, Indiana appear to be better candidates for state-specific waves.

Republicans hold seven of Indiana's nine Congressional districts, and Democrats have an excellent chance of seizing districts, specifically Rep. John Hostettler's 8th district and Rep. Mike Sodrel's 9th district. But they also have a longer-shot opportunity against Rep. Chris Chocola in the 2nd district, and a sweep of all three would give Democrats a majority of the House delegation.

Indiana holds some promise for Democrats because Gov. Mitch Daniels (R) is having a tough time, and that increases the possibility that voters will send a collective message to the GOP.

Pennsylvania and Ohio seem to have the requisite voter anger and slate of competitive races that provide the ingredients for a wave election that could deliver a considerable number of seats to Democrats.

Incumbents struggled during Pennsylvania's April primary, confirming voter dissatisfaction with a legislative pay raise, something that at the very least ought to raise Republican concerns. GOP House incumbents in the eastern third of the state, including Reps. Don Sherwood, Curt Weldon, Jim Gerlach and Michael Fitzpatrick, are all at some risk, and Republican nominees for the Senate (incumbent Rick Santorum) and governor (neophyte Lynn Swann) are not currently doing well enough to help downballot Republican nominees.

Ohio, of course, is made-to-order for a local wave, given Republican Gov. Bob Taft's horrendous poll numbers, state government scandals and credible Democratic challengers to Reps. Deborah Pryce, Bob Ney and Steve Chabot.

The point is that even national waves can be fickle. Not all states have a tsunami even if one appears nationally. Of course, Democrats don't really care where they get their 15-seat gain as long as they get it. But it certainly would be easier for them to get to 218 seats with big gains in at least a couple of states.

Stuart Rothenberg is editor of the Rothenberg Political Report.

On July 4, Where's The Voter Outrage? (RC)

By Nicole Duran

Roll Call, July 3, 2006

The surprisingly easy victory that Rep. Chris Cannon (R-Utah) scored over his primary opponent last week has been heralded as a win for President Bush's immigration policy.

But wealthy developer John Jacob's defeat in the Beehive State's 3rd district holds other lessons for both Republicans trying to dislodge incumbents in primaries and Democrats hoping to flip Republican-held seats in November.

Just as the victories of newly elected Rep. Brian Bilbray (R-Calif.) and Reps. Bob Ney (R-Ohio), Bennie Thompson (D-Miss.) and now-ex Rep. Tom DeLay (R-Texas) demonstrated in recent primaries, voters still need a reason to dump incumbents or switch party control of a House seat.

DOJ_NMG_0038406

"I think the lesson is if you are going to beat an incumbent, you have to have a strong candidate," said Brad Coker of Mason-Dixon Polling & Research Inc., an independent firm. "The opportunity was there for Jacob, and he kind of came unglued the last weekend."

Coker was referring to statements Jacob made to the Salt Lake Tribune in the campaign's waning days about how the devil was sabotaging his business dealings, thereby preventing him from pumping more personal money into his race with Cannon.

"That was bizarre," Coker said. "If you're going to replace an incumbent, voters are looking to make sure that the person they are replacing the incumbent with is competent."

Jacob also faltered because he ran his entire campaign on just one issue — immigration — observers and party insiders agreed. Cannon sides with Bush's overhaul proposal, while Jacob tried to tap into anger over the current situation that has allowed some 12 million illegal immigrants into the country by saying Cannon is for "amnesty."

"You need more than one issue, but you also need to be a competent alternative," Coker said. "You just can't put up any angry person with a name to take out an incumbent."

Republicans, and some independent observers, have argued that Democrats were unable to capitalize on the scandal that sent Rep. Duke Cunningham (R-Calif.) to jail, thereby necessitating a special election for his 50th district seat, because their candidate, Francine Busby (D), was not up to snuff.

Democrats were hoping that a surge in turnout, fueled by voter anger over the ethics issue, would propel Busby to victory. But it never materialized, and voter turnout has not notably increased in any primary to date, even in races where an incumbent was considered vulnerable.

"Democrats lost California 50 because they ran with a second-tier, flawed candidate, and we expect what happened in California to be duplicated across the country this cycle," said Ed Patru, a National Republican Congressional Committee spokesman.

Busby faltered late in the campaign when she told Hispanic voters that they didn't need "papers" to vote.

She was trying to explain that voters are not required to show identification, but Bilbray's campaign claimed she was prodding illegal immigrants to vote.

Democratic leaders warned Republicans last week that they would not allow the GOP to use immigration as a wedge issue.

"They thought this almost jingoistic approach would work," Democratic Senatorial Campaign Committee Chairman Charles Schumer (D-N.Y.) said at a news conference unveiling a poll commissioned by Third Way, a Democratic think tank. "They thought it would be the gay marriage or Willie Horton of 2006."

Horton was the convicted murderer whose violent crime committed while on furlough from prison severely damaged the presidential hopes of then-Massachusetts Gov. Michael Dukakis (D).

The poll, conducted by the Benenson Strategy Group, found that 68 percent of voters in 19 battleground states believe Bush is doing a poor job of enforcing immigration laws.

"If Congressional Republicans want to make immigration the centerpiece of their 2006 campaign, I've got three words for them: Make our day," Schumer continued. "The GOP Congress has had 12 years to tackle this problem but has instead taken a 'see no evil, hear no evil' approach to the Bush White House's failure to enforce immigration law."

Patru said the wins by Cannon and Bilbray underscore that Democrats still face an uphill battle in trying to take back the House.

"The polls are right," Patru said. "Most voters approve of their own Member's job performance; it's very difficult to beat an incumbent; and quality of candidates makes all the difference in the world, which is a problem the Democrats will have to contend with this cycle."

Though not technically an incumbent, Bilbray previously served in Congress and was working as a lobbyist at the time of his June 6 win. He bested an "outsider" in a crowded open primary to secure the Republican nomination before defeating Busby.

Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee Chairman Rahm Emanuel (Ill.) said Republicans are reading too much into those victories.

DOJ_NMG_0038407

All Cannon's win proved was that he could survive a Republican primary, Emanuel said at the Thursday news conference. It also revealed the divisions within the GOP on a number of issues, including immigration, he said.

Bilbray took a hard line on immigration, similar to the position of House Republicans — and a sharp contrast to the position of Cannon and Bush.

"Why are they holding field hearings when they should be in a conference room getting things done?" Emanuel asked about the announcement that Republicans will hold hearings across the country on the immigration issue despite both chambers having passed two radically different bills.

"They want to run a single-issue campaign" but lack a unified immigration plan, he said.

GOP 'Suburban Agenda' Gains Traction On Hill (RC)

By Morton M. Kondracke

Roll Call, July 3, 2006

In the 1970s, as a young deputy sheriff in King County, Wash., Rep. Dave Reichert (R) had his throat slashed while trying to break up a domestic dispute.

Reichert's attacker spent time in a mental institution, then was released. Later, Sheriff Reichert made an effort to find out what happened to the man. He found he was teaching school in Colorado.

Reichert recounted the tale to fellow Republicans last month as part of an effort to get them to back a bill enabling school districts to tap into national criminal databases before they hire employees.

It turned out that the school district that hired Reichert's attacker had checked Colorado databases but had no idea about his criminal record in the Evergreen State.

The bill Reichert was boosting, the School Safely Acquiring Faculty Excellence Act, passed the House almost unanimously in June — the first legislative success for the GOP's "Suburban Agenda," a set of bills designed to appeal to the majority of American voters who live in the suburbs.

The agenda is the brainchild of Rep. Mark Kirk (R-Ill.), one of Congress' most effective moderates, who has sold it to a growing group of conservatives and the House GOP leadership.

Kirk, who represents North-suburban Chicago, told me, "I noticed that the Republican Party was led by mostly Southern and rural Members, starting with [Speaker] Denny Hastert (R-Ill.) from the cornfields of Illinois. And the Democratic Party is led by Members representing the central urban cores. [House Minority Leader] Nancy Pelosi (D-Calif.) is from central San Francisco. The American people live in between.

"Washington may think this is small-bore. It's not the war on terror. But this is an agenda that people care about in their everyday lives — their kids' safety, health care, their ability to send their kids to college."

Besides the school safety measure, the agenda includes a national "401Kids" savings account for college, a screen to block predators from contacting children at online chat rooms and a bill setting standards for computerizing health records.

Kirk got the idea for a suburban agenda in early 2004, made a presentation on it at the party's national convention in New York, formed a House GOP caucus around it and commissioned pollster John McLaughlin to test potential policy items.

From an original core of 22 Members, the suburban caucus has grown to 67. McLaughlin's polling indicates that 70 percent to 80 percent of voters say they'd be more likely to support a Republican candidate knowing that he or she favors items in the agenda.

"I suspect that in the 36 districts where this election will be decided, the suburban agenda is going to be talked about a lot," House Majority Whip Roy Blunt (R-Mo.) told me.

Even some Democrats have signed on to specific bills, not entirely to their leadership's liking. All the bills are lead-sponsored by Republicans on the Democrats' 2006 target list, and top Democrats have tried to get their Members to avoid co-sponsoring them.

The school safety bill, for example, was lead-sponsored by Rep. Jon Porter (R-Nev.), who represents suburban Las Vegas. In the Senate, Kirk told me, the bill is being bottled up by Minority Leader Harry Reid (D-Nev.), who's hoping to see Porter defeated.

DOJ_NMG_0038408

Another measure that originally attracted bipartisan support is the Health IT Promotion Act, sponsored by Rep. Nancy Johnson (R-Conn.), which would set standards for computerizing health records, widely deemed necessary for improving health quality and cost-saving.

However, the two Democrats on the bill, Reps. Sheila Jackson Lee (Texas) and Anna Eshoo (Calif.), abruptly dropped off last week as Johnson's bill was slated for House floor action later this month.

Porter's bill retains the support of Rep. Mark Udall (D-Colo.). And Rep. Melissa Bean (D-Ill.) is co-sponsoring the Deleting Online Predators Act sponsored by Rep. Michael Fitzpatrick (R-Pa.). He also is co-sponsoring her online predator bill.

Reichert, who gained fame for capturing Washington's "Green River killer," is sponsor of the anti-gang bill. Targeted Rep. Clay Shaw (R-Fla.) is sponsoring the "401Kids" bill, and Rep. Jim Gerlach (R-Pa.) is promoting a measure to help farmers preserve open spaces.

Kirk is already working on a "second wave" of suburban bills, including one sponsored by Rep. Deborah Pryce (R-Ohio) that would allow workers who lose their jobs to keep their health insurance for life, not just 18 months, as provided under current COBRA law.

Another bill would give teachers permission to search students for dangerous weapons without fear of litigation.

At one time, I thought that Kirk's suburban agenda was small-bore and symbolic, something like former President Bill Clinton's advocacy of school uniforms. It won't cure global warming or capture Osama bin Laden, but he's convinced me it's bigger than that. And so has Democratic hostility.

An About-Face On '527' Groups (WSJ)

By Jeanne Cummings

The Wall Street Journal, July 3, 2006

WASHINGTON -- Two years ago, Republicans were organizing against new, loosely regulated political groups that were raising money to attack President Bush.

Now, illustrating how roles often reverse in politics, some of the party's conservative activists are trying to stop legislation that would choke off those groups.

The dispute centers on a House bill that would curtail funding for organizations nicknamed 527s, for the section of the tax code that governs them. The groups drew attention during the 2004 presidential campaign, particularly when financier George Soros donated millions of dollars to launch the Media Fund and America Coming Together, or ACT. Those groups ran television commercials against President Bush and registered voters opposed to his re-election.

Republicans want to prevent Mr. Soros and other wealthy Democrats from doing that again. But legislation may not be necessary to achieve their goal: The rich liberals who spent heavily to oust Mr. Bush aren't investing in 527s this election cycle, even though the stakes are high, with control of Congress in play. ACT closed last year and the Media Fund is dormant.

In the 2006 campaign so far, it is right-leaning 527s that are most active. The Club for Growth, a conservative economic-issue group, is leading the charge to kill the Republican bill that would shut down 527s. The Club for Growth received $8 million in donations during the 2004 cycle; for this cycle, its donations as of May tally $5.1 million. "I don't know how they would expect organizations to sit on the sideline and cheer when they are talking about taking a wrecking ball to the First Amendment," says David Keating, the club's executive director.

Mr. Keating's allies include social conservatives, gun-rights groups and college Republicans. Their campaign could stall congressional efforts to enact anticorruption legislation -- a response to a spate of ethics scandals -- because the House attached 527 language to its rewrite of lobbying laws.

The fracas stems from the 2002 McCain-Feingold campaign-finance law, which banned unlimited "soft-money" donations to political parties from companies, labor unions and wealthy individuals. But many of those donors didn't rein in their spending in the campaign cycle that followed. Instead, they found a new outlet in 527 advocacy groups, which could take unlimited funds from donors, though they ostensibly couldn't explicitly say who to vote for and couldn't coordinate their efforts with the parties.

DOJ_NMG_0038409

The House measure would subject 527s to limits like those for political action committees. Individuals could give a maximum of $5,000 per election cycle to groups advocating or opposing federal candidates and $25,000 to groups engaged in partisan voter registration.

The proposal is backed by the Republican National Committee and other party leaders. "There is certainly an opinion in the House that the 527s represent a loophole in campaign-finance laws that they want to see reformed," says New York Republican Rep. Tom Reynolds, who heads the National Republican Congressional Committee.

The House passed the bill in April and attached it to legislation overhauling lobbying rules. The Senate version doesn't have 527 limits. The two chambers are trying to reconcile their bills but failed to do so before Congress's July 4 recess -- in part because of the 527 tussle.

Seven Republican senators have sent a letter to Majority Leader Bill Frist warning they might filibuster the lobbying legislation if it emerges with 527 limits attached to it. "Republicans do not need, and should not attempt, to muzzle their opponents," the letter said. It was signed by Virginia Sen. George Allen and Kansas Sen. Sam Brownback, two potential 2008 presidential candidates who are wooing the Republican's conservative base.

The debate is causing some philosophical gymnastics. Many Republicans opposed the McCain-Feingold law's limits on party donations, saying that the curbs infringed on free speech. Now, some Republicans argue that extending the donation limits to 527 groups aren't a further infringement.

Democrats who supported the 2002 bill as vital to ending the corrosive influence of money on politics now say such limits on independent groups would infringe on the political discussion.

The dispute comes amid scant evidence that 527 groups will figure significantly in November's midterm elections.

Fred Wertheimer, president of Democracy 21, a money-and-politics watchdog, says 527s "are certainly not going to play the kind of role they played in the 2004 election in this election."

But, he adds, "That doesn't mean the problem has gone away or that it won't come back in a very big form in the next presidential election."

A recent Campaign Finance Institute study found that in the 2004 election cycle, 527s raised a total of $426 million. By this point in the cycle, they had collected $109 million. As of March of this year, the 527s registered in the 2006 cycle had raised just $57 million -- and most groups are focused on labor or particular issues that aren't as tethered to wealthy donors as the groups in 2004.

Mr. Soros, for instance, has given about $1 million to one 527 group, America Votes, a voter-turnout operation. Most of his other donations this cycle are to traditional party committees and candidates. "George fundamentally believes the effort to elect Democrats has to be united under the banner of the Democratic Party," said Michael Vachon, Mr. Soros's spokesman. "There wasn't sufficient time in 2004 to do that."

House leaders say they will enter negotiations with the Senate determined to see their 527 language included in a final bill overhauling lobbying rules. But as ethics scandals make headlines, lawmakers are under pressure to back down and clear the way for an anticorruption measure. Most Republicans say passage of such a law is vital to restore voter confidence before November's elections. When asked if the House would stick to that position if it meant blocking passage of an ethics and lobbying-overhaul law, Rep. Reynolds, of New York, said: "I don't think you could necessarily say that."

If the House cedes its position, Federal Election Commission Chairman Michael Toner says the rules governing 527s "will be pretty well settled for the 2006 election and the 2008 elections" under a loose system similar to the one in 2004. "The $64,000 question will be what these outside groups do with that. How active will they be? And will they play as big a role in 2008 as they did in the 2004 election?"

Are Americans Ready For A Mormon President? (LAT)

By Elizabeth Mehren

The Los Angeles Times, July 3, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0038410

BOSTON -- Most traditional barriers to religion in presidential elections have toppled, a new Los Angeles Times/Bloomberg poll has found. In particular, the survey to be released Monday showed that anti-Semitism and anti-Catholicism are fading as voter taboos.

But uneasiness about some religions persists. Thirty-seven percent of those questioned said they would not vote for a Mormon presidential candidate -- and 54 percent said no to the prospect of a Muslim in the White House.

In addition, 21 percent said they could not vote for an evangelical Christian. Only 15 percent replied that they would not vote for a Jewish presidential candidate. Just 10 percent of those polled were unwilling to cast ballots for a Catholic chief executive.

"This clearly shows that the old Protestant/Catholic/Jewish distinction has largely eroded in American politics," said David Campbell, a professor of political science at the University of Notre Dame. "That doesn't mean that candidates from religious groups that might be considered to be exotic, in the way that Catholics once were thought to be exotic, wouldn't necessarily be confronted with challenges."

The nationwide survey of 1,321 adults was conducted June 24-27. The poll has a margin of sampling error of plus or minus 3 percentage points, poll director Susan Pinkus said.

With no likely Muslim candidate on the presidential horizon, the poll numbers present the greatest threat to a potential contender from the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints (as the Mormon Church is formally known). Massachusetts Gov. Mitt Romney is a Mormon who is exploring a run for the 2008 Republican presidential nomination.

"It is something he will have to address," said MerleBlack, a professor of politics at Emory University. "It will be a challenge. It doesn't necessarily kill him as a candidate, but he may have to talk in more detail than he ever has before about his faith."

His religion apparently was no detriment in Massachusetts in 2002, when he easily won election as governor. Massachusetts is one of the most heavily Catholic states in the country, and also one of the most Democratic.

The governor hails from a family that is almost as political as it is Mormon. His late father, George Romney, was a three-term governor of Michigan who also made a brief, unsuccessful run for the Republican presidential nomination. Lenore Romney, the Massachusetts governor's late mother, lost a Republican bid for the U.S. Senate.

Romney, who made a fortune as a venture capitalist, suffered defeat in his maiden political outing in 1994 when he ran against Democrat Edward M. Kennedy for a U.S. Senate seat from Massachusetts.

As a young man, Mitt Romney was a Mormon missionary in France. He graduated from Brigham Young University, an LDS-sponsored institution. Romney has been a Mormon bishop, and was president of the LDS stake -- or congregation -- in Belmont, Mass., where he settled with his family more than 30 years ago.

His great-grandfather had five wives, but Romney has disavowed polygamy -- a practice that no longer is condoned by the LDS hierarchy. The Mormon Church claims about 12.5 million members worldwide, according to the church Web site; almost half are in the United States.

Romney is reluctant to discuss his religion, citing privacy and contending that candidates should not be judged on their "brand of faith." But he regularly describes himself as a Christian who believes that "Jesus Christ is my savior."

But some branches of Christianity are less than eager to embrace the Mormon Church. On its Web site, the Southern Baptist Convention includes Mormonism in a section called "cults, sects and new religious movements." Kenyn Cureton, a vice president of the Baptist convention, said his church does not regard Mormons as Christians.

"They are not orthodox in their beliefs," Cureton said. "They have additional books that they add to the Bible, which evangelical Christians believe is God's word. They believe that there are many, many gods and that you, too, can become a god in your own world. It sounds good, but unfortunately it is not based on sound teaching."

Cureton praised Mormons as "very moral, very family-oriented people." Southern Baptists, he said, "would appreciate that angle. But as far as our beliefs, we would have disagreements."

Republican political consultant Mike Murphy, who advised Romney in his gubernatorial bid, said any discussion about Romney's religion as a potential political obstacle was premature -- and probably misplaced. Murphy also has counseled the Massachusetts governor as he tests the waters for the 2008 presidential race.

"I think the poll is wrong," Murphy said. "I think this is a classic example of how with polling data, you can find something that is not predictive at all."

If his religion was the only thing voters knew about Romney in a "hypothetical candidacy," that could be an impediment, Murphy said.

"If he runs, I think he won't be judged only through that prism," he said. "When you break it down to one aspect for a guy, that is a mistake. Polls, I am sure, said the exact same thing about John F. Kennedy a year before he ran."

In a Roper poll from June 1960, 35 percent of respondents said either that it might be better not to have a Catholic president, or that they would be against it. Then-Sen. John F. Kennedy addressed the Southern Leadership Conference on the subject of his religion that September, and was elected president two months later.

But Emory University political scientist Black rejected the comparison to earlier political biases against Catholic or Jewish candidates.

"I don't think it is of the same status, because Mormonism has never been seen as a mainstream religion," Black said.

According to Campbell, "The question facing Mitt Romney is, will he be the Mormons' Al Smith -- who was the first Catholic ever to run for president in 1928, and went down in flames. Or will he be the Mormons' John F. Kennedy?"

Atlantic City Casinos Ordered To Close (AP-Y2)

By Angela Delli Santi

AP2, July 2, 2006

Atlantic City's casinos were ordered to close Wednesday, the latest casualty of a state government shutdown that entered its second day Sunday after the Legislature failed to adopt a budget by its July 1 deadline.

The head of the Casino Control Commission ordered gaming in Atlantic City to cease at 8 a.m. Wednesday — the day after the July Fourth holiday — if New Jersey fails to enact a budget by then.

Atlantic City's 12 casinos, which require state monitoring, have waged a court battle to remain open, and an appeals court was weighing the matter Sunday. There was no word on when a ruling would be made, courts spokeswoman Winnie Comfort said.

Gov. Jon S. Corzine said Sunday there was "no immediate prospect of a budget." State parks, beaches and historic sites also were expected to shut down Wednesday.

If the casinos shut down, the state would lose an estimated $2 million in tax revenue each day they stayed closed. Republican Assemblyman Francis Blee, whose district includes the casinos, said it was important for them to remain open.

"We will have tens of thousands of individuals, real people, that are going to be hurt by this," he said. "There will be bread-winners who are not bringing home a paycheck."

Corzine shut down nonessential government services Saturday after the Legislature failed to adopt a budget by its July 1 deadline, leaving the state without the means to spend money. Budget talks became heated this year as Corzine, a Democrat, proposed increasing the state sales tax from 6 percent to 7 percent to help overcome a $4.5 billion budget deficit.

Most Democrats in the Assembly and several Senate Democrats oppose the sales tax increase, fearing voter backlash and reserving any tax increase for property tax reform. Assembly Democrats proposed a series of alternatives, some of which Corzine accepted, but both sides remained $1 billion apart as the budget deadline passed.

About 45,000 state employees were furloughed Saturday. Corzine's order allows him to keep 36,000 state employees working without pay. Services such as state police, prisons, mental hospitals and child welfare were to keep operating.

The lottery and road construction projects were among the first to close. A state appellate panel on Sunday ordered horse tracks closed at the end of business Tuesday. It was not immediately known Sunday whether the horse racing industry would file further appeals to keep harness and thoroughbred tracks open past July 4.

Corzine was expected to meet in private Sunday with top Assembly and Senate leaders. Assembly Budget Committee members were called to the Statehouse and were discussing alternatives to a sales tax increase, panel chairman Lou Greenwald said.

The Senate is scheduled to meet on Monday, and Senate President Richard J. Codey has told senators to be ready to stay in session until a budget is adopted.

DOJ_NMG_0038412

"Let's get on with getting this problem solved," Corzine said while touring a state police dispatch center in Hamilton on Sunday, emphasizing he couldn't "sign a bill that doesn't exist."

Republicans, the minority party in both the Assembly and Senate, have expressed frustration.

"I'm appalled that this reached this stage," said Senate Minority Leader Leonard Lance, R-Hunterdon. "It is very unfortunate that the Democratic governor and Democratic majorities in the Legislature could not achieve a budget in place by June 30, and now all the people of New Jersey suffer as a result."

Some lottery sellers — and many customers — were surprised to learn that the games were being put on hold until the budget impasse is resolved.

"People will be angry, but we can't do anything about it," said Umesh Patel, 40, owner of Deli Delight in Ewing. "I don't know how long it's going to be, so let's just see what happens next."

Same-Sex Marriage Debate Drives Intense Fundraising Efforts (WP)

By Chris L. Jenkins

The Washington Post, July 3, 2006

The proposed state constitutional amendment that would ban same-sex marriage in Virginia has sparked an aggressive fundraising effort, with each side of the debate hoping to secure hundreds of thousands of dollars for their cause.

Virginia voters will decide Nov. 7 whether the state constitution should be amended to define marriage solely as a union between a man and a woman. The amendment also would place a ban in the constitution on civil unions, which already are illegal in Virginia.

To help rally amendment opponents, the Commonwealth Coalition, a Richmond-based group, has set an ambitious goal of raising $3 million, organizers said. They want to fund a barrage of radio and television ads in the fall. Meanwhile, the Family Foundation Action, which is organizing amendment supporters, has set a best-case-scenario fundraising goal of $900,000, although activists and volunteers said they expected to raise less than that.

Already, both sides have created Internet fundraising mechanisms and appealed to potential voters through churches and community events across the state. Activists said they plan a direct mailing campaign throughout the summer and fall.

Activists on both sides said money raised for the marriage amendment will go toward outreach, mailers and electronic advertising.

"I don't think there's any question that Virginians are engaged in this fight and that they're stepping up to the plate both as volunteers and contributors," said Claire Guthrie Gastanaga, campaign director for the coalition.

Each organization has to submit its first campaign finance report Sept. 15.

Amendment supporters said they do not feel pressure to raise millions of dollars because they were confident door-to-door activism and church networks would be effective.

"The reality is that we knew from the beginning we might get out-raised and outspent," said Chris Freund, communications director for the Family Foundation. "But an important part about all of this is the grass-roots mechanics. Campaigns tend to get analyzed by their bank account, and sometimes that's not the best reflection of what's really there."

The fundraising drive in Virginia probably will mirror what was seen in other states that have voted on such amendments. In 2004, for instance, supporters and opponents of amendments in 13 states spent more than $13 million, according to the Institute on Money in State Politics. In 2004, supporters of marriage amendments out-raised their opponents. The costliest race was in Oregon, which also was the closest. The two sides spent a total of $5.4 million.

The amendments have passed in each of the 20 states where they have been on the ballot, often by more than 3 to 1.

The struggle over money mirrors the sharp campaigning that has begun. Opponents, who include Gov. Timothy M. Kaine (D), have argued that the language of the amendment -- that the state will "not create or recognize a legal status for relationships of unmarried individuals" -- is so broad that it also would affect contracts between unwed heterosexual couples. Kaine spoke on that point in a radio interview Thursday.

The amendment "in my view disenfranchises . . . unmarried people, both same-sex or heterosexual couples," Kaine said. But he took his criticism one step further, saying that the proposed amendment was discriminatory:

DOJ_NMG_0038413

"There's nothing else in the [Virginia] Bill of Rights that takes away rights of people. We're equal citizens in the state; we ought to be treated equally."

Supporters of the amendment believe that the amendment is necessary to preserve traditional marriage. They also say that current law -- Virginia's Marriage Affirmation Act of 2004 -- mirrors the language in the proposed constitutional amendment and has not invalidated contracts between unwed couples.

"There is a law on the books right now that does the same thing as the amendment and that has never been challenged in court," said Del. Robert G. Marshall (R-Prince William), sponsor of the legislative resolution creating the proposed amendment. "The argument is nothing but a red herring."

Petitions To FDA Sometimes Delay Generic Drugs (WP)

By Marc Kaufman

The Washington Post, July 3, 2006

A procedure designed to alert the Food and Drug Administration to scientific and safety issues is getting a hard look from members of Congress, who say they are concerned that it may be getting subverted by the brand-name drug industry.

Some at the FDA, as well as leaders in the generic drug industry, complain that "citizen petitions" -- requests for agency action that any individual, group or company can file -- are being misused by brand-name drugmakers to stave off generic competition.

The simple act of filing a petition, they say, triggers another round of time-consuming and often redundant reviews of the generics by the FDA, which can take months or years. In the process, consumers continue to pay millions of dollars more for the brand-name drugs.

Statistics collected by the staff of Sen. Debbie Stabenow (D-Mich.), who has introduced legislation with Sen. Trent Lott (R-Miss.) that would rein in industry-filed citizen petitions, show that 20 of the 21 brand-name petitions settled by the FDA since 2003 were ultimately rejected.

"The brand-name drug industry has found a major new loophole," Stabenow said in an interview. "The way things stand now, even if the FDA finds that a petition was frivolous and rejects it, [the drug companies] can get hundreds of millions of dollars of profits from the delay."

She and others point to the example of Wellbutrin XL, a hot-selling antidepressant that was facing the prospect of competition from cheaper generics late last year.

By the time Biovail Corp., the drug's maker, filed a citizen petition with the FDA, raising concerns about the safety of its potential rivals, Impax Laboratories Inc. and several other companies had already gone through much of the FDA application and review process for their generic versions of the drug. Impax was looking forward to getting a tentative approval that would bring it considerably closer to making and selling its competing drug.

But because of the citizen petition, the FDA has yet to act, and Biovail still has the market for Wellbutrin XL to itself. Impax is fuming, as are many others in the generic drug industry.

In a letter sent last week to FDA Acting Commissioner Andrew von Eschenbach, Stabenow and Lott estimated that the delay in approving a generic version of the antidepressant Wellbutrin XL is costing consumers $37 million a month.

Impax already sells a twice-a-day version of Wellbutrin; the once-a-day XL version was approved by the FDA in 2003 as the patent on the shorter-lasting formulations was running out.

"Biovail's petition is a sham, designed solely to delay the onset of generic competition for its Wellbutrin XL product," Impax told the FDA in a letter. "Biovail has wasted FDA's and Impax's time and resources and has likely cost the American public millions of dollars in taxes and health care expenditures in selfish pursuit of further undeserved windfall profits."

Biovail rejects the view that it is trying to block generic competition, and in its petition made the case that generic versions of its product may not be biologically equivalent and could be dangerous. As a result, the company -- which has also filed patent infringement suits against its prospective rivals -- asked the FDA to require substantial additional testing before any generic version of Wellbutrin XL is approved.

DOJ_NMG_0038414

Pharmaceutical Research and Manufacturers of America (PhRMA), which represents brand-name drugmakers, supports the citizen petition process and says the dozens of similar petitions pending with the FDA raise legitimate concerns.

"Most citizen petitions raise important regulatory, legal or scientific issues," said Caroline Loew, the group's senior vice president. "The fact is, the petitions have played a vital role at the FDA since their adoption almost 30 years ago. They have been responsible for important discussions about health and safety, and have been a catalyst for key agency decisions, such as speeding approval of AIDS medicines and implementing rules to protect children from accidental iron poisoning."

Although citizen petitions have raised many important drug policy issues, the Wellbutrin filing is one of several dozen pending that some call "blocking petitions" because they have the effect of delaying approval of a generic alternative. FDA officials said that about 170 citizen petitions are before the agency -- compared with 90 in 1999 -- and that about 30 percent involve industry challenges to generic applications.

FDA Chief Counsel Sheldon Bradshaw told generic drugmakers at a September conference that the agency has been troubled by the number of such petitions. He said they "appear designed not to raise timely concerns with respect to the legality or scientific soundness of approving a drug application, but rather to delay approval by compelling the agency" to review arguments that could have been made months before.

That response caused PhRMA to write to Bradshaw asking for more information. Scott Lassman, PhRMA's assistant general counsel, said the organization found the comments to be "troubling," especially if they could lead to restrictions on how and when citizen petitions could be filed.

More recently, Scott Gottlieb, FDA deputy commissioner for medical and scientific affairs, said in an interview that the agency has instituted internal changes that will allow for quicker rulings on citizen petitions, especially if they are filed close to the time when a decision on a new generic is expected. But he said that he did not believe there had been an increase in "what a reasonable person would call a blocking petition."

"It's very hard to decide what's a blocking petition and what has value without taking a serious look," Gottlieb said. "I think citizen petitions are very important and have to be preserved. The last thing we want to do is close off an avenue of discourse with the agency."

By regulation, all generic drugs must be "bioequivalent" to the brand-name drugs they copy and must have the same effects and dependability. Industry-sponsored citizen petitions often challenge the process by which bioequivalence was tested.

Because generics generally cost 25 percent to 75 percent less than brand-name products, the sums of money at stake can be enormous -- for the brand-name company, the generic maker, patients, insurance companies and government programs. Wellbutrin XL (a once-a-day formula of bupropion hydrochloride with fewer side effects than the original) costs $1 to $5 a pill and earns about $800 million a year for Biovail and GlaxoSmithKline PLC, which developed the drug. An Impax spokesman said his company planned to sell its generic version, if approved by the FDA, for "a considerable discount."

Making changes to the citizen petition process is a high priority for the Generic Pharmaceutical Association. Its president, Kathleen Jaeger, said her group considers blocking petitions to be among the greatest obstacles facing the industry.

"Because of the way the system works now, branded companies have every reason to file citizen petitions," she said. "There's a potentially great benefit, and there's no risk. I can't imagine that this is how the originators of the petitions thought they should work."

This is not the first time that the generic industry has complained about citizen petitions that it believed were unfairly blocking generic applications. The Clinton administration responded to those complaints in 1999 with a proposal that would have changed the way the FDA received and handled citizen petitions. PhRMA strongly opposed the rule, and the Bush administration withdrew it in 2003.

Jaeger said the generic industry was working hard with Congress at that time to close other loopholes in the patent system that allowed makers of brand-name drugs to extend their time for exclusive sales. "We were working so hard to get that legislation passed that we didn't really focus on what was happening with the citizen petition rule," she said, "so some of what we won in Congress, we lost to the citizen petitions."

Stabenow and Lott, who are trying, in their bill, to reduce the petitions, said in their letter to von Eschenbach that "the Senate Appropriations Committee recognized the unintended effect citizen petitions were having on the approval of [generic drug applications] and directed the FDA to provide a written report explaining the process and suggesting improvements. . . . It is our understanding the FDA has not moved forward with this request."

DOJ_NMG_0038415

Weather Nixes Shuttle Launch - Again (AP)

By Marcia Dunn

The Associarted Press, July 2, 2006

Stormy weather prevented NASA from launching Discovery for the second day in a row Sunday, extending a yearlong grounding of the space shuttle prompted by persistent trouble with fuel-tank foam.

Launch officials said they would try again Tuesday, on the Fourth of July, after giving the work force some rest and a chance to replenish the shuttle's on-board fuel. The weather was expected to improve by Tuesday, although rain was still in the forecast.

Launch director Mike Leinbach said it will be tight getting Discovery ready for a Tuesday afternoon launch — only the second liftoff of a shuttle since the 2003 Columbia disaster — and that any thunderstorms on Monday could put his team behind.

He halted the countdown just an hour after the seven astronauts boarded the fueled spaceship.

"Looking out the window it doesn't look good today," shuttle commander Steven Lindsey radioed from the cockpit. He noted that July Fourth would be "a good day to launch." It would be the first time NASA has ever launched a crew on the holiday.

The afternoon sky was considerably darker than on Saturday and left NASA with little choice but to call off the flight to the international space station. Thunderstorms were moving in quickly from the west, and lightning was detected within a few miles of the launch pad. The astronauts rode back to crew quarters in the rain.

The back-to-back delays cost NASA an estimated $2 million in overtime pay and fuel costs.

"After a year of preparation and after a very careful countdown, you don't want to get into a rush and do something that is not smart from a weather standpoint," said deputy shuttle program manager John Shannon, chairman of NASA's mission management team. "Nobody is going to remember that we scrubbed a day or two days a year from now. But if we go launch and get struck by lightning or have some other problem, that will be very memorable."

Shannon said he told his team, "What a great gift NASA could give to the nation to return the shuttle to operation on Independence Day."

"If the weather is good, that's exactly what we'll do," he said.

Among the invited guests who returned for the second launch attempt were family members of the perished Columbia astronauts. Vice President Dick Cheney was back in Washington after a brief visit to the space center Saturday.

Last month, NASA Administrator Michael Griffin approved launching the shuttle despite the concerns of two top agency managers who wanted additional repairs to the foam insulation on the external fuel tank. Columbia was brought down by a chunk of flyaway foam, and a piece broke off Discovery's redesigned tank last July, barely missing the shuttle.

"I've kind of steeped myself in this problem over the last month, and I am quite confident that we've got a very good chance of flying and flying safely," Griffin said Sunday in an interview on CNN's "Late Edition with Wolf Blitzer."

Griffin has repeatedly pointed out that if Discovery were damaged during launch, the astronauts always could take refuge on the space station until a rescue vehicle is sent up.

Sen. Bill Nelson (news, bio, voting record), D-Fla., who flew on a space shuttle in 1986 right before the Challenger disaster, defended Griffin's decision on Sunday and said it was an acceptable risk.

NASA's top safety officer and chief engineer recommended at a flight readiness review meeting two weeks ago that the shuttle remain grounded until design changes are made to the foam that insulates 34 brackets on the fuel tank. Without this foam, dangerous ice could form on the metal brackets once the tank is filled with super-cold fuel.

As it is, more than 35 pounds of foam were removed elsewhere in what NASA described as the biggest aerodynamic change ever made to the shuttle's launch system. Shuttle managers said they wanted to fly with only one major change at a time.

Once in orbit, Discovery's crew will test shuttle-inspection techniques, deliver supplies to the space station and drop off German astronaut Thomas Reiter for a six-month stay.

DOJ_NMG_0038416

NASA hopes to add an extra day to Discovery's 12-day flight to test spacewalking methods for repairing possible damage to the ship's thermal skin. By replenishing the shuttle's on-board fuel now, the astronauts will have a better chance of getting that additional day in orbit.

Academic Manifesto Takes Root (WT)

By Valerie Richardson

The Washington Times, July 3, 2006

DENVER -- Three years ago, David Horowitz came to Colorado to promote his newly inked Academic Bill of Rights, a plan the radical-turned-conservative activist said was needed to liberate students from an oppressive atmosphere of liberal groupthink at the nation's universities.

Critics had scoffed at the assertion by Mr. Horowitz -- who in the 1960s had been a prominent left-wing student activist -- that freedom on 21st-century campuses was being crushed by a tyrannical regime of political correctness.

But as then-state Senate Majority Leader John Andrews listened to Mr. Horowitz over breakfast at the Brown Palace Hotel, he agreed the time was ripe for an intellectual revolution.

"We were finishing each other's sentences, because this has been a concern for conservatives for such a long time," Mr. Andrews recalled. "I started working on and researching legislation right away."

A few months later, the Colorado legislature became the first to broker a deal with state universities on policies to protect students from political discrimination.

Since then, the Academic Bill of Rights, which says students should be graded and faculty should be hired and promoted without regard to their political or religious beliefs, has inspired the introduction of legislation in 18 states. Ohio and Tennessee struck deals with their universities on protecting academic freedom in lieu of legislation.

Meanwhile, Students for Academic Freedom, the campus watchdog group founded by Mr. Horowitz, has established chapters on more than 150 campuses. Student governments at a dozen universities have approved resolutions supporting the Academic Bill of Rights.

In April, Princeton University became the first institution of higher learning to pass a version of the Student Bill of Rights by a vote of the entire student body, surprising even Mr. Horowitz, who had no hand in the election.

"I didn't engineer that. They took the Academic Bill of Rights I designed, made their own Student Bill of Rights and got it passed," said Mr. Horowitz, who visited Princeton shortly after the plebiscite. "That shows it's taken on a life of its own."

Of course, it hasn't all been good news. A well-known conservative writer and activist, Mr. Horowitz was never the most popular guy on campus, and the academic freedom movement has cemented his status as a persona non grata.

Demonstrators greet Mr. Horowitz's every college appearance. At Duke University, associate professor Diane Nelson urged students to pull off their T-shirts to protest his March 7 speech. During a talk last year at Butler University in Indiana, he was hit in the face with a pie.

For all his success in raising the issue before state legislatures, no state has actually approved an academic freedom bill, despite the flurry of hearings and committee votes.

That is fine with Mr. Horowitz. The strategy of taking the issue to the legislatures was aimed at focusing attention on the issue, with the hope that universities would take up the gauntlet themselves and not on force-feeding diversity by statute.

"The agenda was always to force university administrators to pay attention, because there's nobody to hold them accountable," Mr. Horowitz said.

Still, the tactic has backfired with some small-government Republicans.

"The left knows there's a battle on, and they're in it," Mr. Horowitz said. "Conservatives are still hung up on this legislation thing -- they don't want to do anything that requires legislation. It's going to take a little time."

The left fights back

Mr. Horowitz's success with state legislatures has caught the attention of the left. The Center for American Progress, funded by Democratic billionaire George Soros, last year started Campus Progress, which follows the conservative movement at universities.

DOJ_NMG_0038417

In February, a coalition of teachers unions and civil-liberties groups, including the center, founded Free Exchange on Campus, an organization designed to counter Mr. Horowitz and his quest.

Jamie Horwitz, who acts as a spokesman both for Free Exchange on Campus and the American Federation of Teachers, said the opposition was slow to react because "we dismissed it at first as the rantings of an ideologue."

"But when the states starting proposing legislation, starting with Colorado, we decided to get involved," Mr. Horwitz said. "We've tried to raise awareness about what's really going on here."

On its face, few would disagree with the Academic Bill of Rights, a two-page document that outlines principles protecting the free-inquiry and free-speech rights of professors and students while stressing the importance of intellectual diversity.

It says that professors should use their class time for education -- not indoctrination -- and that neither the political nor religious beliefs of students and faculty should be a factor in grades or promotion.

Despite the document's political neutrality, critics fear that if it becomes state law, it will be used as a hammer to promote conservative thought and squelch liberal dissent.

"I think what they're doing is curtailing academic freedom," said Adam Jentleson, policy and advocacy manager of Campus Progress. "I don't think they're really making that much progress because every state that's considered it has either voted it down or referred it to committee."

In 2003, the American Association of University Professors condemned the Academic Bill of Rights as "a grave threat to academic freedom." Last year, however, the organization was one of 27 higher-education groups to sign a statement endorsing "intellectual pluralism," grievance procedures for students and other tenets of the document.

"That was pretty huge for us," said Sara Dogan, president of Students for Academic Freedom. "They never would have done that if we hadn't pointed out the problems and asked them to do something about it. Unfortunately, their member organizations [universities] haven't picked up on it."

Indeed, university professors have been the document's biggest critics, arguing that the cure is worse than the purported disease. Already, they say, the debate has created a climate of self-censorship on campus as professors increasingly steer clear of politically charged topics, such as global warming.

"Wouldn't it be worse to have laws that restrict free speech in the classroom?" Mr. Horwitz said.

Professors stay silent

Most professors aren't the all-powerful gods that they're made out to be, he said, noting that only one-third of university faculty are tenured.

"What I hear more and more is that the majority of faculty are afraid to speak their views because they have no protection," Mr. Horwitz said.

Critics also insist that the problem isn't as bad as the academic freedom movement claims, despite hundreds of examples ranging from professors who routinely bash Republicans in class to those who penalize students for expressing conservative views.

At the Students for Academic Freedom conference in April, however, Mr. Horwitz said many of the horror stories boiled down to students disgruntled over bad grades.

"I went to the conference and listened to a handful of students. Most of the time it was, 'I'm active in conservative politics, and I got a professor I didn't like and got a bad grade, and it's because he was biased,' " said Mr. Horwitz.

"Where's the evidence? This raises questions in higher education when it starts to look like a witch hunt."

Not so, says Pennsylvania state Sen. Gibson Armstrong. After legislators held five hearings at state universities to gauge academic freedom, wrapping up May 31, Mr. Armstrong said he's convinced there's "a serious problem."

"They [critics] point to one case that turned out to be not true," said Mr. Armstrong.

"But I've got a lot of these stories and some of them have to be true. It's hypocritical -- if there were one case of a problem with gender or racial diversity, the university would be apoplectic."

In fact, he said, that did happen. At Penn State University, there was a campuswide uproar after several black students received racist e-mails in 2001. It was later discovered the e-mails were sent from a computer lab at Temple University in Philadelphia.

DOJ_NMG_0038418

"They spent $10 million to stop a problem that wasn't even theirs. Here we report numerous problems with diversity of thought, and they turn a blind eye. It's a double standard," he said.

In March, the Pennsylvania House passed academic freedom language in an amendment to the reauthorization of the Higher Education Act, now pending in the Senate.

Churchill ignites a firestorm

To those who ask for evidence of liberal bias in academia, Mr. Horowitz has two words: Ward Churchill. The University of Colorado ethnic-studies professor transformed the debate in February 2005, when it was publicized that he wrote an essay comparing victims of the September 11 terrorist attack to Nazi war criminal Adolf Eichmann.

"Churchill is huge," Mr. Horowitz said. "I don't think this movement would have happened without Ward Churchill. I know I wouldn't have written 'The Professors' if it hadn't been for Ward Churchill."

The specter of the long-haired, chain-smoking, research-faking, America-bashing Mr. Churchill molding impressionable young minds turned Mr. Horowitz's pet project into a national sensation almost overnight. Suddenly, it became difficult to argue that liberal bias on campus was the product of an overheated right-wing imagination.

Nowhere was his influence greater than in Colorado, where Mr. Churchill literally rescued the movement. After the Democrats took back the legislature in November 2004, state Sen. Bob Hagedorn introduced a bill that would have erased the state's groundbreaking Memorandum of Understanding with the state universities on academic freedom.

A few weeks later, the Churchill story broke, and Mr. Hagedorn, a Democrat, withdrew the bill.

"Everything changed," recalled Mr. Andrews, now a fellow with the Claremont Institute. "Churchill became the poster boy for abuse in the classroom and destroyed whatever chance Hagedorn thought he had to pass this protective layer on university professors."

The publicity gave Republicans an unexpected bonus issue on the education front. Whether academic freedom has the political mojo to sway voters will be tested this year in Maine.

As vice chairman of the Maine Republican Party, Dan Schuberth is on a mission to elect Republicans to the state House, where they trail Democrats by just one seat, and academic freedom may be the issue that gets him there.

"This is something people are talking about, on talk radio, on the street, in the papers," Mr. Schuberth said. "I think it's a winning issue for us, to be honest. It's playing well, and any candidate who talks about academic freedom is going to win support."

Last month, the Maine Republican Party became the first in the nation to add academic freedom language to its platform. The decision came after an academic freedom bill failed by one vote in the state House by a straight party-line vote.

Calls for the legislation came after a stir over liberal bias at Bates College. In February 2004, a Bates staffer accidentally copied an e-mail back to the College Republicans calling them a "bunch of thugs" for sponsoring a seminar on conservative politics.

In the ensuring outcry, the Bates student government passed a resolution calling for an Academic Bill of Rights. The staff member apologized and was reprimanded.

In May 2005, during legislative hearings on academic freedom, a Bowdoin College student testified that his early Christian literature professor had thrown a Bible to the floor on the first day of class.

The events created a political climate ripe for the Academic Bill of Rights.

"It's phenomenal. It's the archetypal grass-roots campaign," said Mr. Schuberth.

"It's just common sense, and Maine people are all about common sense," Mr. Schuberth said. "When you talk to Maine people about what they want for their kids, one thing they want is to be able to send them to college without having them indoctrinated."

Maine Republicans have vowed to introduce another academic freedom bill if they win the House in November. Mr. Schuberth is confident that the state will ultimately approve such legislation, as long as the unthinkable doesn't happen.

"Heaven forbid we get a Republican professor in there who insists Ronald Reagan was the greatest president ever and [Franklin Roosevelt] was a communist," said Mr. Schuberth.

DOJ_NMG_0038419

Representatives Relish Being Made A Mockery (WT)

By Christina Bellantoni

The Washington Times, July 3, 2006

No matter how hard members of Congress who appear on the "Better Know a District" comedy segment try to beat the system, Stephen Colbert makes them end up looking silly. But several lawmakers said doing the spoof spot on "The Colbert Report" on TV's Comedy Central actually has raised their profiles back home, particularly among young folks.

"You have to have the right attitude," said Rep. Phil Gingrey, Georgia Republican, whose 11th District was featured on the cable show in April.

"It's a comedy show; he's a comedian, and you're not," he said. "Even though I tried to be funny, all my funny stuff ended up on the cutting-room floor. I just had to leave hoping that when they slice and dice and put it all back together again, I wouldn't look too stupid."

Indeed, any publicity is good publicity.

Mr. Gingrey, whose thick mustache was admired by Mr. Colbert, who asked to stroke it, said there was an unexpected byproduct of doing the show -- attention from young constituents and House staffers.

Rep. Earl Blumenauer of Oregon had a similar experience when his 3rd District was profiled in May. "I had never watched it, but I was stunned at the number of e-mails I got almost instantly," the Democrat said.

But Rep. Barney Frank, Massachusetts Democrat, regrets his appearance and called Mr. Colbert a "third-rate" comedian.

"It was a stupid waste of time, and he is two stooges short of a good routine," Mr. Frank said.

Still, the segment is among the more popular on "The Colbert Report," a spin-off of "The Daily Show with Jon Stewart," with more than 1 million viewers.

Mr. Colbert so far has targeted 25 members in the 435-member House, splicing and dicing sometimes two-hour-long camera sessions into five-minute clips.

Mr. Blumenauer said his appearance was fun, even though the two argued about global warming and Mr. Colbert called him "an America-hating terrorist-lover hiding behind a stupid bow tie."

"We tend to take ourselves too seriously in this business," Mr. Blumenauer said.

Several lawmakers said that although their staffers prepped them with clips of past segments, they were not prepared for Mr. Colbert's creative editing.

Mr. Colbert recently hazed Rep. Lynn Westmoreland, a Republican from Georgia's 8th District, for not writing a single piece of legislation during his nearly two years in Congress.

However, Mr. Westmoreland co-sponsored a bill that would require the Ten Commandments be displayed in the Capitol.

When asked, the lawmaker was able to name just three of the Commandments. "I can't name them all," he said.

Democratic Rep. Brad Sherman did the show with gusto, even filming a spoof pornographic movie with Mr. Colbert because his 27th District in California is home to many pornographers.

House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi, who has been a guest on "The Daily Show," said the Colbert segment is "humorous," but wouldn't recommend members make an appearance.

"I would think it would be OK to go on if you were live to tape, but don't subject yourself to a comic's edit unless you want to be made a fool of," the California Democrat said. "I think: Why would anybody go on there? Not that I don't think they have all done very well."

Mrs. Pelosi added that she watches the show "all the time."

House Majority Leader John A. Boehner of Ohio, by contrast, said he had never heard of the show.

"I'm culturally illiterate," he told The Washington Times.

The segment has an educational element, with Mr. Colbert outlining the district's demographics, history and oddball trivia. He also gives each district the adjective "fightin'," as in the "Fightin' Fifth" in Oregon.

He talked to that district's Rep. Darlene Hooley about the state's medicinal-marijuana laws. The Democrat laughed heartily when she was asked: "Are you high right now?"

DOJ_NMG_0038420

Mr. Colbert, widely panned for his performance bashing President Bush at the White House Correspondents Dinner, commonly asks guests: "George W. Bush: great president or the greatest president?"

Mr. Colbert has featured five Republicans and 18 Democrats, and also did a mock "retiring" of Texas' 22nd District when Republican Rep. Tom DeLay announced his retirement, putting together press clips for a fake interview with the former majority leader.

He moved California's 50th District to the "never existed to me" category when former Rep. Randy "Duke" Cunningham resigned amid a bribery scandal. The Republican is now serving prison time, and Mr. Colbert's segment was renamed as a 434-part series.

Glass Houses (RC)

By Mary Ann Akers

Roll Call, July 3, 2006

The typically rowdy fans who attended the 45th Annual Roll Call Congressional Baseball Game on Thursday night were pretty tame this year. Until the seventh inning, when embattled Rep. William Jefferson (D-La.), who's teetering dangerously close to the edge of indictment, got up to bat as a pinch hitter.

That's when a small group of Republicans in the stands starting chanting, "Cold hard cash, cold hard cash."

Their taunting — a reference to that $90,000 in alleged bribe money that FBI agents found in Jefferson's freezer — didn't last long. Jefferson popped out meekly and headed off the field almost as soon as he got up to bat.

One GOP source told HOH that "some of the higher-ups" in Republican ranks thought the hecklers, who were sitting down close to home plate, had "crossed the line." But Jefferson's communications director, Melanie Roussell, said the Congressman wasn't bothered by the chanting, because he didn't hear it.

She said she didn't hear any chants either. "Ney, not a one," she joked in an e-mail, cleverly referencing the Republican who seems to be in dire danger of indictment — Rep. Bob Ney (R-Ohio).

Softball Gets Downright Scary. No, that wasn't Jaws from the James Bond flicks who you saw Thursday at the Congressional baseball game. That was Spicer, Sean Spicer, the recently departed spokesman for the House Republican Conference, whose mouth has been wired shut for a week and a half.

Spicer, who was scheduled to start his new job last Monday flacking for the U.S. trade representative's office, got whacked in the face during a Congressional softball game on June 22 and wound up in intensive care for four days. Now he's on a diet of applesauce and Frappacinos.

Spicer got up to pitch for his team, the Ugly Mugs, during their game against the House Energy and Commerce Committee. The first pitch was so-so, he recalled Friday.

"The second one was a dream," he mumbled through the wires keeping his jaw shut for the next five weeks. "That dream pitch got jammed in my face."

Three teammates grabbed some ice from a cooler, packed it on Spicer's face and drove him to George Washington University Hospital. His entire jaw had been shattered.

"One side of my jaw was going one way, the other side was going another way, my teeth were smashed out, and I was spitting up blood," he said.

Four days of intensive care, two hours of surgery and many stitches later, Spicer had a plate in his face, wires in his mouth, and, luckily, painkillers in his bloodstream.

He was supposed to start his new job at USTR on June 26 and travel to Geneva for World Trade Organization meetings. Obviously, that didn't happen. "I got to go on a different trip," Spicer said. "Four days in ICU, wasn't exactly the idea of 'travel.'"

Still, tough nut that he is, Spicer, after being released from the hospital on Monday, started his agency job on Thursday, wires and all. So, that guy at USTR you can't understand on the phone — that's him.

Though many a friend and colleague have threatened to wire Sean Spicer's mouth shut over the years, nobody wanted to see it happen this way! HOH wishes him a speedy recovery and the dinner of his dreams when he gets those wires off.

DOJ_NMG_0038421

Pity the Fool. Attention House Democrats: Don't go on "The Colbert Report" if you care what House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi (Calif.) thinks.

At her press conference Thursday, when asked what she thinks of Stephen Colbert's "Better Know a District" series, Pelosi said: "Well, it is humorous; I wouldn't recommend that anyone go on the show. I would think it would be okay to go on if you were live to tape, but don't subject yourself to a comic's edit unless you want to be made a fool of."

That said, Pelosi said she watches Colbert's show "all the time" and she thinks, "why would anybody go on there? Not that I don't think they have all done very well."

To the Moon, Alice. While Gabrielle Giffords, the apparent Democratic frontrunner in Arizona's 8th district to replace retiring Rep. Jim Kolbe (R-Ariz.), stumps for votes this July Fourth holiday, her boyfriend will be out of this world. Sure, he's in love and all that, but we mean literally out of this world.

Giffords has been dating U.S. Navy Commander Mark Kelly for over a year. At press time, Kelly, a combat veteran of the first Persian Gulf War, was slated to pilot the Space Shuttle Discovery, scheduled to launch from the Kennedy Space Center.

"This is such an exciting weekend for Mark; we're all so proud of him as he pilots the shuttle for the first time," his gal/House candidate said. "It's so fitting that it's happening over the Fourth of July weekend — so many of us are still inspired by President Kennedy's dream of exploring the new frontier."

If They Build It, Will Jesus Come? (WP)

By Al Kamen

The Washington Post, July 3, 2006

The Republican-controlled House and Senate don't seem to be able to agree on much these days. There have been bloody, public battles over immigration, estate taxes, voting rights and, of course, the important constitutional amendment to ban flag-burning.

But the biggest fight may have occurred last week over a House proposal to build a fenced walkway that would run across the now-closed east front of the Capitol -- the area where the long-delayed Capitol Visitor Center is being built.

House folks, led by Speaker J. Dennis Hastert (Ill.) himself -- he's said to be "passionate" about the idea -- want the walkway. "It's so the American people get a view of all sides of the Capitol," a House Republican aide said. "They deserve to have a walkway to see it."

House backers say the walkway will cost only $60,000, the aide said, adding "that's not all that much. They [Senate aides] claim the cost is $95,000, but we don't know what that is for, some $35,000 in incidental costs, like a slush fund."

The walkway would be about 10 feet wide -- 30 feet in some spots -- and the fence would be six feet tall on the sides, though at one point, in front of the Capitol steps, it would drop to 3 1/2 feet.

Senate detractors say this proposal is exceptionally stupid, even for Congress. One Senate aide opined that House members wanted it because they're "cranky over there about the delays with the visitors center -- now a year behind schedule, so they want to take people there and show progress."

The Upper Chamber folks rather uncharitably say the mysterious fence dips to only four feet high so Hastert and House members can walk down the steps and have their pictures taken with constituents.

"We are an active construction zone" on the Senate side, with "trucks coming in and out daily, dropping off building materials," a Senate aide said, so safety is an issue. Also, "someone could hop the fence, then you have an intruder and security issue, requiring additional police. And what if there's an evacuation?" People leaving the Capitol would be impeded by the fence.

But the aide for the People's House said these things are being overblown. "We're saying it is safe, so why not let citizens see that side of the Capitol? The House is prepared to move on this," he said, and if the Senate won't go along, "it'll show the Senate doesn't want people to have access to the view."

That means, however, that the walkway will end halfway across the Capitol, making it more a dead-end chute than a walkway.

DOJ_NMG_0038422

"The Jesus Lady could come back," another congressional aide said, referring to Rita Warren , a 77-year-old, white-haired woman who, until the construction began, appeared daily at the east entrance steps with a life-size mannequin in white robes and a beard. The well-known duo might camp in the walkway, that aide said.

Warren, who calls herself "a lobbyist for God," had protested the closing of the Capitol steps to build the visitor center, telling The Hill newspaper it was "a waste of a billion dollars."

"The good Lord is waiting until it's finished."

No reason to wait much longer. The fence, at least on the House side, is scheduled to go up this week.Abramoff Can't Get a Break

Justice Department Inspector General Glenn A. Fine , after a lengthy investigation, reported last week that although disgraced lobbyist and Loop favorite Jack Abramoff had boasted of ridding immigrant smugglers and sweatshop owners in Guam and the Northern Mariana Islands of an annoying interim U.S. attorney, he actually had nothing to do with it.

The interim official, Frederick Black , said President Bush replaced him in 2001 because Black had called for an investigation of Abramoff and had supported applying federal immigration law to the Marianas, which Abramoff's clients opposed.

The inspector general concluded that the new nominee had already been chosen under normal selection procedures, "well before Abramoff tried to become involved in the process," a Justice Department official said.

"We concluded that Abramoff played no role in the selection of Black's replacement. However, when informed of the White House's decision to select a new prosecutor, Abramoff attempted to take credit with his Guam contacts for the selection, even though Abramoff had played no role in it."

Well, it was a good try.Speaking of Legitimate Elections . . .

More from the now-famous taped luncheon chat between Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice and Russian Foreign Minister Sergei Lavrov last week in Moscow. All very cordial, we were assured -- until the tape proved completely otherwise.

During the talk, Rice, speaking of Iraq, said: "This is the only legitimately elected government in the Middle East with a possible exception of Lebanon, which was a peculiar election."

Not sure what she means by Lebanon, but what about the Palestinian territories? Because Hamas won, it's not legitimately elected? What about Israel?

Lessons Learned (WT)

By By James Loy

The Washington Times, July 3, 2006

History shows us that Congress follows a time-honored pattern of reacting to the aftermath of a major tragedy with an impulsive first response followed by years of "perfecting" the original legislation.

After the 1989 Exxon-Valdez oil spill in the pristine Prince William Sound, Alaska, Congress and the executive branch reacted with the Oil Pollution Act of 1990. One of my last acts as commandant of the U.S. Coast Guard in 2002 was to sign the 110th clarification on how to implement that law. Though we thought the act was the right response at the time, experience later showed that we needed to make adjustments. America finds itself in such a pattern yet again in the debate over the future of the Federal Emergency Management Agency and its place within the Department of Homeland Security.

Most would agree that the deficiencies of FEMA stood out in sharp relief in the aftermath of Hurricane Katrina. There is much less consensus on how best to correct these deficiencies. There are currently 11 bills pending in Congress that address the future of FEMA. Some would re-establish FEMA as an independent agency, while others acknowledge the value of leaving FEMA within DHS and would simply restructure the agency. Some would give the FEMA director additional powers.

None of these proposals, however, address the central problem: The Homeland Security Act of 2002 diluted the FEMA director's focus on the agency's core mission -- response and recovery -- by requiring him to wear an additional hat as the DHS under-secretary for emergency preparedness and response (later changed to the under-secretary for federal emergency management).

This dual role within the DHS bureaucracy necessarily prevents him from concentrating 100 percent of his time on improving FEMA's performance. In the current iteration, the FEMA director is required to devote significant attention to the administrative, budget and policy issues that are part and parcel of managing a directorate within the overall DHS bureaucracy. To once and for all set FEMA up for success, Congress must restore the FEMA director's singular responsibility -- making FEMA run well.

DOJ_NMG_0038423

At the same time, it is important to keep FEMA within DHS, preserving its access to the agencies and assets it needs to perform well during an emergency. Those who advocate reverting FEMA to the independent, cabinet-level agency that it was during the Clinton Administration fail to recognize the dramatically different post-September 11 security environment we live in today. The creation of the Department of Homeland Security was a response to new threats facing our country. It pulled together 22 disparate agencies under one roof responsible for preventing and responding to disasters. It made the secretary of homeland security the president's designated coordinator for disaster preparedness and response, regardless of the threat source. It does not seem wise to pull the rug out from under him by reverting FEMA to a stand-alone agency, thus removing the major response and recovery agency from his oversight.

FEMA is charged with protecting the nation from all hazards -- natural or man-made. To effectively fulfill this mission, FEMA needs ready access to and association with the communication and law enforcement assets that exist within DHS. To remove FEMA from that synergy would require building bureaucratic bridges back to the other DHS response and recovery agencies in order to do its job. This would be a redundant effort, costing time and money that we simply don't have.

Ample precedent already exists for the creation of FEMA as an independent agency within DHS. Both the Coast Guard and the Secret Service exist within DHS, but their leaders are focused solely on running their agencies and report directly to the secretary. They can be a model for FEMA.

It is reasonable to expect that we will need to make adjustments to the initial solutions we quickly devise after major disasters. In the debate over FEMA's future, we should ensure that the FEMA director can focus all of his time, energy and talent on guiding the agency in responding effectively and efficiently to the American people in the event of a disaster. That is best accomplished by restoring FEMA's independent agency status, offloading the director's responsibilities of being double-hatted as an under secretary and keeping the agency and the director inside DHS with direct access to the secretary during a crisis.

Adm. James Loy is the national co-chairman of ProtectingAmerica.org. He is the former commandant of the U.S. Coast Guard and former deputy secretary of Homeland Security.

We Need Fewer Secrets (WP)

By Jimmy Carter

The Washington Post, July 3, 2006

The U.S. Freedom of Information Act (FOIA) turns 40 tomorrow, the day we celebrate our independence. But this anniversary will not be a day of celebration for the right to information in our country. Our government leaders have become increasingly obsessed with secrecy. Obstructionist policies and deficient practices have ensured that many important public documents and official actions remain hidden from our view.

The events in our nation today -- war, civil rights violations, spiraling energy costs, campaign finance and lobbyist scandals -- dictate the growing need and citizens' desire for access to public documents. A poll conducted last year found that 70 percent of Americans are either somewhat or very concerned about government secrecy. This is understandable when the U.S. government uses at least 50 designations to restrict unclassified information and created 81 percent more "secrets" in 2005 than in 2000, according to the watchdog coalition OpenTheGovernment.org.

Moreover, the response to FOIA requests often does not satisfy the transparency objectives or provisions of the law, which, for example, mandates an answer to information requests within 20 working days. According to the National Security Archives 2003 report, median response times may be as long as 905 working days at the Department of Agriculture and 1,113 working days at the Environmental Protection Agency. The only recourse for unsatisfied requesters is to appeal to the U.S. District Court, which is costly, timely and unavailable to most people. Policies that favor secrecy, implementation that does not satisfy the law, lack of a mandated oversight body and inaccessible enforcement mechanisms have put the United States behind much of the world in the right to information.

DOJ_NMG_0038424

Increasingly, developed and developing nations are recognizing that a free flow of information is fundamental for democracy. Whether it's government or private companies that provide public services, access to their records increases accountability and allows citizens to participate more fully in public life. It is a critical tool in fighting corruption, and people can use it to improve their own lives in the areas of health care, education, housing and other public services. Perhaps most important, access to information advances citizens' trust in their government, allowing people to understand policy decisions and monitor their implementation.

Nearly 70 countries have passed legislation to ensure the right to request and receive public documents, the vast majority in the past decade and many in middle- and low-income nations. While the United States retreats, the international trend toward transparency grows, with laws often more comprehensive and effective than our own. Unlike FOIA, which covers only the executive branch, modern legislation includes all branches of power and some private companies. Moreover, new access laws establish ways to monitor implementation and enforce the right, holding agencies accountable for providing information quickly and fully.

What difference do these laws make?

In South Africa, a country emerging from authoritarian rule under the apartheid system, the act covering access to information gives individuals an opportunity to demand public documents and hold government accountable for its actions, an inconceivable notion just a decade ago. Requests have exposed inappropriate land-use practices, outdated HIV-AIDS policies and a scandalous billion-dollar arms deal. In the United Kingdom, the new law forced the government to reveal the factual basis for its decision to go to war in Iraq.

In Jamaica, one of the countries where the Carter Center has worked for the past four years to help establish an access-to-information regime, citizens have used their right to request documents concerning the protection of more than 2,500 children in public orphanages. Two years ago there were credible allegations of sexual and physical abuse. In the past year, a coalition of interested groups has made more than 40 information requests to determine whether new government recommendations were implemented to ensure the future safety and well-being of these vulnerable children.

Even in such unlikely places as Mali, India and Shanghai, efforts that allow access to information are ensuring greater transparency in decision making and a freer flow of information.

In the United States, we must seek amendments to FOIA to be more in line with emerging international standards, such as covering all branches of government; providing an oversight body to monitor compliance; including sanctions for failure to adhere to the law; and establishing an appeal mechanism that is easy to access, speedy and affordable. We cannot take freedom of information for granted. Our democracy depends on it.

The writer was the 39th president and is founder of the Carter Center.

Doctors, Lawyers, Priests -- And Journalists? (WSJ)

By Dick Thornburgh

The Wall Street Journal, July 3, 2006

National debate over media disclosure of the government's bank-records investigation has so far focused on newspapers' editorial decisions to publicize this information. But it's only a matter of time until the spotlight turns. Questions will soon be raised about who leaked that information to the press, and whether or not Washington has a right to force a reporter to reveal the leaker's name.

Ever since then-New York Times reporter Judith Miller went to jail for 85 days last year rather than comply with a subpoena for her sources in the Valerie Plame case, the media has been pushing for a federal shield that would grant reporters unprecedented special protection from revealing sources during litigation. The Senate is now taking steps toward providing such a reporter-source privilege with the Free Flow of Information Act, which is likely to be sent to the floor for a vote over the next few weeks. The act contains an exception for national security that might well apply to the bank-records investigation, which was conducted as a means to track terrorist activity.

DOJ_NMG_0038425

But for the longer term, the bill has troubling implications. In its current form it contains a shield so broad -- and a definition of journalism so vague -- that it upends what up to now has been a reasonable balance between protecting reporters from disclosing sources and preserving the right to the fullest possible access to truth in the courtroom for plaintiffs and defendants.

Important as it may be to safeguard the source confidentiality that is one element of a free press, we have an equal or greater interest in ensuring that truthful evidence is presented in the courtroom. Over the years, on a case-by-case basis, our courts have done a pretty good job of balancing these occasionally conflicting principles -- as they have with attorney-client, doctor-patient and priest-penitent privileges. Congress has recognized this and resisted the temptation to enact laws that would override such judicial balancing acts.

In 1975, for example, the Judicial Federal Rules Advisory Committee recommended that Congress codify the doctor-patient, priest-penitent and attorney-client privilege, among others -- though not the reporter-source privilege. Congress declined to do this, determining that the development and application of privileges that might keep crucial information from the courtroom are best left to "principles of common law" and the "reason and experience" of the judicial system.

Unfortunately, the Senate has responded to recent controversy over media sources by turning its back on that wisdom and restraint. The result is a piece of legislation that could do more harm than good.

Under the proposed law, for example, a person could illegally reveal someone else's private health-care or employment records and be completely protected from any consequences, as long as he or she used a reporter to reveal the information, the reporter declined to reveal the source and there were no other ways to learn the identity of that person. A disgruntled employee could illegally share a company's trade secrets and intellectual property with the world -- again with no concerns about being unmasked, as long as the only way to identify the wrong-doer was by questioning a reporter. People on either side of a lawsuit might well be emboldened to leak to the press documents that the court has placed under seal. In all of these cases, if any party sought to identify the source of a leak known only to a reporter, judges would no longer have the discretion to weigh all the facts to determine what would be fair and in the interest of justice.

Another serious failing in the proposed legislation is its overly broad definition of who is a "journalist," and what constitutes "journalism." The bill does not require that a journalist be someone professionally engaged in the legitimate reporting of news, or that the information at issue be obtained in the course of legitimate newsgathering. Nor does it require that reporters be accountable to any objective standard of journalism ethics. The only requirement is that the "reporter" be paid for the work and be part of an organization that regularly processes and researches information. This is so broad that it could be used to give immunity to nonreporters engaged in nonjournalistic activities -- including those with ties to terrorist or criminal organizations.

It is important to note that most leaking is not whistle-blowing, and that people who reveal trade secrets, private medical or tax information are rarely whistle-blowers. Employees, including government employees, who report legal or regulatory infractions or fraud to the proper authorities are protected from retaliation by a variety of whistle-blower provisions, none of which are or can be affected by media-shield laws.

If Congress insists on breaking with longstanding tradition and precedent to categorically keep certain types of truthful information from the courtroom, it needs to make sure that the privilege is as clearly defined as possible, and has a reasonable balancing test that allows the protection to be superseded when necessary.

Perhaps the most efficient way to ensure such a balance would be to base media-shield legislation on the long practical experience our federal courts have with this issue. All 13 federal circuits strike a balance between unfettered protection of journalistic sources, the right to truth in the courtroom, and the need to prevent media protection from encouraging or protecting law-breakers. Indeed, six circuits have explicitly adopted a balancing test that looks at whether the information is relevant to the case; whether the information can be reasonably obtained by other means; and whether there is a legitimate interest in disclosure of the information.

At its best, the media supports democracy by providing the public with the information that citizens need to exercise their rights. But given the potential for abuse of that critical role, any media shield must, in the interests of justice, be carefully crafted.

Mr. Thornburgh is a former attorney general of the U.S. and is counsel to Kirkpatrick & Lockhart Nicholson Graham LLP.

We Were Wrong About Term Limits (LAT)

DOJ_NMG_0038426

By Rob Stutzman

The Los Angeles Times, July 3, 2006

THE POLITICAL landscape is always evolving. Sometimes violently (as with 9/11 or Watergate), other times gradually, through shifting demographics or economic change. Dogmas come, dogmas go, political winds shift back and forth, tossing us about.

About 20 years ago, the notion of term limits for officeholders became dogma for the center-right. Voters wanted to punish self-dealing politicians by eliminating their permanency. Career politicians out, citizen politicians in! Or so the idea went.

Fourteen years have passed since California voters approved legislative term limits, restricting Assembly members to a trio of two-year terms and state senators to two four-year stints.

I have always been a loyal conservative supporter of term limits — not as any kind of fundamental prerequisite for a healthy democracy, but more as a suitably blunt instrument to correct the arrogance of elected officials not mindful enough of those who elected them. Public service, I reasoned, should be an avocation, not a permanent vocation. And the public interest would be protected by preventing the development of entrenched, powerful political dynasties, such as Willie Brown's marathon 14-year rule of the Assembly.

But after 16 years of working in California politics, I've changed my mind. We were wrong. Term limits haven't delivered what we hoped for. They have, in fact, harmed the public interest.

For starters, they have done little to eliminate the permanent political class. Today's legislators, from whichever party, are all too often ex-staffers or relatives of the politicians the limits uprooted from office. (Six direct relatives of term-limited Assembly members ran last month for the vacated seats, though this time only two of them won.) The goal of creating a true "citizen" Legislature has gone unrealized.

Term limits also have led to a revolving door of Assembly speakers who are so temporary and beholden to the special interests that helped put them in power that at times they function without complete authority. While eliminating its evils, we didn't fully account for the virtues of an imperial speakership.

For example, just look at last year, when Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger attempted to negotiate his reform agenda with the Legislature and avoid a contentious special election. The Assembly has a dynamic and charismatic leader in Fabian Nuñez, who I believe genuinely wants to accomplish great things for California, and who knows that we have a broken budget system that needs to be fixed. Yet, for those of us close to those negotiations, it was clear that Speaker Nuñez did not have the ultimate authority to sign off on a deal. The ultimate power resided with the California Teachers Assn.

This is not a criticism of the speaker but an indictment of our system. It's difficult to imagine Brown having to bow to an interest group. A strong speakership is good for the state, but it can't exist under term limits. Outside interest groups — business, labor, trial lawyers, doctors — are more powerful now than before.

This situation is exacerbated by noncompetitive legislative districts. When 90% of legislators are immune from voters in a general election, it should come as no surprise that the citizens are easily forgotten under the Capitol dome.

To launch a political career, one must simply win a primary election. Primary campaigns in each party have become the new battleground between interest groups, which can get more for their dollars because the electorate is smaller. Freshly minted legislators often feel they owe their careers to whichever interest group funded their first successful race.

We know from the fairly drawn state legislative districts of the 1990s that requiring roughly 25% of the seats to be competitive will give us a Legislature that more accurately reflects California.

The proof is in how Brown was finally displaced as speaker after the 1994 elections. Although one motivation for term limits was to get rid of Brown, it was competitive seats and a new GOP majority that took Brown's name off the speaker's door before term limits could get him.

The real reform that we need is redistricting. Politicians from both parties raised millions of dollars to defeat Schwarzenegger's ballot initiative last year, but Democratic leaders promised to work with the governor to pass new legislation this year.

DOJ_NMG_0038427

If that means also abolishing or at a minimum extending term limits, then Schwarzenegger and the Republicans should take that deal. It would be a win-win. We need competitive legislative races, and it is high time to admit that term limits haven't worked.

Rob Stutzman is former deputy chief of staff for communications for Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger, and now works as a communications and political consultant.

Rank Disloyalty (NEWREP)

By The Editors

New Republic, July 3, 2006

There is something a bit troubling about the Democrats' current obsession with discipline, as though there were no higher aspiration than matching the ruthless efficiency of the House Republicans. A political party is not the same as a Third World liberation movement. It ought to accommodate moments of dissent and occasional deviations from the party line without the forms of retribution that have recently taken hold in the liberal blogosphere.

But apostasy comes in gradations: There is heterodoxy, and then there is Montana Senator Max Baucus. Baucus isn't in the mold of Daniel Patrick Moynihan, who flirted with reasonable ideas taboo among Democratic constituencies. He doesn't take quirky procedural stands, à la Russ Feingold. He's not even a Zell Miller-like figure who rhetorically strafes his party but does little substantive damage. What Baucus does is use his influence as the top Democrat on the Finance Committee to systematically undercut his party and enable George W. Bush's most egregious domestic legislation. So why does his party entrust him with so much responsibility?

We were reminded of this question during this month's estate-tax debate. On one side was the vast majority of Republicans, who kvetch about the cosmic unfairness of taxing the top 1 percent of family fortunes. On the other side was the vast majority of Democrats, who see the estate tax as a reasonable, if modest, curb on the excesses of dynastic wealth. And in the middle was Baucus, an opponent of the tax, pushing a last-minute compromise that would dramatically scale it back. Baucus says he was trying to make the best of a difficult situation, since the tax will be reined in one way or another. But his compromise doesn't merely split differences; its price tag is nearly 70 percent of the cost of outright repeal, according to the nonpartisan Tax Policy Center. And it reveals precisely why Baucus shouldn't be in such a sensitive position: He understands statesmanship strictly in terms of the size of the concession he makes; the more he concedes, the more Churchillian he thinks he is.

If you look closely enough at recent domestic policy debacles, you'll invariably see his fingerprints. Facing George W. Bush's massive tax-cut proposal in 2001, Baucus undermined the Senate Democrats' strategy of forcing concessions by maintaining a united front. In private negotiations with his GOP counterpart, Chuck Grassley, Baucus produced a bill that handed the White House virtually all of its top priorities. Afterward, he boasted that he'd done Democrats a favor, since they "would have been in trouble in 2002 just saying no to every one of the president's proposals." We shudder to think what might have happened had the Democrats been labeled "obstructionist."

Then there was the 2003 Medicare debate. Baucus, true to his method, agreed to a set of procedural conditions that undermined Democratic unity and preordained a disastrous outcome. Then he used the little authority he retained to--how to put it?--give away the store. In addition to agreeing to Health Savings Accounts--a gambit that he had once condemned as irresponsible--Baucus assented to a provision preventing Medicare from negotiating discounts with pharmaceutical manufacturers.

Baucus and his defenders--alternately known as his press office--make two arguments on his behalf. The first is that Baucus is simply doing what he needs to do to get reelected. (This argument usually masquerades behind the mantra of doing what's best for the "people of Montana.") But, unless the way to get ahead in Montana is to insist on overcharging Medicare patients by billions of dollars, the senator has been going far above and beyond the call of duty.

Baucus's second argument is that Democrats get substantively better legislation when he engages Republicans on their behalf. But this argument assumes the Bush administration has the votes to pass legislation without Democratic support. Often, it's Baucus who provides the margin of victory--either with his own vote or by crafting pseudo-compromises that provide cover for a small number of Democratic defectors. Indeed, the Democrats' only real victory of the last five years--stuffing the administration on Social Security--came after Harry Reid cautioned Baucus against freelancing with the White House.

DOJ_NMG_0038428

Well, we'll do Reid one better and suggest he boot Baucus from the Finance Committee altogether. If we miss out on a few deals by not having Max Baucus at the table, that's a risk we're prepared to live with.

Correction: This article originally stated that Senate Minority Leader Harry Reid had "explicitly ordered" Senator Max Baucus not to negotiate with the White House on Social Security. In fact, Reid only cautioned Baucus about cutting his own deal with the White House. We regret the error.

the Editors

Where The Boys Aren't (WSJ)

By Christina Hoff Sommers

The Wall Street Journal, July 3, 2006

Education Sector, a new Washington think tank established this year by the Bill & Melinda Gates and other leading foundations, describes itself as an "honest broker of evidence in key education debates." But its first big study, "The Evidence Suggests Otherwise: Truth About Boys and Girls," is deficient in this virtue.

The report, written by policy analyst Sara Mead, denies that American boys are in trouble academically. "The real story," says Ms. Mead, "is not bad news about boys doing worse; it's good news about girls doing better." So why do so many fret about boys doing poorly? Ms. Mead explains: "The idea that women might actually surpass men in some areas seems hard for many people to swallow." She also hopes that the nation can have a reasonable "conversation" about gender issues "without unfairly undermining the gains girls have made in recent decades."

One looks in vain in Ms. Mead's report for any indication that anyone is undermining girls. She seems to think that concern for boys means shortchanging girls. But it does not -- because education is not a zero sum game.

From the study's title, one might think that it contains evidence that boys are not languishing academically. It doesn't. In fact Ms. Mead concedes that vast numbers of boys are doing poorly. She acknowledges that more boys than girls drop out; that girls have higher aspirations and take more rigorous academic programs. The number of boys diagnosed with disabilities, she says, "has exploded in the past 30 years." She admits that "high school boys' achievement is declining in most subjects." And, yes, she says, it is true that our colleges are now 57% female.

So how does she back up her claim that "in fact, overall academic achievement for boys is higher than it has ever been"? She argues that in "absolute" terms boys are doing better today than they were 20 or 30 years ago. She adds that, in any case, the problem of male underachievement is largely confined to black, Hispanic and low-income white males. Neither claim withstands scrutiny.

The reading scores of 17-year-old boys overall have gone down in the past decade, hitting an all-time low in 2004. Judith Kleinfeld, a professor of psychology at the University of Alaska, has done a thorough analysis of the reading skills of white males from college-educated families. Using Department of Education data, she shows that at the end of high school, 23% of the white sons of college educated parents scored "below basic." For girls from the same background, the figure is 7%. "This means," Ms. Kleinfeld writes, "that one in four boys who have college educated parents cannot read a newspaper with understanding."

Education Sector's study concedes that African-American, Hispanic and low-income white males "are in real trouble." But it attributes their plight to larger social problems that have little to do with gender. Ms. Mead does not seem to have noticed that among these demographics, males are far behind their female counterparts. For example, Ms. Kleinfeld found that 34% of Hispanic males with college-educated parents scored "below basic" -- compared to 19% of Hispanic females.

Today, for every 100 women who earn a bachelor's degree, just 73 men get one. Not to worry, says Ms. Mead. It is actually good news for young men, because more of them are going to college today than did in the '70s and '80s. By this reasoning, we need not worry about the relatively low wages of women compared to men, since in "absolute terms" women are doing better than in the past.

DOJ_NMG_0038429

We are strikingly better at educating young women than young men. Boys need our attention. It is difficult to understand why an organization devoted to improving education should regard the current concern for boys as a threat to girls' progress. Education Sector would be more constructively occupied if it looked for ways to help our boys keep pace with the girls.

Ms. Sommers is the author of "The War Against Boys" (Simon & Schuster, 2000).

What Boy Crisis? (NYT)

By Judith Warner

The New York Times, July 3, 2006

It's been muttered for some time now in feminist academic circles that the "boy crisis" — the near-ubiquitous belief that our nation's boys are being academically neglected and emotionally persecuted by teachers whose training, style and temperament favor girls — is little more than a myth.

Now a major study has confirmed it. According to "The Truth About Boys and Girls," a report from the nonpartisan group Education Sector, most boys aren't just not failing; they're doing better than ever on most measures of academic performance. The only boys who aren't — the boys who skew the scores because they're doing really, really badly — are Hispanic and black boys and those from low-income homes.

"But the predominant issues for them," wrote Sara Mead, who based her conclusions in the study on decades of government statistics, "are race and class, not gender." Mead's conclusions echo those of Prof. Caryl Rivers of Boston University and Prof. Rosalind Chait Barnett of Brandeis.

"White suburban boys," they wrote in The Washington Post earlier this year, "are not dropping out of school, avoiding college or lacking in verbal skills ... among whites, the gender composition of colleges is pretty balanced. ... In Ivy League colleges, men still outnumber women."

Given these facts — which, when you think of it, were always pretty obvious — why is it that the notion that their sons are "in crisis" has persisted among affluent, educated (mostly) white parents and the similarly privileged journalists, experts and politicians who shape their opinions?

Blame anti-girl "backlash." Blame media navel gazing. I think, though, that there's more to it than that.

The notion that boys are in crisis rings true to many middle- and upper- middle-class parents because it feels true to them. And that's because these parents are sick of being told that their preschool sons need occupational therapy because they can't apply stickers with the right fine-motor finesse. These parents are sick of seeing their kindergarten boys referred to reading specialists. They're sick of suggestions that their 9-year-olds have A.D.H.D. if they can't sit still through school days from which recess has been cut, gym has been eliminated and even lunch, sometimes, has been all but eradicated to cram in more hours of test prep.

Many dads recall that when they were in school, they were restless, sometimes turbulent, sometimes aggressive, sometimes disruptive in class. When they channeled their energy into the workplace, they thrived — and they don't want their sons pathologized, or girlified, for the sake of big-size classroom control.

I sympathize with much of this. But what I don't see happening among parents who complain that their boys are being disserved by educators is a calling into question of their own complicity with high-pressure schools that demand way too much of their sons.

Talk of the boy crisis is a diversion. It draws attention from the real reasons so many white suburban parents sense that their sons are in trouble. Those reasons aren't academic; they're behavioral and emotional. Researchers have found in recent years that anxiety, depression and self-medicating through drugs and alcohol are disproportionately on the rise in rich communities, as kids seek escape from excessive pressures to succeed.

This isn't unique to boys. Girls in these communities are showing an increased incidence of eating disorders (female athletes are in particular trouble on that score), and also a disturbing rise in escapist behaviors like binge drinking and cutting. Experts say girls are showing crisis signs for the same reasons as boys: because they're stressed out, overextended and pushed beyond the limits of normal human endurance. But since girls' forms of acting out tend to be self-destructive rather than disruptive and often coexist with excellent academic performance, they often pass under the radar.

DOJ_NMG_0038430

The notion that there's a universal boy crisis is expedient for well-off parents in other ways as well. Talk — about anti-boy discrimination, about boy-only learning styles — is cheap. Doing the things necessary to address the real crisis among black, Latino and rural and poor city boys isn't: it requires money for smaller classes, better-trained teachers and more support. I'm not sure that white suburban taxpayers are eager to pay the price. But I do know that if we can get past gender turf battles, we might be able to address what's really going wrong with our nation's kids.

Judith Warner, the author of "Perfect Madness: Motherhood in the Age of Anxiety" and a contributing columnist for TimesSelect, will be a guest columnist through the end of July.

What 'Energy Security' Really Means (WP)

By Sebastian Mallaby

The Washington Post, July 3, 2006

At their annual gathering each summer, the leaders of the rich world promise to fix some pressing global problem -- and usually fail to deliver. This month's Group of Eight summit in Russia takes statecraft to a whole new level. Global leaders have "energy security" on the agenda. But judging by what they say and do, they don't always understand the subject.

For many American leaders, energy security means producing energy at home and relying less on foreigners. But the United States imports three-fifths of its oil, and the share is heading up. For the foreseeable future, alternative fuel is unlikely to change that.

For China, which isn't part of the G-8 but participates in some of its meetings, energy security means buying stakes in foreign oil fields -- in Sudan, Nigeria, Angola and so on. But this doesn't make China any more secure. If a geopolitical crisis broke out, China's tankers might be blocked on the high seas; owning chunks of Africa's oil wouldn't make much difference. In the absence of a crisis, African investments make little more sense: China can buy oil on the world market.

For Russia, which pushed energy onto the G-8 agenda, energy security has yet a third meaning: restrictions on foreign investment in domestic oil and gas fields. But this is the mirror image of the Chinese mistake. Just as China's security isn't boosted by owning African resources, Russia's security isn't reduced by allowing foreigners to own Russian ones. In a crisis, Russia would control its oil fields by military force. Short of a crisis it can extract taxes and royalties from foreign energy firms just as it can from Russian ones.

So there's no sense in these nationalistic conceptions of energy security. As Daniel Yergin has written recently in Foreign Affairs, real energy security requires setting aside the pipe dream of energy independence and embracing interdependence.

Energy interdependence can actually be good for energy security: Just look at natural gas markets. Right now nearly all the natural gas that Americans consume comes from U.S. and Canadian fields; only 3 percent comes into the country by tanker in the form of liquefied natural gas. This renders the United States highly vulnerable to disruptions on its home continent. If terrorists or a hurricane took out a key pipeline, it would be hard to bring in alternative supplies from outside North America, and prices would spike upward. By buying more liquefied natural gas from a diverse range of foreigners, the United States would reduce its energy independence but enhance its energy security.

For different reasons, the oil market also shows why leaders should embrace interdependence. Because oil is traded globally, a supply disruption anywhere will affect gas prices in the United States; there's no use thinking nationalistically. If there's an explosion in a Chinese oil field that serves Chinese consumers, it will force the Chinese to buy more oil on the world market and so drive up the global price: American motorists will suffer. So China's energy security is not in competition with U.S. energy security, as the resource-scramble model would suggest. China's energy security is part of U.S. energy security.

Equally, there's a lot of breast-beating about the U.S. strategic oil reserve. The idea of vast bunkers full of crude conjures pleasing feelings of national self-sufficiency: The heck with those foreigners, we can take care of ourselves! But this is mostly a delusion. If the United States releases oil from its reserve, the benefit is dissipated around the world since the global oil price is affected. To have a serious impact on that price, the United States needs Europe and the advanced Asian countries to release oil from their stockpiles in a concerted way: Far from being a tool of national self-sufficiency, strategic oil reserves are a classic multilateral instrument. There's an urgent need to bring the big emerging economies into the International Energy Agency, which coordinates the reserves held by the rich countries.

DOJ_NMG_0038431

What about U.S. relations with energy suppliers ; surely here the model of nationalistic competition is relevant? The Arab oil embargo of 1973 demonstrated the danger of a conflict between suppliers and consumers, and Russia's withholding of natural gas from Ukraine last winter shows that embargoes remain possible. But suppliers know that strong-arm tactics are the surest way to accelerate the search for alternative fuels, which is why Russia plays politics with energy more by giving out subsidized supplies than by refusing to sell any. The threat of an embargo by oil states is therefore smaller than the threat of violence by non-states -- rebel attacks in Nigeria's oil delta, an al-Qaeda strike in Saudi Arabia. In this sense the energy security of producers is not in competition with that of consumers. They are interdependent.

If the G-8 summit can spread the word about this interdependence, it will do some good. But the nationalistic conception of energy security is worse than useless. By encouraging a competitive scramble for resources that could spiral into conflict, this sort of security talk only creates insecurity.

Working For A Pittance (NYT)

By Bob Herbert

The New York Times, July 3, 2006

"We can no longer stand by and regularly give ourselves a pay increase while denying a minimum wage increase to the hardworking men and women across this nation."

— Hillary Rodham Clinton, to her fellow senators.

The federal minimum wage, currently $5.15 an hour, was last raised in 1997. Since then, its purchasing power has deteriorated by 20 percent. Analysts at the Economic Policy Institute and the Center on Budget and Policy Priorities jointly crunched the numbers and determined that, after adjusting for inflation, the value of the minimum wage is at its lowest level since 1955.

For those who don't remember, Eisenhower was president in 1955, the Dodgers were still in Brooklyn, and Barack Obama hadn't even been born.

If you're making the minimum wage, you're hurting. If Congress and the president don't raise the minimum wage by Dec. 2, it will have remained unchanged for the longest stretch since it was established in 1938. (The longest period previously was from January 1981 to April 1990 — a span that saw the entire Reagan administration come and go.)

Senate Republicans recently blocked a Democratic bill, sponsored by Senator Edward Kennedy, that would have raised the minimum wage to $7.25 an hour over the next two years. Jared Bernstein, a senior economist at the Economic Policy Institute, noted that while Republicans in Congress are standing like a stone wall against this modest increase in the poverty-level wage, "they are working as hard as they can to repeal the estate tax."

"That," he said, "is just vicious class warfare."

The most important pay increases for most members of Congress are their own, and they are diligent in that regard. Senator Clinton, in a floor speech supporting the minimum-wage hike, said, "During the past nine years, we've raised our own pay by $31,600."

Mrs. Clinton has introduced a bill that, in addition to raising the minimum wage to $7.25, would link Congressional pay raises to hikes in the minimum wage. Under the bill, the minimum wage would be increased automatically by the same percentage as any increase in Congressional pay.

Polls have shown that Americans overwhelmingly favor an increase in the minimum wage. But the low-income workers who would benefit from such an increase are not part of the natural G.O.P. constituency. Thus, the stonewall.

A separate study by the Economic Policy Institute found that in 2005, with the pay of top corporate executives up sharply, and with the minimum wage falling further and further behind inflation, "an average chief executive officer was paid 821 times as much as a minimum wage earner."

That C.E.O., according to the study, "earns more before lunchtime on the very first day of work in the year than a minimum wage worker earns all year."

"The reality," said Senator Clinton, "is that a full time job that pays the minimum wage just doesn't provide enough money to support a family today. We have to acknowledge that fact and do something about it. As a country, we cannot accept that a single mother with two children who works 40 hours a week, 52 weeks a year earns $10,700 a year — let me say this again: $10,700 a year. That is almost $6,000 below the federal poverty line for a family of three."

DOJ_NMG_0038432

During the 1950's and 60's, the minimum wage was roughly 50 percent of the average wage of nonsupervisory workers. It has now fallen to 31 percent — less than a third — of that average.

As the Economic Policy Institute and the Center on Budget pointed out in their study: "Each year that Congress fails to raise the wage floor, its purchasing power erodes. The fact that the minimum wage has remained the same for nearly nine years means that its real value has declined considerably over that period. As inflation has accelerated recently due to higher energy costs, the real value of the minimum wage has fallen faster."

There is no justification — none — for condemning the nation's lowest-paid workers to this continuing slide into ever deeper economic distress. "No one who works for a living should have to live in poverty," said Senator Kennedy.

It's very telling that in the most prosperous nation in the world, that kind of comment actually sounds radical. We have a very long way to go.

A Call To Honor The Sabbath (USAT)

By Henry G. Brinton

USA Today, July 3, 2006

For all the attention paid this past year to public displays of the Ten Commandments, you'd think people would spend as much energy trying to follow them.

When it comes to the Fourth Commandment — "Remember the Sabbath Day" — that's not the case. And pastors like me, far from being role models, are among the worst offenders. After all, we work every Sunday.

INDEX: Read other stories in the series

The problem with ignoring the Sabbath is that it hurts us as individuals, families and communities. Wayne Muller, a therapist, minister and best-selling author, is convinced that modern life has become a violent enterprise.

We make war on our bodies by pushing them beyond their limits, war on our children by failing to give them our time, and war on our communities by failing to be kind and generous and connected to our neighbors. To bring an end to this destruction, we have to establish a healthier balance between work and rest.

Whether religious or not, people know that they need to take a day off in order to maintain their sanity and remain efficient and productive at work. But I'm convinced that downtime is not enough.

We need a formal day of rest. A true Sabbath gives us time to refresh and renew ourselves, regain proper perspective and redirect our lives to what is good and true and worthwhile.

There is something positive and even creative about allowing ourselves to take a break, as is noted in the Bible when it says God finishes the work of creation on the seventh day ... by resting (Genesis 2:2). Resting is an act of creativity.

Unfortunately, our society rewards hard-driving people who are focused on their work seven days a week, and our technology allows us to be constantly connected to the workplace through computers, cellphones and BlackBerrys.

"Modern culture's time values often seem enslaving and oppressive," says Dennis Olson, professor of Old Testament Theology at Princeton Theological Seminary. "Work time seems increasingly to expand and rob us of time with family and friends. Computers and the Internet bombard us with a constant flow of data, messages and information."

And as many Americans are pulling more time at the office, they're spending less time in bed. Average amount of sleep has dropped from nine hours a night in 1910 to seven hours today. The result is that we feel harried and hurried, out of balance, out of sync.

For much of this country's history, blue laws kept businesses closed on Sundays, forcing Americans to focus on church-going, rest and relaxation. Although many people resented these limitations, these laws did have the beneficial effect of creating a day of rest. But in the past century, and particularly since the 1960s, states have relaxed these rules regulating business on Sunday as our consumer-driven culture has gone into overdrive.

DOJ_NMG_0038433

What began as a trickle soon became a raging river: Today, almost every mall, theater and restaurant is operating seven days a week. Even in Europe, where church-going has been in decline for years, Sunday has been — until recently — a day in which most businesses were closed, allowing people to spend time with family members and friends.

Given this history, Sabbath-keeping is going to be a countercultural activity, one requiring commitment and creativity. A day of rest does not have to be a Saturday or a Sunday — impossible for pastors and many others — but it should be at least one day out of seven, and qualitatively different from the other six.

The key is to break away from work patterns, whether that means hobbies, sports or artistic activities. (Sabbath is related to the Hebrew verb meaning "to cease, stop, interrupt.")

"Spend more time with people in a friendly way, with meals (and) extended conversations, but no talk related to work," advises theologian Marva Dawn, author of Keeping the Sabbath Wholly: Ceasing, Resting, Embracing, Feasting.

New York Mets pitcher Pedro Martinez rests by engaging in gardening; for a professional gardener, though, Sabbath-keeping might involve playing baseball.

My own practice on Wednesday, my substitute for Sunday, always includes a long run. My thinking becomes unstructured as I jog along a beautiful wooded trail, the stress melting away and solutions to knotty problems popping into my mind. In this activity, I feel close to God. This is my way of remembering the Sabbath day, and keeping it holy.

There is a communal dimension to rest as well, one that is important for maintaining healthy relationships in our families and communities.

My son, who is trying out for his high school cross-country team, often joins me on my runs. This gives us a chance to talk without time pressures or interruptions, far from the demands of work and school.

At the end of life, we'll remember and cherish these times — these mini-sabbaticals, if you will — far more than those hours toiling away in the office. As the saying goes, no one ever says from his deathbed, "I wish I had spent more time at the office."

Ironically, we can actually be more productive if we take a break from time to time. Dawn is convinced that what we gain is "a greater eagerness to do our work and a better sense of what that work actually is."

We can learn from men and women in the European Union, who work hard but still enjoy an average of five weeks of paid vacation per year. They often remark that they don't "live to work," as we do — instead, they "work to live."

So take a vacation this summer and a Sabbath day throughout the year — whether to honor God, your family or yourself.

Henry G. Brinton is pastor of Fairfax Presbyterian Church in Virginia and author of Balancing Acts.

Protecting All Waters (NYT)

The New York Times, July 3, 2006

Senator James Inhofe, a conservative Republican from Oklahoma, and Senator Lincoln Chaffee, a liberal Republican from Rhode Island, are at opposite ends of the earth on environmental issues. But both found themselves equally mystified by the recent Supreme Court decision on the Clean Water Act. The decision did nothing to clarify which waters were protected under the act and which were not.

Both agreed that only Congress can end the confusion. Both are right. Without Congressional intervention, the certain outcome is endless litigation and a steady decline of the nation's streams and wetlands.

The court issued what amounted to three opinions. Four conservatives led by Justice Antonin Scalia said the law protected only "permanent, standing or continuously flowing" water bodies, a judgment that would have exposed most wetlands and all seasonal streams — nearly 60 percent of the country's waters, by the government's own estimates — to dredging, dumping and development.

A liberal four-justice bloc argued the opposite, that the act protected all the nation's waters — a view that has been endorsed by every regulatory authority except President Bush's Environmental Protection Agency since the act's inception in 1972. The crucial ninth vote was cast by Justice Anthony Kennedy, who said in effect that each case should be judged on whether the water body in question had a "significant nexus" with a navigable waterway.

That saved the country from the blanket destruction of Justice Scalia's reasoning. But it, too, had no solid basis in the act itself and, worse, threatened to open matters up to continuous dispute.

DOJ_NMG_0038434

There is a bill in Congress that would quickly resolve the issue. It is called the Clean Water Authority Restoration Act, and its purpose is to remove any ambiguities in the original law and to reassert, in clear terms, the act's intention to protect all the waters of the United States, large and small, permanent or seasonal, navigable or isolated.

This would also clarify things for the E.P.A. and the Army Corps of Engineers, the regulatory agencies charged with carrying out the law. With the law's scope in doubt, neither agency has known quite how to proceed — some developers received permits to dredge and fill wetlands and small streams, some did not. Congress can make sure that from now on the law is squarely on the side of clean water.

Campaign Finance Bellwether (WP)

The Washington Post, July 3, 2006

AT FIRST GLANCE, the Supreme Court's decision last week striking down Vermont's campaign finance laws may seem like a defeat for proponents of reasonable regulation of election money. The court voided the toughest contribution limits in the country and refused Vermont's invitation to reconsider its long-standing hostility toward legal limits on campaign expenditures. In the long run, however, the decision may prove more silver lining than cloud. The Vermont rules never stood much of a chance; they are so strict as to present genuine problems. The important feature of the case is not its specific result but the way the court -- and its two newest justices -- reached that result. On this point, the decision is promising.

Ever since the Supreme Court handed down its landmark 1976 decision in Buckley v. Valeo , it has treated legal limits on campaign expenditures with the gravest of suspicion and treated limits on contributions to campaigns as presumptively valid as long as they are not too low. Both of these holdings have had detractors ever since. One flank, mostly conservatives, believes that contribution limits, too, are unconstitutional. The other, mostly liberals, wants to give legislatures control of spending limits. The Vermont law tested both prongs of Buckley . It not only contained a spending limit for state offices but also set contribution limits lower than does any other state in the country. The limits of $200 to $400 per election cycle, in constant dollars, amount to about one-twentieth of the $1,000 federal limit the court upheld in Buckley .

It is thus no surprise that the court balked. While the three most liberal justices, in dissent, would have used the case to give legislatures more authority on spending limits, this was never a plausible outcome. Rather, the case posed the danger that the court's new members, Chief Justice John G. Roberts Jr. and Justice Samuel A. Alito Jr., would join with the three justices who take a far more restrictive view of campaign finance under the First Amendment and would radically scale back legislative power to restrict money in politics. Not only did that not happen, but both joined an opinion by Justice Stephen G. Breyer that analyzes the Vermont law in the context of Buckley . In other words, despite an opportunity to declare themselves hostile to campaign finance regulation in general, both signed on -- Justice Alito somewhat equivocally -- to the court's long-standing doctrine that appropriately crafted contribution limits can survive constitutional scrutiny.

This is a far more significant development than the fate of Vermont's statute. It suggests that, notwithstanding the turnover in the court's personnel, a revolution in campaign finance law may not be in the offing.

How To Educate Young Scientists (NYT)

The New York Times, July 3, 2006

The United States could easily fall from its privileged perch in the global economy unless it does something about the horrendous state of science education at both the public school and university levels. That means finding ways to enliven a dry and dispiriting style of science instruction that leads as many as half of the country's aspiring scientists to quit the field before they leave college.

The emerging consensus among educators is that students need early, engaging experiences in the lab — and much more mentoring than most of them receive now — to maintain their interest and inspire them to take up careers in the sciences.

Some universities have already realized the need for better ways of teaching. But this means revising an incentive system that has historically rewarded scientists for making discoveries and publishing academic papers, not for nurturing the next generation of great minds.

The Howard Hughes Medical Institute, the country's largest private supporter of science education, is well ahead of the curve, and has been pushing universities in this direction for several years under the leadership of Thomas Cech, a Nobel laureate. The institute recently announced its latest batch of 20 "million dollar professors," who will use their grant money to explore and expand innovative approaches to teaching science.

DOJ_NMG_0038435

The institute has also awarded grants to 50 universities aimed at providing richer undergraduate science education as well as mentoring and early research experiences with working scientists. Many of the grants will be used partly to advertise the virtues of scientific study not just at universities but also in high schools and middle schools.

These programs send a powerful message at a time when the country needs to be paying attention to remaking science education. Congress, which has been casting for ways to address this problem, would do well to emulate them.

Mr. Ehrlich In The Ring (WP)

The Washington Post, July 3, 2006

THE GOVERNOR of Maryland, Robert L. Ehrlich Jr., has spent four years compiling a so-so record. He has diminished a handful of modest victories and sensible policies by displaying a tin ear for political ethics and a pointlessly petulant style of governance that has compounded the partisan venom in Annapolis. Despite the obvious difficulties of being a Republican facing a legislature dominated by Democrats, he has often managed to be his own worst enemy.

Those qualities, as well as the advantage that Democrats enjoy in the state, may help explain why Mr. Ehrlich, despite generally high approval ratings and a public persona that many voters find likable, paradoxically begins his campaign for reelection so far behind his Democratic rival, Baltimore Mayor Martin O'Malley. Naturally, the governor, who scored a come-from-behind victory four years ago, insists that he relishes the role of underdog -- although with an anticipated campaign war chest of $20 million, he's a very well-financed underdog indeed.

Expect a no-holds-barred campaign. Both candidates know how to hold a grudge. Both seem to think politics is intensely personal, a battle of egos and pride and personal honor. The governor claims not to read the newspaper because the coverage of his administration makes him so mad. For his part, the mayor, hypersensitive to perceived slights and slow to forget them, seems often to struggle with his own temper. What's more, the two don't care for each other and make no effort to disguise it.

So wouldn't it be a pleasant surprise if despite all the bad blood, chin-jutting and macho bluster, Mr. Ehrlich and Mr. O'Malley could focus on the issues that confront the state -- education and crime; good government and sound finances; containing the cost of health care and cleaning up the Chesapeake Bay? Wouldn't it be nice if the campaign looked and sounded like a contest of ideas between two grown-ups, and not a locker-room smack-down. That will be the real test of both candidates -- whether they have the capacity to wage a hard-hitting, substantive, mature campaign that is about Maryland and Marylanders, not just about Bob Ehrlich and Martin O'Malley.

LaRocco Engaging In Hand-to-Hand Combat (RC)

By Kate Ackley

Roll Call, July 3, 2006

Former lobbyist and one-time Rep. Larry LaRocco (D-Idaho), who disembarked from K Street earlier this year to run for lieutenant governor of the Gem State, recently kicked off a “handshake pledge” to show that he’s in touch, literally, with voters.

LaRocco, who during a failed 1982 Congressional race took a job in every county of the district, launched a 25,000 handshakes/25,000 stories campaign in June.

“I’m shaking hands individually with Idahoans throughout the state and listening to what they have to say, their stories, their positions on various issues. I’m trying to get back to old-fashioned campaigning,” LaRocco said. “Part of my theme is, I’m a good listener. I’m not going to do all the talking.”

In order to keep track of just how many hands he actually shakes, LaRocco’s camp has printed out palm cards numbered one through 25,000 to give to would-be voters during the handshake. Repeat customers, he said, don’t get a second card.

As of late last week, LaRocco’s count was up to 2,430 hands after a stop at a barber shop in Boise. “I’m in the car now, so that’s the reason I’m not shaking hands,” he said.

Last week, though, LaRocco shook some familiar hands in Washington, D.C. The candidate’s son, Matthew LaRocco, who recently joined the firm Arnold & Porter, hosted a fundraiser at the shop on June 28.

DOJ_NMG_0038436

"Some of my old buddies are co-hosting," the elder LaRocco said. Those buddies included fellow Reps.-turned-lobbyists Cal Dooley (D-Calif.) and Max Sandlin (D-Texas).

Foreign Agent Files. Clients from afar have been helping K Street firms expand their new-client rosters.

The all-Republican Barbour Griffith & Rogers recently sealed a deal with the National Dialogue Party of Lebanon for a monthly fee of at least $50,000. The work includes "developing, refining and expanding relationships between officials of the National Dialogue Party and US foreign policy-making apparatus in the Executive and Legislative Branches of the US Government," according to a contract filed with the Justice Department's foreign agent registration unit.

Meanwhile, Barbour Griffith's other international clients have helped the upstart firm Herald Group. Herald, whose partners include former White House spokesman Taylor Gross, is working with Barbour Griffith on Taiwan, and the Kurdish Regional Government in Iraq as well as India, which is lobbying for Congressional approval for a civil nuclear program.

"As a number of foreign-policy issues continue to take center stage before Congress and the executive branch, the Herald Group remains increasingly involved in providing strategic communications to foreign governments and organizations," Gross said. "With respect to these specific engagements, we are working with the leadership of Barbour Griffith & Rogers to help provide international clients with coordinated and effective public and government affairs services in Washington."

K Street Moves. Carolyn Doyle, a former aide to Sen. Arlen Specter (R-Pa.), has left her position as senior federal affairs representative at the MWW Group. On July 5, Doyle will start a new gig lobbying for the March of Dimes, a nonprofit group that focuses on health care to prevent birth defects. Doyle's title will be associate director of federal affairs.

• Karen Reidy, most recently with the former MCI, has joined the telecom trade association COMPTEL as its vice president for regulatory affairs. COMPTEL also promoted Jonathan Lee to general counsel and Mary Albert to assistant general counsel.

• Cable giant Comcast Corp. has picked up a new lobbyist. Peter Filon comes to the company as senior director, federal government affairs, from the House Energy and Commerce Committee, where he has served as minority counsel.

• PR power-shop Qorvis Communications has signed Jim McGann as managing director. McGann is a 22-year veteran of AT&T, where he led media efforts in Washington, D.C.

• The U.S. Tuna Foundation has a new president. Anne Forristall comes to the fishy lobby from MGN Inc., where she advised a range of clients on legislative strategy.

• Lisa McGreevey is joining the hedge fund industry's primary trade group, the Managed Funds Association, as executive vice president and chief operating officer. McGreevey formerly worked at the Financial Services Roundtable as executive vice president of external affairs and president of the government affairs council.

• The public policy and law group at Dickstein Shapiro has added Brian Finch as counsel. He previously worked at McKenna Long & Aldridge, where he focused on homeland security matters.

• Benjamin McKay has been promoted to senior vice president of federal government relations at the Property Casualty Insurers Association of America.

• Trading one heavy-hitting Wall Street CEO for another, the Financial Services Roundtable has named Citigroup chief Charles O. Prince to replace newly confirmed Treasury Secretary Henry Paulson as chairman of the group.

Broad Experience For A Tall Job: A Hipper CNBC (WP)

By Howard Kurtz

The Washington Post, July 3, 2006

When Jonathan Wald was fired as executive producer of the "Today" show, he says, "I wanted to stay in the game and get back into the daily battle."

When Josh Howard was forced to resign as executive producer of "60 Minutes II" after the botched story on President Bush and the National Guard, "I frankly wasn't sure, after my last experience, whether I wanted to work in television again."

Both men landed at CNBC, where they are helping to retool programming on a business channel that has struggled in the ratings since the dot-com bust six years ago.

DOJ_NMG_0038437

Wald helped launch the 7 p.m. weeknight show "On the Money," which takes a freewheeling approach to the financial side of pop culture. Howard is preparing the fall launch of a monthly magazine show that sounds suspiciously like "60 Minutes" and producing four documentaries, some of which may run as long as two hours.

The two executives are helping to move CNBC, which fixates on stocks and bonds during the day, toward a broader definition of business coverage. And they're finding it liberating to be freed from having to deliver mass audiences for the broadcast networks.

"We don't have to do a piece on Britney Spears because we need to drag in the 18-to-49-year-olds," Howard says. "It's a huge advantage."

Since its core mission is to cover Wall Street and corporate America, CNBC's fate is tied to public interest in the markets. So executives are trying to dream up new programming that will get more people into the cable tent. "We'd like everybody who has even a passing interest in business and markets and investment," says Mark Hoffman, who took over as CNBC president last year and would face stiff competition if Fox News follows through on plans for a business channel.

Hoffman wanted the evening lineup to reflect the network's core identity. CNBC's prime time has had more than its share of failures, including shows hosted by Dennis Miller and John McEnroe, leaving the channel turning to reruns of Conan O'Brien and "The Apprentice" and looking very much out of gas.

The O'Brien repeats gave way to "On the Money," which boosted viewership by 32 percent but still reached only 141,000 viewers over the past three months. The show, hosted by Dylan Ratigan, has been covering issues involving Hollywood (why is America obsessed with weekend box office grosses?), cyberspace (NBC's alliance with the post-it-yourself video site YouTube), and global business (a piece from Russia on the seizing of a factory that makes tubes for the kind of amplifiers once used by Jimi Hendrix).

"Business news and what people are talking about need not be mutually exclusive," says Wald, now a senior vice president. With segments such as "Ka-Ching" (on who's making big bucks) and running jokes (such as calling Fed Chairman Ben Bernanke "The Bearded One"), "On the Money" brings a fast-paced sensibility to potentially dull subjects.

Unlike "Today," where he was dropped in 2002 after 16 months on the job, "it's great to start something new and not just be the latest one to be handed the keys," Wald says. But even with cable's smaller audiences, he says, "the pressure and the stakes are just as high" as at NBC.

Howard, whose first documentary involves a behind-the-scenes look at a major airline, says the model is CNBC reporter David Faber's examination of Wal-Mart, which won Peabody and DuPont awards and has aired 35 times. "One of the nice things about cable is you get to run the stuff over and over again," Howard says.

The magazine show, a blend of features, profiles and investigative work, will use some NBC reporters and "Dateline" staffers. "The pieces could look very much like '60 Minutes' pieces," says Howard, who is also developing two pilots with lighter themes. "The format works, so why reinvent it?"

Howard, a 14-year veteran of "60 Minutes," took a year off after the debacle over the National Guard story, which led to the departure of two other senior executives and the firing of Dan Rather's producer on the story, Mary Mapes. "It would have been depressing if I really felt my reputation had been ruined by this thing," Howard says.

CNBC's ratings are quite modest -- although understated, because many investors watch from their offices -- but the network remains a gold mine, generating an estimated $250 million a year in profit. That's because advertisers are willing to pony up for viewers whose median household net worth is more than $1.5 million.

After a long ratings slump, daytime business programming was up 41 percent in the last three months, to 217,000 viewers, over the same period last year. But Hoffman sounds nonchalant about the numbers, saying he's less concerned than most television executives.

"We're not a populist network," Hoffman says. "This is a niche network that is focused on a fairly narrow content area that appeals to a high-end audience."Live From Gitmo

When the Supreme Court ruled Thursday that the Bush administration exceeded its authority in arranging military tribunals for terror suspects, ABC's Terry Moran was at the perfect spot: Guantanamo Bay.

DOJ_NMG_0038438

The timing was coincidental -- ABC had been pressing for access to the prison for months -- but the "Nightline" co-anchor did win Pentagon approval to extend his stay by one day after learning that the closely watched case filed by a Gitmo detainee was about to be decided.

Despite the great proximity, Moran had a frustrating week and couldn't get anyone there to comment on the ruling. "It's hard to do anything here because the security situation is so intense -- getting around, getting into the camps, what you can shoot when you're in the camps," he says from the U.S. base in Cuba. In fact, military censors must clear all videotape after ensuring that no detainees can be identified.

While Moran interviewed top officials of the camp, he says the Pentagon refused access to several detainees who had agreed in writing to talk to him. "As I've told our viewers, we can only get one side of the story," he says.Vanity Fair: Is It a Crime?

Henry Porter, Vanity Fair's London editor, had already gotten under Tony Blair's skin with a piece accusing the prime minister of using the fear of terrorism to wage an assault on civil liberties. Blair responded by conducting an e-mail debate with Porter that was published in London's Observer, where the writer has a column.

Two weeks ago a man carrying a placard with a George Orwell quote was arrested and charged with violating a law banning demonstrations within one kilometer of Parliament.

Steven Jago, who faces up to a year in jail, has said that police confiscated a copy of Porter's Vanity Fair piece, which he was carrying, and told him the article was "politically motivated material."

Says Porter, who has written a letter of complaint to the police: "The idea that a piece of journalism could be used as evidence of someone's criminal intent, when it's a mainstream journalism attack on the prime minister, it's a little step toward tyranny. That's astounding. It's frightening, really."Falling Star

"They had done a great deal of research, and her negatives were rising." -- Barbara Walters to the New York Times, explaining the decision to drop Star Jones Reynolds from ABC's "The View." So politicians aren't the only ones who live and die by opinion polls?

EDITORIAL WRAP-UP:

Crisis Postponed At The U.N. (NYT)

The New York Times, July 3, 2006

The United Nations steered clear of a financial shipwreck last week, but it also steered clear of approving urgently needed management reforms. That is a standoff, not a solution. If the less-developed countries blocking those reforms continue to dig in, the United Nations will suffer in diminished public credibility and greater resistance to dues-paying by some of the largest contributor nations, including the United States.

The less-developed countries — led by Cuba, Egypt, Pakistan and South Africa — are reluctant to yield the influence over management and personnel issues that comes with detailed control over U.N. spending. These poorer nations make up a decisive majority of the General Assembly. But most of the U.N.'s budget comes from the developed world, chiefly the United States, Japan and the European Union.

The United Nations cannot move forward unless both groups are satisfied. And if it doesn't move forward, the less-developed countries will suffer the most.

One crucial reform would have given Secretary General Kofi Annan management flexibility on making job assignments. The less-developed majority flatly turned him down. Another reform would sharply pare down the roughly 9,000 directives of various kinds accumulated over the decades — many of them now outdated or redundant. The majority agreed only to a trivial reduction.

Less-developed countries complain that the demanding tone of donors has poisoned the atmosphere for compromise. That is partly true. America's U.N. ambassador, John Bolton, has particularly tried to bludgeon the resisters into submission with dire financial threats.

But these criticisms miss the point. The reforms are not a concession to Washington and other big donors. They are a necessity for all U.N. members. The U.N. cannot function effectively in the 21st century under budget and management rules that were originally devised for a much smaller organization. Successive embarrassments like the oil-for-food scandal should have made that painfully clear.

DOJ_NMG_0038439

Taming The Tamil Tigers (LAT)

The Los Angeles Times, July 3, 2006

SINCE APRIL, SRI LANKA has experienced rising violence between the government and the Tamil Tigers rebel group, effectively gutting a 4-year-old cease-fire. But amid the carnage, leaders of both sides have been making unexpected conciliatory gestures, spurring hope that with the help of international monitors, full-scale war can be avoided.

The decades-old conflict between the Tamil rebels, who control portions of the country and want separate rule, and the Sri Lankan government has claimed more than 60,000 lives. More than 800 people have been killed since the November election of President Mahinda Rajapakse, a hard-liner who rode to victory on the heels of a Tamil boycott and with the support of ardent Sri Lankan nationalist groups.

Cease-fire monitoring by Norway and other countries broke down in early June when the European Union declared the Tigers a terrorist group, causing the Tigers to reject them as biased. Soon afterward, more than 60 people were killed in an explosion on a bus, and on June 26, a suicide bomber killed Sri Lanka's third-highest-ranking general. The Tigers have denied responsibility, and the government has wisely avoided retaliation.

Also in June, the so-called Sea Tigers attempted a large-scale raid on a ship carrying Sri Lankan soldiers. The navy thwarted the attack, but it demonstrated that the rebels' sea capabilities remain fairly strong, making an all-out war a real possibility.

Aiming to avoid that, Rajapakse recently offered to negotiate directly with the Tigers and rein in a paramilitary group run by a former Tiger who now attacks his one-time associates. The Tigers are considering the offer. Both sides also have made overtures to India, a significant move for the Tigers because they are believed responsible for the assassination of Indian Prime Minister Rajiv Gandhi in 1991. A senior Tiger officer expressed "regret" over Gandhi's death, the closest the group has come to admitting guilt.

The Sri Lankan government has requested Indian assistance in monitoring the Palk Strait between India and Sri Lanka to head off further attacks by the Tamil navy, but India hasn't indicated that it will change its largely hands-off policy.

A peaceful Sri Lanka is very much in India's interest; war could bring a stream of refugees and instability to India, particularly in the state of Tamil Nadu. India should start to take a more active role, while the EU must work for a return to the bargaining table. It isn't too late to head off a full-scale war.

DOJ_NMG_0038440

DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE NEWS CLIPS

PREPARED FOR THE OFFICE OF PUBLIC AFFAIRS, US DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE

TO: THE ATTORNEY GENERAL AND SENIOR STAFF

DATE: MONDAY, JULY 3, 2006 7:45 AM EDT

TODAY'S EDITION

Terrorism News:

Congress To Work With Bush On Tribunals (FT) ... 2
Senators Promise Gitmo Statute (WT) ... 3
Lawmakers Seek Action After Ruling On Detainees (NYT) ... 4
Lawmakers Discuss Ruling On Tribunals (USAT) ... 5
Congress Faces Dilemma On Terror Trials (LAT) ... 5
Gitmo. How To Fix It (TIME) ... 7
After Hamdan (WSJ) ... 9
War On Terror Ruling Worries GOP Lawmakers (AP-Y2) ... 10
Former Justice's Influence Felt In 2006 (WP) ... 11
McCain Is Latest To Rip Times (NYPOST) ... 12
A Terror Strike, Choreographed On A Computer (NYT) ... 12
A Somali Taliban? (WSJ) ... 14

Homeland Response:

Bratton To Join Police Chiefs In Pressing Homeland Security For Intelligence (LAT) ... 15
Police Chiefs And Homeland Security Officials To Meet (AP) ... 16
Ramsey Wants More Information Sharing During Terror Threats (WRC-TV) ... 17

War News:

Sunnis Boycott Parliament After Colleague's Kidnapping (NYT) 17
Sunnis Boycott Iraqi Parliament Over Kidnapping Of Legislator (WP) ... 18
Kidnapping In Iraq Leads To Sunni Political Boycott (LAT) ... 19
Former Saddam Associates Top 'most Wanted' List (FT) ... 20
Saddam's Wife, Daughter On Wanted List (AP) ... 21
Details Emerge In Alleged Army Rape, Killings (WP) ... 22
Investigations To Nowhere (NATLREVIEW) ... 24
Political Strategy (NEWREP) ... 25
U.S.-Afghan Foray Reveals Friction On Antirebel Raids (NYT) .. 26
Two British Soldiers Die In Attack In Afghanistan (WP) ... 28
How To Help Afghanistan (WP) ... 28
U.S. Elite Forces Face Shortfall (USAT) ... 29
Iran Again Rejects Deadline On Nuclear Plan (NYT) ... 30
Iran Plans To Cut Gas Imports, Subsidies (WT) ... 31

DOJ:

Supreme Court's New Man In The Middle (CSM) ... 32
Disorder In The Court (TIME) ... 33
Hill GOP To Put Heat On Bush For More Judges (WT) ... 35

Corporate Scandals:

Unclear What Impact DOJ Report May Have (GUAMPDN) ... 36
Gutierrez Praises Report (GUAMPDN) ... 37
"Carl Gutierrez Had Nothing To Do With This" (GUAMPDN) ... 38
Abramoff: Gutierrez Wanted Black Out (GUAMPDN) ... 39
Tenet CEO Tries To Erase Effects Of Scandals (WSJ) ... 41
Austin Banker Near Victory In S&L Suit (AAS) ... 42
BP Traders, Attempting To `Corner' Propane Market, Lost $10 Mln (BLOOM) ... 44
BP Suspends Three Traders Amid Calls To Police Markets (FT)45
Offshore Disturbance Behind Big Wall Street Failure: An Unregulated Bermuda Unit (WSJ) ... 46
SEC Dubious Of German Bond Deal (USAT) ... 49

Criminal Law:

Justice Dept. Subpoenas Jefferson's E-mails (RC) ... 49
Ohio's Rep. Ney Stuck In Wait-and-see Game (USAT) ... 50
Political Scandals Refuse To Go Away In 'Corrupticut' (WP) ... 51
Missouri Court Ruling Limits Names On Sex Offender Registry (SLPD) ... 52
Guiding Kids From Net Danger (DENP) ... 53
Toddler Didn't Meet Amber Alert Criteria (DMN) ... 54

Civil Rights:

Chabad Fight Goes To Court (MH) ... 55
La Tuna Inmates Say Prison Doesn't Follow Procedures (EPTIMES) ... 56
Fallout Felt From Texas Redistricting Ruling (WT) ... 58
The Flag Fetish (WSJ) ... 59
Flagging Rhetoric (WP) ... 60

Antitrust:

Kosher Slaughterhouses Investigated By Feds (APP/AP) ... 60
Merger Machine Keeps Churning Out Deals (WSJ) ... 61
Street Sleuth Countdown Starts For Satellite Giant (WSJ) ... 62
Intelsat To Get Much Bigger, But Not Yet Profitable (WP) ... 63

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

An Exodus Of Agents (TIME) ... 64
Despite New Allegations, Blagojevich Says Misconduct Is Limited (CHIT/AP) ... 65
Watchdog Rips State Hiring (CHIT) ... 66

Governor, It's Mr. Fitzgerald (CHIT) ... 68
Late Mobster's Ex-girlfriend A Key Witness (KCS) ... 68
Suspect Pleads Guilty To Terrorism Hoax (CHIT) ... 69

Immigration:
Immigration Bill: GOP Firmly Against Amnesty (WSJ) ... 69
Winning On Immigration (NATLREVIEW) ... 70
House Of (immigration) Blues (LAT) ... 71
Border Apprehensions Increase In 2006 (WT) ... 72

Congress-Administration:
Bush To Name Virginian To Lead Maritime Agency (WT) ... 72
Push For Government Openness On Right And Left (NYT) ... 74
Growers Reap Benefits Even In Good Years (WP) ... 75
Democrats Seek To Enact Lobby Reforms By Rule (RC) ... 78
President Wanted, MBA Not Required (LAT) ... 79
A New Partnership Binds Old Republican Rivals (NYT) ... 80

Other News:
Emanuel, Dean Still Sparring (RC) ... 82
GOP Claims Edge In House Races (WT) ... 83
In Political Waves, Tide Doesn't Rise To Same Level In Every State (RC) ... 84
On July 4, Where's The Voter Outrage? (RC) ... 85
GOP 'Suburban Agenda' Gains Traction On Hill (RC) ... 86
An About-Face On '527' Groups (WSJ) ... 87
Are Americans Ready For A Mormon President? (LAT) ... 88
Atlantic City Casinos Ordered To Close (AP-Y2) ... 90
Same-Sex Marriage Debate Drives Intense Fundraising Efforts (WP) ... 90
Petitions To FDA Sometimes Delay Generic Drugs (WP) ... 91
Weather Nixes Shuttle Launch - Again (AP) ... 93
Academic Manifesto Takes Root (WT) ... 94
Representatives Relish Being Made A Mockery (WT) ... 96
Glass Houses (RC) ... 97
If They Build It, Will Jesus Come? (WP) ... 98
Lessons Learned (WT) ... 100
We Need Fewer Secrets (WP) ... 100
Doctors, Lawyers, Priests -- And Journalists? (WSJ) ... 101
We Were Wrong About Term Limits (LAT) ... 102
Rank Disloyalty (NEWREP) ... 103
Where The Boys Aren't (WSJ) ... 104
What Boy Crisis? (NYT) ... 105
What 'Energy Security' Really Means (WP) ... 106
Working For A Pittance (NYT) ... 107
A Call To Honor The Sabbath (USAT) ... 108
Protecting All Waters (NYT) ... 109
Campaign Finance Bellwether (WP) ... 110
How To Educate Young Scientists (NYT) ... 110
Mr. Ehrlich In The Ring (WP) ... 110
LaRocco Engaging In Hand-to-Hand Combat (RC) ... 111
Broad Experience For A Tall Job: A Hipper CNBC (WP) ... 112

Editorial Wrap-Up:
Crisis Postponed At The U.N. (NYT) ... 113
Taming The Tamil Tigers (LAT) ... 114

TERRORISM NEWS:

Congress To Work With Bush On Tribunals (FT)

By Edward Alden

Financial Times, July 3, 2006

The US Congress looks set to co-operate with President George W. Bush in devising rules for military commissions to try alleged terrorist detainees. This follows last week's historic Supreme Court decision that struck down the president's claim that he could set the rules on his own authority.

"He's created a real mess that now has to be cleaned up," said Senator Carl Levin, a Michigan Democrat who has been a harsh administration critic, but pledged on Sunday to work with Republicans to establish new procedures.

Senator Arlen Specter, Republican chairman of the Senate judiciary committee, said on CBS News on Sunday that he had scheduled a hearing for next week to begin the effort.

"We ought to work with the administration to try to structure rules that will comport with the Supreme Court decision but still protect national security interests," he said.

The court, in a 5-3 decision, ruled that the commissions established by the administration to try detainees currently held at Guantánamo Bay were illegal, violating both congressional rules for military trials and provisions of the Geneva conventions.

Mr Bush has insisted for more than four years that special rules were needed for terrorist detainees, rejecting the use of established military or civilian courts.

That put him into conflict with military lawyers, human rights groups and allies such as the UK and Australia.

Nine UK detainees at Guantánamo were released after the UK government led by Tony Blair, the prime minister, refused to agree to have them tried before the military commissions, insisting the procedures were illegal.

DOJ_NMG_0038442

The definitive decision by the Supreme Court means that the administration could be forced to release more detainees if it cannot find a legal way to bring them to trial. While the court invited Congress to devise rules for the commissions, the task will not be simple.

The court said that the rules of evidence should be similar to those for military trials, and should meet minimum standards set out under the Geneva conventions. But Mr Specter acknowledged that the US continued to hold many detainees against whom “there is not much evidence”.

Lindsey Graham, a Republican senator and former military lawyer who is an acknowledged expert on detainee issues, said on Fox News Sunday that the court’s ruling on the applicability of the Geneva conventions to al-Qaeda suspects was “breathtaking”.

He insisted that Congress had the power – even though the court ruled the president on his own does not – to limit the applicability of the Geneva conventions to terrorist detainees held by the US, and to devise special rules of evidence for the military commissions.

Senator Dianne Feinstein, a California Democrat, said, however, that the rules for trial must meet “the parameters” of existing military law, which offers detainees far more rights to challenge the evidence against them than the US has so far offered.

Senators Promise Gitmo Statute (WT)

By Eric Pfeiffer

The Washington Times, July 3, 2006

Senators of both parties yesterday said Congress would provide President Bush with legislation to deal with the terror suspects detained at the U.S. Naval Base Guantanamo Bay, Cuba, following a Supreme Court decision that limited the White House's authority in dealing with the detainees.

Some Republicans said they hoped to have legislation in place by September, with influential liberal Democrats saying they expected to give Mr. Bush the necessary tools for handling the issue and not obstruct the bills.

"I would hope Congress would have hearings about what to do in light of this decision," said Sen. Lindsey Graham, South Carolina Republican, during an appearance on "Fox News Sunday." "And that we will sit down together ... in August, write legislation and hopefully vote by September."

"There's nothing more important than the war on terror," Sen. Mitch McConnell, Kentucky Republican, told NBC's "Meet the Press." "I think we will have to act on this very soon, either in July or in September. Certainly, in the next couple of months."

Sen. Jack Reed, Rhode Island Democrat, promised that his party would work with Republicans and the White House on a compromise.

"I believe we will cooperate, and I think cooperation will be required by all parties, including the president," Mr. Reed told Fox. "I think that's something that will come together in a bipartisan basis, I hope, in a deliberate and quick fashion."

Rep. Barney Frank of Massachusetts, one of the most liberal Democrats in Congress, was asked on CNN's "Late Edition" by host John Roberts whether "you believe that Congress needs to give the president the power, the latitude ... to prosecute these prisoners who were being held at Guantanamo Bay?"

"Of course. And, in fact, again, I want to stress, many in Congress have wanted to do that," Mr. Frank said.

Sen. Charles E. Schumer, New York Democrat, expressed many strong differences with Republicans and the White House, but also promised to compromise in finding a solution.

"On giving the president what he needs and giving our country what we need to fight the war on terror, there's going to be agreement," Mr. Schumer said during his appearance on "Meet the Press."

Sen. Arlen Specter, Pennsylvania Republican, told CBS' "Face the Nation" that the Judiciary Committee has already scheduled hearings on the issue, to begin next week.

"I think that we should now have hearings in the Judiciary Committee, which we've scheduled for July 11," Mr. Specter said.

Sen. Carl Levin, Michigan Democrat and Armed Services Committee member, told CBS that his panel will "have hearings in a couple of weeks."

Despite the talk of compromise, there are sharp differences between Democrats and Republicans regarding how far the Supreme Court's decision goes.

"[Thursday's] Supreme Court decision reaffirms the American ideal that all are entitled to the basic guarantees of our justice system," House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi said in a press release issued after the court's decision.

Fellow California Democrat Sen. Dianne Feinstein agreed with Mrs. Pelosi, telling ABC's "This Week," that any decision by Congress should give "detainees the rights that the Constitution provides." Mrs. Feinstein disagreed that offering enemy combatants the same legal protections as Americans would make Democrats appear weak on national security. "This is our strength. It is not our weakness."

DOJ_NMG_0038443

Mrs. Feinstein also said she believes the court's decision applies to the administration's terrorist-surveillance program.

Mr. Schumer seemed to agree, telling NBC that the court's decision may have deeper implications. "We're going to have to not only look at this issue, we're going to have to go back to the other issues, as well," he said, "because this ruling undercuts some of the other things the president has done."

Lawmakers Seek Action After Ruling On Detainees (NYT)

By Robin Toner

The New York Times, July 3, 2006

WASHINGTON, July 2 — Democratic leaders argued on Sunday that the Supreme Court's rebuke of the Bush administration last week underscored the costs of President Bush's "unilateral" approach to the fight against terrorism.

They called for closer consultation with Congress and a broad review of the administration's use of executive power to combat terrorism.

Republican leaders, also making the rounds of the Sunday talk shows, called for a more limited response. They said Congress should pass legislation in a matter of months to comply with the court and give the president explicit authority to put detainees at the military prison in Guantánamo Bay, Cuba, on trial before military commissions.

The Supreme Court ruled Thursday that the military commissions the administration had planned were unauthorized by federal statute and violated international law.

Republican leaders also expressed alarm on Sunday over the court's application of a provision of the Geneva Conventions to the detainees, which they said they would seek to counter legislatively.

Both parties were treading carefully in a political and legislative terrain suddenly reconfigured by the Supreme Court. Most leaders on Sunday pledged bipartisan cooperation, but some fault lines were clear.

Senator Charles E. Schumer, Democrat of New York, said on "Meet the Press" on NBC that "this White House has felt it could just change things unilaterally." Mr. Schumer added, "Had they come to Congress a few years ago on this issue, my guess is they would have gotten most of what they wanted."

But in light of the court ruling, Mr. Schumer called on Attorney General Alberto R. Gonzales to create an independent commission to conduct "a top-to-bottom legal review of all of the administration's ongoing antiterror measures."

Mr. Schumer added, "The administration has not only largely ignored the Congress, but has also badly miscalculated how its efforts would be evaluated by the Supreme Court." Efforts to "marginalize the other two branches of government threaten to undermine, rather than promote, counterterrorism efforts," he said.

Republicans focused much of their fire on the court's ruling that a provision of the Geneva Conventions dealing with the treatment and trials of captured combatants applied to the Guantánamo detainees. Senator Mitch McConnell, the No. 2 Republican in the Senate, called it a "very disturbing aspect" of the decision that meant "that American servicemen potentially could be accused of war crimes."

Mr. McConnell, appearing on "Meet the Press," said Congress must quickly address that issue, along with creating military commissions. "There's nothing more important than the war on terror," he said, "and I think we will have to act on this very soon."

Senator Lindsey Graham, Republican of South Carolina, said on "Fox News Sunday" that he was also deeply troubled by the court's application of the Geneva Conventions.

Mr. Graham said that terrorists should be "humanely treated" but that the question was whether "Al Qaeda members who do not sign up to the Geneva Convention, who show disdain for it, who butcher our troops, be given the protections of a treaty they're not part of." He added, "My opinion — no." Mr. Graham said Congress had the ability to restrict the conventions' application to terrorism, "and I think we should."

Senator Jack Reed of Rhode Island, one of the Democratic Party's point men on national security, suggested that the court ruling was a broad rebuke to the Bush administration's expansive use of executive power in the fight against terrorism. The "most significant aspect of the case," Mr. Reed said, was "the declaration by the court that the president has to seek Congressional authority."

He added, "The president declared that he was operating in his own capacity as commander in chief, and I think the court reined him back, and I think it's appropriate."

Senator John McCain, the Arizona Republican and former prisoner of war, said on "This Week" on ABC that he was confident that "using the guidelines laid down by the Supreme Court, we can make sure that bad guys — and there are bad guys — are not released, and that those who deserve to be released will be."

DOJ_NMG_0038444

Senator Arlen Specter, Republican of Pennsylvania, also called for a measured response. "It can't be handled on a sound bite on Sunday morning," Mr. Specter, the chairman of the Judiciary Committee, said on "Face the Nation" on CBS. "We have to get the details as to what the administration thinks they can do. We've got to look at the Supreme Court decision. And we have to reconcile it. But it has to be Congress because it's our constitutional responsibility."

He added, "It's not up to the president alone."

Lawmakers Discuss Ruling On Tribunals (USAT)

USA Today, July 3, 2006

Republican senators said Sunday that Congress will have to address the Supreme Court finding last week that international law applies to the Bush administration's conduct of the war on terrorism.

Sen. Mitch McConnell of Kentucky, the No. 2 GOP leader in the Senate, said the ruling that embraced part of the Geneva Conventions on the rules of war is “very disturbing” and “Congress is going to want to deal with that.” Sen. John McCain, R-Ariz., said it was “somewhat of a departure” for the court to say the international treaty applies to “stateless terrorists.”

McConnell wants Congress to deal with the Geneva Conventions issue while it addresses another aspect of the court's ruling overturning President Bush's military commissions, which were created to try a limited number of detainees from Guantanamo Bay. The justices said the commissions violate the Uniform Code of Military Justice and the Geneva Conventions, which deal with prisoners of war.

Senior Democrats called for a broader review of whether Bush overstepped his war powers. “We're going to have to go back to other issues as well because this ruling undercuts some of the other things the president has done,” Sen. Charles Schumer of New York said.

McConnell and Schumer spoke on NBC's Meet the Press. McCain was on ABC's This Week.

Vice President Cheney's heart condition remains stable, and there have been no irregular heartbeats to activate an implanted pacemaker, according to doctors after his annual physical Saturday.

Cheney, 65, is scheduled to have a stress test on a treadmill in the fall to determine whether the blood flow to his heart is adequate, said his spokeswoman, Lea Anne McBride.

Cheney has had four heart attacks since 1978. He has had quadruple bypass surgery, two artery-clearing angioplasties and received an implanted cardioverter defibrillator in June 2001.

Congress Faces Dilemma On Terror Trials (LAT)

By Richard B. Schmitt

The Los Angeles Times, July 3, 2006

WASHINGTON — The Supreme Court decision striking down the military tribunal system for trying accused enemy combatants at Guantanamo Bay has apparently presented the Bush administration and its allies in Congress with two choices — both fraught with risk.

They can use the GOP majorities in the House and Senate to put a quick congressional seal of approval on something close to the existing system, but run the risk that it too will be struck down by the high court.

Or they can follow the path suggested by the court and devise a system embracing the procedural and other principles of the U.S. Uniform Code of Military Justice and the Geneva Convention, but risk the possibility that few, if any, of the alleged terrorists will be convicted.

And both choices, as well as attempts to chart a middle course, could set off the kind of protracted, internally divisive debate that the White House and GOP political strategists would not relish with the November elections approaching.

Indeed, Sen. Dianne Feinstein (D-Calif.) issued a warning Sunday: "Republicans will rue the day if they politicize this," she told ABC's "This Week."

Two Republican senators — prospective GOP presidential candidate John McCain of Arizona and Judiciary Committee Chairman Arlen Specter of Pennsylvania — have made clear their desire to dig into the problem.

"We're going to have to dot all the i's and cross all the t's on this legislation to make sure it passes muster," Specter said Friday.

The high court's decision has set up what may be the biggest test so far of the government's ability to reconcile maximum anti-terrorism effort with traditional American standards of legal fairness and decency. And the test has been almost five years in the making.

Since the Sept. 11 terrorist attacks, the Bush administration and its supporters have argued that extreme measures are necessary and justified against a foe that employs extreme tactics and rejects accepted moral standards. Civil libertarians, many

DOJ_NMG_0038445

Democrats and now the Supreme Court have argued that the war on terrorism must be waged in a manner compatible with established legal and ethical principles.

In the case of the alleged terrorists in the U.S. prison at Guantanamo Bay in Cuba, the challenge is to devise a system that will survive later judicial review yet permit successful prosecution.

Many legal experts say that will be hard to do.

"Can you set up a tribunal that will pass what we now know to be the judicial standards the Supreme Court is going to impose? The answer is unequivocally 'yes,' " said retired Rear Adm. John Hutson, a former Navy judge advocate general and the dean of Franklin Pierce Law Center.

"Is the prosecution going to be able to get convictions? I think there is a chance you won't see any," he said.

That's because a trial system capable of withstanding judicial review would probably exclude much of the evidence the government has gathered on battlefields and in prison interrogation rooms.

The military code to which the court pointed as a roadmap is "a good framework for setting up tribunals," McCain said Sunday on "This Week" — and these legal experts agree. The Uniform Code of Military Justice mirrors many of the procedural rules of U.S. civilian courts and the bedrock principles that the court mandated last week, including the right of the defendant to be present during trial and to hear the evidence against him.

Yet experts acknowledge that one result of embracing such a system could be that few, if any, of the Guantanamo detainees whom the government has identified for trial could end up being convicted — or even tried.

The rules created for the Pentagon's military commissions, or tribunals, permit the introduction of secret evidence that defendants are not allowed to see, testimony obtained by coercion, and other material that would not be accepted in traditional legal systems.

Such evidence would probably be excluded under more traditional legal rules.

Moreover, such rules could compel the government to reveal now-secret information or give up prosecutions.

That prospect rankled Rep. Peter T. King (R-N.Y.), chairman of the House Homeland Security Committee.

"We can't be turning over evidence and discovery and giving the benefit of the doubt to terrorists in these cases," he said Sunday on CNN's "Late Edition." "This is different from other wars. This is not like capturing uniformed soldiers in World War II or the Korean War or even Vietnam."

The Bush administration contends that it is important to have trials for detainees accused of war crimes and atrocities.

With the legislative wars over the tribunals just heating up again, however, it is far from clear what path Congress will choose. Some members are believed to be pushing for a narrow fix that some experts said would skirt the intent of the high court and avoid extending broader legal protections to the detainees.

But legal experts said lawmakers and the White House were also under pressure to come up with a legally and morally defensible system to show the world that the U.S. was serious about dispensing justice to people who had been imprisoned for nearly five years at the U.S. base in Cuba.

"It is a watershed event for Congress and the president alike. They really need to decide if they want to bite the bullet and set up a system that is fundamentally fair or if they want to play the game of setting up something that is substandard and waiting another five years for the court to decide its validity," said Diane M. Amann, an international law expert at the UC Davis law school.

"I don't think they are going to have a lot of leeway to depart" from the military code, she said.

The court ruled that the tribunals failed to meet the most basic of standards for fairness under U.S. and international law. Among the flaws: denying prisoners the right to attend their own trials and thus to hear the evidence against them. Under the tribunal rules, attorneys could be present, but they would not always be allowed to convey what they learned to their clients.

Another contentious point was that detainees had no right to appeal convictions to civilian courts. Some justices also said they were concerned that the crime involved in the case before the high court — conspiracy — was not recognized under international law.

Legal experts said some of those problems would be more easily solved than others.

Congress could amend the military code to include the crime of conspiracy. Prosecutors could also use alternative, better-established theories roughly analogous to conspiracy, such as crimes associated with "aiding and abetting" offenses.

However, extending other benchmark rights — such as defendants' right to be present at their trials and to hear the evidence against them — could undercut the prosecution of detainees.

Much evidence accumulated against many detainees is based on intelligence from secret sources around the world. Officials may not want to risk a trial in which a judge might order that information be made available to the defense.

DOJ_NMG_0038446

"The government's biggest problem is that the thing they want most — to protect the sources of their evidence and to avoid disclosing information to the defendants — is the thing that is most important to the Supreme Court," said Ronald W. Meister, a New York lawyer and former Navy judge advocate.

Some lawyers said there was wiggle room for defenders of the status quo.

A central part of the justices' ruling was that the administration, in designing new procedures, was bound by a section in the military code requiring that President Bush use rules for tribunals that were close to those used in criminal courts and courts-martial.

One solution might be to eliminate that section of the law and free up Bush to impose less-demanding procedures. Such a step would probably resonate with some Republicans in Congress who have said the court has given terrorists more due process than they deserve.

But most experts said the move would defy the spirit, if not the letter, of the ruling.

"The signal that the court was giving was that the requirement of a court-martial-type proceeding is embedded both in American law and international law," Amann said. "If Congress wants to depart from that, it is going to have to make a showing of a necessity for doing so."

The court-martial model affords some strong rights for defendants. The rules of evidence are comparable to those in civilian courts. There is also a strong presumption of a public trial. Even the pretrial investigative stage of a court-martial is generally open.

The main point of departure with normal criminal courts is that the military gets to choose the jury.

Although there are procedures for closing trials when national security is involved, "there is a strong right that the accused be present and confront the person who is testifying against him," said Beth Hillman, a former Air Force officer who is a professor at Rutgers University law school in Camden, N.J.

She added that the law was clear that "the only exception for denying the defendant's presence is if he is disruptive."

With military lawyers expressing serious national security concerns about letting defendants hear certain evidence, "I can foresee the government saying, 'We just cannot go there. The court has signaled these people have to be present. We simply cannot allow them to be present,' " Hillman said.

An even bigger problem could be the handling of confessions and statements by defendants and the handling of statements that other detainees have made about defendants — crucial evidence from the government's viewpoint.

The military code forbids the use of statements that are obtained through "coercion" or "unlawful influence."

Lawyers for many detainees have said that the statements their clients gave authorities were the product of abusive techniques and torture, which would make them inadmissible.

"In order to be lawful, they would have to create a process that excluded the only evidence they have against these guys," said Joseph Margulies, a Chicago attorney who is co-counsel for one of the few Guantanamo detainees who have been formally charged. "You might be able to create a process, but there would be no evidence you could present."

Margulies' client is an Ethiopian picked up in Pakistan who, before being sent to Cuba, was interrogated in Morocco and allegedly confessed under torture to being a member of Al Qaeda. Razor blades were allegedly used against the man's genitals. Margulies said such a confession could not be used as part of a legal trial.

Some experts said that if the adoption of such standards meant some detainees were not brought to justice at a formal trial, it would be a small price to pay.

"I think we gain more than we lose by adopting courtsmartial," said Scott L. Silliman, a military law expert at Duke University law school. "If we were to adopt them, we would send a clear statement to the international community that we are still a nation under the rule of law."

Gitmo. How To Fix It (TIME)

By Nathan Thornburgh

Time, July 3, 2006

The Supreme Court's ruling in Hamdan v. Rumsfeld totals 185 pages and can be summarized in two words: Start over. If the Bush Administration wants to try terrorism suspects at Guantánamo Bay in special military tribunals, it can't just declare them legal--it needs to work with the other branches of government to make them so. That in itself was a rebuke to the Administration's claim that it alone can decide how to defend Americans from terrorism. What the court did not say--despite the exultation of civil libertarians and the outrage of advocates of executive power--is that Guantánamo has to be closed. In fact, there are plenty of people who believe it's possible to comply with the court's ruling while protecting American citizens and extracting useful intelligence from detainees. In other words, there are ways to fix Guantánamo.

1. The White House must work with Congress

DOJ_NMG_0038447

The White House finds itself in its current Guantánamo predicament because it didn't play well with the other branches of government--or even play with them at all. Republican Senator Lindsey Graham of South Carolina, a military lawyer (JAG), says he tried as recently as 18 months ago to interest the Administration in an amendment that would give tribunals congressional authorization. "I could not get agreement with the White House," Graham says. "They believed it wasn't necessary."

Now that it's beyond necessary, but legally mandated, the White House will find it has a far less compliant Congress than it would have had immediately after 9/11. Complicating matters further is that Congress is exhibiting its usual election-year pathologies. Democrats, wary of being lumped in with al-Qaeda should they introduce a bill that protects the rights of terrorism suspects, are calling on the White House to make the first move. Republican lawmakers are already divided between those eager to impress security-minded voters back home with a tough new tribunal and others, like Virginia's John Warner, who warn that moving too quickly or too carelessly might lead to another embarrassing showdown with the Supreme Court. It may take months to achieve the harmonic balance between good policy and good campaign agitprop, but any Guantánamo policy that eventually emerges could have greater certainty and legitimacy for having been forged through the chaos of democracy. "The message is that Congress has a role in the war on terror and the courts have a role in the war on terror," says Graham. "When we collaborate, all three branches, we're stronger as a nation."

2. Repatriate the small fish

"The worst of the worst" was the Bush Administration's description of the type of combatant who ends up at Gitmo. But a Seton Hall University study culled from the government's own data found that only 8% of the camp's prisoners were actually fighters for al-Qaeda. More than half were not determined to have committed any hostile act against Americans or their allies. Even Salim Ahmed Hamdan, the detainee at the center of the Supreme Court case, was Osama bin Laden's chauffeur and bodyguard--hardly the criminal mastermind that requires a country to create a maximum security prison. To its credit, the government has been trying to repatriate the less dangerous detainees as well as those who probably should never have been there. "We want to get out of the Guantánamo business if we can," State Department legal adviser John Bellinger III said in a conference call last week, "while continuing to protect ourselves and protect others."

But repatriation is tricky. Many of the detainees' home countries either refuse to take them or haven't guaranteed that they won't be tortured upon their return. Take the case of the Uighurs--five ethnic Muslims from western China--who recently left Gitmo. The State Department didn't want to send the men back to China, where they are wanted by the authorities, but after contacting scores of countries the only willing host was Albania, where no one speaks Uighur.

Regardless of the challenges, the Administration needs to continue to support the State Department's aggressive efforts to make sure that the small fish at Guantánamo move on. The logic that gave rise to the Administration's broad powers of detention, interrogation and surveillance is the logic of the worst-case scenario, of terrorist masterminds and ticking time bombs. It's consistent with that logic that a place like Guantánamo be reserved for only the most dangerous terrorists.

3. Process the habeas cases

More than 400 habeas corpus cases, in which Guantánamo petitioners are challenging the legality of their detention, are percolating around the country. Lawyers who filed some of those petitions tell TIME that they anticipate that the Supreme Court ruling will open a path for those cases to head up the chain of appeals. The Administration argues that the courts have no jurisdiction, and Congress barred judges from ruling on almost all future habeas appeals from Gitmo by passing the Detainee Treatment Act last December.

Terrorism trials in civilian courts have been a mixed bag--the prosecution of the Lackawanna and Portland cells ran smoothly, while al-Qaeda operative Zacarias Moussaoui took a federal court on a wild grandstanding ride worthy of Slobodan Milosevic or Saddam Hussein. The judges who hear the appeals may affirm that civilian courts are the wrong venue for Gitmo detainees, but the debate is too important--and too complex--to cut the judiciary out.

4. Live by the Geneva rules

The Supreme Court made it clear that the Geneva conventions afford Gitmo detainees certain trial rights. Less certain is whether Geneva rights should now extend to cover interrogations at the camp. The White House has held that unlawful combatants are to be treated humanely but are not covered by Geneva, which prohibits "humiliating and degrading treatment." Some techniques, like shackling prisoners for 24 hours and leaving them in their own excrement, are known to have been used at Gitmo and would certainly fall under that definition. Regardless of what the prevailing interpretations of the Hamdan decision are, the government would do well to read the tea leaves and begin envisioning a world in which officials will be forced by a future ruling similar to Hamdan to gather crucial intelligence while conforming to Geneva. Gitmo has always been a laboratory for the Bush Administration's edgiest ideas about how to fight the war on terrorism. Why not make it a testing ground for an interrogation policy that is both humane and clearly legal under the Geneva conventions?

The era of Guantánamo as a fount of intelligence may already be ending, however. There is only so much intel you can glean from a man who has been interrogated for four years. The base commander, Navy Rear Admiral Harry Harris Jr., told

DOJ_NMG_0038448

TIME shortly before the Hamdan decision that 75% of detainees held at Gitmo no longer face regular questioning, and some haven't faced it in six months or longer. So, as with many of the other issues raised by the Hamdan case, perhaps the interrogation debate should move away from Gitmo and focus on other places around the world where the U.S. is holding enemy combatants.

5. Lift the veil of secrecy

Guantánamo has long since ceased being just a detention center for terrorism suspects. It's a symbol, and it shapes how the world views America and how Americans view themselves. While all three branches of government need to work in concert to balance the strategic and legal imperatives involved in fighting terrorism, the White House can take a huge step toward removing the discomfort about Gitmo by opening the operation to the outside world. A few journalists have been granted access to the facility following the coordinated suicides of three inmates last month, but camera crews and reporters are often hemmed in by minders and shepherded past buildings that have been the site of Guantánamo's harsher realities--the force-fed hunger strikers, the suicide attempts. If Guantánamo is legal and effective, now is the time for the government to prove it.

After Hamdan (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, July 3, 2006

America's political elites certainly have come a long way since September 11. In the wake of that bloody attack on U.S. soil, everyone clamored for the executive branch to act with energy and dispatch against our enemies. Yet last week, not five years later, many of those same voices celebrated a Supreme Court ruling that rebuked the executive in order to guarantee more rights to Osama bin Laden's former driver and bodyguard.

That is the larger context in which to read the Supreme Court's verdict in Hamdan v. Rumsfeld, which has liberal journalists waxing lyrical even in their news accounts. Only a country that feels safe once again would dare to rejoice in a ruling that could give enemy combatants the same due process rights that U.S. servicemen get in a court martial. We'll now see if Congress feels as complacent as it seeks to rewrite the rules on military commissions. * * *

As David Rivkin and Lee Casey argued on these pages Friday, the Court's ruling is not as sweeping as many commentators claim. But it is nonetheless a major Court intrusion into executive war powers and thus a setback not just for this Presidency, but, more important, for future ones.

The Court's opinion masks its own power grab by asserting that the executive must defer more to Congress in designing military commissions. But the Court's own deference to Congress is selective in the extreme, as it simply chose to ignore the clear intent of the Detainee Treatment Act that Congress passed only last December. That Act expressly denied judicial review of any habeas corpus petition "by or on behalf of an alien detained by" the Pentagon at Guantanamo.

But this would have meant the Court should not have heard Mr. Hamdan's case. So the Court's narrow five-Justice majority simply declared that the Detainee Act applied only to habeas corpus petitions filed after December 2005. Justice Antonin Scalia's dissent is withering in showing that the Act provides for no such distinction and was written by Congress partly with the Hamdan case in mind. The Court's interpretation also violates its own precedents in reading Congressional intent. The only way to read the Court's logic is that five Justices were simply determined to find a way to slap the Bush Administration, by whatever means necessary.

And we mean only five Justices. Hamdan was decided by a vote of 5-3, with Chief Justice John Roberts recusing himself because he'd previously ruled for the Administration when he was on the D.C. Circuit Court of Appeals. So in effect this was a 5-4 decision, with Justice Anthony Kennedy providing the swing vote, albeit also parting company with his liberal brethren on their most sweeping legal claims. A single liberal retirement from the Court would thus put Hamdan's reasoning in jeopardy.

Amid all of the antiwar cheering, we should also point out what Hamdan does not do. It does not shut down the detention center at Guantanamo Bay, or question the President's right to hold unlawful combatants for the duration of hostilities. It also does not apply to most of the prisoners there -- only 10 of the roughly 450 Guantanamo detainees are immediately affected by the ruling. And it does not reclassify enemy combatants as ordinary prisoners of war, as many in the European left and ACLU would prefer.

Moreover, Hamdan affirms that military commissions are Constitutional and an appropriate part of American law. This would have been hard even for the liberal Justices to deny, given that commissions have been used in some form by strong Presidents in the past, including Washington, Lincoln and FDR.

So instead the Court declared that the Pentagon's current version of military commissions violates Article 36 of the Uniform Code of Military Justice, which provides guidelines for the rules to be followed by both military commissions and courts martial. The language of Article 36 happens to be broad and deferential to Presidential prerogatives. (Its very title is, "President May Prescribe Rules.") Yet the Justices found that the Pentagon's current rules allowed too much hearsay evidence and denied a combatant-defendant's appearance at some moments at trial.

DOJ_NMG_0038449

Justice Kennedy in particular claimed to see no "practical need" for these deviations from the UCMJ. But in fact the very practical reason is to limit the access that accused al Qaeda operatives have to classified sources and methods. This is the core of the Administration's case for military commissions, which is that they are a military necessity.

As for the rules of evidence, the Court's decision could make it much harder to convict these defendants because the Pentagon often won't want to risk exposing military secrets. Thus one irony of Hamdan is that many of these combatants may end up being returned to their home countries where they may get far worse legal treatment. In any case, the Court's intrusion here is a breathtaking assertion that it knows better than an elected President how to treat enemies captured on the battlefield. Legal scholars tell us they can't recall this happening in any previous American conflict. * * *

As a practical political matter, Hamdan tosses the debate over military commissions back to Congress. Our liberal friends keep assuring us that this is the key to restoring the "rule of law." But there's a reason the Founders gave Presidents the bulk of the Constitutional power to wage war, leaving to Congress mainly the power to declare war and then finance it. The executive branch can act with speed and decisiveness that a committee of 535 simply cannot. Presidents can also be held directly accountable by voters in a way that a diffuse Congress (and especially the Supreme Court) cannot.

That's why the clamor after 9/11 was for the White House to act, and that is the period in which it established military commissions and set up Guantanamo. Now that we haven't been hit again in nearly five years, liberals want us to believe that such executive authority is more dangerous than our enemies.

We thus certainly hope the Administration presses its case for military commissions to the Congress, including just how much due process protection the Members think al Qaeda detainees really deserve. An election is coming in which the prosecution of the war on terror will again be a major issue. By all means let's debate the proper care and handling of Osama's bodyguard.

War On Terror Ruling Worries GOP Lawmakers (AP-Y2)

By Pete Yost

AP2, July 2, 2006

Two Republican senators said Sunday that Congress must rein in the Supreme Court ruling that international law applies to the Bush administration's conduct in the war on terror.

Thursday's Supreme Court decision embracing Article 3 of the Geneva Accords in the military commission case of Osama bin Laden's former driver strikes at the heart of the White House's legal position in the war on al-Qaida.

Sen. Mitch McConnell (news, bio, voting record), R-Ky., the second-ranking GOP leader in the Senate, said the 5-3 court decision "means that American servicemen potentially could be accused of war crimes.

"I think Congress is going to want to deal with that," McConnell said on NBC's "Meet the Press." He called the ruling "very disturbing."

The Geneva Convention's Article 3 is "far beyond our domestic law when it comes to terrorism, and Congress can rein it in, and I think we should," said Sen. Lindsay Graham, R-S.C., assigned as a Reserve Judge to the Air Force Court of Criminal Appeals. Graham spoke on "Fox News Sunday."

Sen. John McCain (news, bio, voting record), R-Ariz., also expressed concern about the decision, saying it "is somewhat of a departure, in my view, of people who are stateless terrorists."

Article 3 mandates standards of treatment in cases of armed conflicts not of an international character in the territory of a contracting party, which Afghanistan is.

Article 3 prohibits outrages upon personal dignity, "in particular humiliating and degrading treatment," and bars violence, including murder, mutilation and torture.

McConnell wants Congress to deal with the Geneva Accords issue at the same time it addresses another aspect of the court's ruling overturning President Bush's military commissions created to try a limited number of detainees from Guantanamo Bay.

"I don't think we're going to pass something that's going to have our military servicemen subject to some kind of international rules," said McConnell.

Addressing the commission issue, McCain and Senate Judiciary Committee chairman Arlen Specter, R-Pa., said Congress might pose broader changes than the White House wants in trials of detainees at Guantanamo Bay.

As a starting point for debate, McCain said Congress should embrace the Uniform Code of Military Justice, the bedrock of military law protecting the rights of accused soldiers. The Bush administration has sidestepped the code for nearly five years in dealing with Guantanamo Bay prisoners it has classified as enemy combatants.

Specter said that "we have to reconcile" what the Bush administration thinks it can do and what the Supreme Court decision says.

DOJ_NMG_0038450

Specter spoke on CBS's "Face the Nation" and McCain appeared on ABC's "This Week."

Many Republicans in Congress say detainees in the war on terror should not have the same legal protections as those in the military and that Congress should give its imprimatur with little or no change to the Pentagon's military commissions.

McCain agreed that justice afforded to enemy combatants "shouldn't be exactly the same as applied to a member of the military." He added, however, that the Uniform Code of Military Justice is "a good framework.

"Using the guidelines laid down by the Supreme Court, we can make sure that bad guys — and there are bad guys — are not released and those who deserve to be released will be," said McCain, a prisoner of war during the Vietnam conflict.

McCain and Specter added their voices to that of Senate Armed Services Committee chairman John Warner, R-Va., who says he is uncertain Congress should pass legislation to create new military tribunals.

"Everybody says, 'Pass legislation, pass legislation,' but we've got to make certain it's needed, and then do it with careful analysis, to get it right," Warner told The New York Times on Friday.

The Supreme Court said Bush's military commissions violate the Uniform Code of Military Justice and the four Geneva Conventions signed in 1949. Under military commission rules, the court noted, such panels may block an accused and his civilian lawyer from ever learning of evidence the prosecution presents that is classified. In addition, commissions can permit the admission of any evidence it deems to have probative value to a reasonable person.

Former Justice's Influence Felt In 2006 (WP)

By Charles Lane

The Washington Post, July 3, 2006

Justice John Paul Stevens wrote last week's Supreme Court opinion striking down President Bush's plan to put suspected terrorists on trial before military commissions.

But in a real sense, the opinion's author was Wiley B. Rutledge, the justice for whom Stevens clerked during the court's 1947-1948 term, and for whom he has expressed great admiration in the years since.

Appointed by President Franklin D. Roosevelt in 1943, Rutledge served only six years before his death in 1949. But in that time, he made a mark by arguing that the United States must respect the rights of its foreign enemies.

His most famous dissenting opinion came in 1946, when he wrote that the majority of the court was wrong to deny a petition for habeas corpus by Tomoyuki Yamashita, the Japanese general sentenced to death by a U.S. military commission in the Philippines for atrocities committed by his troops. "I cannot believe in the face of this record that the petitioner has had the fair trial our Constitution and laws command," Rutledge wrote.

So soon after the bitter war that had begun at Pearl Harbor, it took courage for Rutledge to stand up for the rights of a Japanese commander, and he received an avalanche of hate mail, as Diane Marie Amann, a law professor and former Stevens clerk, points out in a recent Fordham Law Review article on the Stevens-Rutledge relationship.

It is hard to imagine anyone less popular in the United States than Yamashita. But the man whose case was before the court last week, Osama bin Laden's former aide, Salim Ahmed Hamdan, might qualify. Nevertheless, Stevens defended not Hamdan, but Hamdan's rights.

His opinion last week cited Rutledge's opinion and quoted from a passage in which Rutledge summarized the unfairness of Yamashita's trial, calling it "outside our basic scheme." Some of the procedures Rutledge criticized were similar to those in Hamdan's military commission trial at Guantanamo Bay, Stevens implied, especially limitations on the defendant's access to all the evidence against him.

Stevens went on to argue that the concerns of Rutledge's dissent were reflected in later changes to U.S. military law, and in the 1949 Geneva Conventions. As a result, Stevens argued, the Supreme Court's decision upholding Yamashita's conviction, "the most notorious exception" to the rule that military trials of U.S. enemies should usually give them the same rights as their American counterparts, "has been stripped of its precedential value." The origins of Stevens's opinion in the post-World War II debate underscore how thoroughly it rejected the Bush administration's military commissions and the political and military concepts upon which they were based.

Administration officials have characterized the conflict with al-Qaeda as a new kind of war in which the United States cannot afford to be constrained by the existing domestic and international legal framework.

But Stevens, 86, who served in World War II as a Naval signals intelligence officer, took the view that nothing about the current situation is so novel as to justify departing from laws that bear traces of Rutledge's Yamashita dissent. The danger posed by international terrorism, Stevens wrote, is not by itself enough to warrant "any variance from the rules that govern courts martial." Therefore, he continued, Bush's denial of Hamdan's "basic" right to see all the evidence against him and to be present at his trial "cannot be lightly excused."

DOJ_NMG_0038451

In this regard, too, Stevens echoed Rutledge, whose dissent in Yamashita's case acknowledged that "we are on strange ground," but added: "If, as may be hoped, we are now to enter upon a new era of law in the world, it becomes more important than ever before for the nations creating that system to observe their greatest traditions of administering justice, including this one, both in their own judging and in their new creation. The proceedings in this case veer so far from some of our time-tested road signs that I cannot take the large strides validating them would demand."Cert Denied

The court granted review in fewer cases this term than in either of the two previous terms, according to official Supreme Court statistics released June 30. The court granted certiorari in 78 cases in the 2005-2006 term, not significantly fewer than the 80 cases it agreed to hear in the 2004-2005 term, but down about 10 percent from 2003-2004, when it agreed to hear 87 cases.

However, since the court often consolidates two or more similar cases in a single argument hour, the best measure of the court's activity is argument hours. By that standard, the drop is greater. The court agreed to hear 70.33 hours of argument in the 2005-2006 term, down 3.17 hours from 2004-2005, and down 5.17 hours from 2003-2004.

Even this term's low number was inflated, because the court extended argument by 2.33 hours in major cases on Texas's redistricting plan, the Clean Water Act, military commissions and the Vienna Convention. If it had stuck to the one-hour schedule for each, the hours would have been 68 -- a drop of 10 percent from 2003. As a result of the court's slowdown in accepting cases, the justices have scheduled 29 hours of argument for the coming term, three fewer than it needed to complete its schedule through December. Last year at this time, the court had 37 hours of argument for the coming term.

McCain Is Latest To Rip Times (NYPOST)

By Deborah Orin

The New York Post, July 3, 2006

Sen. John McCain yesterday joined the chorus of critics who say The New York Times was wrong to out a top-secret terror money-tracking program, and he called for prosecuting the leakers.

"Tracking the money is always a vital tool, and members of Congress were kept informed and agreed to this program," McCain (R-Ariz.) told ABC's "This Week."

"So, no, I don't think [the Times] should have published it."

McCain also challenged the Times' claim that it didn't reveal any real secrets, saying, "If The New York Times thinks the story was inconsequential, the legitimate question is: Why was it on the front page?"

Asked if the Times should be prosecuted, McCain replied, "I think we should go after the leakers first."

Times executive editor Bill Keller acknowledged on CBS that "there didn't seem to be any obvious illegality" about the program.

"I don't think the threshold test is whether they've done something that's blatantly illegal or outrageous. I think you probably would like to know what they're doing that's successful as well," Keller told "Face the Nation."

A Terror Strike, Choreographed On A Computer (NYT)

By Raymond Bonner

The New York Times, July 3, 2006

JAKARTA, Indonesia, July 2 — The bombs should be small and placed in day packs, making them harder to detect. The bombers should dress like tourists. They should not bother targeting hotels because security is too tight. Instead they should consider restaurants, discos and theaters.

A thorough survey should be done in advance by the bombers themselves. That way, they are more familiar with the sites, and no one is left behind to be hunted later by the police.

"There is no escape plan because the perpetrators will become martyrs," the planning document states. "They will go to the targets and not return."

That is part of the playbook for a suicide bombing, including even a minute-by-minute choreography of the bombers' final hours. The Indonesian police uncovered the document from the computer of one of the planners of an attack last October in Bali, which killed 20 people when three men walked into separate restaurants and blew themselves up.

The document offers a rare glimpse into the minds of the most cunning terrorist plotters and of the kind of meticulous planning that lies behind their operations. It also shows what even a small, local group with few resources can do, and the difficulty of thwarting their plans.

"It tells us that these guys tried to think of every contingency," said Sidney Jones, project director of the International Crisis Group's office in Jakarta, and one of the foremost authorities on terrorism in Southeast Asia. "Even when they're being hunted, they had the capacity to think through what had to be done right down to the second."

DOJ_NMG_0038452

The 34-page document, titled "The Bali Project," was found on the computer of Azhari Husin, a Malaysian-born engineer educated in Australia and Britain who became a master bomb maker and was one of the most dangerous terrorists in Southeast Asia until he was killed in a shootout with the police last November.

The document was given to The New York Times by a person who requested anonymity because it had not been officially released. It was first reported on by Tempo, an English-language weekly newsmagazine here.

Mr. Azhari's co-planner was Mohammad Noordin Top, who has narrowly escaped capture several times and remains on the run, one of the most wanted men in Southeast Asia.

The Indonesian police have said they found no evidence of any link to Al Qaeda in the Bali bombings. Members of Jemaah Islamiyah, the fundamentalist Islamic movement here, were involved, but the operation was not directed from the top of that organization, the police have said.

The document, written in six sections, sheds little new light on those links but corrects some initial speculation about the attack — that the bombs were assembled in the Philippines, for instance, and that the attack was aimed at the Indonesian government, or the Balinese economy.

The author, who the police say they believe was Mr. Azhari himself, begins by asking, "Why Bali?" Because it will have a "global impact," he answers. "Bali is known around the world, better than Indonesia itself," the author writes. "An attack in Bali will be covered by the international media."

In Section 2, "Method of Attack," he notes that the plan must differ from the first attack in Bali, in October 2002, when a minivan loaded with explosives was detonated in front of two nightclubs, killing 202 people.

Now, "security is tighter," the author writes, noting that the police chief in Bali had increased the number of intelligence officers to 256 from 70.

The author concludes that it is too risky to bring in a truck or a similarly large amount of explosives and that it would be more difficult to rent a house with a garage to assemble a bomb. "The bomb must be smaller, and brought in ready to use," the document says.

The targets, the author writes, are "foreign tourists from America and its allies," which included all NATO countries, as well as Australia, New Zealand, South Korea, Japan, Thailand and the Philippines.

The author knew that the bombers would have trouble determining the native country of many tourists. "So, we will consider all white people the enemy," the document says.

A few weeks before the attacks, the three men who would carry out the operation were sent to Bali to do a "survey" of possible targets for themselves.

Beforehand, they were told to learn what they could about Bali, a popular tourist island, on the Internet, and to get tourist brochures from travel agents and a tourist map.

The possible targets surveyed included McDonald's, Pizza Hut, Burger King and KFC restaurants, theaters, a golf course, tattoo parlors, art galleries and souvenir stalls.

As part of their surveillance, the men were told to "pay attention to clothes worn by local tourists" and what kind of day packs or shoulder bags they carried and whether they carried more than one.

The men did their reconnaissance, then reported back.

The next section includes a question-and-answer exchange between the men and their "field commander," presumably Mr. Azhari.

The men had concluded that the bombers should not use taxis to reach their targets because a taxi driver might help with the backpacks and be suspicious of their weight.

Rather, they should take a motorcycle taxi, which offers no opportunity for the driver to talk to the passenger. As for how to dress, they decided on black shirts, below the knee shorts or jeans and exercise shoes or sandals.

They decided that discos and nightclubs offered potential targets because most of the patrons were foreigners, and there was "no security to speak of, easy to enter."

But those sites were ultimately rejected, because backpacks would be suspicious at the time of night when the clubs got crowded, after 9 p.m.

That led the men to consider restaurants in Kuta, one of the most popular tourist districts, as well as the seafood restaurants on the beach at Jimbaran. "Of all the places," the document says, "this may be the easiest, God willing."

The team explained how the tables at Jimbaran were arranged in the sand, about a yard apart with three to seven diners at each. "Almost 80 percent of the patrons are white," they said. Others were Chinese or Japanese, they noted, using a derogatory term.

The best time would be around 7:30 p.m., when the restaurants were the most crowded and a backpack would not be suspicious.

DOJ_NMG_0038453

The survey team came up with four options. Mr. Azhari and Mr. Noordin, it is presumed, chose the fourth: one restaurant at Kuta Square and two restaurants at Jimbaran.

Simultaneous attacks in two locations "will have greater effect than simultaneous attacks in one location," the document states.

There was a further reason for choosing the restaurants at Jimbaran: many of the patrons were businessmen. "The death of foreign businessmen will have a greater impact than of young people," the document says.

The backpack bombs were to be assembled by Mr. Azhari at his base in Java, and there was a serious concern about whether they could be taken on a bus to Bali without being detected. At the Bali port of Gilimanuk, where the vehicle ferry lands, passengers are required to get off and their identification cards are checked.

The backpacks with the bombs could be left on the bus — the police did not inspect baggage left on the bus, the team reported.

The team determined that the backpacks should not be mountaineering backpacks, but student day packs, to avoid suspicion. For that reason, Mr. Azhari constructed relatively light bombs weighing 10 to 12 kilograms, or 22 to 26 pounds.

He devised two elaborate detonating systems, which Section 4 of the report explains in detail, including schematic diagrams of the wiring system and drawings of a man with the wired backpack.

The first was "direct" and connected to the explosives in the backpack. The other was on "delay," for explosives in a fanny pack worn by the bombers.

The delay time was 30 seconds; the bomber would flip the switches for that one as he approached the restaurant. That way, if he were stopped by a guard and could not set off the main bomb, the fanny pack would still explode.

Mr. Azhari worried that the bombs might explode during the bus ride from the base to Bali, if the bus hit a bump or the backpack was jostled, or on the motorcycle from the boardinghouse to the targets. For that reason, he decided to use four switches as a precaution.

"It's important to make the bomb systems as simple as possible so the perpetrators don't get confused," the author wrote.

There was a green light, placed on the chest side of the left backpack strap so that it was visible only to the bomber, which would go on when the delay system had been an activated. A red light, similarly hidden on the right strap, would indicate that the main bomb was ready, and the bomber only had to flip the last switches. The order in which the switches were flipped did not matter.

In Section 5, "The Attack," the final movements of the suicide bombers are planned, in some cases to the second.

5:25 p.m. — Pack, check out of the boardinghouse and synchronize watches.

5:30 — Look for a motorcycle taxi to Legian Beach, in Kuta.

6:15 — Arrive near the Hard Rock Cafe and look for a place to pray.

6:35 — End evening prayers. Then the two groups split up.

7:21 — The man who is going to detonate his explosives in Kuta begins moving toward the restaurant, making sure the red and green lights are on.

7:33:04 — Arrive at the restaurant.

7:33:25 — Make sure the delay switches are all ready, and enter restaurant.

Meanwhile, the other two suicide bombers reach Jimbaran Beach at 6:50, loiter at a food stall until 7:30, then synchronize their watches again, and begin walking to the outdoor tables on the beach, one 45 yards behind the other. The first man walked into the table area, and the second did the same. Then, the document concludes its choreography.

7:34 — "ALLAH-U AKBAR!!!"

"We tried to minimize the impact on Muslims," the author explains in the final section, which was written after the attack. "Nevertheless, there were still Muslim victims killed and wounded."

The death toll was a relatively low number compared with the first Bali attack. Five of the 20 killed were foreigners: 4 Australians and a Japanese. Fifteen were Indonesians.

A Somali Taliban? (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, July 3, 2006

Events are going from bad to worse in the Somali capital of Mogadishu. The Islamists now running the country have also seized control in much of southern Somalia, made public their intention to declare Shariah law, and named as their leader a cleric on the U.S. watchlist for suspected links to al Qaeda.

So it goes in the failed state in northern Africa that is beginning to look like Afghanistan under the Taliban. The world can't afford another radical Islamic state that shelters terrorists. And while it would be nice to think that Somalia's neighbors or the United Nations or NATO might do something about all this, the reality is the task will be left to the U.S.

DOJ_NMG_0038454

Somalia has been without a functioning government since dictator Mohammed Siad Barre was overthrown in 1991. Warlords have since fought for political power -- most notably, to Americans, in 1993, the year of "Black Hawk Down." Eighteen American special forces were killed in a failed attempt to capture the warlord Mohammad Farrah Aidid and restore order after failed efforts by U.N. peacekeepers. Since 2004, the U.S. and U.N. have backed a transitional government whose members have bickered and accomplished nothing.

Enter the Somali Supreme Islamic Courts Council, the alliance of 12 Muslim militias that seized Mogadishu on June 5. They range from moderate to extremist, and until recently neither wing had the upper hand. So long as that was the case, U.S. officials say, it was difficult for al Qaeda to operate from Somalia without being caught in the internecine crossfire.

The U.S. says a dozen or so terrorists are hiding in Somalia, including one or two the U.S. believes were responsible for the 1998 bombings of our embassies in Kenya and Tanzania. Half of the terrorists in Somalia have been linked directly to al Qaeda. The ink had scarcely dried on last month's cease-fire agreement between the Islamists and the transitional government when the Council demoted its relatively moderate leader, Sharif Sheikh Ahmed, in favor of a former associate of Osama bin Laden, Sheikh Hassan Dahir Aweys.

One danger is that Islamist militias may next move on the northern half of Somalia. This relatively calm area is divided into semi-autonomous regions called Somaliland and Puntland and home to strategic ports. Ensuring that Somaliland and Puntland remain safe zones -- like Kurdistan in prewar Iraq -- would be a useful goal of U.S. policy, enforced if necessary with U.S. special forces. The U.S. has a joint task force in nearby Djibouti that trains African troops and helps African countries to track down terrorists.

Neighboring Ethiopia is also watching the Islamists' rise, warning against any movement into the border town of Beledweyne or into Baidoa, where the transitional government is based. Ethiopian officials say they've moved troops near the border to guard against an incursion. They also want to discourage cooperation between the Somali Islamists and Ethiopia's own hostile domestic groups.

There's no appetite in the U.S. for a large military intervention in Somalia, but that doesn't mean the new regime should think it is immune from outside attention. So here's a suggestion: Send an emissary to the new Islamist government and propose a deal: Hand over the 1998 embassy bombers, refuse safe harbor to al Qaeda operatives, do not invade Somaliland and Puntland. Agree to that, and we will be able to get along. Don't agree, and the U.S. will do what it must to disrupt any terrorist camps or terrorist activity within its borders.

Al Qaeda interpreted the U.S. retreat from Somalia in 1993 as a sign of weakness that only encouraged further attacks. The Somali Islamists need to understand that if they attempt to turn their country into another refuge for terrorists, it will end as badly for them as it did for the Taliban.

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

Bratton To Join Police Chiefs In Pressing Homeland Security For Intelligence (LAT)

By Richard Winton And Patrick Mcgreevy, Times Staff Writers

The Los Angeles Times, July 1, 2006

Chief will take part in Homeland Security meeting focusing on sharing information.

Los Angeles Police Chief William J. Bratton said Friday that he and other big-city police chiefs will meet this month with top Homeland Security officials amid complaints that the federal agency isn't doing enough to share information with local law enforcement nationwide.

The meeting was planned after big-city police chiefs expressed frustration with what they considered a lack of communication by the federal security agency about possible terror-related intelligence.

Bratton said some chiefs raised concerns about a year ago because there have been "issues from time to time." He did not cite specifics.

This year, Mayor Antonio Villaraigosa publicly complained that federal officials didn't give him an in-depth briefing before President Bush detailed a terrorist threat on the U.S. Bank Tower in downtown Los Angeles.

"This is a critical issue for us," the chief said. "The good news is: We've seen some significant improvements in intelligence provided over the last year."

Federal officials have long hailed what they have described as the seamless relationship between the Department of Homeland Security and local police.

But, in addition to a lack of sharing, some chiefs have said they were concerned about the quality of the federal intelligence.

DOJ_NMG_0038455

Bratton said is it is not so much "they don't share intelligence as they don't have intelligence."

Washington, D.C., Police Chief Charles Ramsey requested the meeting with Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff to address issues of sharing information, said Officer Kenneth Bryson, a Metropolitan Police Department spokesman.

"The chief just wants to make sure information flows accurately," Bryson said.

The meeting was first reported in the Wall Street Journal.

"It's going to be an opportunity for the secretary to sit down with the chiefs of police for major cities and talk about information sharing," said Russ Knocke, Homeland Security Department spokesman.

Chertoff, he said, wants to "listen to the concerns of the police chiefs and personally work to address the concerns."

Knocke said that last year, the federal agency provided more than 1,200 bulletins, notices and other dispatches to local law enforcement agencies.

He said the department was reviewing ways to improve the sharing of information and the quality of analysis in the shared information.

"We are the first to say there is more work to be done," Knocke said. "Information sharing is one of the most important priorities."

Bratton said changes have already been made to bolster communication between federal and local agencies.

Bratton said the 14 chiefs of the nation's largest cities have cellular phones that allow conference calls with one another and federal anti-terrorism experts at a moment's notice.

In addition, he said, more of the money to protect the nation's vital assets is being directed to Los Angeles.

The Los Angeles-Long Beach area recently received $80.6 million for antiterrorism efforts — a 14% increase over last year.

Some of that money will go toward what Bratton sees as part of the longer-term solution to disseminating counterterrorism information.

Bratton said a Joint Regional Intelligence Center is scheduled to open in Norwalk in the next month. It will be staffed by intelligence analysts from the FBI, the Department of Homeland Security, the Los Angeles Police Department, the Sheriff's Department and other agencies.

"The fusion center will become a national model. The best intelligence will be analyzed and shared from across Southern California," he said.

Bratton said he hoped that with better communication, local and federal officials could develop better information about possible terrorist risks.

The chief said any differences between local and federal officials can be ironed out.

"In Los Angeles and California, the LAPD has some of the best relationships in the country with the FBI and Homeland Security," he said.

Police Chiefs And Homeland Security Officials To Meet (AP)

The AP, June 30, 2006

LOS ANGELES - Los Angeles Police Chief William Bratton and other big-city police chiefs will meet later this month with top Homeland Security officials amid complaints that the federal agency doesn't share enough information with local authorities.

The meeting was planned after various police chiefs expressed frustration with a lack of communication by the federal security agency about possible terror-related intelligence.

"This is a critical issue for us," Bratton said. "The good news is: We've seen some significant improvements in intelligence provided over the last year."

Earlier this year, Mayor Antonio Villaraigosa publicly complained that federal officials didn't give him an in-depth briefing before President Bush detailed a terrorist threat on the U.S. Bank Tower in downtown Los Angeles.

Beyond a lack of sharing, some chiefs have said they were concerned about the quality of the federal intelligence.

Bratton said is it is not so much "they don't share intelligence as they don't have intelligence."

Washington, D.C., Police Chief Charles Ramsey requested the meeting with Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff to address issues of sharing information, said Officer Kenneth Bryson, a Metropolitan Police Department spokesman.

"The chief just wants to make sure information flows accurately," Bryson said.

Homeland Security Department spokesman Russ Knocke said that last year the federal agency provided more than 1,200 bulletins, notices and other dispatches to local law enforcement agencies.

He said the department was reviewing ways to improve the sharing of information and the quality of analysis in the shared information.

"We are the first to say there is more work to be done," Knocke said.

DOJ_NMG_0038456

Bratton said changes have been made to improve communication between federal and local agencies. He said the 14 chiefs of the nation's largest cities have cellular phones that allow conference calls with one another and federal anti-terrorism experts.

Ramsey Wants More Information Sharing During Terror Threats (WRC-TV)

WRC-TV Washington, DC, June 30, 2006

Ramsey: Information Flow Not Uniform

WASHINGTON -- D.C. Police Chief Charles Ramsey and other big city chiefs said Friday that they are not getting what they need from the Department of Homeland Security. The chiefs were complaining about a lack of information sharing during terror threats.

"We get a lot of information in. Nothing has changed in, I mean nothing has changed as far as threats and all that sort of thing. Fortunately nothing has happened -- but all it takes is one time, and then you've got yourself a big problem," Ramsey said.

Ramsey, in an interview with News4, confirmed a Wall Street Journal report Friday that Ramsey and other big city chiefs feel left out of the homeland security intelligence effort.

Ramsey confirmed the journal's report that he had written Homeland Secretary Michael Chertoff.

"I did send a letter to the secretary and he has agreed to meet sometime in July along with out key staff people, and I'll have some of the police chiefs who are also concerned. Then we'll sit down and talk about it," Ramsey said.

Ramsey said the information flow from federal officials is not uniform.

"It's kind of uneven. Sometimes it comes very quickly, sometimes it doesn't. Again, nothing major has happened, but these are kinds of issues that have to be worked out. If we sit down and work through them, it could lead to something far more serious," Ramsey said.

Ramsey's criticism comes within weeks of the city's complaint before congress that D.C. and New York were downgraded as potential terrorism targets. He said big city police need to be in step with federal security.

"I think it's time that we sit down and really explain clearly what our needs our, and then Homeland Security can sit down and really decide what it is they can provide. And if there's a gap -- how we can fix those gaps," Ramsey said.

Homeland Security told News4 Friday that it takes the concerns of the chiefs seriously and is trying to improve information sharing.

WAR NEWS:

Sunnis Boycott Parliament After Colleague's Kidnapping (NYT)

By Kirk Semple

The New York Times, July 3, 2006

BAGHDAD, Iraq, July 2 — The main Sunni Arab political bloc began a boycott of Parliament on Sunday to protest the kidnapping of a Sunni legislator and threatened to withdraw its members from the prime minister's cabinet unless the lawmaker was freed within the next 48 hours.

The walkout was the first serious disruption in Iraq's new government and reflected the fragility of the power-sharing arrangement in the face of the relentless sectarian violence overwhelming the nation.

The legislator, Tayseer Najah al-Mashhadani, and eight of her guards were kidnapped by people suspected of being Shiite militiamen on Saturday while driving into Baghdad from her home north of the capital. Ms. Mashhadani's party, the Iraqi Islamic Party, belongs to the Iraqi Consensus Front, the umbrella Sunni bloc that holds 44 of the Parliament's 275 seats and has often criticized the Shiite-led government security forces.

In a similar attack on Sunday, officials said, gunmen ambushed a convoy carrying a Shiite legislator as it drove through a region south of Baghdad where the Sunni-led insurgency has fought regularly with government forces. The legislator, Laqa al-Yaseen, escaped unharmed, though eight of her guards were abducted and two were wounded in a shootout, said Shatha al-Musawi, another Shiite member of Parliament.

No one has claimed responsibility for either attack.

The Sunni bloc said it would continue the boycott until Ms. Mashhadani was released. Sunni politicians have occasionally used walkouts as a form of political protest, most notably during negotiations over the constitution last year, and during a wave of attacks on Sunni mosques after the bombing of a prominent Shiite shrine in February.

Representatives of Shiite and Kurdish political factions, perhaps in an effort to avert a crisis, expressed guarded support on Sunday for the Sunni bloc's concerns over security and its demand that Ms. Mashhadani be released.

DOJ_NMG_0038457

Mahdi al-Hafidh, a Shiite legislator, said in a speech to Parliament that he "heartily" backed the Sunni bloc's condemnation of the kidnapping, but he suggested that a walkout was not the best solution to the problem. "When I talk to the brothers in the Iraqi Consensus Front and they want to pull out, against whom are you doing that?" Mr. Hafidh asked. "We have to work together."

Also on Sunday, the national security adviser issued the country's first most wanted list, which included 41 criminal suspects and was topped by Izzat Ibrahim al-Douri, a deputy of Saddam Hussein and one of the Iraqis whose faces were printed on a deck of cards issued by the American military three years ago. Mr. Douri is the highest ranking former Iraqi official still believed to be on the run.

The list included Mr. Hussein's eldest daughter, Raghad, who lives in Jordan, where she was granted asylum; Mr. Hussein's first wife, Sajida Khairalla Tulfa; other senior members of Mr. Hussein's now-outlawed Baath Party; and militants linked to Al Qaeda.

"These are the culprits of most of the explosions and random killings intended to cause harm to the Iraqi people and spark sectarian war between Sunnis and Shiites," Mowaffak al-Rubaie, the national security adviser, said at a news conference. "You will see that they belong to all sects in Iraq, all ethnic minorities."

Mr. Douri became the country's most-wanted man after the death of Abu Musab al-Zarqawi, the former leader of the insurgent group Al Qaeda in Mesopotamia who was killed in an American airstrike last month. Mr. Zarqawi's replacement, Abu Ayyub al-Masri, known sometimes as Sheik Abu Hamza al-Muhajer, also appeared on the list.

Iraqi and American authorities announced on Sunday that Mr. Zarqawi's body had been buried in a secret grave after the American military handed it over to the Iraqi government. An American military spokesman said via an e-mail message that the remains had been buried "in accordance with Muslim customs and traditions."

Among the acts of violence that rattled the country on Sunday, a bomb exploded just before sundown at the main market in Mahmudiya, a violent, predominantly Sunni town south of Baghdad, killing at least 5 people and wounding at least 22, the police there reported.

The blast occurred came a day after a suicide car bomb tore through a bustling street market in a Shiite slum in Baghdad, killing at least 62 people and wounding nearly 120, in the deadliest insurgent assault since the new Shiite-led government was installed in May.

In the northern oil town of Kirkuk, a bomb planted in a road exploded near an American military patrol on Sunday, wounding three American soldiers, said Capt. Mahmoud Abdullah of the Iraqi Police.

Sunnis Boycott Iraqi Parliament Over Kidnapping Of Legislator (WP)

By Joshua Partlow

The Washington Post, July 3, 2006

BAGHDAD, July 2 -- The largest Sunni Arab bloc in the Iraqi parliament said on Sunday it would boycott the fledgling legislature to protest the kidnapping of a colleague, at a time when the prime minister is pushing a reconciliation plan aimed at bringing religious sects together and lessening the daily violence.

The decision by the Sunni Accord Front, which holds 44 seats in the 275-member parliament, threatens to pull the legislature apart. The announcement came a day after legislator Tayseer Mashhadani and seven of her bodyguards were abducted in broad daylight on a busy street in a predominantly Shiite Muslim neighborhood of Baghdad. One of the leaders of the Accord Front, Adnan Dulaimi, said the Sunni parliament members would not participate in the legislature until Mashhadani was released.

"This is outrageous and should be remedied by the government with the participation of American forces," said Dulaimi. "That she and her bodyguards would be kidnapped by criminal gangs is something that should shake Iraq."

Sunni legislators blamed the abduction on Shiite-led militias aligned with the majority political parties in Iraq. Some accused the Iraqi security forces, who were near the kidnapping site in the Shaab neighborhood, of standing by and allowing Mashhadani's convoy to be captured.

"The militias kidnapped Mashhadani, definitely," said Alaa Makky, a senior leader of the Iraqi Islamic Party. "Also, there were certain official checkpoints near this place. It raises many questions."

The decision to boycott parliament came on a day when Iraq's national security adviser issued a "most wanted" list of 41 insurgents including the wife and daughter of former president Saddam Hussein, along with many members of his Baath Party government. Mowaffak al-Rubaie said it took the Iraqi security forces nine months to compile the list, and he said they had "serious evidence on every single one of the people."

"They have killed our innocent people in their attempt to bring back Iraq to the era of dictatorship and sectarianism," he said.

DOJ_NMG_0038458

Rubaie offered rewards of up to $10 million for information leading to the capture of those listed. The largest bounty was for Hussein's former deputy, Izzat Ibrahim al-Douri.

At numbers 16 and 17 on the list were Hussein's eldest daughter, Raghad Saddam Hussein, and his first wife, Sajida Khairallah Telfah, who are accused of funding insurgents. Hussein's daughter lives in Jordan, and Rubaie demanded that all neighboring countries harboring those on the list to turn them over to Iraqi authorities. But Jordanian Prime Minister Marouf al-Bakhit told the country's official news agency on Sunday that Hussein's daughter was under the protection of the royal family as an asylum seeker.

Rubaie also announced that insurgent leader Abu Musab al-Zarqawi, killed in a U.S. airstrike last month, had been buried in a secret location in Baghdad, the Associated Press reported. U.S. military officials said they had turned over the remains of Zarqawi and Sheikh Abd al-Rahman, also killed in the attack, to the Iraqi government and declined to comment further.

The Bush administration said on Sunday that it had verified that the online audio message urging insurgents to keep fighting indeed came from al-Qaeda leader Osama bin Laden. In the message, bin Laden expresses support for Abu Ayyub al-Masri, the successor to Zarqawi as leader of the group al-Qaeda in Iraq, and tells insurgents not to participate in negotiations with the government.

Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki last month called for Sunni Arab insurgent groups to lay down their arms and asked them to return to the political fold. On Saturday, a truck bomb killed at least 66 people in a busy market in the heart of a Shiite neighborhood in Baghdad, the deadliest attack since the government took power in May.

"The major factions have refused this initiative and are not interested in it," said Hussein Falluji, a Sunni lawmaker. "This reconciliation plan is only in the prime minister's mind. It was born dead."

The violence continued on Sunday. A mortar attack hit the Muhammad Bakir al-Hakeem Hospital in the Shula neighborhood of northern Baghdad, killing eight people and wounding 16 others, said Col. Sami Hassan of the Interior Ministry.

Also, Iraqi patrols discovered 11 unidentified corpses floating in the Euphrates River between Hilla and Ramadi in western Iraq. The bodies, of men believed to be in their 20s and 30s, showed signs of torture and had gunshot wounds to the heads, Hassan said.

A car bomb targeting police exploded in the central Baghdad district of Karrada, killing two policemen and one civilian and wounding eight other people. Another car bomb near a Baghdad bus station killed three more people, police said.

A Shiite lawmaker survived an assassination attempt in the Mahmudiyah area south of Baghdad. The motorcade of parliament member Liqa al-Yaseen was attacked by gunmen, who abducted eight of her bodyguards, but she managed to escape, said Maj. Gen. Salim Khaiyon of the Interior Ministry.

Kidnapping In Iraq Leads To Sunni Political Boycott (LAT)

By Louise Roug

The Los Angeles Times, July 3, 2006

BAGHDAD — Following the abduction a day earlier of a female legislator, the largest Sunni Arab coalition announced a political boycott Sunday, as another lawmaker dodged a kidnapping attempt and a third politician survived an assassination try.

Shiite Muslim lawmaker Liqa Yaseen and her driver managed to escape kidnappers who tried to abduct her south of Baghdad, though eight of her bodyguards were taken captive, authorities said.

In the capital, Iyad Jamaluddin, a legislator from the secular Iraqiya slate, was driving to parliament when a car bomb hit his convoy. Jamaluddin escaped unharmed, but some of his bodyguards were injured in the blast, he told Al Arabiya satellite channel.

The boycott and the apparent targeting of both Sunni and Shiite politicians come at a sensitive time for Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri Maliki, whose government has sought to end sectarian bloodshed through increased security measures in Baghdad and diplomacy around the region.

However, ubiquitous checkpoints and additional security forces on the streets of the capital have failed to prevent assassinations and kidnappings that are nearly everyday occurrences in and around Baghdad. Maliki, a Shiite, was criticized for beginning a tour of the Mideast to shore up support among Sunni Arabs on Saturday — the same day a car bombing killed at least 77 people in a poor Shiite neighborhood in Baghdad.

On Saturday, kidnappers abducted Sunni lawmaker Taiseer Mashhadani and several bodyguards at a checkpoint in a Shiite neighborhood of Baghdad.

"We have decided, after careful consideration, to suspend participation" in parliamentary sessions "until her release," said Adnan Dulaimi, head of the Iraqi Accordance Front, the largest Sunni Arab bloc. Dulaimi charged that the Iraqi government and U.S. troops were allowing criminal gangs to freely roam the streets of Baghdad "as if they are the government itself," adding that Mashhadani and her bodyguards were abducted in an area rife with police.

DOJ_NMG_0038459

"We demand that the government and the American forces spare no efforts to find her," he said. "She is a woman. We have the responsibility to protect her."

The Muslim Scholars Assn., another influential Sunni group, meanwhile, condemned a group of American soldiers accused of raping an Iraqi woman and then killing her, along with her mother, father and younger sister. "The rape, mutilation and killing committed by the occupation forces are crimes that shame humanity and disgrace the … American forces," the group said in a statement.

The U.S. military recently began an investigation after two American soldiers came forward with information about the deaths March 12 in Mahmoudiya, a village about 20 miles south of Baghdad. A U.S. military official said investigators believed that the assault was premeditated and that soldiers watched the family for a week before committing the crimes, which are punishable by death.

Muayed Fadil, mayor of the area around Mahmoudiya, on Sunday said a medical examination of the victims showed that bullets had crushed the head of the father, Kasim Hamza Rasheed. His wife, Fakhriya Taha Muhsen, had been shot several times, as had Hadel Kasim, the younger daughter. Abeer Kasim Hamza, the older daughter, had been shot in the head and had burn marks on her body, according to medical records, Fadil said. Military investigators are trying to determine whether the attackers tried to burn the body to conceal the crime.

Iraqi doctors had examined the bodies in March so they could issue death certificates in accordance with Iraqi law.

Mahmoudiya is in an insurgent stronghold known as the "Triangle of Death." Last month, two U.S. Army soldiers were abducted, tortured and killed nearby. The four soldiers under investigation were from the same unit: the 502nd Infantry Regiment, which is attached to the 4th Infantry Division.

On Sunday night, eight Iraqis were killed and 22 others injured in the village when a car bomb exploded in a market. Shortly after, the market was shelled with mortar rounds, authorities said.

Three other bombs killed four people and injured 18 in separate attacks in Baghdad. In several neighborhoods, rebels clashed with soldiers and police, authorities said.

In the mixed Jihad neighborhood in western Baghdad, gunmen fought into the night in the streets near a Sunni mosque. In the last few weeks, problems have brewed in the area, which is also home to a Shiite mosque. One resident said the violence began with sectarian killings and abductions.

Police entered the Noor Sunni mosque at 1:30 a.m. Sunday, and people inside fought back, destroying several police vehicles with rocket-propelled grenades, according to authorities. A suicide bomber, apparently sent to blow himself up among the officers, failed to detonate explosives strapped to his waist. However, he managed to detonate a hand grenade, injuring himself and eight officers, police said. The bomber and his victims were brought to the same hospital, Iraqi officials said.

Near the northern city of Kirkuk, a suicide car bomber attacked police on the highway to Tikrit, killing one officer and injuring two, authorities said.

In a news conference in Baghdad, meanwhile, Iraqi national security advisor Mowaffak Rubaie released a list of the 40 most-wanted people in Iraq, including Saddam Hussein's wife Sajida Khairallah Telfah, believed to be living in Qatar, and his eldest daughter, Raghad, believed to be living in Jordan. Izzat Ibrahim, a high-ranking officer during Hussein's reign, was at the top of the list.

Rubaie also told the Associated Press that Al Qaeda in Iraq leader Abu Musab Zarqawi had been buried in a secret grave in Baghdad. He was killed last month by an American airstrike.

Former Saddam Associates Top 'most Wanted' List (FT)

By Steve Negus

Financial Times, July 3, 2006

The Iraqi government on Sunday published a "most wanted" list topped by family and former associates of deposed president Saddam Hussein who reportedly finance and direct the insurgency.

The list – planned in parallel with the government's national reconciliation plan – suggests that the government considers a reconstructed Ba'ath party to be its most dangerous foe.

"We are releasing this list so that our people can know their enemies," national security adviser Muwaffak al-Rubaie said, announcing a list that included Mr Hussein's wife Sajida Tulfah Khairallah, believed to be in Qatar, and daughter Raghad, believed to be in Jordan.

The list declared Raghad "a significant financial supporter of insurgents in Iraq, while Mrs Khairallah had "access to substantial financial assets stolen by Saddam" and was "a major source of guidance, logistical support, and funding for the insurgent leadership".

DOJ_NMG_0038460

However, at the head of the list was former vice-president Izzat Ibrahim al-Duri, the highest-ranking former regime member still thought to be at large, for whom the Iraqis offered a $10m reward. Number two and three on the list are Muhammad Yunis al-Ahmad al-Moali – said to be organising the New Ba'ath party – and Tahir Jalal Habbush al-Tikriti, former director of the intelligence services, who was said to be financing the party. A $1m reward has been offered for them and four other former regime officials.

Islamist radicals were listed substantially further down: Abu Abdullah al-Shafi and Mullah Halgurd Ahmadi of the al-Qaeda-linked Ansar al-Sunna, number 14 and 15, while the alleged new leader of al-Qaeda in Iraq, Abu Ayub al-Masri, is at number 30.

Each attracts a $50,000 bounty.

"Those people are responsible for most of the bombings and indiscriminate killings aimed at hurting the Iraqi people and starting a sectarian war between Sunnis and Shia," Mr Rubaie said, calling on neighbouring countries to co-operate in tracking them down.

Mr Rubaie announced the list on the second day of a regional trip by prime minister Nuri al-Maliki which took him to Saudi Arabia over the weekend and is also scheduled to see him visit the United Arab Emirates and Kuwait, but there is no indication that obtaining co-operation in tracking the fugitives has been on the Iraqi leader's agenda. Rather, Mr Maliki is reported to be seeking Gulf support in winning over the confidence of Sunni leaders to his reconciliation plan aimed at isolating the more radical insurgent groups from the Sunni population.

Reconciliation efforts, however, were overshadowed by violence at the weekend.

Mortar and gunfire were reported in a Sunni district in Baghdad on Sunday night, a day after a car bomb in the Shia area of Sadr city killed more than 60 people in the bloodiest attack in three months. Police said 10-15 mortar rounds hit Adhamiya, a Sunni neighbourhood in western Baghdad that has seen considerable insurgency activity.

Meanwhile, the largest Sunni political coalition – the Iraqi Accordance Front – on Sunday declared a boycott of parliament to protest at the abduction of one of their colleagues, female lawmaker Taysir al-Mashhadani.

Saddam's Wife, Daughter On Wanted List (AP)

By Bushra Juhi

AP, July 2, 2006

Saddam Hussein's wife and eldest daughter are among 41 people on the Iraqi government's most wanted list, along with the new leader of al-Qaida in Iraq, a top official announced Sunday.

National security adviser Mouwafak al-Rubaie also said the former al-Qaida boss, Abu Musab al-Zarqawi, had been buried secretly in Baghdad despite his family's demand that the body be returned to Jordan. Al-Zarqawi died June 7 from a U.S. airstrike northeast of Baghdad.

Al-Rubaie told reporters the government was releasing the most wanted list "so that our people can know their enemies."

Saddam's wife, Sajida Khairallah Tulfah, was No. 17, just behind the ousted leader's eldest daughter, Raghad. Sajida is believed to be in Qatar, and Raghad lives in Jordan, where she was given refuge by King Abdullah II.

"We have contacted all the neighboring countries and they know what we want. Some of these countries are cooperating with us," al-Rubaie said. "We will chase them inside and outside Iraq. We will chase them one after the other."

Iraqi officials have long alleged that Saddam's relatives who fled the country have been financing insurgent groups linked to the former ruling Baath party. Raghad has played a leading role in organizing her father's legal defense against charges stemming from his 23-year rule.

Jordanian Prime Minister Marouf Al-Bakhit said Sunday Raghad was not engaging in any political or media activities in Jordan.

"Raghad Saddam Hussein and her children are in Jordan for purely humanitarian reasons, hosted and protected by the Hashemite (Jordanian Royal Family) as foreigners," al-Bakhit said in remarks carried by Jordan's official Petra news agency.

Al-Bakhit said Jordan had not received any official request from Iraq with regard to Raghad's wanted status.

The No. 1 spot on the list went to Izzat Ibrahim al-Douri, formerly Saddam's top lieutenant and the highest-ranking regime figure to elude capture. The U.S. has offered $10 million for al-Douri, who is alleged to be among the key organizers of the insurgency.

Although U.S. and Iraqi officials often draw attention to religious extremists in the insurgency, such as the members of al-Qaida in Iraq, most of those on the list had close links to Saddam's regime. They include Baath party leaders, intelligence officials and Republican Guard officers.

No. 30 on the list is Abu Ayyub al-Masri, also known as Abu Hamza al-Muhajer, who was endorsed by Osama bin Laden as leader of al-Qaida's operations in Iraq in an audiotape posted Saturday on the Internet.

DOJ_NMG_0038461

The government offered a $50,000 reward for al-Masri. Last week, the U.S. administration approved a reward up to $5 million for al-Masri, who is believed to be Egyptian.

"Those people are carrying out bombings and random killings as they aim to inflict damage on the Iraqi people and ignite a sectarian war between Shiites and Sunnis," al-Rubaie said.

Al-Zarqawi was blamed for many of Iraq's worst terror bombings before he was killed.

Confirming his burial, the U.S. military said only that he had been interred "in accordance with Muslim customs and traditions." It gave no more details, saying the issue was in the hands of the Iraqi government.

Al-Rubaie told The Associated Press that al-Zarqawi's body was in a secret grave in the capital but would give no other information.

In neighboring Jordan, al-Zarqawi's older brother demanded the body be sent to his homeland and accused President Bush's administration of lying about the burial.

"Bush took his body to the United States," Sayel al-Khalayleh told AP from his home in Zarqa. "Even if he is buried in Iraq, we will continue to ask for the body to be transferred and buried in Jordan. He should be buried in his own country."

Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki, a member of Iraq's Shiite majority, was touring neighboring countries to bolster support for his new government and assure Sunni Arab leaders of his commitment to reconciliation among Shiites, Sunnis and Kurds. He met Saturday night with Saudi King Abdullah and Crown Prince Sultan, who expressed their support for his government, according to the official Saudi news agency.

Iraq's Arab neighbors fear sectarian tensions could spill over into their countries, which are dominated by Sunnis but have Shiite communities.

The Iraqi leader told the independent Kuwaiti newspaper Al-Qabas that if his government falters in the battle against terrorism, "there will be no Iraq left."

Al-Maliki's reconciliation initiative includes an offer of amnesty to many of the fighters the insurgency, which is dominated by the disgruntled Sunni Arab minority.

Spokesmen for two insurgent groups — the Islamic Army in Iraq and the 1920 Revolution Brigade — told Al-Jazeera television on Sunday that they would reject the initiative unless it included a timetable for the withdrawal of U.S.-led forces.

The spokesman for the Islamic Army, Ibrahim al-Shammari, also called for direct talks between insurgents and the United States.

Al-Maliki's government, which took office in May, has so far made little progress in healing the rift between Shiites and Sunnis, which widened dramatically after the Feb. 22 bombing of a Shiite shrine in Samarra.

The largest Sunni Arab bloc in parliament announced Sunday it was suspending participation in the legislature until a Sunni female lawmaker was freed by kidnappers who seized her and seven bodyguards in a Shiite part of Baghdad on Saturday.

Sunni politician Adnan al-Dulaimi called on other lawmakers to join the boycott, saying security officials bore responsibility for the abduction of Tayseer al-Mashhadani.

She was seized when her convoy was stopped by gunmen in a Shiite area of eastern Baghdad, just a few miles from where a car bomb blew up at an outdoor market another Shiite district, killing at least 66 people and wounding about 100.

That was the deadliest attack since al-Maliki's national unity government took office.

On Sunday, moderate Shiite legislator Iyad Jamal al-Din survived an assassination attempt when a roadside bomb missed his convoy in Baghdad.

Details Emerge In Alleged Army Rape, Killings (WP)

By Ellen Knickmeyer

The Washington Post, July 3, 2006

BAGHDAD, July 2 -- Fifteen-year-old Abeer Qasim Hamza was afraid, her mother confided in a neighbor.

As pretty as she was young, the girl had attracted the unwelcome attention of U.S. soldiers manning a checkpoint that the girl had to pass through almost daily in their village in the south-central city of Mahmudiyah, her mother told the neighbor.

Abeer told her mother again and again in her last days that the soldiers had made advances toward her, a neighbor, Omar Janabi, said this weekend, recounting a conversation he said he had with the girl's mother, Fakhriyah, on March 10.

Fakhriyah feared that the Americans might come for her daughter at night, at their home. She asked her neighbor if Abeer might sleep at his house, with the women there.

Janabi said he agreed.

Then, "I tried to reassure her, remove some of her fear," Janabi said. "I told her, the Americans would not do such a thing."

Abeer did not live to take up the offer of shelter.

DOJ_NMG_0038462

Instead, attackers came to the girl's house the next day, apparently separating Abeer from her mother, father and young sister.

Janabi and others knowledgeable about the incident said they believed that the attackers raped Abeer in another room. Medical officials who handled the bodies also said the girl had been raped, but they did not elaborate.

Before leaving, the attackers fatally shot the four family members -- two of Abeer's brothers had been away at school -- and attempted to set Abeer's body on fire, according to Janabi, another neighbor who spoke on condition of anonymity, the mayor of Mahmudiyah and a hospital administrator with knowledge of the case.

The U.S. military said last week that authorities were investigating allegations of a rape and killings in Mahmudiyah by soldiers of the 502nd Infantry Regiment, part of the 4th Infantry Division.

The mayor of Mahmudiyah, Mouyad Fadhil Saif, said Sunday that the case was being investigated by the U.S. military as an alleged atrocity.

Janabi was one of the first people to arrive at the house after the attack, he said Saturday, speaking to a Washington Post special correspondent at the home of local tribal leaders. He said he found Abeer sprawled dead in a corner, her hair and a pillow next to her consumed by fire, and her dress pushed up to her neck.

"I was sure from the first glance that she had been raped," he said.

Despite the reassurances he had given the girl's mother earlier, Janabi said, "I wasn't surprised what had happened, when I found that the suspicion of the mother was correct."

The U.S. military has not identified the victims. U.S. military officials contacted this weekend said they did not know the names of the people involved or most other details of the case, although one military official confirmed that according to preliminary information gathered by investigators, the family lived near a U.S. checkpoint and the killings happened about March 12.

The military official pointed to one discrepancy in the accounts, however. Preliminary information in the military investigation put the age of the alleged rape victim at 20, rather than 15, as reported by her neighbors, officials and hospital records and officials in Mahmudiyah.

U.S. soldiers at the scene initially ascribed the killings to Sunni Arab insurgents active in the area, the U.S. military and local residents said. That puzzled villagers, who knew that the family was Sunni, Janabi said. Other residents assumed the killings were sectarian, with Shiite Muslim militiamen as the likely culprit.

But on June 23, three months after the incident, two soldiers of the 502nd came forward to say that soldiers of the unit were responsible, a U.S. military official said last week. The U.S. military began an investigation the next day, the official said.

Officials said last week that none of the four soldiers under investigation had been detained, although one had been discharged for unrelated reasons.

Family members have given permission for exhumation of Abeer's body, Janabi and the mayor said.

The case is at least the fourth American military investigation announced since March of alleged atrocities by U.S. forces in Iraq.

The rape allegation makes the Mahmudiyah case potentially incendiary in Iraq. Rape is seen as a crime smearing the honor of the family as well as the victim in conservative communities here.

Death certificates viewed Sunday at the Mahmudiyah hospital identified the victims as Fakhriyah Taha Muhsin, 34, killed by gunshots to her head; Qasim Hamza Raheem, 45, whose head was "smashed" by bullets; Hadeel Qasim Hamza, 7, Abeer's sister, shot; and Abeer, shot in the head. Abeer's body also showed burns, the death certificate noted.

Janabi said U.S. soldiers controlled the scene of the killings for several hours on March 11, telling neighbors that insurgents were responsible. The bodies of the victims were taken to Mahmudiyah hospital by March 12, according to Janabi and an official at the hospital, who spoke on condition of anonymity.

On March 13, a man identifying himself as a relative claimed the bodies for burial, the hospital official said. An hour after the man left with the bodies, U.S. soldiers came to the hospital and asked about the bodies, the hospital official said.

The next day, the hospital official said, soldiers scoured the area, trying to find the funeral for the family.

"But they did not find it, simply because the relatives did not do it, because the death includes the rape of one of the family members, which is something shameful in our tradition," the hospital official said.

"The family kept the news a secret, fearing the disgrace," he said. "They thought it was done by militias, not U.S. forces."

Reached by telephone Saturday at his home in Iskandariyah, south of Mahmudiyah, a member of the extended family would not discuss the incident.

"What is the benefit of publishing this story?" said Abeer's uncle, Bassem. "People will read about this crime. And they will forget about it the next day."

DOJ_NMG_0038463

Investigations To Nowhere (NATLREVIEW)

By Byron York

National Review, July 3, 2006

It's probably safe to say that in October 2002, when she declared on the Senate floor that "intelligence reports show that Saddam Hussein has worked to rebuild his chemical- and biological-weapons stock, his missile-delivery capability, and his nuclear program," Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton had no idea that statements like hers would one day be the subject of a full-scale Senate investigation. Nor could she have known that when she added a statement on terrorist connections — "[Saddam] has also given aid, comfort, and sanctuary to terrorists, including al-Qaeda members" — she made it even more likely that someday her fellow senators would be poring over intelligence documents, trying to determine whether her declaration was justified on the basis of the intelligence available at the time of the Iraq War Senate debate.

And yet that is precisely what has happened. At this moment, the Senate Intelligence Committee is engaged in a protracted investigation of the public statements of President Bush, Vice President Cheney, top administration officials, lawmakers in the House and Senate, and even officials of previous administrations to determine whether they exaggerated, cherry-picked, misrepresented, or otherwise manipulated intelligence in the run-up to the war.

It's not going well. In fact, the "statements investigation" is the main roadblock to completion of what is called "Phase Two" of the committee's probe of pre-war intelligence. A look at its history is a case study in how the rationale for the war in Iraq has retroactively become hopelessly politicized — and why that is unlikely to change anytime soon.

As originally conceived in 2003, the committee's investigation was to focus on what went wrong with intelligence about Iraq's purported weapons of mass destruction. But from the beginning Democrats also wanted to investigate the Bush administration's use of the intelligence as it made the case for war. Most Republicans had no desire to go in that direction — they could see the whole thing turning into a political argument without end. Ultimately, a deal was struck. The committee would go ahead immediately with the basic intelligence investigation — dubbed Phase One — before examining the use of that intelligence in Phase Two.

Phase One was finished and the committee's report released in July 2004. To no one's surprise, it concluded that key intelligence judgments in the pre-war National Intelligence Estimate about Iraq "either overstated, or were not supported by, the underlying intelligence reporting." But it found "no evidence" that any of those mistakes were the result of political pressure from President Bush or members of his administration.

That left Democrats with a problem: The report did nothing to further the "Bush lied" theme that they hoped might help the party in the 2004 election. So Democrats pressed on for Phase Two. "I think people want their leaders to give them straight, unvarnished statements without exaggeration," Sen. Carl Levin, the number-two Democrat on the committee, told Roll Call in July 2004. "So if people believe that the administration or the president exaggerated or embellished intelligence, I think that there will be some people [who] would say that is a factor in their vote."

But, owing to the volume of the material involved, Phase Two couldn't be done quickly, and Republicans weren't keen to make it a priority. After the election, it progressed so slowly that Democrats shut down the Senate in November 2005 to protest the lack of progress. After that, things got moving.

As agreed to by Intelligence Committee chairman Pat Roberts and ranking Democrat Jay Rockefeller, Phase Two is actually five separate investigations. The first is a reexamination of pre-war intelligence; the second is an investigation of how the intelligence community used information provided by the Iraqi National Congress; the third is a look at the administration's pre-war assessments of post-war Iraq; the fourth considers Levin's allegations that former Pentagon official Douglas Feith distorted intelligence about the connections between Iraq and al-Qaeda; and the fifth is the public-statements probe.

Today, most of those investigations are nearing completion, with the notable exception of the public-statements matter. When it comes to that, the two parties have found it hard to agree on anything. After Democrats first proposed to investigate only Bush administration officials, Roberts pointed out that many members of Congress, as well as many members of the Clinton administration, had also made statements about Iraq's supposed WMD capabilities. Just look at what Senator Clinton said. And look at Ted Kennedy, who said, "We have known for many years that Saddam Hussein is seeking and developing weapons of mass destruction." And look at Levin himself, who said, "[Saddam Hussein] has ignored the mandates of the United Nations [and] is building weapons of mass destruction and the means of delivering them." Those statements should be investigated, too, Roberts suggested.

Then the chairman really surprised the opposition. When senators evaluate each statement in light of the intelligence that was available at the time, he proposed, they should do so blindly — that is, not knowing the identity of the speaker, so they would not allow any biases to influence their judgment on the appropriateness or inappropriateness of the statement. Only after making a ruling on a particular statement would a senator learn who had uttered it.

DOJ_NMG_0038464

It would not be an exaggeration to say that Democrats — behind the scenes, of course — went bonkers over that suggestion. What if they condemned a statement made by one of their own? That's not what the investigation was supposed to be about — remember "Bush lied, people died"? What had started as a way to criticize the Bush administration threatened to backfire on Democrats.

So far, the problem hasn't been resolved, and no senator has examined any statement by anybody. The Republican committee staff originally prepared a chart of 300–400 statements, consisting of the statement alongside the intelligence purportedly justifying it. At the request of Democrats, that chart has now been turned into a narrative running more than 800 pages. But it's not clear whether any senator will actually read it. Critics point out that many lawmakers never read the 90-page National Intelligence Estimate that underlay the administration's case for war. Will they plow through 800 pages now?

And what, precisely, is in the narrative? Sources won't say which specific statements are at issue. (One amusing thing about all this is that the committee is conducting a secret investigation of public statements.) But it seems clear from conversations with several sources that investigators are focusing on a predictable set of high-profile administration statements made in the months before the war.

One object of Democratic interest is President Bush's October 7, 2002, speech in Cincinnati, in which he made several specific references to Iraqi weapons programs. Democrats are also said to be focused on a speech by Vice President Cheney in Nashville in August 2002 in which he declared that "many of us are convinced that Saddam Hussein will acquire nuclear weapons fairly soon." And then there is the famous presentation by then–secretary of state Colin Powell before the United Nations, as well as then–national security adviser Condoleezza Rice's statement that "we don't want the smoking gun to be a mushroom cloud."

So far no senator, Republican or Democrat, has made any final judgment about anything. And it seems unlikely they will agree on much. How could they? They are approaching the war from strikingly different points of view, and it seems guaranteed that they will reach different conclusions from the same set of facts — something Pat Roberts seems to have known from the very beginning. "Early on in the debate," says one source familiar with the situation, "Roberts's position [toward Democrats] was, 'We are going to end up in this room at some point in the future arguing over highly subjective judgments over whether something is substantiated, and your politics are going to drive your judgment, and our politics are going to drive ours. And we're never going to finish.'"

Political Strategy (NEWREP)

By Peter Beinart

New Republic, July 3, 2006

Why doesn't George W. Bush want to win in Iraq? Seriously. The past several weeks have forced him to choose between two big goals: demonizing Democrats to help the GOP retain control of Congress and fostering a domestic climate that gives the new Iraqi government the best chance to survive. And, again and again, he has chosen door number one. This is what ex-Bush officials like Paul O'Neill and John DiIulio warned us about--and what Hurricane Katrina reaffirmed: that what matters in this administration is not policy, but politics. For all his talk about America's historical mission to defeat tyranny and spread freedom, there is only one mission to which George W. Bush has shown consistent devotion: winning elections. He acts less like the president than like the head of the Republican National Committee.

The situation in Iraq today is desperate but not hopeless. And, in the months to come, avoiding the abyss will require brutal compromises, not only in Baghdad, but in Washington--the kind that require support on both sides of the aisle. The good news is that the basic outlines of a deal to undermine the insurgency, break up the militias, and facilitate U.S. withdrawal are becoming clear. Sunni nationalist (as opposed to jihadist) insurgents seem increasingly willing to lay down their arms--if they are granted amnesty, the constitution is rewritten to accommodate their concerns, and U.S. troops leave. And, if Sunni insurgents stop massacring the Shia, then Shia militias may begin to disband.

That's the good news. The bad news is that envisioning the outlines of a final deal is a lot easier than achieving one. Ending the Iraq war will require agonizing concessions, not only from Shia, Sunnis, and Kurds--but from Americans as well. For starters, the United States will have to resist imposing a timetable for withdrawal, even though many Americans want one and many Democratic activists are demanding one. Such a plan must come from the Iraqi government, as part of a broader agreement with the Sunni insurgents and Shia militias. If the Iraqi government tells us to leave, it strengthens them--especially among the Sunnis who want us gone the most. But if we tell them we are leaving, it looks like a vote of no confidence in their ability to survive--which might embolden the Sunni insurgents to think they can win on the battlefield and, in turn, make the Shia militias dig in their heels.

For Americans, however, resisting a public withdrawal date is only the beginning. The truly gut-wrenching part will be looking the other way if Iraq's government allows insurgents who murdered heroic young Americans to go free. In blood-soaked societies, some kind of amnesty is crucial. Amnesties helped overcome the Islamist insurgency that ravaged Algeria in the 1990s, and they helped peacefully transfer power in South Africa, through the Truth and Reconciliation Commission. Like black South Africans who saw their families slaughtered under apartheid, some Iraqi Shia and Kurds who saw their families slaughtered by Saddam Hussein will have to accept a public acknowledgement of the truth but no full justice. And some grieving American families will have to as well. The United States can get Iraqi leaders to fudge this on paper. But, on the ground, an amnesty for some violent anti-U.S. insurgents may prove crucial to persuading Sunni nationalists to break with the foreign jihadists, lay down their arms, and give Iraq's new government a chance at life.

DOJ_NMG_0038465

Swallowing these concessions will require a bipartisan bargain--the kind of ceasefire required for difficult domestic changes like reforming Social Security or the tax code. Were he interested in such a deal, Bush would have invited top Democrats into his office after the formation of Iraq's new government and the death of Abu Musab Al Zarqawi and said something like this. "If you resist a withdrawal plan so the Iraqis can announce their own, I'll bring you in on the negotiations. In fact, I'll replace Donald Rumsfeld with a secretary of defense that you trust--why don't you suggest a few names. And, if you don't demagogue this amnesty stuff, I'll tell Karl Rove and his henchmen to stop calling you cowardly defeatists. That might hurt me this November, since slandering Democrats is my best chance of luring Republicans to the polls. But I'm more interested in winning Iraq than winning Ohio. And, to do that, I need your help."

Of course, over the past several weeks, President Bush has done exactly the opposite. Rove and company immediately wielded Zarqawi's death as a partisan club, saying that, if Democrats had their way, he'd still be loose. Then the White House and congressional Republicans rigged a phony, vicious Iraq debate in Congress, which saw Republicans call the main Democratic Senate plan (which didn't include a strict withdrawal timetable) "cut and jog"--only to announce days later that the Bush administration was considering something similar itself. All of which made Democrats trying to decide what was best for the country--as opposed to merely their party--look like chumps. Partisan acrimony, already stratospheric before the Iraq debate, is now even worse. And, among Democrats, the likely result will be greater demands for a public timetable for withdrawal and louder denunciations of amnesty for insurgents. (In Tennessee, Democratic Senate hopeful Harold Ford is already running ads on the subject.) It's hard to serve the national interest when the president of the United States does not.

This has been the Democrats' dilemma all along. From the beginning, Bush has preferred the war on terrorism as a wedge issue to the war on terrorism as a unifying national cause. In 2002, he staged a fight on the Department of Homeland Security, when a bipartisan compromise could easily have been had. That fall, he told Congress he needed its support to disarm Iraq peacefully--when he was already intent on war. He has refused to seek congressional authorization for government surveillance, even though Congress would have given him most of what he wanted. In short, he has done everything in his power to alienate Democrats from an anti-jihadist struggle that, without their support, he cannot win. If Michael Moore did not exist, Bush would invent him.

Politics, of course, does not--and should not--end in times of war. But mendacious, blood-sport politics should. Instead, it has emanated from the highest office in the land. And, if we lose in Iraq, it will be a major reason why.

Peter Beinart is editor-at-large at The New Republic and the author of The Good Fight: Why Liberals--and Only Liberals--Can Win the War on Terror and Make America Great Again (HarperCollins).

U.S.-Afghan Foray Reveals Friction On Antirebel Raids (NYT)

By Carlotta Gall

The New York Times, July 3, 2006

KABUL, Afghanistan, July 2 — A joint military raid by American and Afghan forces on an unobtrusive house here in the capital on March 20 has pointed up the tensions between the American military and the Afghan Defense Ministry over the conduct of counterinsurgency raids, particularly in Kabul, the Afghan defense minister says.

The raid, in which six men were detained, was led by masked American special forces, and included eight members of a unit of the Afghan National Army. The involvement of Afghan soldiers prompted the defense minister, Gen. Abdur Rahim Wardak, who had no advance notice of the raid, to bar Afghan Army personnel from taking part in any raids on houses or compounds.

"We really are trying not to get involved in these policing jobs at all, because that would ruin" the army, General Wardak said last week. "We want to just be in support of police, but not doing a policing job."

The American military, which has in the past resisted Afghan pressure for greater control of counterinsurgency operations, defended the use of Afghan soldiers in the raid. "Depending on the intelligence received and how time-sensitive an operation is, combined forces must often act quickly, using available resources and expertise for the particular mission required," Lt. Col. John Paradis, an American military spokesman in Kabul, wrote via e-mail.

DOJ_NMG_0038466

"The team was operating on very credible, detailed information, a tip, that certain individuals were linked to several anti-Afghan activities, including the use of I.E.D.'s," Colonel Paradis wrote, referring to improvised explosive devices, or roadside bombs.

Five of the men detained are sons of the head of the household, Hajji Aminullah. The brothers are well-known athletes — one a boxing champion and trainer, another a member of the national volleyball team — and never took part in fighting or politics, let alone insurgent activities, their father said. "My sons are not those type of people, to be involved in drugs or terrorism," he said. A neighbor who is a friend of the youngest son was detained but released two days later.

The Afghan Independent Human Rights Commission has taken up the brothers' case with the American military. "The issue we are bothered with is to get a response for the father and family, who are desperately waiting for news," said Ahmed Nader Nadery, the deputy commissioner.

The men are being held in the American detention center at Bagram Air Base, near here. Like most of the 500 men held there, they have no right to know the charges against them and no access to court proceedings, a lawyer or their families, except through short notes passed by the Red Cross, which told the family the men were there.

Getting rid of the black hole that detention at Bagram represents and ending raids and other American military activities that cause resentment among Afghan civilians are aims of the government, General Wardak said.

Afghanistan is fighting the most serious insurgent activity in four years, and, with the American-led coalition, has mounted a broad offensive across five provinces.

On Sunday, two British soldiers and their Afghan interpreter were killed in fighting with insurgents in Helmand Province in the south, military officials said, and a military helicopter crashed near Kandahar Air Base. No information on casualties was available.

Despite the continuing violence, the Afghan government says that raids, detentions and attacks on civilians are causing it to lose the public trust. "We have now an understanding that we should be very careful first to rely on very correct intelligence, because there have been cases where the wrong intelligence has resulted into wrong arrests," General Wardak said, speaking in English. "We think first it is a police job to search a place, and still we would not like the foreign forces to do the searching." The Afghan authorities have to be told of any raid and before any arrest is made, he added.

"We have been talking about this for quite a while," he said. "It has been gradually improving."

Next year the Defense Ministry is to take charge of a secure wing of Pul-i-Charkhi prison, on the eastern edge of Kabul, to guard nearly 100 Afghan detainees set to return from Guantánamo Bay, he said. They will be afforded full judicial rights, he said.

Afghan Army personnel are permitted to search houses only when pursuing militants on the battlefield and when no police unit is with them to do the search, General Wardak said.

The commander of the Afghan soldiers who took part in the raid, Lt. Col. Sher Ahmed, 51, confirmed that Afghan soldiers had been ordered not to take part in future raids. "We got an order that this should be the first and last operation raiding a house," said Colonel Ahmed, commander of the Third Company, First Brigade of the Afghan Army's Central Corps.

Captain Muhammad Nabi, 46, of the Third Company, which is based here, took part in the raid. His unit had gone out that day with American forces on a patrol to Logar Province, south of here, and on their return to Kabul went to Khair Khana, a district of Kabul, and surrounded a house, he said.

The raid was uneventful. He said that as far as he knew nothing incriminating was found. Mr. Aminullah, the owner of the house, said that he went to the neighborhood mosque for evening prayers around 7:30 p.m. and that soldiers prevented worshipers from leaving the mosque until 11 p.m.

He was allowed back into his house as his five sons, Muhammad Yousuf, 35, Muhammad Mohsin, 33, Muhammad Rahim, 31, Muhammad Nassar, 28, and Muhammad Saber, 20 — were being led away. "One did not have any shoes on, so I gave him mine," he said. The soldiers had discovered a large amount of cash in the house, and Mr. Aminullah said he snatched it back, explaining that it was his own money.

Hamidullah, 21, a neighbor and close friend of Mr. Saber, who had been sitting with the brothers, was also detained. "They started kicking the gate, and we thought it was thieves," he said. "They ordered us to lie face down." Then he was stood up and questioned, he said. "They started saying: 'You have narcotics. Where is the heroin?' I said, 'If you find any heroin in my house, you can shoot me,' " he said.

"We have been neighbors for 15 years, and I told them there were never any political problems going on here or in any house around," he said.

The American soldiers confiscated the brothers' cellphones and $4,900 that a business partner had given Mr. Rahim, more than 30 videotapes, mostly Western movies and sports events, and a big bag of sports equipment, Mr. Hamidullah said. The six were taken to the army base at Darulaman, where they were held in a wood hut, furnished with Army cots and guarded by three American soldiers, Mr. Hamidullah said. They were blindfolded when taken out individually for questioning by Americans or to visit a plastic portable toilet, he said. They did not see any Afghan soldiers while there, he said.

DOJ_NMG_0038467

The next day Mr. Hamidullah was questioned about the brothers. The American interrogator told him that nothing had been found and that they would be released. he said. But after two nights at the base, he was driven out blindfolded by an Afghan translator and dropped on the main road, while the five brothers were transferred to Bagram, he said. The Defense Ministry has confirmed that the five men are there.

Mr. Aminullah said he suspected that his sons' former partner in the business deal, Abdullah Shekib Satari, had planted false information to avoid paying money he still owed them after they withdrew from a joint investment in a sports shop.

Mr. Satari, who is general secretary of Afghanistan's boxing federation and ran unsuccessfully for Parliament last year, denied in an interview in his sports shop that he had anything to do with the arrests. "They are my best friends, and I want to help them," he said. "They did not have enemies."

Two British Soldiers Die In Attack In Afghanistan (WP)

By Tini Tran

The Washington Post, July 3, 2006

KABUL, Afghanistan, July 2 -- An insurgent attack on a British base killed two soldiers and an Afghan interpreter, military officials said Sunday, while at least 20 insurgents were killed in clashes and coalition airstrikes.

An AH-64 Apache attack helicopter crashed Saturday in an accident in southern Afghanistan, killing one crew member, the U.S. military said.

The deaths came during a massive anti-Taliban campaign in southern Afghanistan involving more than 10,000 Afghan and international soldiers. It is the largest military offensive since the Taliban government was ousted in a U.S.-led invasion in late 2001.

The two British soldiers died after their base was hit by small-arms fire and rocket-propelled grenades Saturday night in southern Helmand province, said Capt. Drew Gibson, a British military spokesman.

An Afghan interpreter was also killed, according to Canadian Maj. Quentin Innis. Four other British soldiers were wounded but are in stable condition, Innis said.

Two British soldiers were killed last week in an attack in the same district of Helmand province. A total of five British soldiers have been killed since the anti-Taliban offensive, dubbed Operation Mountain Thrust, began on June 15.

Violence has spiked in recent weeks as the NATO-led International Security Assistance Force prepares to take over responsibility for security in southern Afghanistan from U.S.-led troops.

Coalition aircraft bombed a suspected Taliban hideout in southern Helmand province Sunday, killing at least nine fighters, including a Taliban area commander, Tur Jan, said Ghulam Nabi Malakhail, the provincial police chief.

Innis confirmed the attacks and estimated that 12 to 15 insurgents were killed.

In a separate incident in the same district, 11 insurgents were killed by Afghan forces Saturday night during search operations, Malakhail said. Afghan forces came under fire from suspected militants and fired back, killing the 11 fighters, he said.

The U.S. helicopter plunged to the ground shortly after taking off from the Kandahar airfield while responding to a reported rocket attack against the air base, the military said in a statement.

One crew member was killed, and the other was injured and evacuated for treatment.

"The cause of the crash will be investigated, but we have ruled out enemy fire as a cause for the loss of the aircraft," the statement said.

There were no injuries reported from the rocket attack, the military said.

The continued violence has stirred fears among British lawmakers that security is rapidly deteriorating in Afghanistan. Britain has 3,300 troops involved in the current military offensive.

The insurgents are following the lead of fighters in Iraq and carrying out suicide attacks and roadside bombings that once were rare in Afghanistan.

"There are signs that the tactics that have brought such devastation to Iraq are being replicated in Afghanistan," the Foreign Affairs Committee of Britain's House of Commons said in a report Sunday on the foreign policy aspects of the fight against terrorism.

How To Help Afghanistan (WP)

By Ahmed Rashid

The Washington Post, July 3, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0038468

KABUL, Afghanistan -- The current political and military meltdown in Afghanistan was entirely predictable and avoidable. For the past three years Afghans, their president, Hamid Karzai, and foreign experts have been warning that the failure of the United States and the international community to provide sufficient economic, military and reconstruction resources to the fledgling Afghan government would lead to a Taliban resurgence and disillusionment among the Afghan people. That is exactly what has happened.

But there is still a way out of the mess if the international community and the Afghans pull together, rather than being at odds with one another. Karzai set the ball rolling late last month by calling for a joint strategy in a critical meeting with the most important foreign players in Kabul.

The situation is dire. The Taliban offensive in the south and the counteroffensive by British, Canadian and U.S. troops under NATO has escalated into a full-scale war, with a dozen attacks every day and 700 lives lost since mid-May. Most Afghans are angry with the United States and the West for ignoring the alleged sanctuary provided to the Taliban by Pakistan, and with Pakistani President Pervez Musharraf for apparently supporting Karzai and the Taliban at the same time.

Papering over the cracks between Pakistan and Afghanistan, as Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice tried to do in her recent visit to the region, is clearly not enough. The charges and suspicions on both sides have to be addressed. Ordinary Afghans say the Taliban virus is spreading. The Taliban have been reported just 25 miles from Kabul, and they have attacked in the north and the west -- hundreds of miles from their main bases in the south. According to the United Nations, every single day somewhere in Afghanistan a girls' school is burned down or a female teacher killed by the Taliban.

The riots in Kabul in late May that left 20 people dead were also indicative of how angry Afghans are at their own government. While Karzai has lashed out at the West for not providing adequate resources, Afghans and foreigners have been scathing in their criticism of his inability to govern effectively or to punish those in his administration who are corrupt or dealing in drugs.

Karzai has failed to put together an effective administrative team. The cabinet is dysfunctional, and his growing dependence on former warlords, whose militias have only recently been disarmed, is seen by many as a betrayal of the reform agenda set out in the Bonn agreement of 2001.

Karzai is right when he says that Afghanistan has received less aid than has been dispensed in any recent conflict including nation building, whether in the former Yugoslavia or East Timor. Building a new security apparatus run by Afghans is going too slowly. According to American officials, the U.S.-sponsored police training program is three years behind schedule, although Washington will provide $1.2 billion this year to equip 60,000 police officers nationwide.

A U.S. commitment to build a new Afghan army has been stymied by the irresponsible decision of Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld mandating an Afghan army that will be smaller than originally planned, with fewer weapons and with the cash-strapped Afghan government, rather than the Americans, having to pay the troops' salaries. (What a great morale booster for Afghan army recruits facing a full-blown insurgency!)

But saving Afghanistan from itself is the world's responsibility, not just that of the United States. The Europeans and the Americans differ on military and economic priorities and on the advice being given to Karzai. As NATO, with its large European troop contingents, replaces U.S. troops in the south and the east, the United States has to learn to share decision-making responsibilities in Afghanistan with NATO, the European Union and the United Nations, rather than cut its own secret deals in Kabul.

The United Nations has had the unenviable task of fulfilling the political mandate chalked out at Bonn, but today Afghanistan does have an elected president, parliament and provincial councils, and a constitution. Now the Security Council needs to give the U.N. officials in Kabul the responsibility for coordinating the international response to the crisis and economic and political strategies with the Afghan government.

Karzai addressed some of these issues in a recent meeting with the major players -- the United States, United Nations, European Union, NATO, Britain and Canada. He is determined that his government and the international community will coordinate better to devise a joint strategy looking at both the insurgency and at how reconstruction can be speeded up. He also needs to think long and hard about what constitutes good governance and set an example that his countrymen can admire rather than protest.

Despite all the dire predictions made in 2001, the Afghans have given the international community, its aid workers and soldiers a large window of opportunity to repair the damage done by 25 years of war. That window, which has stayed open for nearly five years, with amazing good will from the Afghans, is threatening to close unless the world wakes up and deals with the crisis.

Ahmed Rashid, a Pakistani journalist, is the author of "Taliban" and "Jihad: The Rise of Militant Islam in Central Asia."

U.S. Elite Forces Face Shortfall (USAT)

DOJ_NMG_0038469

By Tom Vanden Brook
USA Today, July 3, 2006

WASHINGTON — The Army, Navy and Air Force face shortages of elite special operations forces that are playing a leading role in the war against terrorism, military records show.

The shortfall of Army special operations, Navy SEALs and Air Force combat controllers persists as the Pentagon seeks to expand the forces by 15% over the next four years to bolster the anti-terrorism campaign.

One reason for the shortage is the intense training. The Navy says only 35 of 166 candidates will qualify as SEALs.

Retention also is a problem. Some veterans can make $780 a day as civilian security contractors in Iraq, says Rep. Jim Saxton, R-N.J., chairman of a House Armed Services subcommittee that oversees special operations troops. Bonuses as high as $150,000 have helped stanch that loss, he says.

The shortfalls affect:

·The Navy. It has 2,352 SEALs but is authorized for 2,684, says the Naval Special Warfare Command. Another unit of special warfare combatants has 563 people; it is authorized to have 653.

·The Air Force. It has filled 504 of 616 jobs for combat controllers who direct airstrikes; rescuers of wounded troops behind enemy lines; and combat weather forecasters.

·The Army. It has acknowledged a shortage of troops but won't give a precise number. The Army Special Operations Command said this year that it would take a few years to return "Army special forces units to full strength." The Government Accountability Office, the investigative arm of Congress, reported in 2005 that the Army had filled only 2,922 of 3,834 spots for sergeants in four Special Forces categories: intelligence, communications, engineering and medical.

The U.S. Special Operations Command says it has about 17,000 troops.

Pentagon officials say they can overcome the current shortfall and achieve the planned additions, the largest expansion of elite forces since the Vietnam War, with more trainers and more recruits.

"These are specialized skills and units that will be grown over time and in such a fashion that ensures they retain the highest quality and capability," said Bryan Whitman, a Defense Department spokesman.

Michael Vickers, a former Army special operations officer, agreed. "There's always a risk of diluting quality," but elaborate selection and training processes help prevent that, Vickers said.

Lt. Taylor Clark, a spokesman for the Naval Special Warfare Command, said it won't be easy to find more SEALs. The lures include a $40,000 bonus for graduates — and adventure.

"Instead of an office job where they might have a cubicle and do the same job day in and day out, you … will be a part of an elite team that travels the world looking for the bad guys," Clark said.

There have been some early signs of success. The Army's Green Berets had hoped to have 750 graduates per year by 2006. It exceeded that goal by 40 soldiers in 2005.

In 2005, the military began offering bonuses up to $150,000 to 19-year veterans with special operations experience who sign up for six more years. The Army gave the bonus to 118 soldiers last year and 99 this year, the Pentagon said.

Iran Again Rejects Deadline On Nuclear Plan (NYT)

By Nazila Fathi
The New York Times, July 3, 2006

TEHRAN, July 2 — Iran on Sunday again rejected a deadline to respond to an international proposal to end the standoff over its nuclear program, saying it would respond a month.

"We do not consider such statements as constructive and invite them to wait for our answer until next month," said Hamidreza Assefi, the Foreign Ministry spokesman, the ISNA news agency reported.

The next month in the Iranian calendar begins July 23. Mr. Assefi was responding to a statement made at a meeting of the Group of 8's foreign ministers on Thursday in Russia, during which they demanded Iran make a "clear and substantive" response to the proposal in a week. President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad had previously said Iran would give its answer around Aug. 23.

"We will take into account our country's rights and interests and will also try to alleviate the other side's concerns," Mr. Assefi said.

In June, Javier Solana, the European Union's foreign policy chief, offered Iran a package of proposals from Germany and the five permanent members of the United Nations Security Council: China, Russia, Britain, France and the United States. Diplomats have said it includes political and economic incentives and a promise to help develop Iran's nuclear program in return for its suspending nuclear enrichment.

Mr. Assefi said Sunday that Iran's chief nuclear negotiator would meet with Mr. Solana on Wednesday to discuss the package.

DOJ_NMG_0038470

In their statement, foreign ministers from the Group of 8 nations — United States, Russia, France, Germany, Italy, Canada, Britain and Japan — demanded a response from Iran to the proposals by Wednesday. The ministers said they expected that response to come when the Iranian negotiator, Ali Larijani, and Mr. Solana meet. Mr. Assefi said the offer had ambiguities that needed to be discussed. He said Europe should be thankful that Iran was "examining the proposal with such a positive attitude and precision."

In a separate news conference on Sunday, the minister of intelligence, Gholamhossein Mohseni-Ejei, linked the arrest of an Iranian-Canadian philosopher, Ramin Jahanbegloo, to what he said were efforts by the United States to start a "soft revolution" in Iran. Mr. Jahanbegloo has been jailed since late April, when he was arrested at the Tehran airport.

"The United States is pursuing efforts to start soft revolution in Iran and in many other countries and Mr. Jahanbegloo's arrest can be defined as part of that," ISNA quoted Mr. Mohseni-Ejei as saying.

"Mr. Jahanbegloo had an assignment and the intelligence apparatus became suspicious at the scale of his activities and resources" at his disposal, he said.

Mr. Jahanbegloo has not been allowed to see a lawyer. Independent human rights groups have said his arrest was politically motivated.

Iran Plans To Cut Gas Imports, Subsidies (WT)

By Andrea R. Mihailescu

The Washington Times, July 3, 2006

Iran, which relies on imports for almost half its refined petroleum products, plans to halt those imports and introduce gasoline rationing later this year, the government announced.

The decision appears related to a plan to allow the nation's heavily subsidized gasoline to spike in price in order to reduce the smuggling of fuel to neighboring countries, a practice that aggravates shortages and costs the country billions of dollars every year.

Analysts think Tehran may be acting to reduce its vulnerability to any international sanctions on its gasoline imports over its nuclear program. But similar attempts to lift subsidies on key commodities in other countries have sparked widespread unrest, and one Iranian member of parliament has said the government will not dare to go ahead with its plan.

Iran is the world's second-largest producer and exporter of crude oil, but its antiquated refineries are able to meet barely 60 percent of the domestic demand, according to government figures. Production stands at 10.5 million gallons a day, compared with daily demand standing at 18.5 million gallons.

Heavy subsidies -- which keep gasoline prices as low as 9 cents to 45 cents a gallon, depending on the quality and location -- meanwhile allow for huge profits on gasoline smuggled into neighboring countries, such as Afghanistan, Iraq, Pakistan and Turkey.

Iranian Oil Minister Kazem Vaziri Hamaneh announced June 23 on state television that the government planned to stop importing gasoline as of Sept. 23.

"As there is nothing provided for petrol imports in the second half of this [fiscal] year's budget ... the imports will naturally stop and petrol will be rationed," Mr. Hamaneh said.

Iran had been expected to spend $5 billion importing refined oil products in 2006. But the parliament budgeted only $4 billion for the purpose and, then in February, slashed that to $2.5 billion.

At the same time, the parliament backed a government initiative to limit the number of people permitted to purchase gasoline at subsidized prices, an initiative that has not been implemented.

In any event, prices generally will be permitted to rise in hopes of reducing the pressure on existing supplies by slowing the smuggling of Iranian gas into neighboring countries.

Iranian press last month quoted Gen. Ali Soltani, director of the campaign against economic crimes in Iran, complaining about the problem. "Every year, [310 million gallons] of refined oil products worth $1.18 billion are smuggled abroad," he was quoted as saying.

"Last year, we seized more than [13 million gallons] of oil products, which is equal to only 10 days of the trafficked amount," Gen. Soltani said.

Iraq, Iran's western neighbor, acted earlier this year to end a heavily subsidized gasoline program that was established during the rule of Saddam Hussein. Iraq also has become a recipient of Iran's cheap fuel.

The fuel smuggled from Iran is colored pink, while that from the refineries in Iraq has a clear color. Because substitution of inferior Iranian fuel is frequent, motorists typically smell and rub a sample of gasoline between their hands to see whether it has been watered down and color added before sale.

DOJ_NMG_0038471

Afghanistan is another recipient of smuggled Iranian fuel. The Iranian newspaper Mardom-Salari cited the Baztab news agency on June 6 as reporting that nomadic tribes on both sides of the border are actively transporting oil products to Afghanistan. Fuel thieves typically carry barrels full of oil products across the border at night.

The newspaper said many passenger buses also have concealed fuel tanks. Fuel thieves also use animals as a means of transport.

The long Pakistan-Iran border also is wide open to smugglers, despite denials from Pakistani officials. Smugglers pass through the checkpoints unchallenged and untaxed.

DOJ:

Supreme Court's New Man In The Middle (CSM)

By Warren Richey

The Christian Science Monitor, July 3, 2006

WASHINGTON

The US Supreme Court has grow nmore conservative with the addition of President Bush's two nominees, Chief Justice John Roberts and Justice Samuel Alito. But it will be a third justice, Anthony Kennedy, who will likely decide how far to the right the law moves under the new lineup of justices at the nation's highest court.

"Kennedy now holds the center of gravity on the court," says Jonathan Turley, a constitutional law professor at George Washington University. Prior to her retirement in January, Justice Sandra Day O'Connor was frequently called the most powerful woman in the country. As a centrist on the nine-member Supreme Court, she often cast the fifth and deciding vote in some of the nation's most contentious and important cases.

In years past, Kennedy shared the swing-vote designation with O'Connor. But with her departure he occupies the court's decisive center alone. That puts Kennedy in an even more powerful position than O'Connor, legal analysts say.

"He who casts the decisive vote is going to be the person with all the power," says Michael Dorf, a constitutional law professor at Columbia University Law School in New York.

Tom Goldstein, a Washington lawyer who has argued 16 cases at the Supreme Court, described Kennedy's emergence at a recent gathering of the American Constitution Society. "The basic principle you should understand is it is Justice Kennedy's world and you just live in it."

Kennedy's power was on full display last week when he joined the court's liberal wing to forcefully strike down President Bush's plan to put terror suspects on trial before military commissions at Guantánamo Bay, Cuba.

In other actions during the term, he cast the decisive vote in a case that makes it easier for convicted criminals to get another chance to present claims of innocence to a judge. He sided with the court's liberals in rebuking former Attorney General John Ashcroft for attempting to use his rule-making power to invalidate Oregon's physician-assisted suicide law. And he provided the decisive fifth vote to invalidate a congressional district in Texas drawn to protect an incumbent Republican.

On the conservative side, Kennedy provided the key fifth vote to uphold a Kansas death penalty statute that allowed the imposition of a death sentence even when jurors found that aggravating and mitigating factors concerning the crime and the defendant were evenly balanced. He voted with the conservatives to limit the scope of federal authority to protect the nation's water resources under the Clean Water Act. And he provided the decisive vote to eliminate application of the exclusionary rule to evidence obtained by police who fail to knock and announce their presence before bursting into a private home with a search warrant.Kennedy more reliable for the right

While such results demonstrate Kennedy's power to break deadlocks, they understate his role at the high court, legal analysts say.

Compared with O'Connor, Kennedy is a much more reliable vote for the conservative wing, analysts say. But they add that when he swings to the liberal side, he really swings.

One example was Kennedy's landmark opinion in a 2003 gay rights case called Lawrence v. Texas. The same characteristic came to the fore last Thursday in the Guantánamo military-commission case.

"He is not by nature a balancer, so when he comes out on the liberal side he is going to come out forcefully that way," says Professor Dorf, who clerked for Justice Kennedy in the 1991-92 term. "It is also because he has more of a libertarian streak than O'Connor," Dorf says.

Although Kennedy is clearly the swing justice now, he would hate being described as such, Dorf says. Kennedy does not position himself to wield a tie-breaker. "It is more that his substantive views end up placing him precisely in the middle of this court," Dorf says.

Professor Turley agrees. Kennedy, he says, is more likely than was O'Connor to try to maintain a consistent and coherent line in the law while breaking 4-to-4 ties.

But such consistency also comes at a price. When the high court deadlocked 4-to-4 this term over how to interpret the Clean Water Act, Kennedy sided with the conservatives enough to send the case back to the lower courts. But in a concurring opinion, he also expressed agreement with aspects of the liberal view of the case, staking out and defining a middle ground occupied by Kennedy alone.

The result is that very little was decided, and lower courts will be left to struggle through that indecision. In addition, environmentalists are worried about the scope of federal protection of remote wetlands, and developers are facing increasingly expensive delays and uncertainty.A check on the conservative wing

Others see in Kennedy's middle way a useful check on the conservative proclivities of the newly reconstituted high court. In his majority opinion in the police knock-and-announce case, Justice Antonin Scalia appears to be laying the foundation for a broader assault on the exclusionary rule, which prevents illegally gathered evidence from being presented in court.

In response, Kennedy, who provided the key fifth vote in that case, wrote in a concurring opinion that "the continued operation of the exclusionary rule, as settled and defined by our precedents, is not in doubt."

The sentence sent a clear signal to conservatives hoping to do away with the exclusionary rule, and to liberals hoping to protect it.

While the 2005 term was a time of transition at the high court, the stage is now set for what could become a blockbuster term next fall. The docket already includes cases dealing with global warming, punitive damage limits, affirmative action in public schools, and a federal ban on so-called partial-birth abortions.

In the affirmative action and abortion cases, analysts expect the court to split 4-to-4. The result: all eyes will be on Kennedy.

"Those briefs could just be mailed directly to his chambers," Turley says.

Disorder In The Court (TIME)

By Jeffrey Rosen

Time, July 3, 2006

Ordinarily the Supreme CourtÂ is not very much like The View. You won't hear much of the Justices' inner thoughts, let alone their outer ones. And with the exception of perhaps the Dalai Lama or, in his day, Alan Greenspan, they are the only people in power who can deliver their opinions and then steadfastly refuse to elaborate on them. Everything about the court's rituals is meant to keep the Justices behind the red velvet curtains and their emotions in check.

The first year of the Supreme Court under John Roberts, though, has not been ordinary. As evidenced last week when the court struck down the Bush Administration's use of military tribunals, the Justices are suddenly unafraid to talk to one another in personal terms. "We are not engaged in a traditional battle with a nation-state, but with a worldwide, hydra-headed enemy," wrote Clarence Thomas in an impassioned dissent. Thomas felt so strongly--he called the majority decision "unprecedented and dangerous" -- that for the first time in his 15 years on the court, he read his dissent aloud. The ordinarily genial Stephen Breyer responded indignantly that the court did not "weaken our Nation's ability to deal with danger." Congress, he added, "has not issued the Executive a 'blank check.'"

The pointed back and forth was characteristic of the sometimes barbed, often unpredictable and really quite fun Roberts court. It began with a surprising number of unanimous decisions, but by the time it adjourned for the summer last week, in what Justice John Paul Stevens called a "cacophony" of discordant voices, the usual decorous costume drama that is a Supreme Court term had morphed into something much closer--in vitriol, tension and drama--to a soap opera (O.K., a PBS soap opera). Having spent 11 years without a change in personnel, the Justices were clearly rejuvenated by two new colleagues, Roberts and Samuel Alito, and the energy fueled their opinions. Although the alliances on the Roberts court are still fluid, even the longest-serving Justices are debating issues that matter to the American people--the limits of death penalty, the war on terrorism--with unusual passion.

Despite the impression left by its rush of final decisions, the Roberts court is, at least so far, less fractured than the court led for 19 years by William Rehnquist. Almost half its decisions this year had no dissents, compared with 38% in Rehnquist's final term, and the tally of 16 cases decided by a 5-to-4 vote is seven fewer than under Rehnquist. That is a tribute to the personality and leadership skills of Roberts, who has made issuing strong decisions and encouraging collegial debate top priorities. In a commencement speech at Georgetown University Law Center in May, Roberts opened with some high-quality lawyer jokes, then set out his goals as Chief Justice: unanimity or near unanimity, which he thought would promote "clarity and guidance for lawyers and lower courts trying to figure out what Justices meant."

DOJ_NMG_0038473

Roberts emphasized that a good court should decide cases narrowly so Justices on both sides can reach a meaningful consensus. But he added an important qualifier: "There will of course be disagreements on the court, and these could and should not be artificially suppressed." Roberts practiced what he preached in his three dissents, using often forceful prose. "It is a sordid business, this divvying us up by race," he declared last week in the partisan-gerrymandering case, which left all but one of Texas' redrawn congressional districts in place. Earlier in the term, he attacked an opinion by Justice David Souter that held that a wife couldn't give the police permission to search a house over her husband's objection. "The majority reminds us, in high tones, that a man's home is his castle," Roberts wrote, "but even under the majority's rule, it is not his castle if he happens to be absent, asleep in the keep, or otherwise engaged when the constable arrives at the gate."

Souter responded in kind. "In the dissent's view, the centuries of special protection for the privacy of the home are over," he announced with an uncharacteristic note of melodrama. Having abandoned his famous Yankee reserve, he started to make a habit of it. During oral arguments in the Gitmo case, the government's lawyer seemed to suggest that Congress could suspend the writ of habeas corpus--which allows prisoners to challenge the legality of their detentions--inadvertently. Souter, incredulous, asked, "Isn't there a pretty good argument that a suspension of the writ [by] Congress is just about the most stupendously significant act that the Congress of the United States can take? The writ is the writ!" Antonin Scalia, one of the most reliable defenders of Executive power, insisted that Congress could suspend habeas corpus even if it didn't say so explicitly.

That mini courtroom brawl between Souter and Scalia, which had the overtones of an 18th century boxing match, was picked up again in the final days of the term. By a 5-to-4 vote, the court upheld a death-penalty verdict in Kansas, and Souter filed an agonized dissent listing recent cases in which DNA testing had led to innocent people's exoneration. Dripping with sarcasm, Scalia chided Souter for encouraging the "sanctimonious criticism of America's death penalty" that he said was common in "some parts of the world." "I say sanctimonious," Scalia added, "because most of the countries to which these finger waggers belong had the death penalty themselves until recently."

Scalia is famous for picking intellectual street fights on and off the court, and this year he has been even more pugnacious than usual. In March, Scalia ridiculed the challenge to military tribunals during a speech in Switzerland. "Give me a break," he declared. "I had a son on that battlefield, and they were shooting at my son, and I'm not about to give this man who was captured in a war a full jury trial. I mean, it's crazy."

A few weeks later, when a Boston reporter asked whether his participation at a Mass for Catholic lawyers might raise questions about his impartiality, Scalia fanned the fingers of his right hand under his chin. "That's Sicilian," he said, explaining that the gesture meant he "could not care less."

Scalia can always be counted on to pick a fight, but what has changed this year is that other Justices, once relative wallflowers, are increasingly emboldened to fire back in kind. In February, Ruth Bader Ginsburg, ordinarily a model of judicial composure, gave a speech in South Africa attacking critics in Congress who have assailed her citations of international law as an offense against U.S. sovereignty. Those criticisms, she said, "fuel the irrational fringe" and have encouraged threats on her life. She singled out Scalia, who had called the consultation of "alien law" a form of "sophistry."

Is the recent round of attacks and counterattacks a sign of internal animosity? Not necessarily. Ginsburg and Scalia, after all, are old friends, united by their love of opera and good cooking. For years they have spent New Year's Eve together, along with their spouses. (Ginsburg's husband Marty often cooks.) Certainly, there's nothing on the Roberts court resembling the antagonism among the Justices that raged after World War II. Consider the blood feud between Hugo Black and Robert Jackson, both appointed by Franklin Roosevelt. Jackson thought F.D.R. had promised to promote him to Chief Justice, but after a vacancy arose in 1946, Black threatened to resign if Jackson became Chief. That led Jackson to fire off an unhinged letter to President Harry Truman and Congress, accusing Black of unethical behavior. The '40s produced another nasty rivalry: Felix Frankfurter was so intellectually condescending to Chief Justice Fred Vinson that during one of the Justices' private conferences, Vinson rose from his seat and nearly punched Frankfurter in the nose. After Vinson died unexpectedly of a heart attack while the court was deciding Brown v. Board of Education in 1953, Frankfurter declared on the train back from the funeral, "This is the first indication I have ever had that there is a God."

By contrast, the Justices of the Roberts court are able to attack one another vigorously in public while maintaining cordial relations in private. Thomas, for example, has told students groups that he has never heard an uncivil word uttered at the Justices' conferences during his time on the court. And despite the disagreement in the military-tribunals case, Thomas is on good terms with his ideological opponent Breyer, who has praised Thomas' skills as a lawyer and photographic memory in technically complicated cases.

It's a good thing for the court and the country that the Justices of the Roberts court seem to be finding a way to disagree vigorously without taking it too personally. During his confirmation hearings, Roberts said, "It's my job to call balls and strikes and not to pitch or bat." Nevertheless, the court under his leadership will continue to decide some of the most momentous questions of American life. It has already agreed to hear important cases next term on the boundaries of affirmative action and abortion.

DOJ_NMG_0038474

Those are questions about which all the Justices have extremely strong views, and the fact that they are not shy about expressing them helps citizens on both sides of the issues feel as though their own views have been strongly represented and thoroughly aired.

Still, the Roberts court is walking a delicate line. History suggests that the moment the Justices begin to take their legal disagreements too much to heart, the court may fracture in ways that even the most capable Chief Justices are unable to repair. For that reason, all the Justices might do well to remember Ginsburg's advice for keeping your cool in the face of attacks. "I sometimes find myself alone in chambers momentarily distressed or annoyed," Ginsburg told actress Marlo Thomas in 2002, "thinking, I'd like to strangle Justice So-and-So." At times like that, Ginsburg said, she remembers the advice of her mother-in-law on her wedding day: "Of course, it is important to be a good listener--but it also pays, sometimes, to be a little deaf."

> Rosen's latest book is The Most Democratic Branch: How the Courts Serve America (Oxford University Press)

Hill GOP To Put Heat On Bush For More Judges (WT)

By Charles Hurt

The Washington Times, July 3, 2006

In coming weeks, Republicans on Capitol Hill plan for the first major push on judges since Chief Justice John G. Roberts Jr. and Justice Samuel A. Alito Jr. were confirmed to the Supreme Court.

In the nearly six months since Justice Alito was confirmed, only 14 federal judges have been seated. That's the slowest six-month period since early 2004, according to documents kept by the Department of Justice's Office of Legal Policy.

The plans for renewed emphasis on judges comes after a consortium of conservative leaders expressed deep displeasure with both the White House and Republican leaders on Capitol Hill in recent months over the slowed pace of confirmations.

"We write to remind you of your duty, but also because we are concerned that if the Majority that assured the confirmation votes of Chief Justice Roberts and Justice Alito lose just one seat in the next election, the future of the Supreme Court and the federal appellate bench will again be imperiled by the use of filibusters," the conservatives wrote in a letter to Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist, Senate Majority Whip Mitch McConnell and other Republican leaders in the body.

In particular, said the conservatives led by former Frist aide Manuel Miranda, Republicans' best hopes for keeping their majority in the Senate could rest on the issue of judges.

"We write because we fear that the Majority is ignoring the impact of the nominations debate on its ability to gain the support of those small margins of voters that the Majority needs to secure unobstructed confirmations," they wrote.

The 83 signers of the letter also include such conservative icons as Paul Weyrich, Alan Keyes, Richard Viguerie, Abigail Thernstrom, David A. Keene, L. Brent Bozell III and Bill Donohue.

Efforts to draw attention to the federal bench got a boost last week with the Supreme Court decision that the administration had overstepped its constitutional boundaries by using military tribunals -- rather than civilian courts -- to try enemy combatants held at the U.S. Naval Base Guantanamo Bay, Cuba.

Conservatives think that most American voters support Mr. Bush's efforts to fight the war on terror and that the high court's ruling will underscore yet again how out of touch the court is. Also, the decision caused something of a conundrum among liberal advocacy groups, who hailed the ruling after years of dire warnings about the consequences of allowing Mr. Bush to put people on the Supreme Court like Justices Roberts and Alito.

On the day of the ruling, People for the American Way issued a statement calling it a "major defeat for the Bush administration" and a "victory for the rule of law."

Later that same day, the group issued a second press release about the court's term in general. Instead of listing all of what it sees as disastrous rulings by the Bush court that it had been predicting for so long, the group instead warned that "next year's cases could signal acceleration of the ultraconservative trend."

Just last week, Mr. Bush sent 10 judicial nominations to the Senate, including names for four seats on U.S. courts of appeals.

The nominations were announced shortly after Senate Judiciary Committee Chairman Arlen Specter, Pennsylvania Republican, told The Washington Times that he couldn't understand what was taking Mr. Bush so long to offer new nominations.

"Not only am I expecting it, I've been expecting it for about six weeks," he said.

"There is an issue here as to how long we're going to be able to confirm judges," Mr. Specter said. "You know the Democrats are salivating to take over the Senate, and if they think they can take over the Senate, it would be a very different confirmation process if [Vermont Sen. Patrick J.] Leahy is the chairman."

DOJ_NMG_0038475

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

Unclear What Impact DOJ Report May Have (GUAMPDN)

By Sunmi Kang

Guam Pacific Daily News, July 3, 2006

The fallout over the federal investigation of a possible link between disgraced lobbyist Jack Abramoff and former Democratic Gov. Carl Gutierrez remains unclear.

The U.S. Department of Justice on Friday issued a report on the replacement of Frederick Black as the island's U.S. Attorney, in which lobbyist Jack Abramoff told investigators he was helping Gutierrez get rid of Black. Gutierrez on Saturday denied those allegations.

Former Guam delegate and Democratic gubernatorial candidate Robert Underwood, in a phone interview from Seattle, said the case warrants further investigation. In particular, he said, inquiries should be made into whether Abramoff received monetary compensation of any kind and where that money might have come from. Gutierrez on Saturday said he nor his administration never paid Abramoff for any lobbying efforts.

Underwood went on to say that if any additional information of a conspiratorial nature is revealed in subsequent investigations, those responsible should be prosecuted. Accountable "First of all, the voters should hold them accountable and secondly the law should hold them accountable," he said.

While Underwood had no comment on how the report might affect voters in the upcoming elections, he said now is a critical time for voters on island.

"People have to decide at some point how (the administration) is going to be," he said. "Is it going to be open and transparent or is it going to be closed and manipulated?"

Republican Gov. Felix Camacho, who is running for reelection, yesterday in a written statement declined to comment on the report, saying it is inappropriate to comment on an ongoing federal investigation.

On the issue of the report and this year's gubernatorial elections, Camacho's office said: "The governor believes that people will make an informed decision based on the character of candidates, their records and the issues."

Delegate Madeleine Bordallo could not be reached for comment yesterday, her office said. The Pacific Daily News also tried to reach Lt. Gov. Kaleo Moylan, who's running for governor, but was unsuccessful in its attempts.

While some are calling for more comprehensive investigations, others contend reaction to the Justice Department report is still premature.

Antonio Charfauros, chairman of the Democratic Party of Guam, said it is still too early to tell whether the federal report will be negative or positive for the party itself. However, he said the report will most likely not bode well for the Gutierrez campaign down the line.

"Once people start digesting this information, the impact will be probably be very negative," he said.

Negative light Charfauros, who has already started fielding calls about the report, said whether this puts one candidate at an advantage over the other is anyone's guess.

Charfauros said any investigation, let alone one on a federal level, does not reflect well on the party in the public's eye.

"People don't want to see anymore negative issues like this to come out," he said.

He said the gubernatorial election will be determined by votes from independents — some 10 to 15 percent of the voting population, Charfauros estimated.

Though the recently released report has stirred more than a few political pots, most residents seem ambivalent. For them, they say, it's politics as usual.

"I don't think (the report) is going to impact voters too much," said 39-year-old Sinajana resident Jeanette Concepcion. "I think people already have decided who they want to vote for and they are going to stick with that."

Concepcion said she is disdainful of the mud-slinging political tactics.

Concepcion said though she will vote in the gubernatorial election, she is weary of the divisiveness and chronic problems.

"I just wish everyone had a common goal," she said, to work together for a better community. She said politicians should pay more attention to issues like the state of the economy and the quality of life here.

Tamuning resident 44-year-old Richard Waters, who considers himself an independent voter, said island politics have been too marred by nepotism and corruption.

"It's follow(ing) the family tree," he said.

While public reaction to the report remains lukewarm, more questions are bound to be raised over time, Underwood said.

DOJ_NMG_0038476

"It is not the future of individual parties that's at stake," he said. "It's our confidence in our own ability to govern that's at stake."

Gutierrez Praises Report (GUAMPDN)

By Gaynor Dumat-ol Daleno

Guam Pacific Daily News, July 3, 2006

Former Gov. Carl Gutierrez yesterday praised a recently released federal investigation into the removal of former acting U.S. Attorney Fred Black, saying Black's smear of his replacement, Leonardo Rapadas, is a "prime example of his operations."

Gutierrez yesterday released a written statement responding to the report, accusing Black of blocking local attempts at self-government. During a Saturday interview with the Pacific Daily News, Gutierrez denied statements in the Department of Justice report that lobbyist Jack Abramoff was working on his behalf to get Black removed.

Gutierrez in yesterday's statement acknowledged meeting with Abramoff during a dinner in the nation's capital, where the topic of Black's nomination came up, but he did not elaborate on what happened after that, saying only that he found it "interesting" that Abramoff wanted to meet him. A Justice Department Office of Inspector General report, released Friday in Washington, D.C., states that Abramoff told federal investigators he began working on behalf of Gutierrez, who was governor at the time, to lobby for the removal of Black when certain Gutierrez administration officials were under federal investigation.

According to e-mails from Abramoff cited in the report, Gutierrez and former Sen. Mark Charfauros wanted a business associate of Gutierrez's son-in-law to replace Black. But when Abramoff's lobbying group found out the selection of Lenny Rapadas as U.S. Attorney for Guam and the Northern Marianas was well under way before its lobbying, Abramoff still took credit for the removal of Black and the selection of Rapadas, according to the report.

In one e-mail, he told a lobby shop colleague to "spin, spin, spin" that their lobbying had led to the replacement of Black and selection of Rapadas.

"Abramoff's e-mails confirm that in later February 2002, he became involved on Gutierrez's behalf to oust Black from the interim U.S. Attorney position," according to the federal report, issued after an investigation based on allegations from Black. Black had also sought to become nominated to the U.S. Attorney position in a permanent capacity, according to the report.

Abramoff strategy Because the Bush administration, which ultimately makes the nomination for U.S. attorney, would prefer a political appointee who is supported by Republicans at the local level, the report says part of the Abramoff strategy against Black was to paint him as a local Democratic supporter.

Abramoff said he was provided a copy of a letter Gutierrez had written years earlier, when the White House was under the Democratic leadership of President Clinton. In the letter, Gutierrez had described Black as a "good Democrat," according to the report.

Upon receiving the old Gutierrez letter, Abramoff sent it in an e-mail to members of his lobbying team who handled Guam and Northern Marianas issues, according to the federal report. Abramoff e-mailed the letter to Michael Williams, Todd Boulanger, Tony Rudy and Kevin Ring, Abramoff associates at lobby shop Greenberg Traurig. Abramoff and Rudy have pleaded guilty in a broadening influence-peddling case in the nation's capital.

The report states Abramoff, in the Feb. 25 e-mail, described Black as "a total commie," who "has been bashing the CNMI nonstop in the past ... we need to get this guy sniped out of there."

The U.S. Attorney's Office under Black had pursued corruption-related prosecutions involving members of the Gutierrez administration. Several members of the Gutierrez administration had been charged in federal court, and some of them, including former Gutierrez Chief of Staff Gil Shinohara, have been convicted.

Dinner meeting Gutierrez, in his statement yesterday, said he first met Abramoff at a February 2002 dinner in Washington, arranged by Charfauros, a self-proclaimed friend of Abramoff.

In the Justice Department's Inspector General report, Charfauros was identified as Abramoff's main contact on Guam to link to Gutierrez.

Gutierrez's press release yesterday states he met Abramoff while attending a National Governors' Association meeting.

The federal report said, based in part on information from Abramoff, that before the Gutierrez-Abramoff dinner, Abramoff had been working alongside Guam Republicans.

In his press release yesterday, Gutierrez said: "Mark Charfauros told me that Jack Abramoff wanted to meet his most formidable foe in Guam."

"Back then, I didn't know the extent of Abramoff's involvement in the 1998 election fiasco, and I thought it was interesting that he wanted to meet me. I never refuse to meet with anyone, including adversaries," Gutierrez added.

In 1998, when it appeared Gutierrez and his Republican opponent, Joseph Ada, would face off in a runoff election, Abramoff had offered a campaign strategy, according to Pacific Daily News files. The runoff didn't materialize because of a court ruling that paved the way for Gutierrez to serve his second term. Gutierrez is running for governor in the November election, with running mate Democrat Sen. Benjamin J. Cruz.

Gutierrez said the other attendees of the February 2002 dinner with Abramoff were:

Former first lady Geri Gutierrez;

Gutierrez son-in-law Chris Stahl, Carla Gutierrez Stahl and their daughter Lilly;

Former Sen. Charfauros and his wife;

Former Guam Army National Guard Adjutant Gen. Benny M. Paulino and wife Bernie;

Former Gutierrez administration Deputy Chief of Staff Joshua Tenorio;

Former Commission on Decolonization Executive Director Leland Bettis and wife Melissa; and Former Gutierrez Washington staff members John Whitt and Mary Eva Candon.

"At the dinner, Gutierrez recalled that Abramoff raised the subject of Black recommending himself for the U.S. Attorney position in Guam, saying that Black was claiming to be a member of the Republican Party," according to Gutierrez's press release yesterday.

Gutierrez in the press release said he told Abramoff that he had signed a letter in January 1995 to former President Clinton recommending Black to be U.S. Attorney. "Contrary to what Fred Black reported to investigators, he was the one that approached me about signing a letter of recommendation he had drafted," Gutierrez stated.

Black was off island over the weekend when the Pacific Daily News contacted him for comment, but his continuing employment as a part of the U.S. Attorney's Office on Guam, albeit with a diminished role, bars him from giving media interviews, he has said.

Charfauros on Saturday told the Pacific Daily News he disputed the federal report linking Abramoff and Gutierrez to a plan to remove Black. Charfauros said while he did ask his friend Abramoff for help in securing a confirmed U.S. Attorney for Guam, he did not work with Gutierrez on the matter.

'Blatantly racist' The federal report, which is based on an investigation stemming from allegations by Black, also states that Black has given unfavorable comments about other previous candidates for U.S. attorney for Guam and the Northern Marianas.

In that context, Gutierrez yesterday saw the report in a positive light.

"I am very pleased that the Department of Justice has issued this report, which exposes the inappropriate attempts by former acting U.S. Attorney Fred Black to block the appointment of any local attorney to be U.S. Attorney. It is scathing by all counts and further supports my contention that Fred Black abused his authority as the acting U.S. Attorney. Fred Black successfully eliminated any local candidates for U.S. Attorney for 11 years by alleging that all potential candidates had connections to family members who were suspected of corruption. This is blatantly racist," Gutierrez said.

"The bottom line is this -- for 11 years Fred Black smeared Guam's political leaders and the people of Guam as being corrupt," Gutierrez said yesterday.

On Saturday, Gutierrez denied ever pushing for a business associate of his son-in-law as Black's replacement, as stated in the report.

The report states Abramoff's March 2002 e-mails reflect Gutierrez and Charfauros favored an attorney from the Washington, D.C., law firm Patton Boggs for Guam U.S. attorney.

"Abramoff told the (Office of Inspector General) that the attorney had worked with Gutierrez's son-in-law on a business matter," according to the report.

The report did not mention the Patton Boggs attorney's name.

Stahl, Gutierrez's son-in-law, was president of a company, GIPR, that was on contract as a marketing consultant for the local government's attempt under the Gutierrez administration to sell the Guam Telephone Authority. Stahl worked with Patton Boggs in the GTA privatization, but their joint efforts were unsuccessful in selling the government phone company. GTA was privatized in January 2005, two years after the Gutierrez administration left office.

According to a local government audit, GIPR was paid about $1.7 million in fiscal years 2001 and 2002, while Patton Boggs was paid about $903,000 in fiscal 2002 for its involvement in GTA privatization attempts, according to Pacific Daily News files.

"Carl Gutierrez Had Nothing To Do With This" (GUAMPDN)

By Steve Limtiaco

Guam Pacific Daily News, July 2, 2006

Charfauros disputes DOJ report on Black

Former Democratic Sen. Mark Charfauros yesterday acknowledged that he probably was lobbyist Jack Abramoff's closest friend on Guam, but he disputed a U.S. Department of Justice report released yesterday, linking Charfauros and former Gov. Carl Gutierrez to a plan to remove interim U.S. Attorney Frederick Black.

According to the report, investigators found a January 2001 e-mail from Charfauros to Abramoff, stating that Gutierrez would be unofficially "funnelling" his candidates for U.S. Attorney and judiciary appointments through Abramoff's office.

Charfauros yesterday evening said he did ask his friend Abramoff for help in securing a confirmed U.S. Attorney for Guam, but said he was not working with Gutierrez on the matter and did not send the e-mail stated in the report. "No way. I'd like to see that e-mail. That didn't happen. I never filed any kind of e-mail, saying that nominations are gonna come out of Carl Gutierrez. Carl Gutierrez had nothing to do with this whole issue," Charfauros said.

According to the report, Abramoff spoke to Gutierrez at a dinner in the nation's capital, and said he was aware that Gutierrez wanted Black removed from his position, "in part because of an ongoing corruption investigation Black's office was pursuing into the activities of certain members of the Gutierrez administration."

According to the report, Abramoff's e-mails confirm that in February 2002 he became involved on Gutierrez's behalf in a plan to remove Black.

Charfauros, who once was chairman of the legislative judiciary and criminal justice committee, said he always was interested in getting someone confirmed to the U.S. Attorney job on Guam, and said it did not matter who that person was.

"We have never had the ability to have the clout in Congress to confirm a U.S. Attorney for Guam," he said.

He said he went to his friend Abramoff for help. "Me and Jack's relationship was purely friendship... And this is an issue which is really unfair for Jack because he did this for no pay."

Charfauros also disputed the statement in the report that he hates Black.

"I don't think I hate Fred Black. The only thing I can say about Fred Black was there was a choice between Fred Black and Lenny Rapadas, and the only one I felt was gonna make it was gonna be Lenny Rapadas. He was the only guy I felt would get a confirmed nomination."

Charfauros, who in 1997 was sued by the Gutierrez family for slander, and who countersued them, yesterday described his relationship with the former governor, saying he wanted Gutierrez investigated because of allegations of wrong-doing. He said he started to "think twice" after federal investigations yielded no convictions against Gutierrez.

"I asked that Carl Gutierrez be investigated, and this investigation was done extensively and nothing came out of it. If I was gonna take this any further, then it would basically be personal, and it was never really personal," Charfauros said.

Abramoff: Gutierrez Wanted Black Out (GUAMPDN)

By Gaynor Dumat-ol Daleno, Dionesis Tamondong

Guam Pacific Daily News, July 2, 2006

Disgraced lobbyist Jack Abramoff has told federal investigators and said in e-mails that he worked on behalf of then-Gov. Carl Gutierrez to remove Frederick Black from being the top federal prosecutor on Guam, a new federal report states.

In a Feb. 25, 2002, e-mail, Abramoff wrote Black is "a total commie ... and has been bashing the CNMI nonstop in the past ... we need to get this guy sniped out of there." The e-mail is quoted in the newly released U.S. Department of Justice Office of Inspector General report from Washington, D.C.

Gutierrez late yesterday said he never asked Abramoff to help oust Black from his position. "I've never tried to get Fred Black removed," said Gutierrez, a gubernatorial candidate in this year's election. "As a matter of fact, I nominated him when I first became governor."

The Justice Department report stems from Office of the Inspector General's investigation into Black's allegations that Abramoff worked to get him demoted because he was leading corruption investigations involving people in the Gutierrez administration.

The investigation also was prompted by Black's allegation that Abramoff wants him out of the federal prosecuting loop because he supports applying U.S. immigration laws in the Commonwealth of the Northern Mariana Islands for national-security reasons.

Black could not be reached for comment yesterday. He previously has declined to comment on the Abramoff issue because he works under Rapadas.

"We are opposed to Black. He has been screwing us for years in the CNMI, so this is good payback. I don't care if they appoint Bozo the clown, we need to get rid of Black," Abramoff wrote in a March 6, 2002, e-mail to members of his lobbying firm at the time, Greenberg Traurig.

Abramoff pleaded guilty in January to mail fraud, conspiracy and tax evasion in connection with his lobbying work. He is cooperating with a broadening investigation that has so far produced five convictions.

The federal report states "Abramoff's e-mails confirm that in late February 2002, he became involved on Gutierrez's behalf in a plan to oust Black from the interim U.S. Attorney position."

A few months ago, the Gutierrez camp had portrayed itself as a victim, rather than a partner, of Abramoff lobbying. Gutierrez has served two gubernatorial terms and is running in the November gubernatorial election.

But while the report provides a direct link between Gutierrez and Abramoff on certain attempts to have Black removed, the report also concludes that Abramoff's efforts to influence the White House appointment for U.S. Attorney for Guam and the Northern Marianas did not matter because by the time Abramoff got involved, Leonardo Rapadas already had been chosen by a Justice Department selection panel for the job, and "it was too late to affect the selection," according to the report.

"Abramoff told the (Office of Inspector General) that he recalled being involved in attempts to influence the Guam U.S. attorney nomination beginning in February 2002," according to the report.

"At that time, Abramoff was pursuing a $1.3 million contract with the government of Guam to pursue its interests, including attempting to increase airplane flights to and from Guam," according to the report.

As part of his efforts to obtain the contract, Abramoff met Gutierrez, who was then governor, at a dinner in Washington, D.C., states the report.

'We may have talked' "Abramoff, who had previously worked on behalf of Gutierrez's Republican opponents, said he was aware at the time that Gutierrez wanted Black removed in part because of an ongoing corruption investigation Black's office was pursuing into the activities of certain members of the Gutierrez administration," states the report.

Gutierrez yesterday said he, along with his family and other government of Guam officials, did meet Abramoff at the Washington, D.C., dinner.

"We may have talked about how Fred Black is hurting the island of Guam. Maybe he came to the conclusion that Fred Black was persona non grata as far as I'm concerned out here, not necessarily for myself but for the people of Guam."

Gutierrez, who was hosting a party at his home yesterday evening, called about five minutes after an initial interview with the PDN to say that former Sen. Mark Charfauros was the one who spoke with Abramoff and asked him to see what he could do to oust Black from his position and to move Rapadas' nomination forward. The report states that Abramoff's main contact on Guam in getting to Gutierrez was Charfauros.

Former Sen. Randy Cunliffe, who was at Gutierrez's party last night, also said Charfauros was the one who spoke with Abramoff. Cunliffe said he was speaking as Gutierrez's attorney.

Gutierrez also said that neither he nor his administration paid Abramoff for any lobbying efforts.

Charfauros in a phone interview yesterday said he did ask Abramoff for help in getting a permanent U.S. Attorney for Guam, but he did not work with Gutierrez on the issue.

On Feb. 26, 2002, after Gutierrez and Abramoff's dinner meeting, Michael Williams, a lobbying associate of Abramoff, sent an e-mail to Abramoff stating that Tony Rudy, who also was in the Abramoff lobbying group, was ready to speak to the White House about "killing" the U.S. attorney candidate (Black's role as acting U.S. attorney)." Williams also suggested that the lobby group suggest "a good Republican alternative," according to the report.

By March 4, 2002, Abramoff's e-mails reflect that Williams had learned that Gutierrez and Charfauros favored an attorney from the Washington, D.C., law firm Patton Boggs for the Guam U.S. attorney position, according to the report.

"Abramoff told the (Office of Inspector General) that the attorney had worked with Gutierrez's son-in-law on a business matter," according to the report. The report did not mention the Patton Boggs attorney's name.

Gutierrez yesterday denied those allegations.

Gutierrez son-in-law Chris Stahl was president of a company, GIPR, that was on contract as marketing consultant in the local government's attempt under Gutierrez's administration to sell the Guam Telephone Authority. Stahl worked with Patton Boggs in the GTA privatization, but their joint efforts failed.

Rapadas subsequently was confirmed by the Senate to replace Black, who had held the position in an interim capacity for years.

The federal report states even after Abramoff knew his lobbying efforts against Black were not what ultimately led to the selection of Rapadas, he took credit for the removal of Black and Rapadas' nomination.

In March 2002, after Abramoff found out that Rapadas had been selected as the replacement for Black, Abramoff e-mailed Michael Williams, an associate of his at the Greenberg lobby shop, to "play it" to their Guam contacts as though their lobbying efforts where what "killed Black," according to the Office of Inspector General report.

On March 8, 2002, Williams e-mailed Abramoff that although the "good news" was that Black would soon be out, the "bad news" was that the Patton Boggs attorney did not make the final cut, according to the report.

Abramoff added in an "e-mail that the Patton Boggs attorney was 'out of the process already. Spin spin spin,'" states the report, quoting from the Abramoff e-mail.

DOJ_NMG_0038480

Abramoff and Williams proceeded to track the process in the Senate for confirming Rapadas, according to the report.

Another e-mail reflects that Williams was told by his congressional contacts on May 7, 2002, that Rapadas was on the Judiciary Committee docket the next day and was expected to be "reported favorably" by the committee.

Two days later, on May 9, 2002, after the full Senate voted to confirm Rapadas, Williams e-mailed the news to the governor's son-in-law and asked that the governor be notified.

Fewer prosecutions The report also states that Black alleged that under Rapadas and First Assistant U.S. Attorney Ross Stoddard, Guam saw fewer prosecutions of federal corruption cases, and corruption matters have not been pursued to the degree they should have.

The FBI special agent who has led the public corruption cases on Guam since 1999 said that while the number of cases has gone down, that is due to "the normal cycle of cases," according to the report.

"The special agent stated that the (task force on public corruption) focused its energy on Gutierrez administration cases, and now reached the end of that road so it was necessary to build up some new cases," according to the report.

The report also states that according to the FBI special agent, since the change in the gubernatorial administration on Guam, "the number of public corruption referrals went down."

Tenet CEO Tries To Erase Effects Of Scandals (WSJ)

By Rhonda L. Rundle

The Wall Street Journal, July 3, 2006

Trevor Fetter inherited a financial and legal morass in 2003, when he took the top job at Tenet Healthcare Corp., the big hospital operator. Now, with most of the company's legal woes behind him, Mr. Fetter is turning to his next task: moving on.

Tenet last week agreed to pay the Justice Department $725 million to settle a host of investigations, including allegations that it gamed the Medicare system to generate lucrative payments it didn't deserve. The long-running saga, which hammered the company's stock price and led to the ouster of previous management, also cast a pall on Tenet's future. In recent years, Tenet's hospital roster shrank 40% to 68, as the company sold off many of the facilities where revenues were pumped up by questionable Medicare payments.

Now, Mr. Fetter's job is to restore Tenet's reputation and upgrade cash-starved facilities. The biggest challenge will be to persuade doctors to send more patients to Tenet hospitals, many of which languished as Tenet conserved cash in anticipation of the Justice Department settlement. Today, those hospitals lack the latest CT scanners and other high-tech equipment that doctors crave.

Mr. Fetter is prescribing both culture change and nuts-and-bolts operating improvements. His predecessor built Tenet over eight years through acquisitions, resulting in a deal-driven hospital company that rewarded executives for financial performance. Mr. Fetter himself was part of that management team for several years before leaving in 2000 to run a Tenet spinoff company. He was recruited back after Tenet's problems hit and eventually rose to chief executive. In that role, he has shifted incentives, including executive compensation, to spur quality improvements for patients. And he consolidated headquarters in Dallas last year, moving out of Santa Barbara, Calif., the location former management favored.

Even Tenet's critics give it credit for improving. But rivals aren't standing still, and a physician shortage in many communities is making it that much more difficult to recruit. Mr. Fetter shakes off the pessimism. "The table is set if we can get patients to come in," he says.

In their investigations, the Justice Department and U.S. attorneys in half a dozen cities didn't prove that Tenet had committed crimes. But Tenet acknowledges that a flawed culture led to an aggressive pricing strategy, which blew up when Medicare officials and private insurance companies discovered they were paying too much. "I hope we have changed the culture," Mr. Fetter says, "because ultimately your culture is your only protection."

One root of the trouble, Mr. Fetter says, was insufficient interaction among senior managers. He has imposed a three-day "no fly zone" during the third week of every month, when the company now holds a regular management meeting. In Dallas, he moved senior executives from their 16th-floor offices to rub shoulders with direct reports on other floors. He brought back suits and ties.

Behind the scenes, Tenet has been mending fences with doctors. Mr. Fetter, Chief Operating Officer Reynold Jennings and individual hospital CEOs have been making personal visits to ask doctors what Tenet can do to make their jobs easier. Some of the complaints can be addressed at little expense: Surgeons, for example, want operating rooms to operate efficiently and on-time to maximize the number of procedures they perform in a day.

Physicians at Houston's Cypress Fairbanks Medical Center complained that bottlenecks resulted in a shortage of critical-care beds, forcing the hospital to turn ambulances away from the emergency room. After an extensive evaluation, the hospital assigned more housekeepers to arrive after lunch, when rooms typically are vacated. Surgeons who tended to miss early start times in the operating room were assigned to later slots. "Patient flow isn't very fancy, but it's the kind of thing that makes Southwest Airlines" so successful, says Terry Wheeler, the hospital's chief executive.

DOJ_NMG_0038481

Such changes have boosted volumes, but Tenet hospitals have been hurt by rivals who have taken advantage of favorable interest rates to finance swank new buildings and expensive equipment. "Tenet really hasn't been able to do that, which puts them at a significant disadvantage," says Sheryl Skolnick, an analyst at CRT Capital Group. "The doctors tell us that Houston Northwest, once their crown jewel, is falling apart."

Tenet acknowledges that Houston Northwest Medical Center, built in the 1970s, needs updating. The company is expected this week to provide details of how it will allocate some $800 million available for capital investment this year. The cash will go to buy multislice CT scanners, MRI machines, nuclear-medicine cameras and expansions and renovations of emergency rooms and heart catheterization and other labs.

Under previous management, capital investments tended to be glossy, high-visibility programs rather than physician-friendly upgrades. Tenet often lured cardiologists, orthopedic surgeons and other star specialists with lucrative financial arrangements that appealed more to their pocketbooks than to other professional instincts. Some of those deals drew government scrutiny and contributed to Tenet's reputation for being profit-hungry.

Tenet now has halted those deals, making high-quality care the attraction for both doctors and patients. The strategy turns necessity into a virtue as government programs and private insurers increasingly steer patients to doctors and hospitals based on quality measurements. "People will eventually start paying for quality," predicts Jennifer Daley, Tenet's chief medical officer and a former associate professor of medicine at Harvard Medical School. Other medical experts share her view.

Dr. Daley took her current job after Mr. Fetter pledged that Tenet's quality efforts would be real and transparent. "I'm not going to be part of window dressing," Dr. Daley says. "My goal is [for Tenet hospitals] to be in the top 10% to 20%."

In the past, Tenet had refused to participate in quality assessments that invited potentially negative comparisons with rival hospitals. Dr. Daley has insisted that the company begin submitting data to the Leapfrog Group, an industry consortium, and the California Healthcare Foundation, an independent philanthropy dedicated to helping consumers make informed health-care decisions.

Her efforts got the attention of Tenet hospital CEOs when they learned that some 30% of their compensation would be tied to quality metrics, such as progress in reducing hospital-acquired infections. Executives can check their scores on an internal Web site as part of an incentive system that took effect in January 2004. "My phone started ringing off the hook," Dr. Daley says, as hospital executives asked for help improving their numbers.

Tenet's efforts are paying off: United Health Group Inc.'s UnitedHealthcare, the big health insurer, gave its "premium" designation to 18 Tenet cardiac care centers. And in December, the American Heart Association awarded 12 of 50 performance achievement awards to Tenet hospitals. The awards go to hospitals that adhere to guidelines aimed at ensuring that patients get the right medicines and instructions to prevent a second heart attack or stroke.

The achievement is striking in comparison with another dark chapter from Tenet's past, in which two renegade doctors at a Redding, Calif., facility were accused of performing hundreds of unnecessary heart surgeries over a 10-year period. In 2004, Tenet agreed to pay $395 million to settle most of the resulting civil litigation and sold the hospital.

"Having 12 of [the heart-association awards] is significant," says Gray Ellrodt, chief of medicine at Berkshire Medical Center, a Pittsfield, Mass., hospital that isn't part of Tenet. "That is a good-faith effort to do this right."

Austin Banker Near Victory In S&L Suit (AAS)

By Robert Elder

Austin American-Statesman, July 3, 2006

Austin real estate developer Alfred Hughes was close to giddy when he acquired an El Paso savings and loan in 1988.

"We're sitting on top of the world," he said after federal regulators approved the purchase. "We're very comfortable working in a regulated environment."

Less than two years later, regulators shuttered El Paso Federal Savings and Loan. For the past 16 years, Hughes has been trying to collect the $46.5 million he says the government cost him by improperly closing and then liquidating the institution.

Among the assets Hughes lost when the thrift closed was his ownership of 4,500 acres of Steiner Ranch in western Travis County, now a development of high-end homes.

Although the legal battle may roll on, in a continuing echo of the massive savings and loan crisis of the 1980s and early 1990s, Hughes won a big victory last month. Senior Judge James Merow of the U.S. Court of Federal Claims awarded Hughes the full amount, ruling that a 1989 federal law had unfairly imposed new financial requirements on thrifts.

The U.S. Department of Justice has two more avenues of appeal: the Court of Appeals for the D.C. Circuit and the U.S. Supreme Court. Arlene Groner, a Justice Department attorney, did not return calls for comment.

DOJ_NMG_0038482

